When I say crude passion, I refer to the manner in which, to take a concrete example, a child will represent the passion of anger—by stamping the feet, by shaking the arms, or seizing the first object at hand, and venting its wrath upon that. That is an elemental passion. The average adult manifests his anger in another way: it is usually by the upraised chest, the erect head, and the passion is revealed by a torrent of words, accompanied by a flashing eye. Now, with an uneducated adult most of the earlier manifestations cease, and the mime of that type who wishes to represent anger reverts to the old-fashioned method of "ranting." The late Barry Sullivan used to play Richard III. in this "ranting" fashion, representing the mere externals of the character, and little of the soul of the man. The method Henry Irving employed was to represent the spirit of the man, the more intellectual way, therefore the more appreciated.

As to the matter of "realisation," let us revert to La Figlia di Jorio. How does D'Annunzio wish his characters to be realised? I venture to think that he desires the witch to suggest the weird mystery of her personality, the transforming power of love upon that personality changing her into part devil, part angel, and part child. What does Signora Aguglia do? In the first Act you see a poor hunted thing huddled in a heap by the fire, absolutely terror-stricken, and when Aligio attempts to lay hands upon her, the vision of an angel beside her stays his hand. But there is nothing in the acting of Aguglia to prepare you for this sudden revelation—no weird fascination to help you to understand why Aligio is haunted with the vision of Mila. In the love scene (second Act) she is adequate, but as for the horrible grossness of the Lazzaro scene, I find it difficult to believe the author intended this. As for the third Act, Aguglia's powers are mostly spent, and she can only "rant" in a diminished key. In spite of the fact that the author intends the dénouement to reach the heights of antique tragedy, and that Signora Balistrieri and Cav. Grasso make us believe this is the intention by their dignified attitude, Mila reduces her acting to the level of melodrama. There is nothing wonderful in that—our "third-rate" mimes do it every day.

As to these marvellously swift transitions from harshness to sweetness, if you possess a paucity of voice-tones it is very probable you change these very quickly—at least, it seems obvious. My complaint is that she has little versatility in her voice—it varies from a flute-like quality to a husky, sharp, staccato note—and her face is not sufficiently mobile to permit of a wide range of expression. Grasso's case is different. He has complete command over his technique, is able to reserve and abandon himself at will, and varies his expressions by infinite nuances and characteristic actions.

Now for the theory. It is very old, and it leads to the conclusion that crude natures are capable only of representing crude passions. Marcus Aurelius touched upon this subject when he regretted that the high lessons of comedy had sunk to mere mimic dexterity, to exhibitions of sheer animalism. St. Augustine was dealing with a similar theory when he claimed a distinction between the lower and the higher forms of the drama—between the lower and the higher passions. Schiller taught that the uncultivated taste embraces first the novel and surprising, the extravagant and bizarre, the vehement and wild, and avoids all calmness and simplicity. It delights in harsh transitions, dazzling contrasts, pathetic tones. That represents the Sicilians' position, contrasted with a supposedly refined audience, possessing a softness which has degenerated into effeminacy, and mistakes violence of desire for energy of feeling—the energy of feeling which would have arisen had they been treated to really intellectual acting. I think the cultured Frenchman whom Mr. Morant indicates will be in possession of those ideas, and, assuming that, cannot imagine the exclamation of wonder coming from him.

If acting were merely the art of imitation, then Diderot would be justified. But it is admitted that the possession of certain mental powers are required as well. Mental action is the continuous differentiation and integration of states of consciousness. These mental powers are the re-representative feelings of the actor. A reference to Herbert Spencer will inform us that the minds that are most developed emotionally, like those which are most developed intellectually, are filled with imagination, in which the degree of re-representation reaches its extreme. In the most famous mimes you will find this gift of introspective feeling is great. Talma could remember his own personal emotions, and reproduce these when he wished to simulate them in certain characters. The primitive actor states and accentuates the elementary and physical attributes of a character, the modern devotes himself to the task of revealing mental states; he seeks to adumbrate the intellectual qualities more than the merely external passions. The Sicilians emphasise the latter, the elemental part of their characters; but I for one could not perceive anything of their vie intime. One wanted to understand why they did certain deeds, not how they did them. The audience were moved at the condition of the actors in certain pathetic situations, they were not moved with them—an important difference. Compare the effect produced upon an audience witnessing Paolo and Francesca with that produced on one witnessing Malta. Both deal with "the ennobling passion of love," yet one is concerned with the higher passions and the other with the lower. In Paolo and Francesca we know something of the state of the lover's souls; in Malta we only see the baser physical passions.

As for tears—real tears—any capable actress can give you the trick of them. Henry Siddons used to tell how the great Mrs. Siddons grew pathetic or tragic on a bottle of stout! East Lynne is a tear-provoking play, yet I have heard no one belaud the tear-stained actresses who produced that lachrymose effect.

Cav. Grasso is an artist because he is possessed of the two main qualifications for the actor's art—sensitivity and intelligence. In other words, his passions, save on one or two occasions when he is tempted to emulate his fellows, are tempered by intellect and reason. Most nearly of all his company he approaches the ideal of the actor as being the interpreter of the human heart. And now will Mr. Morant state what his objections are to this theory?

ROBB LAWSON.

THE FRENCH PEASANT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I thank you for printing my letter. I did not intend to defend the French peasant only. I think Mr. Machen is too severe on human nature generally. Mathew Arnold, in "Essays in Criticism: Pagan and Mediæval Religious Sentiment," quotes from a Roman Catholic source a terrible description of life and morality under paganism and the Cæsars, and observes:—

"The colours in this picture are laid on very thick, and I, for my part, cannot believe that any human societies, with a religion and practice such as those just described, could ever have endured as the societies of Greece and Rome endured, still less have done what the societies of Greece and Rome did."

In the same way, although I believe the French are now a decadent, or, at least, a very old, race, I do not think that Zola is a true portrait-painter of any portion of their social life: his mind has been compared to a distorting mirror in which objects, mostly phallic, are horribly exaggerated. Brunetière, in the essay in "Le Roman Naturaliste," to which I called attention, compares (page 352) the cruel, contemptuous treatment of the poor in the novels of the French realists, from Flaubert downwards, with the kindly touch of Tolstoi, Dostoievsky, Dickens, and George Eliot; and observes that the lack of sympathy in the observation of the French writers named is the cause of a barren superficiality which does not promise well for their permanence in the future.

If we take the poor in Great Britain as lovable and virtuous because Scott and Dickens have so depicted them, and the French poor as sordid and wicked because certain novelists have seen nothing else in them, I think every one must agree with me that we should make a serious mistake; for, assuredly, the Eternal Power does not favour us with all the good grain and our neighbours with all the tares! Any reader interested in the question will find another emphatic denial of the truth of "La Terre" as a veracious document in the first volume of Anatole France's "La Vie Littéraire."

In conclusion, though it is a purely personal matter, I can assure Mr. Machen that I am incapable of quoting Smollett (whom I detest) on any question of Art, or any politician on a question of Poetry. In either direction I should a thousand times prefer Mr. Machen as a guide, though I do sometimes think him a little intolerant!

H. M.

[Mr. Machen writes:—I have already given my reasons for believing that Zola's report is to be trusted; I have said that it does not seem probable that the man who was ready to endure persecution and banishment in the cause of justice was likely to be the author of a malignant libel on his fellow-countrymen. Brunetière, I think, was a student of books rather than of men; and I see no grounds for giving such preponderating value to his opinions on the subject of the French peasantry. It may be pointed out, by the way, that it is not "immorality" (in the common sense) which constitutes the gravest accusation of "La Terre," but rather a mixture of ferocity and avarice. I disagree with the theory that "sympathy" is necessary to literature that would be immortal; there is, on the contrary, a remarkable lack of sympathy in Swift's account of the Yahoos. Finally, on the personal point, I would assure "H. M." that there is no intolerance involved in the statement that the result of two added to two is four.]

THE LATE SIR JAMES KNOWLES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—THE ACADEMY of the 22nd ult. mentions Professor Seeley as being one of the four survivors of the Metaphysical Society, founded by the late Sir J. Knowles. Seeley died in 1895, and the successor to his chair, Lord Acton, is dead also.

ALCOHOL AND TOBACCO

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—If it be not already too late, may I be allowed to express a view upon one of the questions that Messrs. Robert Lutz and Caleb Porter have been discussing in the columns of your interesting journal?

Even if isolated cases could be proved wherein tobacco and alcohol were found to have been deleterious or the reverse, even so, isolated cases in a matter such as this prove nothing. What, in Heaven's name, does Mr. Caleb Porter or Mr. Robert Lutz know of the inner workings of Fra Angelico's or Tennyson's brain when these artists were inspired? Who can analyse an inspiration? Flaubert said he could think best when in repose; Nietzsche said his mind was most active when he was walking.

It appears to me that the question should be approached from a totally different direction if we are to be at all clear about it. Tobacco and alcohol as "Dinge an und für sich" have no voice in the matter. Why have not Messrs. Caleb Porter and Robert Lutz asked themselves what it is that constitutes genial artistic work? I suppose no one will deny that genial artistic work is that work which is done while the artist is wholly possessed by his inspiration. It is work which the inspiration accomplishes through the subjected artist; it is work in which the artist's will surrenders to the will of the inspiration. But the will of an inspiration is so despotic that it abominates interruptions. What is it, let us ask, that causes interruptions in the expression of an inspiration? The answer is, that interruptions are the result of self-criticism. "That self-criticism can be exercised during the execution of a genial piece of artistic work," ought to be an impossible proposition—it is, in fact, a contradiction in terms. Once the work is done the artist may become a self-critic if he choose, and all conscientious artists do, at this period in their work, become self-critics; though, should they become so at an earlier period, their work is surely flattened.

A simple example of my meaning may be sought in the practice of reading aloud. Every one who is in the habit of reading aloud knows perfectly well that the excellence of his declamation depends to a great extent upon his remaining unconscious of how he is reading. So long as he remains unconscious the reading flows regularly and sweetly; but the moment he attempts to criticise himself—the moment he becomes self-conscious of the working of his muscles—the regular flow stops, his reading becomes halting and lame, and he finds himself stammering over a word, or forgetful of the correct intonation which the punctuation prescribes.

Now in Coleridge's decanter of laudanum and in Tennyson's pipe I see but the weapon which these artists instinctively sought in order to wield them against their inspiration's bitterest enemy—"self-criticism." The inspiration must be master at all costs. "But I am morbidly self-conscious," said Coleridge in his heart of hearts. "I am hard to please, and am most hard to please where my own work is concerned," said Tennyson to his artist's soul—; hence Coleridge's decanter of laudanum and Tennyson's pipe.

If a proof of this theory be required, let us ask ourselves why it is that technical errors so often creep into work which we are bound, in spite of all pedantic prejudices, to class as masterly. Musset's poems are genial; they coulent de source. Yet technical errors abound in Musset's poems, errors he would not have committed had he been constantly self-critical. But had he been constantly self-critical his poems would not have been genial.

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer AND PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908 :—

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

In fact, Mr. Gordon did not speak or write a word of English till well in his teens. But that did not prevent him from earning, for his Jewish stories, the title of "The Jewish Kipling." However, for his novel, "The New Galatea," Mr. Gordon has chosen a thoroughly English group of characters, and handles a theme which in its boldness is reminiscent of the most advanced Continental writers, with a delicacy which cannot offend even the most Puritanical taste.

LIFE AND LETTERS

The Archbishop of Canterbury's letter to Mr. G. M. Scott, secretary of the Diocesan branch of the Church of England Temperance Society, comes none too soon to save the face of the Bishops. Although couched in cautious language, it practically amounts to a counterblast to the Bishop of London's reckless and ill-considered remarks on the Licensing Bill. Dr. Ingram has a positive genius for doing and saying the wrong thing, and in his haste to bless Mr. Asquith's "temperance" Bill, he did not hesitate to make use of language which must have appeared, to the unfortunate sufferers whose property would be swept away if the Bill became law, either cynical or hypocritical. We give the Bishop of London every credit for the best possible intentions, but he has before now given evidence that the wisdom of the serpent is lacking to his character. It will not be forgotten that he was guilty of the profound and far-reaching error of publicly, in the pulpit, expressing his enthusiastic approval of a vulgar and blasphemous sensational novel, and thereby giving it an advertisement which its publishers were not slow to turn to their and the author's advantage.

The Bishop of London has no claim to speak for the Church of England, and his sentiments on the Licensing Bill represent the personal sentiments of Dr. Ingram, who thought "When It Was Dark" a fine and noble work, no more and no less. The Archbishop of Canterbury has pointed out that the Church of England Temperance Society is by no means committed to approval of the Bill:

So far (he says) as the financial details are concerned, the Society has deliberately expressed its readiness to await further discussion and elucidation before committing itself to the opinion that as they now stand they are just or fair.

Nobody wishes or expects Bishops to be trained actuaries, but in a matter so intimately connected with finance as Mr. Asquith's Licensing Bill we do expect them to listen to those who are competent to speak with knowledge before rushing into a position which can be made use of by unscrupulous party politicians for their own ends. This, according to the Archbishop of Canterbury—who speaks with authority and wisdom—is precisely what they intend to do, and we have no fear that they will ultimately be found willing to be parties to any proposals which involve injustice and spoliation, or to consent to do wrong in order that possible good may come.

It is not necessary to "review" Mr. Upton Sinclair's new book, "The Metropolis" (Edward Arnold), in the pages of THE ACADEMY. We have dealt more than once in our columns with the horrible corruption that has penetrated into the veins and sinews and bones of the body politic of the United States; and we need only call attention to "The Metropolis" as the corroboration of all that we have said, as the justification of our most severe accusations. Of course no such justification was necessary; the daily paper gives almost day by day details sufficient to convince the most prejudiced reader; still, it is as well that Mr. Sinclair, who stirred the world with his account of the material poisons which America manufactures, should have drawn this vivid picture of the social and spiritual venoms which are being distilled by this body of death and corruption.

"The Metropolis" is by no means a great work of art, it is a vivid and impressive tract. Here is a passage which describes the city of New York:

It was a city ruled by mighty forces—money forces; great families and fortunes, which had held their sway for generations and regarded the place with all its swarming millions as their birthright. They possessed it utterly—they held it in the hollow of their hands. Railroads and telegraphs and telephones—banks and insurance and trust companies—all these they owned; and the political machines and the legislatures, the courts and the newspapers, the churches and the colleges. And their rule was for plunder; all the streams of profit ran into their coffers. . . . A great editor or Bishop was a man who taught their doctrines; a great statesman was a man who made the laws for them; a great lawyer was one who helped them to outwit the public.

Mr. Sinclair does not attempt to give the causes of this great pourriture; and his remedy, one judges, is a social revolution. Doubtless a revolution of some kind is inevitable, but we question its remedial effects. America may be roughly divided into the enormously rich and the wretchedly poor, but there is no reason to believe that the latter are possessed of more wisdom or of more virtue than the former. The United States are a commonwealth, or a congeries of commonwealths, which have been built up and welded together in direct defiance of every known principle of good—of such defiance "The Jungle" and "The Metropolis" are the natural and inevitable results. No more deadly punishment can be awarded to man under certain circumstances than to give him what he asks for. The child who cries to play with the fire is, now and then, so unhappy as to get the fire. The United States clamoured for hell and death—of course, under certain specious aliases—and they now possess the desire of their hearts.

It would be unfair to lay the offences of another American book in any special sense on America. "The Home Life of Poe," by Susan Archer Weiss (Broadway Publishing Company), is one of the most contemptible books that we have ever read; but one fears that its object—to vilify the memory and to enlarge on the weaknesses of splendid genius—illustrates a weakness, a malevolence rather, that is common to all races. The truth is that the profane vulgar (who are to be found amongst peers as well as amongst peasants) hate the great artist, and have always, perhaps, hated him. It is possible, no doubt, that here we have another facet of the jewel Equality; it may be that the mob resents the fact that John Smith, who looks like one of themselves, sees visions that they cannot see, hears voices that they cannot hear, speaks words that their lips cannot utter or understand. At any rate, the fact remains: John Smith is hated, secretly or openly, and the only relief is to discover that he sometimes took too much to drink. Susan Archer Weiss tells us—we knew it before—that the great Edgar Allan Poe, being poor, grief-tossed, neglected, starved, occasionally got drunk. The greater part of this deplorable book is made up of idle gossip and hearsay; still there is no doubt that Poe, a man of an exceedingly nervous temperament, did now and then exceed, and the race that persecutes the prophets and throws filth on their graves will be rejoiced accordingly. John Smith was not such a wonderful man after all! It is a pity that Susan Archer Weiss did not inform herself that Poe never wrote a poem called "Ullalume," and that his life was never written by a person named "Ingraham." The man—or woman—with the muckrake should at least be accurate.

In the current volume of the "Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature," to which we have already referred, is an interesting paper on Dante's British Allusions, by Mr. W. A. E. Axon. All are, of course, well known to students of Dante, who will, nevertheless, welcome this convenient collection. Some are familiar to all students of literature. Such are the allusions ("Inferno," 12, 118) to the heart of Henry of Cornwall, the nephew of Henry III., "which is still venerated on the Thames;" ("Inferno," 28, 118-142), to "the young King," more probably Henry, eldest son of Henry II., at enmity with his father by the incitement of Bertrand de Born; ("Purgatorio," 7, 131), to "the King of simple life, Henry [III.] of England." Another point—the question concerning the "Inferno," 30, 49-135, whether "Maestro Adamo," until recently called "Da Brescia," the counterfeit coiner, was not actually an Englishman—will be newer to most people. We protest in passing against the misuse of words evolved by the misplaced patriotism which includes Richard of St. Victor and Michael Scott under the term "British." We have no objection to the inclusion of St. Anselm, because he is one of the chief glories of an English See. The term "British," applied collectively to literature and the other arts in Scotland and Ireland in the thirteenth century, cannot be justified.

To one question, long debated among Dante scholars, we call the attention of our readers, and especially of collectors of curios and amateurs of mechanics, since they may be able to throw light upon it. In the Paradiso, 20, 139, &c., Dante likens the wheeling and antiphonal chanting of certain saints to a clock:

Che l'una parte e l'altra tira ed urge Tin tin sonando con sì dolce nota.

It has been suggested by the late Dean Plumptre of Wells, and others, that Dante refers particularly to a clock at Glastonbury, made by Peter Lightfoot, a monk of that monastery, in the early part of the thirteenth century, and now extant in Wells Cathedral. The suggestion has been made on the analogy of the revolution of the figures of armed knights when the clock strikes with the circling of the saints described by Dante. Dean Plumptre could not find any trace of such a clock elsewhere before the middle of the fourteenth century.

From Dante's possible reference to such a clock the Dean drew the inference that Dante may possibly have visited Glastonbury. It appears to us and many commentators by no means certain that Dante refers either to any particular clock, or to any clock adorned with moving figures; his simile is equally just in the case of a clock without them. If the experts on clocks can cite the existence of another clock similar to Peter Lightfoot's as early as his, their discovery would weaken the possibility, which is all that Dean Plumptre claimed for his suggestion. Mr. Axon is careful to point out that the presence of Dante in England at all remains a desirable, but improbable possibility. No argument worthy of the name of evidence can be found in Dante's works. The genuineness of Boccaccio's Epistola to Petrarch is unproved, and even if it were certainly genuine the words:

Traxerit ut iuvenum Phoebus per extremosque Britannos prove nothing as against Boccaccio's silence in his "Vita di Dante" and elsewhere. Nor, as Mr. Axon also points out, does Serravalle's unsupported statement in his book, written in 1417, prove more than a polite desire to gratify two of his patrons, the English Bishops of Bath and Salisbury.

The fragment of the uncanonical Gospel found at Oxyrhynchus in December, 1905, recently published for the Egypt Exploration Fund, edited and translated, with a commentary by Mr. Grenfell and Mr. Hunt, is not so interesting as the two former discoveries of Logia. It relates an altercation between Christ and a certain Pharisee, a chief priest, possibly named Levi, concerning ritual and moral purification, which arose because He walked with His disciples in a certain "place of purification" within the Temple and looked upon "holy vessels," contrary to the law. Christ retaliates by accusing the priests of performing their ablutions in "the pool of David," whereinto "dogs and swine were cast day and night," and by likening them to "harlots and flute-girls, who anoint and wash and wipe and beautify for the lust of men."

The teaching conveyed is but a weak expansion of passages in the Gospels concerning the cleansing of the cup and platter. The use of the term "the Saviour" as a simple designation of Christ strikes even the mere Bible-reader as strange. The editors confirm this impression by pointing out that "the Lord" was His common designation until Origen used "the Saviour." Its use may denote Gnostic influence. Apart from grammatical peculiarities, the chief points of scholarly interest are the use of the words ἀγνευτήριον in connection with the Temple; the correct reference to the white garments worn by officiating priests; and the use of red in the manuscript for the purposes of attracting attention or of correction. The chief questions raised are: Where were "the pool of David" and "the place of purification"? and To which of the holy vessels does the author refer? The chief importance of the MS. is its length. It contains forty-five lines written on the two sides of a single vellum leaf, on a written surface only just exceeding two square inches. The editors decide that a later date cannot be assigned to the fragments than the fifth century, and suggest that it is possibly of Egyptian origin.

Following close on the heels of "Le Grand Guignol," "the Play Actors" produced last Sunday night at the King's Hall, Covent Garden, four little plays, one of which, The Masked Girl, might have found a place in the exciting répertoire of the Parisian Company. The masked girl turns out to be the lost sister of the pierrot who has conducted her home from the fancy ball at which they had met, and the play ends by the pierrot stabbing the clown, who comes in to claim his rights. Perhaps it would be more just to describe the piece as theatrical rather than dramatic, but it produced something of the thrill which is so marked an object of "Le Grand Guignol" programme. The other three plays were not particularly exciting, though Breaking it Gently would make a very fair lever de rideau. To us the feature of the evening was the acting in the latter play of Mr. Edward Rigby as George, the unpleasant little clerk, who has made money in Canada, and who is afraid lest his sweetheart, whom he has known in less prosperous times, may disgrace him. It was an admirable performance, and redeemed what would otherwise have been a rather commonplace entertainment.

Even in the most advanced and militant Radical quarters it is now generally admitted that Mr. McKenna's Education Bill is dead. As we pointed out from the first, it never had any chance of passing into law, and, what is more, was probably never intended to pass. The Westminster Gazette, which professed a few weeks ago to be astounded at the ungrateful attitude of Churchmen towards "the generous treatment" meted out to them in the Bill, has quite changed its tone, and now (March 25th, after Peckham) in a leading article we find it saying, "Let an effort be made, for instance, to see whether some middle term may not be found between Mr. McKenna's Bill and the Bishop of St. Asaph's Bill." The Westminster Gazette may take it from us that no such Bill as that which it suggests will be accepted for a moment by Churchmen. The Bishop of St. Asaph's Bill will meet with as firm and uncompromising opposition as Mr. McKenna's, and it is, therefore, unthinkable that a middle course between the two will be accepted. In this connection we refer our readers to our correspondence columns, where they will find expressed the views as to the Bishop of St. Asaph's Bill which are held by the Church Schools Emergency League. What the Westminster Gazette calls "the forces of reaction"—in other words, the conscience of the nation and its belief in the sanctity of the Eighth Commandment—have made it clear that the House of Lords has a plain mandate from the country to reject any Bill which is not purged of the principles of plunder and spoliation. The Church has no intention of surrendering her plain rights and her own property at the bidding either of Mr. McKenna or the Bishop of St. Asaph or any one else.

INSOMNIA

My sleepless eyes look forth upon the night,
And lo! the enchantress moon with silver wand
Makes of the winter world a new delight,
A solemn fairyland.

No sound at all, in air or earth or sea.
The little shrouded streams lie stiff and cold;
The dun flock huddle close for company
Within the frozen fold.

Yet large and healing peace hangs brooding there.
The weary Earth sleeps in the silver haze,
Sleeps, and is young again, and fresh, and fair,
For all her toilsome days.

Sleep, weary Earth! 'tis meet for thee to rest;
Thou'rt sport for biting frosts and parching suns,
And day by day thou openest thy breast
To feed thy little ones.

Yet not for naught, dear Earth, is thy distress.
Instant reward thou hast in all the brood
Of glorious sons and daughters who confess
Thy mighty motherhood.

But some, thy weaker babes, for whom thy love
Not all-sufficient is, who start apace
To search the Hell below, the Heaven above,
And find no resting-place;

We toil all day upon the fruitless deep,
But no day brings us further on our quest,
And every night we lay us down to sleep,
And never once to rest.

And what if Death should mock us with vain shows
Of sleep at last in his eternal night?
What if our trusting eyelids should but close
To wake to sorrier sight?

Oh! when my little life's expiring flare
Is quite burnt out, and all my room is dark,
I pray no Watcher may be waiting there
With kindling oil and spark.

REVIEWS

THREE JAPANS

Present-day Japan. By AUGUSTA M. CAMPBELL DAVIDSON, M.A. (T. Fisher Unwin, 5s.)

Old and New Japan. By CLIVE HOLLAND. With Fifty Coloured Pictures by Montagu Smyth. (J. M. Dent and Co., 15s.)

The Japanese Nation in Evolution. By WILLIAM E. GRIFFIS, D.D., L.H.D. (George G. Harrap and Co., 6s.)

JAPAN is in serious danger of incurring the fate of Aristides, unless British readers, who already show symptoms of ostracism through sheer disgust at perpetual eulogy, be warned in time of what books may be regarded as transitory and what books preserved as valuable records of competent observation. In truth, historical, if not geographical, there are three Japans, as described by three classes of writers, whom it is most essential to distinguish. There is first the fairyland of choses vues. The writer, often possessing great skill and sensibility, records what he or she has seen, giving us only the evidence of the eye, for barriers of language prevent any but a superficial and inadequate picture. The archetype of this kind of book at its best is "Madame Chrysanthème," and M. Loti repels as much by obtuse ignorance as he charms by delicate appreciation. Then comes the fairy-tale about this fairyland, based chiefly on choses lues. The author has perhaps never set foot in the country he undertakes to expound. Judgment and ability may indeed save him from falling into gross errors, but since his information is at two removes from actuality, and cannot be adjusted by personal experience, his views, though wider, are not likely to be either fresh or independent. Lastly, we have the chronicler of choses vécues, rare enough, but a reliable witness, who has enjoyed opportunities of living the life under propitious conditions of the Japanese themselves. This is the man for our money, if he be but candid and competent.

Miss Davidson has yielded to "frequently-made suggestions" that a book based on copious letters to personal friends "might prove to be not without interest to a wider circle." Undoubtedly the original recipients of these confidences are to be congratulated on a fearless correspondent, who spared no pains to give her impressions in vivid and truthful shape. It is pleasant to travel in company with such an enthusiastic and fair-minded tourist. But she seldom crosses the border of that enchanted Japan which has been mapped out again and again. Her method of welding second thoughts to first impressions so as to combine freshness with accuracy is not always successful. It is thus a little disconcerting to read:

I have only as yet seen one of these performances, so I cannot tell you much about them from personal knowledge, more especially as I never made out from beginning to end what they were about. I understood, however,

Then follows a brief summary of the characteristics which she would have perceived if her education in such matters had been more advanced. It is to be feared that "a wider circle" knows all about Yokohama, Nikko, Danjuro, as they strike a Westerner on first acquaintance. Two chapters, however, in Miss Davidson's record, devoted to "The National Faith" and "Buddhist Rites and Sects," are admirably written. She starts with the felicitous idea that Shintoism is "rather a plain white wooden religion," and proceeds to analyse its hold on the race, comparing it not ineptly with the Italian cult of the "Penates" through all the vicissitudes of Rome. Still more edifying is her exposition of the various Buddhist rites and teachings to a rash and stay-at-home sectary, who dismissed Buddhism in a phrase as "childish idolatry." Miss Davidson had been present at the Goma "litany of fire" and had attended with an open mind many orgies of picnic and prayer. Her receptive and kindly intelligence has enabled her to present this phase of Japanese life with peculiar force. One can only regret that so skilful a pen was denied access to less hackneyed material.

Mr. Clive Holland is at once more pretentious and less satisfying. Encouraged by the success of a hybrid love-story of the "Madame Butterfly" type, and thus associated by the general public in a vague fashion with the Far East, he undertakes to deal in less than three hundred pages with the religion, origin, customs, legends, language, arts, and commerce of "Old and New Japan." Needless to say, his "ambition o'erleaps itself," though provided by many unacknowledged predecessors with convenient jumping-boards. The amount of his indebtedness to Professor Chamberlain, Miss Bacon, the late Lafcadio Hearn, and many others need not be set down, but should have at least been indicated. Justice compels us to add that his subjects are adroitly handled. As a populariser of esoteric knowledge, reaping where the expert had sown, he is by no means unwelcome, particularly as his collaborator, Mr. Montagu Smyth, has contributed illustrations in colour which alone are worth the price of the volume. Less hard and photographic than Mr. Mortimer Menpes' similar series, they afford romantic and hazy peeps at Fairyland. While Mr. Holland is to be praised for his minute portraiture of definite places and customs—the chapters on gardens, temples, and games, for instance—one must deprecate his habit of sweeping assertion on points where first-hand authorities disagree. Is it certain that the Japanese have "no trace of Aryan blood in their veins"? Do facts warrant the assertion that "Buddhism is now merely a formal religion, yearly more neglected, if not positively increasingly despised"? It is plain that Buddhism suffered a temporary eclipse during the war, when Shinto ceremonies, so inextricably bound up with patriotic pride, were more in evidence; but in the last two years the Aryan faith has given proof of recuperative power. The insurance societies, whose funds are administered from Buddhist temples, and the new Buddhist seminary at Kyoto testify to reviving influence. Why, in conclusion, does Mr. Holland print as a couplet, and with erroneous punctuation, thereby ruining both sense and metre, the charming butterfly quatrain, which is given correctly on p. 158 of Hearn's "Japanese Miscellany"?

To serious seekers after truth Dr. Griffis' "The Japanese Nation in Evolution" cannot be too highly commended. Every page is packed with interesting matter; theories are based on wide knowledge and long experience. Its author was one of the first yatoi (foreign teachers) to take employment under the Lord of Echizen in 1870. Every step in the evolution from feudal to constitutional government has been followed and estimated by him both as critic and collaborator. Not only so, but the folklore and history of the country from the earliest times have found in his previous books their first introduction to the outside world. One greets, therefore, with peculiar pleasure this series of side-lights on Japanese growth, whereby hitherto obscure corners and doubtful crevices are brightly illuminated. By far the most striking chapters deal with the thesis that, after all, the Japanese have "Aryan blood in their veins," thus inheriting aptitude for Aryan ideals to a higher degree than the Malay and Mongolian races, to whom they are also more obviously indebted. These Aryan ancestors are no other than the aboriginal Ainu, whose former prowess and importance are very naturally ignored by Japanese native historians. Dr. Griffis from the first had remarked their physical unlikeness to the typical Nipponian in the colour of hair, eyes, and skin; had traced in the Kojiki beneath the mask of Chinese characters many Ainu names of places and heroes; finally, found full confirmation of his suspicion that the Ainu tongue must take rank with Aryan languages by the publication in 1905 of the Rev. John Batchelor's Ainu grammar and dictionary. For further evidence of shell-heaps and dolmens, and indications that the Ainu were largely absorbed and not finally quelled by the Japanese invaders until the sixteenth century we must refer readers to Dr. Griffis, who is scrupulous in citing authorities.

Many graceful superstitions, which adorn idealised Japan, are dispersed by this ruthless historian. You have heard, doubtless, of the Golden Age of Iyeyasu, when the Happy Islands were sealed to the outer world and the nation enjoyed perfect peace. It appears, nevertheless, that during this halcyon period population decreased and oppressive laws checked progress and prosperity. There was also a quiet but persistent trickling of European science through Dutch channels. The amiable assumption that religious persecution was unknown before Jesuits and Dominicans courted disaster by political interference is also refuted. Need it be added that this devotion to truth is consistent with the writer's whole-hearted admiration of the present policy and aspirations of the Mikado's Empire?

A word of protest may be directed to the abuse of analogy, which mars an otherwise attractive style. Japan, it seems, has had its Mazzini, its Jeroboam, its William Lloyd Garrison, its Napoleon (twice), its Thomas Jefferson, its Versailles, its Ireland. Koto had a "Shaksperian intellect," and Wang was the possessor of a "Washingtonian mind." So be it. But these labels are too frequent to be impressive. How many claimants would dispute Dr. Griffis' claim to be styled "the Japanese Columbus"?

SEALS

Seals. By W. DE GRAY BIRCH. "The Connoisseur's Library." (Methuen, 25s. net.)

THERE is a legend of a Western hotel, at which a visitor ordered a modest meal. Placing a steaming dish on the table, the host said, "Stranger, you are not going to have chicken, you are going to have hash, and, stranger"—covering him with his revolver—"you are going to like it." In the absence of some such incentive we protest that we do not like Dr. Birch's book, which is hash of the flavourless variety. The subject is a good one, seals are objects of intrinsic beauty, of historical value, and of sentimental interest, while the author of "A Catalogue of Seals in the British Museum" si non scripsisset is the man of all others whom any editor would have selected as a collaborator. Unfortunately, Dr. Birch has not taken advantage of the opportunity afforded him. The work before us contains nothing of any value that is not already in the "Catalogue," and the larger part of its illustrations are familiar to every student of the subject, either as plates in the "Catalogue" or as sheets in a collection of British Museum photographs made many years ago, and indexed by Dr. Birch himself. It is a little difficult to write with becoming moderation of the historical Introduction provided: if the author had decided to limit himself to summarising British Museum publications, he might at least have consulted the invaluable handbooks to the Babylonian and mediæval collections drawn up by his late colleagues, and spared his readers a rambling account of the history and development of seals, beginning with instances of Old Testament uses and ranging discursively over the Eastern world. Towards the end of the chapter we do, indeed, get a date for the Babylonian seals—"they begin to occur at a period of about two thousand two hundred years before the Christian era." The earliest is dated by every competent scholar at 4,000 B.C., one in the de Clercq collection at Paris is of 3,800 B.C., and examples of 2,500 B.C. are comparatively common. Dr. Birch's ignorance is not limited to ancient history. He was unaware when he wrote the "Catalogue" that the so-called "fourth" Great Seal of Charles I. was not a Royal Great Seal at all, but was the seal of the Parliament at war with him, made in pursuance of an ordinance of November 11th, 1643, its use being prohibited by Charles on the 24th of the same month; and, to all appearance, he is still ignorant of the fact. The "third" seal remained in use till the surrender of Oxford in June, 1646, after which it was solemnly broken with the other Royal seals in the presence of the Long Parliament. We cannot even assume in Dr. Birch a complete knowledge of the Museum collection, for he omitted from his "Catalogue" what we believe to be the unique perfect example of the Great Seal of Ivan the Terrible, preserved in the oldest collection in the British Museum. It should have been figured here, as a very early example of the Russian arms.

The arrangement of this book follows generally that of the "Catalogue"—more convenient to the author than helpful to the collector. A classification by countries is all very well for a Museum Catalogue, but the general idea of a collection is thereby entirely obscured. Mediæval seals may be divided, first of all, into two great classes—those which render the document to which they are affixed ipso facto authentic, and those which do not. The seal of a private person, not lord of an independent jurisdiction, was of no more value on a legal document than a signature, and had to be proved by witnesses in the same way. On the other hand, certain seals by their mere presence prove the authenticity of a deed, amongst these being those of sovereigns, lords of high and low justice, bishops, cathedral chapters, great monasteries, communes, and corporations, these last on grants by the king, &c. As occasions for these authentications grew, municipal corporations often adopted a special seal for them as distinguished from their own affairs, the seal ad causas. In England these latter are comparatively rare, as grants of land were put on record by friendly actions at law, and other transactions were entered on the Close Rolls, or in town books.

Much might be written as to the history of seals. They become comparatively common from the tenth century, and their use is universal from the twelfth to the fifteenth. English seals are at their best at the close of the thirteenth and through the fourteenth centuries, and far excel any Continental ones in beauty and vigour, as shown by the famous Merton Priory seal, described but not illustrated by Dr. Birch. The colour of the wax seems to have been of no importance in England, but in France, for example, a Royal grant was only perpetual if sealed with green wax and affixed to the deed by green or red silk ties. Red wax was used for the affairs of Dauphiny, or Italy.

The romance of sigillography demands a chapter of its own. What collector would not desire to have a Great Seal of Oxford in 1643-6 in preference to one of Charles's earlier and happier years, or an example of his seal of the Court of Wards of the same period, with its "distinction of the Prince of Wales's feathers and coronet," apparently unknown to our author? Who would not wish for one of the seals which made a bale of English cloth current money all over the known world, or for an impression showing some Greek gem, converted to a talisman in the East, and brought home by a Crusader to be set in his seal, or for sets of the most important series of privy seals in Christendom, the annuli piscatoris of the Popes which authenticate the Papal briefs? The handling of objects like these bring us sensibly near to their original owner, whose seal was his most sacredly-guarded possession, so much so that a Chancellor of England has been drowned by the weight of the Great Seal carried in his bosom. Even as late as 1693 England was alarmed and astonished by a successful attempt to rob a Secretary of State of his seal, to facilitate the passage of Jacobite emissaries between England and France. And a writing sealed with an authentic seal could not be invalidated, even in such a case as that of the Chancellor of Henri IV., who retained the Great Seal for five years after the King's death, sealing innumerable false patents. Dr. Birch, when writing about seals for collectors, should surely have told them something about all this, and also about forged seals, ancient and modern.

It must not be concluded from our strictures that Dr. Birch has written a misleading or useless book. This would be less than just. Within his limitations he is an acknowledged authority. He does not write interestingly, he has little sense of the logical connection which must underlie any successful presentation of the facts with which his book is crowded, and he seems to know names and dates rather than actual living history. But, with all these faults of omission and a few actual mistakes, his book will be of very great value to those students who have the opportunity of seeing the originals in London, and in a smaller measure (owing to the absence of an index nominum) to every one making a collection. It is unfortunate that such an opportunity of popularising the results of a lifetime's work has been lost by Dr. Birch. We cannot conceive of any one being induced to take an interest in seals by the perusal of this book.

POETRY

Music and Light, and other Verses. By A. W. BRAZIER. (Printed, illustrated, bound, and published by the Author in Melbourne, n.p.)

Blank Verse Pastels. By CLINTON SCOLLARD. (G. W. Browning, $1.25.)

The Web of Life. By W. W. GIBSON. (Samurai Press, 10s. 6d. net.)

Poems. By the late Mrs. ARCHER GURNEY. (Longmans, Green and Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

Verses, Fancies, and Facts. By HAROLD ROBBINS. (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner and Co., Ltd., 2s. 6d. net.)

The Day's Journey. (Samurai Press, 5s. net.)

Wild Earth. By PADRAIC COLUM. (Maunsell and Co., Ltd., 1s.)

Nugae Latinae. By the late EDWARD CONOLLY. (Blackwell, 2s. net.)

It was a delightful notion of Mr. Brazier's to make a book, print, bind, and illustrate it all at home, and Stevenson's blessing would rest upon the attempt. The photographic blocks are less interesting than the woodcuts of native Australian plants, which are done with zest, and perhaps might be looked upon with more zest if the author-printer had remembered to number his pages. The reader's sympathy with the pleasant audacity of this home-industry will carry him cheerfully through the verse, and sometimes he will find passages to reward him, as in the lyric on "Evening," parts of the "Sweet Suicide of Eros," and particularly in the poem which names the book. Mr. Clinton Scollard, on the contrary, comes in all the glory of full-deckle Strathmore antique, is delightfully printed and precious, but his pastels, like pastels, do not travel well, perhaps. Did slender hyacinths really, at Tintern, sway around him "their peerless, purple bells," and was the wild-plum then in bloom? Blank-verse is the severest test a poet can have, and Mr. Scollard has hardly apprehended that fact. His mood of the "Marsh's Morning" is good, and so are the lines, "At Roxmor," but these are not enough to make up for a good many inferior pastels. The "Web of Life" is a strong volume of verse, and keeps a high level throughout:

Before me through the fleecy mist she went,
And ever and anon her body bent
To gather milk-white mushrooms, dew-besprent,
That huddled closely, waiting the noon heat,

Or:

For he who sings is lord of kings,
And song doth shake the golden throne,
And rend the walls and towers of stone, are good, sound poetry, and "Helen in Rhodos" is something still better, in parts, and so is "Surrender," and also "Passion's Harvest." This is a volume worth re-reading. Mrs. Archer Gurney's little legacy of verse will be welcome to her friends, and not unwelcome to those who had not the honour of knowing her. The poems of "Annunciata" and "Lament" are the best in the volume, and are simple and sincere. In the former the lover's hate, expressed in the fiercest terms, melts immediately at the presence of the beloved, and in the latter the grief for the dead is tenderly set forth. Mr. Robbins, on the other hand, has not the gift of word-melody, nor any strong message to splutter through the unmanageable jangle of bumping syllables. The author of the "Day's Journey," and of nine other books of verse, has many things to say, and sometimes manages to say them; but she does not possess a file nor yet a friend with a sense of humour, or she would prune her lines. Can a key be sane or mad? as she makes it in "Spending." She is peculiarly fond of similes from fox-hunting. The soul's hounds bring to bay the flesh, and the dull are defined as people who never harry "with hounds of keen thought" the "red foxes of woe and of shame," and the will is likened to a gold fox which man hunts with the black and white hounds of day and night:

The old, wary, gold fox, whose bright tail twinkles still
Through the gaps in the hedge of the universe bounds.

But, unfortunately, man, while chivvying the fox snatches fiercely and "eats his desire's bitter fruit." Really few huntsmen, if any, eat the fox. Foxhunting has been unkindly defined as "the unspeakable pursuing the uneatable."

Mr. Colum (why Padraic and not the baptism spelling?) wakes the reader's interest. Every one hopes that Ireland will give us a poet some day, and there does seem to be so much gold-dust about, that the miners any day might find the matrix. Lines like:

And O! the swallows forget many wonders
When walls with the nests rise up once more!

are imaginative lines, and:

Then the wet, winding roads,
Brown bogs with black water;
And my thoughts on white ships
And the King o' Spain's daughter are musical. But there is not a single poem out of the twenty-five which will make men feel: this is an achievement: but enough is done to make the reader angry that he cannot say so:

And I who have lost her—the dear, the rare—
Well, I got me this ballad to sing at the fair,
'Twill bring enough money to drown my care
Over the hills and far away.

A man who can write that, deserves to be reviewed savagely for not working harder in the service of the muse whom he courts and loses.

Mr. Papillon has done well to edit the late Mr. Conolly's pleasant Latin verses. The desire to tag his favourite tit-bits into easy and melodious Latin verse is the mark of a man who has been taught classic literature, and not classic cram. To achieve that laudable desire is given to few, and only those who have tried their hands, say, at "Phyllis is my Only Joy" will understand how exquisitely Mr. Conolly has succeeded with that difficult young lady, in spite of her tricks:

Sin paulo precibus favet rogantis
Nil suetae memini protervitatis.

THE STUDY OF NATURAL HISTORY

Some Nature Biographies. By JOHN J. WARD. (John Lane, 5s.)

THE part which mechanical inventions have played in fostering and developing a love for the study of natural history is a curiously interesting one. The production, for example, of good microscopes at a moderate cost brought forth an army of enthusiasts intent on the study of the infinitely little; wayside ditches and ponds were explored with tremendous zeal—mud and milk, fish-scales and feathers, fur and fleas were alike laboriously examined, and every possible device was adopted to bring new features thereof to light. While some, indeed, followed this pursuit rather with the object of collecting pretty objects than of unravelling the mysteries of Nature—that is to say, they found in the microscope an end in itself—others used the microscope only as a means to an end. But both contributed immensely to add to the sum of human knowledge and to the improvement of the microscope.

More recently dry-plate photography and cheap cameras have turned the tide of Nature-study into other channels. The nearest ditch no longer suffices. In search of subjects for the camera men now risk their lives in climbing precipitous cliffs, or lying hid for hours in bitter cold or broiling heat, to secure some coveted picture of bird or beast. More or fewer of these hunters—for hunters they are, though killing is, happily, no part of their hunting—sooner or later try their hand at writing a book wherein the story of their adventures is duly set forth and suitably illustrated. Of many of these books but little can be said save that they contain pretty pictures. Some, however, as might be expected, breaking entirely new ground, make really valuable additions to our knowledge of animals and plants in their native haunts; while others, if of lesser mark, serve at least as most helpful and delightful guides to the wild places of Nature, or as fascinating companions to the less fortunate stay-at-home naturalists.

Of the many books of this kind which have recently appeared, a small volume by Mr. Seton P. Gordon may be taken as an excellent sample. He writes of the "Birds of Loch and Mountain" (Cassell & Co.), and in a way which shows that he is a good and accurate observer as well as a photographer of no mean skill. Some of the pictures which enliven these pages are, indeed, exquisite; while others, if less beautiful from a pictorial point of view, have a high scientific value.

We heartily sympathise with his strictures on the insane persecution to which many of our most beautiful and most useful birds are subjected, in the interest, mostly imaginary, of game-preservation. The way in which owls, hawks, and eagles have been shot down, and trapped, and in many cases wholly exterminated to provide increased targets for "sportsmen" is nothing less than diabolical. And among the most fiendish of these must be reckoned that most barbarous engine the pole-trap, which, though prohibited by law, is, as a matter of fact, still commonly used. What the "sportsman" leaves to us the mere egg-collector takes; so that, between the two, in a few years our avifauna will have become reduced to sparrows and "game-birds"!

The author of this book, however, lays himself open to a suspicion of insincerity, inasmuch as, though he professes to deplore the slaughter of the Golden Eagle, for example, he dilates on the "havoc" which this bird makes among the grouse, though he must know that the damage he speaks of is grossly exaggerated. Furthermore, he goes out of his way to afford instruction as to the best way in which the nestlings of this fine bird may be captured! Such information one would have imagined he would have withheld!

But the mountain and moor are Elysian fields which only a very few can hope to explore. Most of us must be content with more humble hunting, though this need be no less fascinating. What a world of wonders lies at our very door is revealed to us by Mr. John Ward, who, in a small volume on "Some Nature Biographies" (John Lane & Co.), describes the life histories of a number of butterflies and moths, the strange metamorphoses of jelly-fish, and some of the marvellously beautiful microscopic animals such as the radiolaria. Besides these, however, he gives us some interesting chapters on botany, such as that on the horse-chestnut bud and its development into leaf, fruit, and flower; "A Piece of Coal;" and the glassy skeletons of those microscopic plants known as diatoms, the skeletons of which, in their exquisite beauty of form, are to be reckoned among the greatest marvels in Nature. Though so minute as to require the highest powers of the microscope to make out their parts, these skeletons yet form a very considerable portion of the solid ground on which we tread!

Tastefully bound, and profusely illustrated by very beautiful photographs, this little book should prove a most valuable addition to the Children's Library of Natural History Books.

STORIES OF ENGLISH CARDINALS

Story of the English Cardinals. By the Rev. C. S. ISAACSON. (Elliot Stock, 6s. net.)

THERE always seems to be a demand for books that deal with Court life, more especially should they give promise of a spice of scandal; and of late years we have had a veritable flood of literature purporting to let us behind the scenes (more or less) of the brilliant entourage of the Grand Monarque, and so forth. In the same way there would appear to be a lurking curiosity to pierce the inner circle of the Papal Court; and the Rev. C. S. Isaacson, M.A., has followed up his "Story of the Later Popes" by a pleasantly-written "Story of the English Cardinals." The prospectus of the volume before us assures the expectant reader that "although this book is not written in a controversial spirit, many side-lights are thrown upon Roman Catholic methods and Jesuit intrigues." Here and there the author seems to hint that "he could and he would a fearsome tale unfold;" but those who, on the strength of the bait offered by the prospectus, get the book in the hope of revelations, are destined to be disappointed, for we learn nothing that we do not all know, or think we know, already. In fact, the volume can hardly be said to supply a want or to fill a void. It is merely a chatty, readable recasting of other men's work, without any pretence to original research or without any attempt to elucidate difficulties. Indeed, it could hardly be otherwise, judging by the list of books used by the author in its compilation, for this exhibits an extraordinary jumble of more or less useful, and some certainly valueless, works. Such being the case, it would be unfair to judge this volume by too high a standard, for the pervading slipshodness would tend to cast some doubt on the general accuracy of the author's methods. Thus, the "list of books used" starts with "The National History of Biography" (usually quoted by its own superior title of "Dictionary of National Biography"). John of Gaunt is said (p. 98) to have died in 1309. Wolsey's creation as Cardinal is put down to the year 1555, twenty years after his death. That is not a solitary slip, for on the same page (148) he is said to have received the Great Seal as Lord Chancellor in the same impossible year. The date of a letter from the Bishop of Rochester to Cromwell is given as December 22nd, 1554, some years after the death of both writer and recipient (p. 171); and Dr. Richard Smith is stated (p. 220) to have been Vicar-Apostolic of All England in 1555. He was not even born at that date, and died in 1655. Such errors may be due to inattentive proof-reading; they are nevertheless disquieting and destroy confidence. But the statement that Adam Easton became "a monk of the Benedictine Order at the Blackfriars convent at Norwich" (p. 66) is an item of information which needs explaining, for it is difficult to understand how a man could be prepared for the Benedictine mode of life in a Dominican house; it would be like saying that a cadet at Sandhurst was being trained for the Engineers or the Artillery.

Of course the earlier Cardinals are, on the whole, of less interest than the later ones, and the material for their biographies is necessarily in many cases very scanty; but when we approach modern times, when materials are abundant, it is trifling with the reader to be told, for instance (p. 259), that:

The details of [Cardinal Manning's] administration have been so fully and so recently described in Purcell's remarkable biography that it seems unnecessary to repeat them here.

It may be assumed that not all who read these pages have seen Purcell's "Life," or could have ready access to it, or would care to tackle the two bulky volumes which contain it.

On the whole, this volume gives a not unpleasant picture of remarkable, or prominent, or kindly men, of whom their countrymen may be justly proud, for they have upheld England's prestige in the battle of wits with the pick of the ecclesiastical intellect of Europe during eight or nine hundred years. Nor will Roman Catholics, we fancy, have any reasonable cause to complain of this book, though here and there, possibly, exception might be taken to the personal opinions and obiter dicta that occur. Thus, it is averred that:

With Pole the Pope was first and his lawful Sovereign second (p. 181).

This would be countered by the Distinguendum est of the chopper of logic: as to spirituals, transeat, conceditur; as to temporals, negatur; and, it may be presumed, he would proceed to justify his distinction.

THREE GARDENING BOOKS

Flower Grouping. Sketches in Colour and Notes in English, Scotch, and Irish Gardens. With Fifty-six Sketches in Colour. By MARGARET WATERFIELD. (Dent, 21s. net.)

Gardening for Women. By the HON. FRANCES WOLSELEY. (Cassell and Co., Ltd., 5s. net.)

The Book of Garden Pests. By HOOPER PEARSON, F.R.H.S. (John Lane and Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

MISS WATERFIELD'S book consists of a number of water-colour sketches from a variety of gardens in England, Scotland, and Ireland, supplemented by writings, more or less bearing on the pictures, by a variety of authors. These give information which may be divided under three heads—a good deal of vaguely suggestive matter; some lists which may prove valuable to gardeners who have not yet tried their hands at colour-grouping; and some more particular information about the culture of certain bulbs and plants, which any handbook of gardening gives, and which strikes us as superfluous in a book of this description.

We must not expect too much of letterpress so evidently written round pictures, but must rather look to these to justify the existence of the book. This, we think, they certainly do, though the sketches vary a good deal in quality, some being obviously more suited to the colour process employed than others. The more successful ones are those in which Miss Waterfield's feeling for an architectural point has been gratified by the presence of a sundial, a tazza, or an old tower showing above a wall. The value of both clipped and Irish yews, treated as architecture, has also gone to the composition of some of Miss Waterfield's most successful sketches. We find many of those in which this architectural touch is absent wanting in definition. The eye may wander over a tangle of flowers with pleasure and yet find it hard to recall the pleasure, when faced by some of Miss Waterfield's rather indefinite blotches, where all flower individuality has been lost, without any compensating gain in mass form.

The prints facing pp. 3, 52, and 126 are good examples of the avoidance of this error, and rise above the rather monotonous level of the majority. As far as can be judged without comparison with the original sketches, the colour reproduction is good, and the whole volume is attractively produced by Messrs. Dent. We should describe it as a very pleasing gift-book, for which, indeed, the author probably designed it, without claiming for it a permanent place in the literature of gardening.

In Miss Wolseley's book we have a collection of information which should prove very useful to women wishing to enter on a career as horticulturists. The author is careful to point out the drawbacks of gardening as a profession for women; but in spite of this care she leaves us with a distinct impression that the thing is well worth doing, and well within the powers of the average healthy woman, if she be provided with the two qualities—tact and taste. Miss Wolseley is firm in pointing out that, as physically, woman, however athletic, cannot compete with man, so it must be by bringing intellect to bear on matters often handed over to an uneducated male, that she must enter the market as competitor.

The book contains much useful information as to means of training, with syllabuses of work in some foreign as well as English training colleges, and many addresses of clubs and institutes formed by or in aid of women with professions.

The "worm i' the bud" we have taken on trust from poets and others, but the number and variety of worms, caterpillars, scales, &c., with their cures, as set forth in Mr. Hooper Pearson's handbook, suggest that the garden of the future may consist rather of chemicals for the exclusion of pests than of the flowers they are used to protect. That the book will prove invaluable to the practical gardener is undoubted, as in easily accessible form it places accurate drawings and a clear text within reach of all who need this kind of information.

THE JEWS IN ENGLAND

THE history of the Jews in England is, in the main, a history of money :

Whether Jews were settled in England before the Conquest or not, it is certain that a Jewish immigration into England took place early in the reign of William the Conqueror. The exact date of their settlement is again unknown, but they came from Rouen, and their advent was one of the direct consequences of the Conquest. England at the period of the Norman invasion was inhabited almost entirely by landholders of various grades, villeins, and Churchmen. A small proportion of the population was engaged in trades, but the commercial class was entirely unrepresented. The country was divided between the upper and lower classes, while of the middle there were as yet neither representatives nor substitutes. So long as the English were content to remain at home, either on their estates or in their villages, and took no practical interest in external affairs, the ordinary produce of the soil and district was sufficient to supply their wants, and the baron, his retainers and villeins lived at home in plenty, and found sufficient to enable them to visit their neighbours on either friendly or hostile errands. When, however, the desire to leave that somewhat narrow orbit arose other needs came. Payment in kind when attempted beyond the smallest limits became so cumbersome as to be hardly practicable, and the wider one's interests spread the more pressing became the necessity for a reliable and convenient means of exchange. To satisfy the requirements of the advance in the state of civilisation that marked the advent of the Normans to England, in the first place, coin and, in the second, the machinery of commerce were required. Both could be supplied by the Jews. Driven by persecution from almost all other callings in life, the Jews of Europe had perforce been compelled to devote themselves more and more to finance and trade. In these twin occupations, reinforced by their superior intelligence, due doubtless to the continual sharpening by persecution that Jewry had even then undergone, the Jews of the Middle Ages excelled. In the economy of Norman England the Jews were well fitted to take the place of the middle-class, then lacking, and in the natural course, whether at the special invitation of the King or at their own initiative, the Jews must inevitably have found their way into the country.

With this statement by Mr. Albert M. Hyamson in "A History of the Jews in England" (Chatto and Windus), there is no need in the main to quarrel. Exception, however, should be taken to two at least of the expressions which the author employs, which are shibboleths among the philo-Semites. "Driven by persecution from almost all other callings in life" does not fairly represent the condition of the Jews in Europe, or England, during the early and Middle Ages of Christian civilisation. In point of fact the Jew, and here is his singular force, has never allowed himself to be expelled from any situation in which he had discovered, or foreseen, the possibility of profit-making. This characteristic has given rise to the proverbial saying about the Jew, that "if he be thrown out of the door he will come back through the window." Pananti, the illustrious Italian poet, who in 1808, or thereabouts, was made prisoner in Algiers, and has left a picturesque account of his residence in the pirate citadel, put this question to an Algerine Jew named Durand: "How is it that the Jews, who are treated by the Algerines as the lowest of slaves, who are liable to be tortured and murdered on the smallest excuse, and without any redress, persist in remaining here?" "You forget," replied Durand, "the profits that we make!" Durand was at that time the so-called "King" of the Algerine Jews—that is to say, the chief of the free Jewish community in Algiers, but that did not prevent, shortly afterwards, a fanatical janissary from striking his head from his shoulders for the simple reason that he was a Jew. A similar fate awaited Bacri, who succeeded him as King of the Algerine Jews, and whose descendants were the prime movers in the ultimate downfall of Algiers and its conquest by the French. Mr. Henry Nevinston, the distinguished correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, made the same remark as Pananti in connection with the massacre of the Jews in Russia, of which he was an eyewitness. A Jew might have had his whole family slaughtered in his presence, his house might have been burnt down, and his commerce destroyed. A few days later he would be selling cigarettes off a barrow in the street. He had declined to budge, and was once more in business on the ruins of his home. There is no lack of evidence, moreover, to show that even the wholesale expulsions of the Jews from England by Edward the First did not prevent many Jews from returning to this country. Antony Munday, in his additions to Stow, refers to "the unconscionable broking usurers, a base kind of vermin" that had crept into Houndsditch, "discredit of the age, and of the place where they were suffered to live," and this could have applied at that time only to the Jews. It is more than improbable that the Jew could have been successfully excluded from any trade which he had really wished to ply. It has not been, and is not possible, to prevent the Jew from becoming even a Catholic priest, with respect to which point Borrow supplies valuable details in the "Bible in Spain." If, then, he became a usurer, the common-sense conclusion is that this trade better suited his tastes and inclinations than most kinds of manual labour. For many years, however, the Jews have been instilling into the minds of the Christian Simple Simons, the unsophisticated Protestants of this country, that but for the action of the bigoted Church, which forbade usury to all but Jews, the Jew would willingly have been a tiller of the ground! Alas! persecution cut this same ground from beneath his feet! Thus we see how evil deeds come home to roost. Shylock was a usurer because the Christian Church willed it so. He was a morbid outcome of Christianity, a product of persecution, the ugly child of our own misguided beliefs and principles. This theory must indeed lay soothing unction to the soul of the Jew, supposing that for one minute he believes it. But like that blessed word "persecution," upon which the Jewish communities have been morally and physically thriving for centuries past, it does not bear the test of impartial historical research.

There is another phrase in the above lengthy quotation from Mr. Hyamson's "History of the Jews in England" which needs a note of interrogation. He speaks of the Jews who had come over in the wake of William the Conqueror's army as "being reinforced by their superior intelligence." The author is referring to finance and commerce more than to anything else, but none the less this pert theory that the Jew is more intelligent than the Gentile, which is so often brought forward with a general application by philo-Semites, should not be allowed to pass without protest. Clearly it cannot be maintained with any show of reason that the pickpocket is by the mere fact of his successful theft more intelligent than the man whose pocket he has picked. That the picking of pockets is a profession which requires audacity, skill, and intelligence is incontrovertible. A community of thieves would certainly number a larger number of intelligent persons with a higher average of brain-power and knowledge of the world than would be found in any ordinary English village. But that is where our estimation of their intelligence must stop. It is so with the Jews; though I am far from accusing all Jews of being dishonest. The brain of the Jew has never proved itself to be a superior brain except in the successful carrying out of the more or less shady money dealings which Mr. Hyamson calls, a little euphemistically, "finance." In all other departments of human work in which the mind has the largest share the Jewish intellect has reached a very high, but, at best, only second-rate level of accomplishment.

Mr. Hyamson explains clearly and, on the whole, fairly the circumstances under which it fell to the Jews to establish money in England as the basis of commercial life and as the sinews of the future political life of the nation. For this work, which was, of course, anything but disinterested, England owed a debt of gratitude to the Jews, which has, however, been more than amply repaid.

ROWLAND STRONG.

"TOIL AND TROUBLE"

MANY efforts have been made to express in literature the life and mind of those who can only eat bread in the sweat of their faces. The object is excessively difficult of attainment, because toil has no artistic expression in itself, and literature requires in those who have undergone it the faculty of divesting themselves of the very mind which they are about to express. In the pastoral story, "Children's Children,"* Mrs. Muirhead Bone breaks new ground, the wrapping clay of rural life in its dearest English species. We know well that this clay can raise crops of armed men able to make empires both moral and material, but at the cost of what absorbing labour, and in literature by the criterion of what searching ordeals! I welcome Mrs. Bone's book as the most remarkable work of fiction which has appeared for a long time; or shall I call it rather, the most accurate study of life?

There is no more terrible picture in the "Comédie Humaine," than the incarnation, in "Les Paysans," of the surd struggle between the cunning retentiveness of the soil, and the more intelligent acquisitiveness which would extract its treasures. Here Balzac deals with generalities; he knows that the peasantry has little individual character expressible in words. He therefore avoids the characterisation, of which he was the greatest of masters. In "Les Paysans" he creates no Vautrin, Cambremer, Michu, Marche-à-terre, Taboreau, Goriot, Grandet, nor Rogron. With Dickens, those who toil are either vehicles of his inimitable irony, immortal puppets in the troupe of Punch; or mere solvents of the lachrymal glands. They end according to their deserts, in jail by the way of their own wits, or in comfortable circumstances by the way of their friends' assistance. In any case, they must rise or fall; Dickens's barometer cannot register their mean. George Eliot cannot approach the expression of toil nearer than Mrs. Poyser, Adam Bede, Hettie, Silas Marner. They are the exponents of her moral or religious theories. They echo her reminiscences of her own mind under those of her experiences which most resemble theirs, recorded after she had passed under other influences. Elizabeth Gaskell wrote a powerful story too much forgotten, "The Crooked Branch." Its appeal lies in the tragedy of sorrow, played by devoted parents, "paying in heart's care and heaviness of soul" for the crimes of their only child. Similarly in Monsieur René Bazan's story, "La Terre qui Meurt," toil is clothed in the pathos of disappointment in the fidelity of a son, and in surprise at the constancy of a hired servant. Juliana Horatio Ewing mitigates the dullness of toil, not itself very arduous, with her own gentle humour, and by treating of it in its relation to very kindly employers like herself. Lady Tennant now gives us charming sketches in a similar vein. In verse, Wordsworth idealises toil to such a degree, that every labourer becomes a philosopher in the employment of the Kosmos. His peasants, though expressed in totally different terms, are no more real than are the shepherdesses of Watteau. Barnes, an amalgam of toil and poetry, expresses truly exceptional classes only, such as grave-diggers, cobblers, and weavers—in fact, the "odd fishes" of rural life—whatever other sorts he may intend to pourtray. Crabbe, somewhat like George Eliot, writes of labour from memory, but in its severer forms. He observes it with a curious and much more human eye, and dissects it. But he translates its triviality by triviality of another sort.

When he is not trivial, he is terrible, because he is describing positive tragedies or crimes. He cannot recreate the trivialities of labour, as Jane Austen recreates those of the society which she knew, though his power of realism is as great as hers, and he has far profounder sympathies. As to the country lads of Mr. A. E. Housman's exquisite lyrics, they are all poets, pupils of the palæstra transported to Shropshire.

There sleeps in Shrewsbury jail to-night,
Or wakes, as may betide,
A better lad, if things went right,
Than most that sleep outside.

And sharp the link of life will snap,
And dead on air will stand
Heels that held up as straight a chap
As treads upon the land.

Even in their crimes they are much simpler, tenderer, and more pathetic creatures than those of any of the poets I have named, but therefore even further removed from any resemblance to the true English "yokel." Through a certain affinity between the authors, which I feel, but cannot stop to analyse, I pass to Lady Gregory's wonderful scenes, such as, "At the Jail Gate." Lady Gregory does recreate truly the Irish peasant, as did Ouida the Italian peasant. Alas! that we should have to speak of Ouida's work as finished. But both the Irish and the Italian peasant are much more amenable than the English to expression in Art, because both move in the atmosphere of a religion which, whether it be truer or more moral or no, is more human than any atmosphere which has surrounded the English peasant for a very long time. Catholicism, and nothing else in Europe, if it encourage superstition (I hope so) or retard progress (Toward which pole?) does give form and colour to country clay. Similarly in Scotland, a certain stern glare is cast on the poorest country life, by the amazing interest which the Scottish people take even in theology, not to say divinity, and especially in that side of eschatology which deals with hell-fire—in fact in all kinds of religious controversy. It is well known that the itinerant medicine-man in Scotland cannot sell a single pill at a fair, without a preliminary discourse on Saving Grace or Original Sin. And I am told that this lullaby is still crooned with unction over Scottish cradles:

The black-bull Popery he's broken oot,
And we'll all be murdered in our beds,
Of that there's n're a doot.

Scott himself centres all the interest in those who toil in Scotland, either in their feudal devotion to their masters, as in Caleb Balderston, or in the profession of such monstrous creeds as that of douse Davie Dean. Once only does he appeal to their purely human interest; in the hero of that curiously modern and despised story, "The Two Drovers." Even here the main interest of the story is, of course, its positive tragedy. The story seems to me to contain a germ of the later work of a great living writer, who throughout has more affinity with Scott than appears on the surface—Thomas Hardy. But "Jude the Obscure," Mr. Hardy's most elaborate study which approaches my subject, depends for its interest on the exceptional character of the hero among his fellows, and on such philosophic considerations as George Eliot uses to assist the course of her stories.

In great labour there is Titanic interest. The sweat of Vulcan in his workshop, the labours of Hercules, all the thews and sinews beloved by Michael Angelo, suggest the efforts and the triumphs of the human race. Recently Charles Read knew well the value of deadly violence as a setting to his study of labour in "Tis Never Too Late to Mend," and he used with effect the red glow of the furnaces and the flickering yellow flames of the glass-blowers' ovens, in the infernos of Sheffield or Wigan. As Hilda Wangel would say, "How thrilling!" I do not forget Burns. Though I am little troubled by dialect, and find Scotch ballads the most beautiful that exist, I must frankly confess "imperfect sympathy." I cannot read Burns. I must therefore admit that Burns may have achieved all that I claim for Mrs. Muirhead Bone, for I cannot compare them. But I do compare her achievement with that of the writers whom I have mentioned, even of Balzac, Dickens, Scott, and Mr. Hardy. I have recalled them particularly because they all either decorate or impersonalise their subject. Mrs. Bone has no recourse to appeals to the imagination. She has personalised the sheer type of the hind under "the slavery of making an impossible livelihood," his toil, his trouble, and his very mind. Her theme is toil pure, the lifelong, unintelligent, scarcely productive toil of the very small English cultivator, hardly extracting his daily bread from the "cursed" ground, "in the sweat of his face," gradually sinking into the ground "from which he was taken," to feed in his turn its crop of "briars and thistles." It is such kind of toil that Mrs. Bone isolates absolutely and incarnates in Jacob Pyrah and his daughter Tamar. He works his own farm, he is neither master nor man, he has neither known nor shown fidelity. By his consuming, ill-directed toil he has supported himself, and for part of the time his wife and one daughter, until he is nearly eighty. He has been debarred the double blessing of corporal charity. He is not poor enough to receive, and he is too poor to give. When the story begins his wife is dead, and his daughter is just returning with her two small children, aged four and two, to live at the farm, tired of a husband who will not work. She has never known Love. She married as she will die, in the course of nature. She has never known hatred nor cruelty. Her husband was an unprofitable partner, and she dissolved partnership in the ordinary course of business. The children open a door to such marks of love as these two poor hinds are able to show. They soon fall into an unfenced pool and are drowned. Their mother dies of a common sickness, and the old man is again left quite alone, waiting to fall into the grave, without sign of knowledge whether he is seed or husk. This is Mrs. Bone's theme, and these two are her protagonists. She groups round them four other persons. An elderly brother of Pyrah represents rural levity—Mrs. Bone burdens us only with as much as is essential to her canvas. A weak-minded woman, who is badly treated by the cold cunning of another peasant, supplies in her history the element of misdemeanour necessary to truth. A "converted" mason, John Eglathorne, with the late Mrs. Pyrah, represents religious imagination, and all idea, even the most rudimentary, of any deity whatever; Pyrah and his daughter express none of any kind, not even of Providence. It may be assumed that, by reflexion from the pious Mrs. Pyrah, they perhaps exercise one supernatural virtue—patience; but, like their love, it is rather the instinct of those mild gregarious beasts which nourish their young, and low or bleat when one of their kind falls into a pit. In this restraint Mrs. Bone is absolutely realistic; her first and greatest achievement is in the re-creation of these two harmless human beasts, and her success in interesting her readers in them. She has expressed the inexpressible, which all former writers have found inexpressible. But it is impossible for any art to do this by other means than that of contrast. It is by means of religious imagination in the other personae that Mrs. Bone gives these two characters their salience.

The phenomenon of what is called "Conversion" has never been more simply or more sincerely treated than she treats it in the scene in the village meeting-house. I would willingly quote here the whole six pages which tell how a student had been sent trudging seven miles through the rain and mud to conduct the Sunday prayer-meeting, how he arrived wet and cold:

... depressed with the knowledge that he was always sent to these out-of-the-way congregations, which were invariably the same—two or three serious old people, a labourer or two, who would fall asleep in the indoor warmth, a handful of whispering boys and girls, and a woman with a baby which would wake up and cry when the hymn stopped. He hung his dripping coat on a nail behind the pulpit ... and doggedly began his service. A hymn rose feebly in several keys, but the boys and girls knew the chorus, and finished each verse with a run. It was lacking in dignity, and the words were solemn. At the end of the hymn they had to wait until an old deaf woman, who sung it at her own time, had finished. A boy tittered, and his mother shook her head at him. . . . The student began to pray. He was feeble in prayer, and he knew it. An "Amen!" arose at regular intervals from an old man who sat among the children. . . . The weight of lifting this congregation heavenward pressed heavily on the student.

A feeling of compunction stole over him at his lack of interest, and he began the usual final pleading more earnestly:

"Is there one such soul in this house? One sinful soul that needs cleansing and pardon, one weak soul that needs guidance, one whom no man stretches out his hand to save?"

Suddenly, from the back of the drowsy congregation came a shuffling of feet, and a hoarse voice with a painful stutter called out:

"That's me!"

Every one turned, wide awake as though a peal of thunder had roared unexpectedly outside. The boys in front screwed themselves round and knelt on the bench, staring with open mouths at John Eglathorne, who was on his feet, looking at the preacher.

"That's me, Mester!" he repeated with the same stutter; "that's what I want!"

There was a dead silence. The student's pulses began to beat heavily, and he opened his mouth to speak, but no sound came. A young girl began to cry. It was as if one of the bulls from the meadow had entered the chapel and bellowed with articulate words. It might even be as dangerous. The old man who sat among the children rose from his seat in the other aisle, and made his way round the front of the pulpit to the back of the chapel, his white hair shining under each lamp in turn. Every one watched him. He caught John Eglathorne's attention also as he drew closer. John sat down heavily in his seat, once again repeating, "That's me!" this time a little sullenly.

"Yes, that's you, John!" said the old man, cheerfully.

The old man, keeping his hand still on John's arm, began a little timidly to pray, when John, without any warning, burst into sobs. He made no attempt to cover his face, which was at every violent cry distorted hideously, as if the muscles would be rent apart by this unwonted human feeling. Through his tears he still watched the old man, who, relieved of his timidity by this sudden human contact, went on with his prayer:

"O God! Thou knowest that we're all sinners in Thy sight, and this 'ere man has been a great sinner before Thee. I've knowed 'im ever sin he wur born, and he's been no good to man or beast, but a by-word for cadding and wickedness. But his hard heart's broken now, Lord, and he's crying like a child because of his wicked ways. He's feeling after Thee, Lord, same as a weaned child its mother. O God! Thou'st spoke peace to many a soul in this house of prayer. Give this poor penitent pardon for his sins as Thou hast many a one before, and let 'im rise up a new man in this very hour. Take 'im by the hand and lift 'im up on his feet as Thou didst that sinful man in days of old, and say to 'im, 'Go, and sin no more.' Lord, help this poor lad that's crying for 'is wicked ways. Thou didst overtake many a one of us in our sins, and now Thou's caught 'old of this lad that nobody else had a mind of. Bring 'im to the Cross, Lord Jesus, and let 'im have a sight of Thee suffering for 'im and dying for his soul. Wash 'im clean again from all his sins. 'Neither passion nor pride Thy love can abide, But melt in the fountain that flows from Thy side; Come then from above, Its hardness remove, And vanquish his heart By a sight of Thy love.' While he's crying here before Thee, speak peace to 'im. Come in this very hour, Lord Jesus, and save his soul in Thy love and mercy. Amen!"

The old man ceased, but his lips still moved. The woman in the front pew murmured at intervals, "Lord, save souls! Lord, save souls!" with a deep respiration. A baby who had been sleeping at the breast gave a querulous cry, followed by the hurried hushing of its mother.

[The lad] watched the old man with an obedient and attentive gaze. He, opening his eyes and meeting his look, smiled, and with confident simplicity said, as if speaking to a child:

"He wants you to be a good lad, John."

John nodded.

"Would you like to get up on your feet and tell 'em so?" asked the old man, giving his hand. John took it, and with another scuffle, holding tight to the bench, said, with a stutter of interminable length:

"I'm going to be a good lad for ever and ever. Amen."

"Amen!" echoed one or two voices, and then John shuffled in his old way out of the chapel.

What it portended no one knew. Old Summers believed that the Spirit of God had passed by and breathed on the outcast, but he was so old that no one took much notice of him.

"I hope he's not going to do anything like that again," said a young woman in a thick voice. "He did frighten me—my heart's beating yet."

"He shouted out 'That's me!' and I jumped up," said a man. "I didn't know wheer I was. 'That's me!' he shouts, as if somebody'd got hold of him."

This remarkable description is retrospective of the conversion of John Eglathorne, which resulted in a melancholy of some five-and-thirty years of virtuous conversation. Later in the book (pp. 232 to 241) Mrs. Bone describes in passages on a still higher plane the exquisite sympathy which this same confirmed convert shows to Pyrah and his daughter overwhelmed by the drowning of the children. By doing violence to the most sacred secrets of his own heart, he seeks to relieve their dumb sorrow by giving it vent. He reveals his own spiritual experiences concerning the death of his wife, whom he had loved tenderly. It is a masterly picture which I shrink from spoiling by selection. Mrs. Bone achieves the almost dramatic realisation of practical piety.

In these passages, and generally throughout her story, Mrs. Bone shows a power of self-effacement very rarely combined with a power of personalisation such as hers. Throughout her whole book she keeps one end only in view—the expression of the mind of her characters. She gives no hint of any problem or theory. Her silence represents the dumbness of the peasant's mind, she makes his one mode of expression, the religious mode, her own. Does she find his hymns grotesque or devotional? She makes no sign. To him they are the outpourings of the Spirit; she records them as the response from the abyss of certain human hearts to the abyss of God, without seeking to measure relative human profundity. She deals with inanimate Nature similarly. She has much of Jefferies's feeling for Nature, but she will not allow herself to caress her as he does, less she should identify her with herself, as he does so completely. She sets aside the mood in which she begins her story, and schools herself to regard Nature as the subject of toil, the wilful creature from which the labourer extracts his life. She forces herself to regard the folding of the plains as "the land;" trees, as timber; the chequer of cloud and sunlight, as weather; the snowflakes and the raindrops, as manure; "the tender bowed locks of the corn," as crops. Nothing must divert attention from the dumb, cloaked persons of her drama. I have spoken of her intense realism in forcing expression out of them; she is so absorbed in that object that she sacrifices photographic accuracy in presenting their surroundings. Such would detract from their life. A branching elm overhanging a steep bank is not felled en masse, as she describes, but with much lopping of its great branches. She calls a hoe "antiquated;" I submit to her the emendation "worn out," for I much doubt whether the agricultural hoe has changed, except in material, since the days of Cain. She forgets that a sampler in a picture-frame could scarcely hold together for a year exposed to the English climate in an open churchyard. These trifles do not detract in the least from the vivid truth of the story. Mrs. Bone makes one, more serious mistake. The change of John Eglathorne from "a half-witted lad" to a self-supporting workman is a psychological impossibility. "Conversion" may possibly develop the moral faculties, but it cannot so entirely change the mental. Again, she is chronologically inexact. She places her story too late. This is of small importance; she has given enduring life to a type, whether it continues contemporary with us or not. But considering what I have said, it would be unjust to the spirit of progress not to acknowledge frankly that it is fast abolishing the type, if it has not already done so. It would be unjust to the men of the Oxford Movement not to point out that Mrs. Bone's village would now be hard to find in England. Apart from any religious consideration, the men of that movement realised, perhaps largely unconsciously, that the Zeitgeist close upon them was the Instinct of Expression. By providing for it in the only civilising influence which affects the hind, Religion, they imposed no education upon him; they provided for his demands. The movement was the precursor of the growing instinct, and we do not always realise how much we owe to it incidentally, for colouring and forming the clay, nor how widely it has spread, ritualising, as it has, the most puritanic deportment, and touching with wilful decoration the severest spiritual utility.

RICHARD JEFFERIES

DURING the last few years the fame of Richard Jefferies appears to have passed under a cloud, and his works have been made the subject of much adverse criticism. There are not wanting, however, indications of a revival of interest, and it may be worth while to inquire whether the author of "Field and Hedgerow" and "The Gamekeeper at Home" may not, after all, be destined to occupy a permanent niche in the Pantheon of English literature.

It is obvious that his appeal must always be to a comparatively small number of readers. His form was at times faulty, and his sentences not infrequently bear the marks of hurried and careless composition. He was not, like Izaak Walton, a great artist. One need not be an ardent devotee of rod and line to enjoy the measured and stately prose of "The Compleat Angler;" but Jefferies demands from his reader an interest in his subject-matter almost as keen as his own. Without that interest he will infallibly prove dull, tedious, and uninspired.

His critics have accused him of declining into a mere compiler of catalogues, and Mr. Quiller-Couch, in an amusing essay, has pressed his charge home with considerable force. There is, it must be admitted, some truth in the indictment; but the offence is, at the worst, pardonable. I think it was Mr. E. V. Lucas who once wrote a paper on the poetry of a rose-grower's catalogue, and there must be quite a lot of people, beside myself, who experience an intense joy in the repetition of such words as "celandine," "violet," "woodspurge," or "primrose." The works of Richard Jefferies are full of this nomenclature of the fields and woodlands. They are fragrant with the breath of honeysuckle and wild thyme, and all the varied odours of a country lane. He could never have enough of Nature, and it is possible that he occasionally miscalculated the requirements of his reader. In "The Pageant of Summer," one of the finest of his essays, he has described, with an almost microscopic minuteness, the appearance of a country meadow on a day in June. There is nothing that escapes his attention, for there is nothing that he does not love.

His worst fault would appear to have been a false and distorted sentimentality. It is difficult to realise that he was a contemporary of Darwin. He was, indeed, hopelessly out of touch with current scientific thought and speculation. While Tennyson was writing of Nature, "red in tooth and claw with ravine," Jefferies was inditing panegyrics on the friendliness of the flowers. He affords a marked contrast in this respect to such a writer as Thomas Hardy, who discerns in external Nature the working of those pitiless and cruel laws which appear to direct and control the life of man. In one of the finest and most characteristic of his poems Hardy describes how, in a moment of weariness, he sought relief from the cares and vexations of City life in the sylvan peace of a wood, only, however, to be rapidly disillusioned:

Sycamore shoulders oak,
Bines the slim sapling yoke,
Ivy-spun halters choke
Elms stout and tall.

But in the ears of Richard Jefferies the pipes of Pan are never shrill. The gods above may be pitiless or impotent, but in the life of the fields there is love, and helpfulness, and warmth.

Jefferies had little of the scientific spirit. The dominant note in his writings is a sensuous enjoyment of the life of Nature, tempered by an intellectual pessimism which was probably the result of ill-health. He had a vivid appreciation of colour, and loved to describe the effects of light on flowers, or the blue shadows chasing each other across the downs. For the jargon of the laboratories he displayed the profoundest contempt, and he would gladly have burned all books of botany. "The books have yet to be written," he wrote; and, again, in a moment of genuine illumination, "I want the soul of the flowers."

It was through Nature that he looked for the ultimate and supreme revelation to man. He was never tired of dreaming of a larger life, a life that should be free from commonplace duties and sordid cares, a life at one with the trees, the rivers, and the hills :

I hope (he writes) that at some time, by dint of bolder thought and freer action, the world shall see a race able to enjoy it without stint, a race able to enjoy the flowers with which the physical world is strewn, the colours of the garden of life. To look backwards with the swallow there is sadness, to-day with the fleck of cloud there is unrest ; but forward, with the broad sunlight, there is hope.

This conception possessed him to such an extent that it succeeded in crowding all other interests out of his mind. He could not find words with which to express the new emotions and ideals which clamoured for utterance, and in "The Story of my Heart" he attempted the impossible. He became sublimely inarticulate.

It is, I think, on his earlier works that his fame must ultimately rest, and particularly on such books as "The Gamekeeper at Home" and "The Amateur Poacher." His delineations of rural landscape are executed with a grace and delicacy which have never been surpassed in English descriptive literature. Something of the charm of a fast vanishing period is preserved in these records, the gracious and leisurely life of an English homestead in days when the countryside afforded an ample sustenance to the farmer and the agricultural labourer, the gossip of a village ale-house, the pleasant intercourse between squire and peasant. It is surely not too much to assert that Richard Jefferies will be read and loved when the life which he described so faithfully shall have disappeared before the advent of multitudinous factories and the tramping of great armies.

THE FANATICS

THE human mind, as psychology reveals it to us, is a strange and wonderful organism. Thoughts, often wild and curiously disconnected, sometimes almost supernaturally clear and coherent in the rare inspiration of genius, flit through it from the dim and vast sub-consciousness that lies beyond the threshold of all conscious being, uplifting saint and poet to the Divine on the wings of Imagination, but driving the unimaginative materialist, if he cannot break free from them, into the frenzied fancies of heretical fanaticism. For the basis of all heresies and the motive-power of all fanaticisms is a mental obsession: the mind, by long dwelling upon a single isolated truth, gradually over-emphasises its importance and loses sight of its proper relation to the whole body of Catholic doctrine.

Frequently this religious obsession is associated with a morbid spiritual vanity that amounts to moral perversion.

It was Sunday evening and a grey fog hung over the city, saturating everything with its moisture and obscuring, as with a thick veil, the familiar landmarks. Groping my way through a network of narrow streets I reached the "Horsefair"—an open, railed-in triangle, the favourite haunt of loafers, out-of-works and itinerant evangelists. I paused for a moment, uncertain of my direction, when, from somewhere in the centre, came the sound of a man's voice—the voice of a raucous Boanerges, whose tongue of triple brass was denouncing the terrors of hell upon all and sundry who should refuse to accept the message of this self-appointed prophet. Guided by the hubbub—for there were frequent interruptions—I crossed over and joined the outskirts of a small crowd surrounding the central arc-lamp, which dimly illumined their upturned faces and the wet asphalt beyond. The preacher, a short, dark man, with a heavy moustache and a mass of tangled brown hair, the grime of many days upon his collar, and a tattered Bible in his hand, was gesticulating wildly, amid the scarcely-concealed mirth of the bystanders, as he thundered impartially against Society and Socialism, Churchmen and Nonconformists—in short, everyone except a few like-minded fanatics, whose election to salvation had apparently set them above the moral standard exacted of publicans and sinners.

A tirade against Socialism, containing few facts, but much offensive mud-throwing, provoked one of the crowd to retaliate, and a duel of words ensued—the preacher, heated and abusive, aspersing his opponent's morals and consigning him to the bottomless pit; the Socialist, cool and argumentative, stolidly indifferent to the other's personalities, and cynically enquiring whether they might be taken as a fair sample of Christian charity.

Disgusted with the altercation, I was about to pass on, when physical exhaustion compelled the preacher to stop, and my attention was drawn to his comrade, who now took up his parable and prayed. A tall, gaunt man, with iron-grey hair, wearing a thread-bare overcoat that may once have been black, but had become a curious nondescript shade of green, on his head a round felt hat, much battered, which looked as if it might have been the cast-off head-gear of some Dissenting minister, and in his eyes the far-away glint that betokens a visionary, he might well have passed for a typical example of one of Cromwell's "Fifth Monarchy" men. In marked contrast to his predecessor, he spoke throughout in a quiet, even tone; volcanic fire and energy had given place to a glacier-like coldness; yet here, too, there was no attempt at argument, but crass ignorance and unqualified denunciation; for these men rely blindly on the fantastic promptings of a disordered sub-consciousness—and deem them direct inspirations from the Most High. They alone are the elect of God; the rest of us are marked with the sign of the Beast. A distinguished scientist, a prominent Dissenter, and a Socialist leader are linked together as a Trinity of Evil—representing severally No Bible, No Blood, and No God. And the unemployed are exhorted to pray for work and then—sit down on their hams and wait till it comes to their doors!

I recognised the man. A cobbler by trade, he preferred to loaf about the "Horsefair," babbling of the mysteries that are beyond the ken of him and all his kind, while his poor, suffering wife toiled all day as a charwoman, and his children lacked bread to eat. Only the other day I endeavoured to persuade her to go into the hospital for an operation; but it was impossible, she said. Who would look after her home and her children? Yes; she had tried remonstrances; she had begged him to stick to his last; she had told him that a man's wife and children should be his first care; but she had only been beaten for her pains. One night, when she had broken down and cried, he had clutched her by the throat and threatened to choke her if ever she interfered with him again. Since then she had not dared.

And this was the man who expounded the Scriptures in the "Horsefair" and exhorted sinners to wash them in the Blood of the Lamb and be clean! It is the old Antinomian heresy; an exclusive obsession of the doctrine of justification by faith—the elect can do no wrong. Like a noxious weed, it takes root and flourishes in the congenial soil of Puritanism, to bring forth its fruit in due season—hypocrisy and corruption and all manner of uncleanness. For it is to these that the Apostle applies the proverb: "The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire."

The preacher had finished, and the little crowd of human souls, filled, like the prodigal son, with "the husks that the swine did eat," was slowly swallowed up in the fog. And as I turned away there arose before mine eyes a vision of an England after Mr.

McKenna's own heart—an England of "simple Bible teaching," where every child was left to interpret the Divine Mysteries according to the darkness of his own ignorance, and false prophets thundered at every street-corner, blind leaders of the blind into the ditch of heresy and schism; where the "saints" multiplied and sinned exceedingly, and the gospel of hypocrisy and ugliness brooded over the land. And then—faint and low—came the rise and fall of a chant from a church hard by, as the choir sang the "Clamavi in toto corde meo." I stood beneath the chancel window and listened; the psalm had struck a sympathetic chord; its words were strangely in harmony with my mood. For they sang the concord of words and deeds, of faith and works, which makes the lives of those who have it a veritable symphony of celestial music, bringing to all who hearken to its strains the greatest of God's gifts—His peace.

ERNEST D. LEE.

SOTTO VOCE

WHEN time shall have adjusted the reputations of our Victorian writers, clipping a little here, and, perhaps, giving in some tribute of conscience-money there, it will, when all is done, remain true that the group was splendid, and numerous enough to be called a crowd. The age of the last Queen Regnant will bear, at least, comparison in literary importance with that of Elizabeth or Anne. The second Mary never reigned alone, or was in anything but name a Queen Regnant at all, as indeed there was no reason why she should have been even a Queen Consort: the first held too brief a page, and filled it too full of sombre event to leave room for literature upon it.

No doubt some unborn champion of the Victorian age will claim for it a literary eminence as great as that of the age of Elizabeth, and, if Shakespeare gives him trouble, he will urge that Shakespeare belongs to no age, as the Teutonic critic already refuses to acknowledge that he belongs to any country.

As for the present new-born era—no one seems about to be delivered of any immense literary reputation; a mountain or two may have announced itself in labour, but only mice have been, so far, brought forth. And now seven years of the new century are gone.

It may be a relief, perhaps, instead of scanning the horizon for a reputation to come, to cast a glance or two back on those that stand over from the late century and reign that ended so nearly together. If that is done, it will be inevitable that we should catch sight first of what seems least removed, so that our attention will be arrested by three great figures not really belonging to this new age, spluttering in its cradle, but leaning over into it, as trees may into a garden where they did not grow.

To speak of Mr. Swinburne and Mr. Thomas Hardy as nineteenth-century survivals may seem odd when it is remembered that both are younger than Mr. Chamberlain; nevertheless, it is true that both they and Mr. George Meredith do belong to the great literary age which is finished, and not to that which we are quite ready to see begin.

Mr. Swinburne is destined to afford subject matter for much discussion and speculation by the historians of letters in a future generation. Why was he never Laureate? Who were supposed to have been his competitors, seeing that he long outlived the only two English poets of his time who could ever have been weighed against him as rivals?

No doubt it will be remembered who some of the Laureates have been, and the explanation of Swinburne's unlaurelled brow will be found in the wreathed heads of Shadwell, Nahum Tait, Nicholas Rowe and Eusden, Colley Cibber and Henry James Pye. A chaplet that could fit them was scarcely to be crammed on Swinburne—yet Spenser had worn it big enough for Ben Jonson (though Samuel Daniel must have lost it many leaves): and his friends seem to have thought that it fell down loosely over Wordsworth's face, somewhat obscuring his cold radiance. Swinburne's radiance was, at all events, never cold; though we need not discuss now whether poetry must be "moral," or art either: it is enough to say here that, if all were removed that the chilliest criticism could disapprove, enough would remain to furnish forth a dozen such Laureates as we have named (if only it could have been shared among them) with bays to hide their baldness, and leave its owner a poet still. Not only is he immensely a poet, but he has the rarer distinction of being a poet only. Browning was in the first place a thinker, caring, as it seems, so much more for his thoughts than for his poetry that he thrust them on the latter's company over roughly, over copiously, so that the too tightly packed chariot of his muse had not always room enough for the muse herself, who got smothered in corners, and crammed away behind a plethora of ideas that might as well have walked. Tennyson was all for expounding, but he had not always quite so much to expound as he fancied: when he had anything to say it was always an even chance he would oversay it. If Browning had commonly too many ideas for his words, Tennyson had often too many words for his ideas, and he did not know how to leave off singing when he had got to the end of his tune. Both great poets have paid their penalty. Numbers of readers accuse Tennyson of being universally shallow because his profundity is not invariably alarming, and of being flatly verbose because he did sometimes write poetry when there was no particular occasion for him to write anything at all. Of Browning it is, on the other hand, glibly assumed that he is incomprehensible, malignantly involved, purposely difficult, and repulsively dry. The result is that many who are not really stupid are shy of the trouble of reading Browning; whereas Tennyson's punishment is that the stupid are the most ready to read him, out of a wrong idea that he is just the tuppenny-halfpenny poet for them, and they do not change their minds till they stumble into some of his better work; nor necessarily then, for they are always capable of mistaking it for his worse.

Swinburne does not lift his voice to preach, or to teach either, but because he has to sing, and cannot open his mouth without pouring music from it. It is the melody he fills the ear with, and it is for the song he cares. The words are enough and their beauty is their power. They could not be translated into prose any more than the throstle's song, or the nightingale's, could be rendered in score. Nevertheless the bird's lyric teaches, though he pours it forth in "unpremeditated art," with no care at all of teaching, and though we ourselves could never analyse his lesson, or dissect it into phrases, and dissolve it into themes. God's sublimest messages may be without speech; and he who wrote of Wisdom knew that the circle of the stars, the sun and moon and the great water were also among the prophets. Every teacher is not conscious of his own teaching, or master of it; it is often deeper than himself, and stronger, with significance he can only half divine. Yet God has sent him, as He sent Balaam.

The sea and the sun, the woods and meads of green and gold, the storm and summer shower, have more to tell of God than all the preachers have ever drawn from them: thus every song that is lovely sings of Him, whatever the theme be; every instalment of beauty a hint of the splendours that gem His garments; every sweet odour a reminder of the fragrance of His Feet.

A great poet cannot help being a great teacher, though he may strike no pose of instruction. Nor do we mean in saying that Swinburne's words are of themselves sufficient, in their vocal perfection, that they in fact voice nothing. One needs no knowledge of Italian to be swayed by the glorious, sublime sonance of Dante; and perhaps an Italian with little English would, if he had the ear for music, be moved by the Triumph of Time; language is Swinburne's pipe on which he plays to the heart, through the ear, of everyone who can listen. Words are his angels, and every syllable from his lips a feather in their wings. He gives colour to sound itself, and weaves pictures of arras out of harmony. Expression with him is not merely an acquired knack, but an innate, an inevitable function of life, like breathing. It carries him out, as on a tide, into the irresistible ocean of poetry, where his themes themselves are but islets, jewels in a greater sapphire sea, where one may land and linger, or just as well gaze upon, leaving their guessed beauties uninvaded. Swinburne, like Shelley and Keats, is a poet because he cannot help himself. Some are born great, some have achieved greatness, and some have had it thrust upon them: these three were born poets, had it thrust upon them by a fate that loved them, and achieved it.

No one would compare the other two great survivors, Meredith and Hardy, and only the factious must be forever contrasting. One is essentially English, though great English writers are not always massive, as Mr. Hardy is. He takes us out of doors, where Thackeray would have pulled us by the elbow upstairs (the back stairs, mostly), to sneer at the people in the drawing-room. Dickens was usually indoors, too, hanging about kitchens, and not always even knowing the difference between the kitchen and the housekeeper's room. Nor did he much care to know. He prefers parlours behind shops, or in mean lodgings, or in debtors' prisons. Hardy never wants to go near town houses at all; his folk would be out of drawing in them; they need wide-spaces, free air, and broad distances, large foregrounds, and deep backgrounds. He has not much to say of what people eat and drink, or of what they wear; the life to him is more than the meat, and the body more than the raiment. He has no great nose for a snob, and is no truffle-dog of subterranean vulgarities or piteously disguised meanesses. Even vulgarities on the surface do not cry out to him for castigation. His humour is the back-front of pathos. He is not comic like Dickens, or malignantly witty like Thackeray. He cannot be profane with humanity, or flippant with it. He does not love to see the image of God in plush, or care to watch it over-eating itself. He is not a burly Pope, as Thackeray aimed at being, or a slum-Congreve, as Dickens nearly was. Pope was of his own time, and Congreve of his; Hardy's is not the mere local cleverness of a period, for his men and women are of the eternal sort like Shakespeare's. They do not owe their interest to fashion, or their quaintness to the lack of it. No one pretends that Thackeray had not genius to portray human beings, but he did not care for the most human part of them; the adjective was dearer to him than the substantive; the spots on a man's face were more to him than the man, the false accents more than the voice, especially if it were mincing, or had a brogue in it; and he dressed mankind in their blemishes with a gusto none the less cruel because it was insufferably instinctive and successful. Blemishes were his stock-in-trade, and he dealt wholesale; while absurdities were Dickens's stock that he could retail almost ad infinitum.

Whether Dickens could draw real people or not his critics are not certain, but it is certain that he did draw chiefly caricatures, each character being chiefly differentiated by its absurdities and peculiarities. Of course, the absurdities are irresistible, and the world would be loath to be disinherited of their possession, and the peculiarities are revealed and inimitable. But one may end by trying to resist the former, and many have been drawn on to the weary attempt at imitation of the latter.

Great as both these masters were, each unapproachable in his sphere, it is their own fault if they leave us finally unsatisfied. Life is not really mean, or even wholly ridiculous.

These remarks are no impertinent effort to belittle greatness, or even a paltry attempt to measure it. Thomas Hardy is no more a rival of either of these colossi than he is their imitator. Nevertheless in his way he is larger than them, though less diffuse and admittedly less dazzling. He is more humane than Thackeray and more human than Dickens; for he is more sincere than the former, and more genuine than the latter. Mankind is not the point of his joke or the butt of his sneer. He is a creator, not a costumier, nor a devilish-sharp detector of sordid motives, or even a rollicking mimic of queer habits. Above all, he is a creator: he says of his characters "Let them be," and they are, with no dependence on after-thoughts and after-touches. Dickens never created off-hand, his people are mostly evolutions, at so many stages a month. Out of a bibulous, semi-imbecile little protoplasm evolved the amiable, almost respectable, Mr. Pickwick, and out of the merely priggish Mr. Pecksniff evolved a complete villain. Mr. Hardy's people are each as big as himself, and would mostly be far too big for the mincing pages of "Vanity Fair" or "Barry Lindon." They are not all respectable, but even the disreputable are not despicable, or (what is worse) made to appear so by the unscrupulous cruelty of their maker. In a sense, they are archaic, but they are much less obsolete than Thackeray's snobs or even Dickens's cads. It is not pretended for a moment that they are more amusing: though the pitiless wit of "Vanity Fair" draws tears from the heart of any decent reader, and the pathos of "Little Nell" is enough to make a cat laugh. Hardy is not perpetually in pursuit either of our sobs or our grins: life is not so jocular, according to him, or so sentimental or so banale as that comes to.

Of Mr. Meredith we must not speak in a postscript: and perhaps in speaking of him, if we are allowed space to do so in a further note, we may be permitted to allude to another lesser, but great, literary personage standing over from the late century.

JOHN AYS COUGH.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Ancient Italy. By ETTORE PAIS. Translated by C. DENSMORE CURTIS. (T. Fisher Unwin, 21s. net.)

WE are afraid that to the ordinary reader Signor Ettore Pais's work will rank with Browning's Grammarians, who Settled ſtri's business—let it be—

Properly based oſi

Gave us the doctrine of the enclitic ſe . . .

for the subjects of the majority of the monographs that compose the book are—highly specialised study apart—of quite minute or even exiguous interest. But as the specialisation of the reader increases, so also will his interest in the work and his gratitude to the author. We suppose that in no other branch of humaner letters has the system and method of study changed so much in so short a time as in history. Even the most elementary of students is now no longer content to take as original authorities the unsupported statement of Pseudo-Scymnus on the one hand or even Thucydides or Aristotle on the other—to take the two extremes of reliability; and while our grandfathers were not above accepting even Lemprière and Herodotus as scientific authorities, their grandsons are trained to go behind even contemporary historians, and to try and piece together for themselves, either by actual spade-work or by the study of inscriptions, the history of the time. Such a method is naturally slower and more laboured, but the whole-hearted devotion of the various schools of archæology working side by side throughout Egypt, Greece, the Islands, and Italy, has accomplished much—far more, indeed, than might have been expected, considering how shamefully starved some of them are financially.

There are twenty-six monographs in the present work, all dealing with separate, definite points in the early history of Italy, Sicily, and the neighbouring islands. The importance of these points varies considerably. In two of the chapters Professor Pais discusses at considerable length the Siceliot, Italiot, Samnite, and Campanian elements in the earliest history of Rome. In another he considers two Greek inscriptions found in Sardinia, the longer of which consists of three words and the shorter of four letters. The former of these are, perhaps, the most generally interesting chapters in the book, for Professor Pais traces the debt owed by Rome to Greece both in custom, religion, and political machinery. His case is put with great cogency and clearness, and we realise that long before the physical subjection of Greece by Rome the moral conquest of Rome by Greece, of which Horace speaks, had begun. With the easy adaptability of an unimaginative and uncreative people, the early Romans adopted deity after deity; and, more wonderful still, even such "essentially Roman" institutions as the Tribune are early traceable, according to Professor Pais, to the προστάτης τοῦ δήμου, whom readers of Thucydides will remember at Syracuse. This latter city, and its position among its sister cities in Sicily and Magna Græcia, naturally recurs continually in the various chapters, and by his research and careful weighing of evidence Professor Pais has done much to settle many points of political and topographical discussion which up to now have remained vexed.

The price and matter of the book will undoubtedly limit the number of its readers, as its author admits in his Preface; but if those who read it are few, they will at least be appreciative—a quality beyond all others in value when serious work is to be judged.

Discoveries: a Volume of Essays. By WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS. (Dun-Emer Press.)

THERE are many obscure and some very fine things in this beautifully-printed little volume. The following is, perhaps, the best of all:

I am orthodox, and pray for a resurrection of the body, and am certain that a man should find his Holy Land where he first crept upon the floor, and that familiar woods and rivers should fade into symbol with so gradual a change that he never discovered—no, not even in ecstasy itself—that he is beyond space, and that time alone keeps him from Primum Mobile, the Supernal Eden, and the White Rose over all.

There is here somewhat of the grave music of Jeremy Taylor, and the thought is as beautiful as the expression. Excellent, also, is the observation that "of all artistic forms that have had a large share of the world's attention the worst is the play about modern educated people." Nothing can be more true, but one questions (so far as England is concerned, at all events) the propriety of naming this form "artistic." The modern "serious" play to which Mr. Yeats is referring has nothing to do with art; it is an entertainment, and sometimes a very clever one. As Mr. Yeats says, educated and well-bred people do not storm and rave; "when they are deeply moved they look silently into the fireplace"—or, it might be suggested, they may mutter a few commonplace and broken sentences. Dr. Traill once remarked to a friend that, as modern conversation is largely a series of grunts, a play in good and forcible English is necessarily an artificial product; and the "Thesis" drama, which Mr. Yeats mentions with some approval, has the disadvantage of being undramatic. The pity is that our playwrights have not recognised the unfitness of their medium for high tragical and emotional effects. They will go on making would-be "serious" plays out of stuff that could be moulded into excellent farce. If the very unwise second marriage of Mr. Tanqueray had been handled in the right spirit we might have had a farce of permanent value, better even than Dandy Dick. But, indeed, our "seriousness" (it is wholly a sham seriousness, by the way) renders us incapable of enjoying the old masterpieces as they are meant to be enjoyed. There is a story of a certain revival of the School for Scandal. Joseph was plying Lady Teazle with his cajoleries, and a lady was heard to murmur to her friend, "Ah! poor thing! I hope she won't give way to him." It is curious that the right understanding of comedy had departed from players and audience in the 'twenties of the nineteenth century, for Lamb notes that the intention, the atmosphere of the piece were quite corrupted by that time. And as for high emotion in a drama of modern life, well, the result is either tinsel and red fire—melodrama—or else an exhibition which is more degrading and offensive than any bull-fight in Spain.

Florence and the Cities of Northern Tuscany, with Genoa. By EDWARD HUTTON. (Methuen, 6s.)

MR. HUTTON is a writer with a temperament. He reveals his sympathies and his prejudices on every page of this strangest of guide-books. The modern spirit, the Reformation, and Protestantism are anathema to him. He betrays a very definite dislike for Genoa and the Genoese. He contrives to do something less than justice to Savonarola, in whom he sees merely a pleasure-hating fanatic. He is a lover of joy and of the sunshine, a hater of austerity. The book is one that should be read by every lover of Italy. It is full of a generous ardour, a passionate enthusiasm for the beauty and traditions of that lovely land. Mr. Hutton's style, however, is sadly lacking in restraint. He is addicted to a too sedulous cultivation of the purple patch, nor is he always careful to observe that line of demarcation which separates the sublime from the ridiculous. He tells us, for instance, of a walk from Florence to Vallombrosa:

There were trees full of cherries, too, so full that in the sunshine they seemed to dance for joy, clothed all in scarlet, so red, so ripe was the fruit. Presently I came across an old man high up in a tree gathering them in a great basket, and since I was thirsty I asked him for drink, and since I was hungry I asked him for food.

Here, surely, is a great pother over a small business; but it is characteristic of Mr. Hutton's method. With all its defects, however—and they are the defects of youth, of immaturity, and of an unregulated enthusiasm—the book cannot be neglected. The chapters on the Florentine art-galleries and the Casentino are especially admirable, and a word of praise is certainly due to Mr. William Parkinson's excellent illustrations. Unfortunately, there is a profusion of printer's errors.

Embroidery; or, the Craft of the Needle. By W. G. PAULSON TOWNSEND. (Truslove and Hanson, 3s. 6d.)

WITH the authority and knowledge gained by long experience of practical designing for embroidery, Mr. Townsend has addressed this handbook to students of the art of the needle; and, beside the illuminating diagrams of complicated stitches and appliances, there are many excellent illustrated descriptions of old and modern examples of this charming and delicate art that should recommend the book to those who are interested in the beauty of decorative needlework, as well as to students who wish to work for their own profit and pleasure. For these latter there is nothing of the technique of embroidery that cannot be learnt from Mr. Townsend's book. Embroidery, from its remote beginnings, through the years when it flourished as a vital art, until now in the attenuation of survival, has been a woman's art exclusively. It seems probable that the idea first sprang from the brain of a woman, inspired by the worship of some strange god—Ashtaroah, perhaps, or Baal, or some grotesque and impassive Egyptian deity—and that her devotion found expression in the first tentative efforts to beautify by her needle the garments of the priests or of the god itself.

There is at this moment a great revival of interest in everything connected with the art of the needle, largely due in England to the exertions of the late William Morris. If the hurry of the present day does not allow ladies to spend the enormous time on needlework that they devoted to it in the Middle Ages and later, there are nowadays few cultivated persons who do not wish to know sufficient about the art to distinguish between the genuine old work and its modern imitation. From all these points of view and many others Mr. Townsend's book will be of the utmost service to amateurs.

My Life in the Open. By WILL H. OGILVIE. (Fisher Unwin, 5s. net.)

MR. OGILVIE is a poet who writes very practical prose. Eleven years' experience of Australian farm and bush life have had this effect upon a writer who is evidently a strong believer in hard work. "My life in the Open" is a collection of short essays descriptive of life in Scotland, America, South Africa, and Australia. They are, of course, well written, if undistinguished in an age when there are so many who can write "fairly well." Mr. Ogilvie is a better poet than his prose would suggest. He is never strikingly original in this book, though anybody who can appreciate thoughtful essays on open-air life will find it very soothing. The most characteristic chapter is that entitled "The River-roads." The great highways have fascinated writers for many years, and a large library could be formed consisting of road-books alone. Mr. Ogilvie's description of the river-roads of Australia is the best piece of writing in the book, and it is easy to see that his temperament is essentially Australian, for as soon as he deserts that Continent his prose falls away in quality. The various phases of farm life are treated by the author very sympathetically, and at times enthusiastically; indeed, so much geniality and suavity have seldom been found within the covers of a single book. Mr. Ogilvie, we are informed by the writer of the Introduction, has a great following in Australia, where thousands enjoy his poetry. Doubtless this volume of prose is intended as an epic of the open-air life, but it contains too much information to be anything like a sentimental analysis. However, there is some criticism of American methods as applied to the advertising of farms and farmers, and the ten essays on Scottish life contain a few pointed remarks on the local men and their methods which redeem the volume from monotony. Poets are notoriously proud of their prose, and that Mr. Ogilvie had a serious object in giving us this book is the obvious inference of the Introduction. He has gained a reputation that is quite deserved, and the share he has taken in establishing the Australian school of writers entitles his efforts to careful consideration. "My Life in the Open," if it is advanced as a specimen of the writer's style, can be summed up as a good piece of work, though it scarcely merits the implied compliments of the author of the Introduction. Mr. Ogilvie is not of the school of Stevenson, and "My Life in the Open" has no kinship with "Across the Plains."

Northanger Abbey. By JANE AUSTEN. With Twenty-four Coloured Illustrations by C. E. BROCK. (J. M. Dent and Co., English Idylls, 5s. net; in vellum, 8s. 6d. net.)

Les Maîtres Sonneurs. Par GEORGE SAND. Preface d'ÉMILE FAGUET, de l'Académie Française. Illustrations de M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

La Mare au Diable. Par GEORGE SAND. Notice Analytique de SAINTE-BEUVE. Illustrations de GERTRUDE LEESE. (Bell and Sons, les Classiques Français Illustrés, publiés sous la direction de Daniel O'Connor, 5s. net.)

THESE books are examples of two attractive collections which will fit almost exactly into the same shelf. All three are of an idyllic nature. The chance which brings the two collections together here suggests that Messrs. Dent's Idylls would make as charming reading for French girls as Messrs. Bell's two tales by George Sand would make for English girls. "Northanger Abbey" is not the best example of Jane Austen's work, but the fact that the scene is mostly laid in Bath, one of the few towns in England which retain their proper character, makes it particularly attractive to foreigners. It has also a stronger romantic element than is usual with Jane Austen, which adds interest for young people. Mr. C. E. Brock interprets the period prettily; he is best in his portraiture of Mr. Allen, in which he shows good drawing, and in that of the heroine, when treated in his statelier style, since he does not keep her physiognomy quite sufficiently uniform for drawings intended really to illustrate a story.

Miss Wheelhouse and Miss Gertrude Leese also supply pretty illustrations to George Sand, and have succeeded very fairly in imitating French colour-tones. But this is exceedingly difficult for foreigners, and without in any way criticising the artists' capacities as English illustrators, Messrs. Bell would render their attractive series more self-consistent if they entrusted the illustrations to French artists. The black-and-white illustrations are not so nearly French, though often very pretty in their own way. Since George Sand's other reputation is more widely spread in England, it is fair to insist, as Monsieur Émile Faguet points out in his Preface, that "Les Maîtres Sonneurs" and "La Mare au Diable" belongs to her early romantic period. It is hazardous to give a positive opinion, considering the diversity of views on the subject, but, from a cursory glance, these two stories seem as irreproachable pour les jeunes filles, as "Northanger Abbey." All three books should be useful as presents or prizes, to entice French and English girls to learn each other's language. It must be admitted that English girls will have the advantage in George Sand's superior precision of style, for "the immortal Jane" is often very careless. They will also have the further advantage of Sainte-Beuve's and Monsieur Émile Faguet's Introductions. On the other hand, Jane Austen's vivid sincerity places her on a far higher level than George Sand, especially as an historian of contemporary manners.

FICTION

The Death Man. By BENJAMIN SWIFT. (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)

THE position of the common hangman in social life is an extraordinary one. From no point of view can it be said to be a desirable one, and we have no doubt this book will set many people thinking and wondering on the subject. Mr. Benjamin Swift has dealt with the question in a very vivid and interesting manner, and has described the daily life and feelings not only of the hangman himself, but of his neighbours in the East Coast town in which he lived. When the story opens Martin Sheldrake had held his office for several years, and the cloud of dislike with which he was surrounded had become thicker and thicker; and now dislike had grown into active hatred and hostility, for it had been his duty to execute the sentence of the law on Ned Wilks, the most popular man in Eastwold, where they both lived. The story is cleverly contrived and the little society of the place is presented with a sympathy that is reminiscent of George Eliot. So many of the inhabitants play a natural and important part in the tale, and before long one seems to know quite intimately the miller and his daughter Phoebe, and Aubrey Singleton, the chemist's son, and Mr. Peckney, the draper and undertaker; and then there are Mrs. Sheldrake and her son by her former marriage, Harry Rodrum. It would be doing but poor justice to Mr. Swift's novel to try and sketch the plot at all fully and tell how gradually Sheldrake becomes more and more isolated until even his wife and stepson abandon him, and then how nearly the executioner comes to having to hang his own stepson. Looked upon simply as a story, it is most absorbing; but to many the most interesting part of the book will be the way in which the different characters develop. Sheldrake's own character is of peculiar interest, but perhaps the personage who will attract most attention is Father Harling, the Roman Catholic priest, who learns the innocence of Ned Wilks and the name of the real murderer in the confessional-box. His struggles with his conscience and his sense of duty are most ably depicted, and if his attitude in the end be displeasing to some readers, none can deny that his behaviour is at any rate plausible. It is a long time since we have reviewed a book in this column which combines so excellent a story with such strongly-drawn characters. The atmosphere of the Suffolk fishing-town with its summer visitors is admirably suggested, and the whole book abounds in signs of the author's knowledge of the various—and they are very varied—subjects with which it deals. Mr. Benjamin Swift's reputation, high as it has always been, should be appreciably raised by this his latest work.

Vincenzo's Vendetta. By JOSEPH PRAGUE. (Greening, 6s.)

THE title of this book is unhappy. In the first place, Vincenzo and the other characters are all Italian, and not Corsican, and in the second place, his pursuit of his betrayer does not begin until two-thirds of the book are done. Nor, in our opinion, does the main interest of the book lie either in the betrayal or its consequences, so much as in the careful study of the life and characters of the dwellers in Little Italy. It is a strange life, quite out of harmony with the surroundings, as those of us who know "the Lane" know by observation. For those to whom it is unexplored country Mr. Prague will prove a faithful guide. Here, if nowhere else, caelum non animum is proved to the hilt. Light-hearted, and careless in spite of the grey skies and wretched poverty; hot and passionate in their loves and hates in spite of the chilly, depressing atmosphere, these strangers in a strange land live just as they did at home—gossiping and playing mora in the open-air, smoking and quarrelling at the wine-shop. When trouble comes it is settled by the stiletto, not the fist, and forgiveness is unknown.

Mr. Prague has chosen a theme suitable in its eternal simplicity to his characters. It is the old story of the marriage of convenience, the worthless lover, and the inevitable tragedy. Vincenzo and Raffaele are well contrasted. The one—simple, inexperienced with women, who loses everything because he will take nothing which is not given as freely as he himself gives, is no match for the practised squire of dames—idle, dissolute, unprincipled—who takes all, and never even thinks of giving anything in return. Peppina, the woman of debate, is also admirably conceived. She is no wanton, but a woman who loves passionately, but is compelled by tradition of race to submit to her parents' barter of herself to the man who wants her. Even then, had Vincenzo been less chivalrous or less ignorant of women, the tragedy might have been prevented. But as he respected his wife too much, so did he lose any chance he might have had of gaining either her affection or respect. Mr. Prague shows this primitive characteristic in his heroine quite cleverly. Civilisation has, of course, modified if not destroyed the truth of the adage; but civilisation apart, the gospel of "a woman, a spaniel, and a walnut-tree" would appear to be founded on fact.

WE have always been of opinion that an excellent novel might be written round an analysis of physical cowardice, and, in spite of certain crudities in style and method, "Julian Winterson" confirms that opinion. Concerning cowardice many opinions may be held, and some of his readers will probably be inclined to disagree with Mr. Gleig's premises. For he unquestionably places it in the category of congenital defects as a kind of moral deformity for which there is no cure.

Julian Winterson is by family tradition destined for the Navy. His father had won the V.C. for conspicuous bravery, and all his ancestors had been fighting men. Julian himself, however, is, for the Winterson stock, a freak. He is sensitive, artistic in temperament, and physically a coward. This cowardice does not extend to his moral character, however, and so long as physical pain is not threatened he can face any danger. He is strong, clever, honourable—but bodily pain he fears. Mr. Gleig is at great pains to insist on this distinction, and shows his hero's character quite clearly in both aspects. But he gives no explanation, either by heredity or early shock, of this weakness. Julian is, as we have said, a "freak."

The book, naturally enough on these lines, is a tragedy. Julian funks a fight on the Britannia, and earns his father's title of V.C. as a nickname of disgrace. He passes his exams. brilliantly, and only fails to pass out as a midshipman owing to a piece of moral bravery. Once in the Navy he rises quickly, thanks to his brains; but when his chance of active service comes on the West Coast, he is guilty of cowardice in the field and his career is ruined.

As a contrast to Julian, Mr. Gleig places the ignorant son of an earl, whose intellect is bucolic, but whose bull-dog courage is only equalled by his back-stairs influence. He, of course, succeeds where Julian fails, and that in spite of his stupidity and not too high sense of honour. Mr. Gleig, we think, makes a mistake in choosing so inferior a foil to his hero. His purpose could have been achieved quite as well had he chosen a less detestable type as a contrast. But perhaps he wished to show that the physical courage of the brute is the only virtue in the Navy, and painted his picture accordingly.

Mr. Gleig evidently knows his Navy well, and writes as one with authority. At times his book reminds us of those of Herr Bilse, so evident is the iron in the soul. If this supposition is correct, there is, at least, this consolation to be gained—that, unalluring as the picture is, it is on every count cleaner and healthier than either "The Little Garrison" or "Dear Fatherland."

Clementina's Highwayman. By ROBERT NEILSON STEPHENS and GEORGE HEMBERT WESTLEY. Illustrated by Adelaide Everhart. (Hurst and Blackett, Ltd., 6s.)

Page 1.—Late on a fine afternoon in 1742 a young man strolled musingly along the narrow streets of London. To any observer who noted his moody brow, &c.

Page 320.—She smiled, but made no reply. She was ready to go to the end of the world with him. . . . In a few moments it was all over, and Clementina Melwood, wooed and won in this strange fashion, passed with her highwayman lover out into the night.

THESE sentences, which respectively open and close the story of "Clementina's Highwayman," leave small necessity for any further description or criticism of Messrs. Stephens's and Westley's work. Of course, the highwayman was not really a highwayman, but the young and gallant Lord Eastcourt in disguise. So character after character, incident after incident, chapter after chapter, is reproduced true to the scale and pattern of the rapier and "he-rapped-out-an-oath" school of fiction. One cannot but admire, indeed, the thoroughness with which these two American authors have learned their lesson and the deftness with which they have told an old, old story in the old, old way. That the book was originally written as a play is apparent, and that this comedy, with its puppets shedding sawdust at every pore, will sooner or later grace a London stage is probable, if deplorable.

The Cable-Man. By WEATHERBY CHESNEY. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)

THERE is an ingenuous little note on the cover of this book, in which the publishers point out that Mr. Weatherby Chesney is probably the first novelist to lay his scenes in the Azores and to choose his hero from the men in the submarine cable service. They also call the book "very remarkable," which it certainly is not, being merely a pleasant piece of sensationalism, only redeemed from the commonplace by a certain freshness of characterisation. As we have remarked in a good many books of this character recently, the author, though lavish with improbabilities, does not succeed in making his story proportionately exciting; but he has drawn the character of Val B. Montague, the proprietor of an American circus touring in the islands, with admirable humour and restraint, and some of the other characters are very good. We need hardly say that there is no particular reason why the hero should have been a cable-man, nor has the book left us with any very definite impression of the Azores.

CORRESPONDENCE

GEORGIANA FARRER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Ross's article on Georgiana Farrer is a signal example of the superficial methods of modern journalism. I consider that I have as private a property in Georgiana as Mr. Sydney Lee in Shakespeare or Mr. Shorter in the Brontës. For consider the facts. I discovered her almost in my boyhood. Mr. Ross tells us that he came across her by accident in the library at Thelema. He owes that accident to me, for I introduced her to Thelema. I am generally acknowledged to be a specialist in Georgiana. Though I may know nothing about the subjects on which I write, I do know her, and, therefore, I have never ventured to write about her. But Mr. Ross comes "poaching in the library at Thelema," has the luck to pitch upon Georgiana, glances through her book, is not struck with awe as a real student would be, but at once proceeds to make copy out of it. It never occurs to him to consider the relations of Georgiana to the Zeitgeist, or the condition of her text (so obviously corrupt that it calls for the attention of the editors of Blake), or the true nature of her message, or the essentials of her philosophy. He gauges her social position from "internal evidence." Is this what modern scholarship and research have come to? He proceeds to reconstruct her home, and yet he does not even know where she lived, and I venture to assume that he has never investigated her poems line by line for evidence on that difficult point. He discovers that she has been in Paris, but never asks himself whether she had ever been to Rome, or even whether she had actually seen that Niagara which she compares to sin. He is content with the information that Nellarina was a forced exotic and, to Mrs. Farrer, a narcotic. He never considers the question of her relationship to the poet, or whether she may not have been the same person as Harriet; for both died young. He attempts no explanation of the problems suggested by the difficult poem which begins:

Alabama—Alabama,
Who can say beneath the sky?
Alabama—Alabama,
Sing the saints of God on high.

He does not mention the light thrown on the poet's early years by the verse:

In twilight once I groped along,
Delighting in a thoughtless throng;
With others, called rash deeds a lark,
Not caring that my mind was dark.

Or the evidences in her work of classical and mythological study

Adonis, by heathens uncovered,
And Venus, immodestly shown,
Quite clearly declared their defilement—
Jehovah's pure love was unknown.

Or this hint at a dark experience:

Hear men swearing.
Oh, how daring!
From their curses swiftly flee.
Their caressing, far from blessing,
Shall destruction bring on thee.

Or this of another even more mysterious:

While you sit still debating
What best is to be done,
Your foes go on inflating
Themselves with foulest fun.

He omits all mention of the poem called "Jonah," and of this verse in particular:

For three long days, beneath the deep,
In fish's belly dark laid he;
How horrible, methinks, his state.
May no such terror fall on me.

But I need not labour the point that Mr. Ross has chosen to write on a subject of which he knows very little. He is qualified, no doubt, to produce a Georgiana Farrer birthday book or calendar (uniform, I suggest, with the G. B. S. Calendar), or to write on her for the new series of the English Men of Letters. But when I produce my definitive edition of her works I shall not come to him for assistance.

A. CLUTTON BROCK.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have read with a good deal of interest Mr. Ross's article in this week's ACADEMY upon the poetical works of Georgiana Farrer—a genius, as he says, who somehow managed to elude the vigilant eye of our genius-discoverer from Vigo Street.

Turning this evening to one of my more remote shelves, I disinterred a little volume of verse by another singer of the fair sex, whose technique and depth of expression almost rival Mrs. Farrer's. She is an Australian writer, and the book, entitled "Poems," is dated 1900, and bears the following modest preface:

My reason for publishing these poems is to satisfy the wishes of my many friends, and it is to them I dedicate this little volume.

From one of the first poems, entitled "England's Sympathising Queen," you will, perhaps, allow me to quote two verses:

Who is this that rides along On Balmoral estate?
It is the Queen of England,
Victoria, good and great.
Our gracious Queen, she comes in haste
To one whose heart is full Of grief because his own dear wife
Is killed by an angry bull.

Browning, we remember, immortalised Alfred Domett in "Waring" and "The Guardian Angel;" "In Memoriam" is Tennyson's tribute to his friend; Mrs. Fry has endeavoured to do as much by those she loves. Here is the beginning of a poem "To the Rev. Allan Webb":

A call has come from Melbourne
To Reverend Allan Webb.
'Tis from our Baptist brethren
In this their time of need.
For this we must excuse them
As once we did the same;
We therefore think our Sister Church
Is not so much to blame."

Can Mr. Ross find anything superior to this, in tolerance and technique, in the verse of Mrs. Farrer?

METRICAL EXPERIMENTS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—[The longest real line of serious English verse known to me is that which appears in Tennyson's "To Virgil" and "God and the Universe." It is termed nine-stress trochaic metre. Further extension is attempted in the following quatrains, which do not pretend to be poetry, only metrifaction. The difficulty, of course, is to make true single lines, not merely several separate lines printed as one. It would be easy to prolong these lines much further, but would any sense of unity survive? Does it survive as they stand?]

I

Ocean's hollow deeps resounding thunder back the tortured surges' rage and foam;
All the rocky shore is beaten white with league on league of desolating spray.
High above the noise and fury shine serene afar the guiding lights of home;
Shall the tempest-tossed, bewildered bark attain its peaceful haven in the bay?

II

With a rush and a roar from the crest of the mountain adown to the valley the hurricane sweeps in his frenzy of wrath.
The forests are shattered, their Dryads and Oreads tremble and shriek to the inmost recesses of sylvan abode.
As the sea with its wrecks, with destruction, and ruin of all that was peerless in beauty is strewn his demoniac path;
Over pasture and cornland and vineyard and hamlet effaced and abolished his terrible chariot urges its road.

III

In toil of hand and feet we slowly clamber heights that endless rise and rise immense above.

Still unsubdued, though seamed and scarred by cruel crag and boulder, inch o'er painful inch we rise.

At length, at once, what sudden-bursting, far-extending dream of glory greets our dazzled eyes?

The heights are vanquished; all around is one refulgent heaven of light and peace and warmth and love.

T. S. O.

THE SICILIAN PLAYERS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I fancy I detect in Mr. Lawson's letter something more than a little wavering. I flatter myself that latent therein is a surrender of much which in Mr. Lawson's former letter aroused my best passion—namely, anger. Who would suppose in the light of his second letter that Mr. Lawson had called Cav. Grasso a mere tiro of a "really great artist," and had said of Aguglia, "She is an exceptionally clever mime, capable of representing certain crude passions"? Still, it is due to Mr. Lawson that I should consider his second letter.

Well, in nearly all the instances which Mr. Lawson adduces to support his argument I can only categorically say that his opinions are by no means universally held. Mr. Lawson makes the second part of the Third Act of La Figlia di Forio do too much duty. One example out of so many that offered themselves to him proves nothing. Mr. Lawson calls this scene a "scene of horrible grossness." Really that is a matter of taste. And, if I so desired, I could quite well maintain that this scene is one of the most beautiful scenes in the whole play, and quite rightly from one point of view. At any rate this is certain, that the scene is the pivot round which the whole play turns. And indeed throughout I might charge Mr. Lawson with blaming the players for that for which the plays (if anything) are responsible.

However, revenons à nos moulons. I cannot but think Mr. Lawson has not understood D'Annunzio's play. D'Annunzio, as I think, has purposely made the wunch in the personality of Mila latent. That element is just there; we are just conscious of its presence all the time, though it never obtrudes itself. I for one think that Aguglia's art was very manifest in the wonderful and intelligent way in which she realised this. I, contrary to what Mr. Lawson thinks, felt when I saw the play, and still feel, that Aguglia made the "magic element" neither too obtrusive nor too unobtrusive, but that she realised it enough to make us all just conscious of its presence. It was a fine piece of art, and to my mind showed conclusively that Aguglia has got that "control" which, from some points of view, is perhaps the most valuable element in art. And here Mr. Lawson will be pleased to learn that I am inclined to the belief that such control is largely the sphere of the intellect.

On the other hand, take such a play as Russida. It is truly unfortunate that Aguglia has no part in this very admirable little play. Here, at any rate, there is no "sheer animalism which is sensual appetite." Here I can safely admit Mr. Lawson's argument as to the necessity of the eliminating intellect, and yet maintain that Grasso and Balistreri showed themselves great artists. And I ask Mr. Lawson once more whether in the light of his play—of Feudalismo—he is prepared to maintain that the acting of Grasso is that of a tiro of a "really great artist." It was against this and the above-quoted judgment on Aguglia that I wrote my letter. It is, apparently, "artistic restraint" that Mr. Lawson believes to be lacking to Aguglia. Well, I appeal to the First and Second Acts of Feudalismo.

Then, again, Mr. Lawson denies to Aguglia sufficient "mobility of face to admit of a wide range of expression." Well, has Mr. Lawson ever seen the Second Act of Malia, the Third Act of La Figlia di Forio, the Juan José, and the First and Second Acts of Feudalismo? Unlike Mr. Lawson, I appeal to more than one play. As for myself, in the Second Act of Malia she exercises the most superb mobility of face, such that I never hope to see any one better in this respect.

Again, Mr. Lawson should, instead of trying to disprove—what no one has maintained—that the Sicilian players are universally the greatest of actors, have proved that they were third-rate actors in that class of play which forms their repertoire. Instead of this, he judges them from the point of view of "universal" art, and even compares Paolo and Francesca with Malia, although, as all the world knows, there can be no manner of comparison between them, Malia being simply, as it were, a page taken out of the book of life. Malia is essentially a drama of ordinary human peasant life. Without maintaining that the art of the Sicilians is necessarily the highest art, I do maintain that in their own province of art they are extraordinarily good. But Mr. Lawson has seen fit to desert the points at issue in our former letters.

However, Mr. Lawson has shown a desire, leaving the shell, to get at the kernel of the matter. Now I think his letter is a perfect example of the dangers into which our excessive trust in and worship of the intellect is leading us. It is responsible for the essentially modern drama of Ibsen and Shaw, and Mr. Lawson seems to think that all drama has got to be intellectual drama. So much are we the prey of our intellects that Mr. Lawson has judged the Sicilians by the same measure by which he would judge this intellectual drama of Ibsen. He seems to think that love is merely affection, whereas I assure him that not only is love not yet "eliminated" by our superior culture and superior intellect, of which Mr. Lawson is so proud, but that it is even nearly if not quite as common as ever it has been. And I assure him, further, that love is still, "not to speak it profanely," affection and desire. And, again, the veneer of culture, on the contrary, is so superficial that any man in a fit of anger or jealousy does knock the chairs out of the way, just as is done in the plays in question. The fact is, I deny that there is any such distinction between the passions as Mr. Lawson would have us believe. And I deny that a man possessed of jealousy, love, hate, or any other of the "crude passions," cares one jot for the cold dictates of his reason. It is not to the point what your blue-blooded gentleman, cultured to effeminacy, does. On the other hand, Mr. Lawson may have heard of a poet called Wordsworth, who grasped the fact that it is in the moments of love and hate and jealousy that men of the peasant class truly live, and say beautiful things, and do beautiful things—"That's the true pathos—sublime of human life." Of this the plays acted at the Shaftesbury have afforded notable instances.

Finally, there are two ways of acting. Those who excel in either are equally to be called artists. One way is to retain one's consciousness while one acts, the other is to surrender one's own personality completely in that of the rôle one impersonates. Whichever way one chooses to adopt, one has got first to be capable of emotion, of sympathy. All I wanted to show was that Aguglia, by virtue of this genius for intense sympathy, is entitled to be considered a great artist, whether in posse or in esse. Art is emotion, a heightening, a "holding of the mirror up to Nature."

An actor, if he is to be an artist, must bear the same relation to the play as the critic, for they are both the interpreters through the intellect of psychology. Such, put briefly, is, I take it, Mr. Lawson's position. It is a position I cannot understand. As I say, it puts the intellect in the wrong place—in the first instead of the second place. I agree with Mr. Lawson as much as another that the "reason" should temper the "sensitivity," but I do not think Mr. Lawson has made good his point that Signora Aguglia is without this intelligence. It is a little ungracious in him and in others to deny the existence in Signora Aguglia of greatness in posse, and, as I think, to no small extent in esse. Artistic restraint is notoriously absent in youthful work. Keats and Ruskin, where so many instances suggest themselves, were great, though without this valuable restraint from the beginning of things. Accepting Mr. Lawson's argument, the one thing the Sicilians do is to reveal mental states by expression of emotion. A mental or psychological state must give rise to outward acts and external appearances, or, to all intents and purposes, such state is non-existent. Personally I found Malia rendered quite intelligible, which, if I understand Mr. Lawson aright, is what constitutes art in acting. And an actor is an artist when besides intelligence there is the more important projection of himself, which projection of personality is, perhaps, "creation." Myself I do get this projection most pronouncedly in Cav. Grasso and Signora Aguglia.

A friend of mine once very wittily said, "How can any one feel in a stiff shirt-front?" I must still maintain that the Sicilians have been judged from a wrong point of view. One did not go to the Shaftesbury for Ibsen.

I must apologise for the space I have already taken; much, however, still remains unsaid.

THE FRENCH PEASANT

SIR,—I congratulate Mr. Machen on having two British qualities in an eminent degree (prejudice and obstinacy). He reminds me of what a French general said of some British square at Waterloo, "One might kill the beggars, but their corpses remained rigid in the unbroken square!"

Mr. Machen, like the Holy Inquisition, has no intention of believing in the innocence and virtue of any heretics, whatever evidence may be forthcoming in their favour; like Jonah, he hungers for the destruction of Nineveh, and forgets the more than six-score thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand who are always with us. Let me recall the beautiful story of Abraham who interceded again and again even for the Cities of the Plain.

If he will read the account of the artist's parents in Sensier's

"Life of Millet," he will see how morally beautiful French peasants often are; and again in the "Life of the Curé d'Ars," from which I extract a story that should find grace in his eyes. An old peasant who often went into a little wayside chapel to kneel by the crucifix was asked what he said to the Lord, and replied, "I say nothing. I contemplate Him, and He me."

Zola, I believe, never records outside the priesthood, if even there, any example of the religious type, because he did not believe in the spiritual side of man. He often observed with a sigh that ~~a good dinner was the only real pleasure in life~~. "Il n'y a que ça!" To this poor man, to quote Carlyle's pungent phrase, the belly and its adjuncts were emphatically the grand realities. Even his death in a vitiated atmosphere was purely symbolic, and was exactly shown (as was pointed out at the time by a well-known astrologer) by a direction of the Ascendant to a vitiated Venus afflicted at birth.

When Laplace, who was called an atheist, was dying, his favourite pupil brought him word that Bessel, in Germany, had discovered something which confirmed one of his pet theories. He received the news with a chilly indifference, and murmured: "Tout ça c'est une blague! L'homme ne poursuit que des chimères. Il n'y a de vrai que l'amour." Here the last word of Science was a repetition, perhaps unconscious, of the last lovely line of Dante's great poem:—

L'amor che muove il sole e l'altre stelle.
"All great Art is Praise," which is another word for Love. "Intellect without love," said Walt Whitman, "is a fiend; Satan the most perfect expression thereof." "All great thoughts come from the heart," wrote Vauvenargues. Their lack of love is probably a considerable element in the fact that Swift and Nietzsche both died insane.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "SEA"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—To primitive man the sea must have seemed more shiny, open, and seeable than the land, which is blocked with hills, and covered with a hull of woods and forests. Whether ᾠη and silua, sylua are connected with Old-English hulen, Icelandic hylja, Gothic huljan, is for philologists like Dr. W. W. Skeat to say. But may it not be that, just as Latin mare appears to come from a root meaning to shine, to gleam, so the Gothic saiws = the sea, is akin to Gothic saihwān = to see? In the Carpathian Mountains there are lakes known as "eyes of the sea;" and in Baskish a spring of water is called ur-begi, literally water-eye. The Greek is ὠκεανός, and is thought by some to come from ὠκός = swift, but is it not possible that its etymon is the same as the Latin oculus, and other Indo-European words meaning eye?

THE ST. ASAPH SURRENDER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The Bishop of St. Asaph has dealt a grievous blow to Voluntary Schools in the Bill which has been printed by order of the House of Lords. Will you permit me to point out some of the reasons why this Bill should be repudiated by all Church-people as strongly as they oppose that of Mr. McKenna?

1. The scheme has never been submitted to the judgment of the Church, and has no authority but that of the Bishop himself. It is directly subversive of the National Society's policy. There can be no settlement of this education question until the views and necessities of all considerable sections of Church-people are considered and met.

2. It involves the abolition of all the Voluntary Schools, which number two-thirds of the schools of the country, and educate one-half the children. The past history and present services of these schools are worthy of a very different reward.

3. It proposes the destruction of Church trust-deeds, and the complete reversal of the religious purposes for which the schools are held. Only the slightest extension of the trusts would be needed to remove all legitimate Nonconformist grievances, without any violation of the principles of those trusts.

4. Trustees are to have power to "transfer" their schools, which means in plain English to betray their trust. Parliament may sanction such trucking with trust property, but it can never be made to square with the Eighth Commandment.

5. This Bill gives unequal treatment as between trust-deed religious teaching and Cowper-Templeism, between Nonconformists and Church-people. Cowper-Temple religion is to be established in the place of Church teaching in Church Schools, and is to be paid for out of the rates: Church teaching is to be extra and exceptional, and is to be paid for out of the pockets of Churchmen. Nonconformists are to have everything they require at the public cost. Churchmen must pay three times over for the education of their children. They have provided and maintained the premises of over eleven thousand schools, they must pay rates and taxes for education, and, in addition, pay again for their own religious teaching in their own schools.

6. This Bill would destroy all security for any religious teaching whatsoever. No teacher need profess any religious belief, nor belong to any religious denomination, nor attend any place of worship, nor be required to give any religious instruction. Here the figment "no religious test" runs wild.

7. The Bishop's Bill makes no provision for Roman Catholic schools. Is he prepared to give them "special treatment" while he destroys the schools of his own Church?

"Peace at any price" is the only motive which can be alleged for this gratuitous and wholesale surrender of our rights, principles, and property. But such surrender is never the way of peace. The grievance of Nonconformity which it is sought to remove is as dust in the balance to the burden of wrong and injustice which would be imposed upon the Church, and the strife of the past would be as nothing compared with the conflict which must be waged in defence of our schools, our children, and our faith.

T. E. CLEWORTH, Hon. Secretary,
Church Schools' Emergency League.

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer AND PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

Some Representative Opinions on

The Times' new World-History

We here print a few representative opinions on The Historians' History of the World, chosen out of the hundreds which have reached us from men and women of every profession and school of thought; from statesmen, administrators, social economists, scholars, historians, scientists, men of letters, business men, clergymen, teachers, &c.

If these readers have found The History so interesting, is it not worth your while at least to send for the Free Descriptive Booklet, which tells what this new World-History is? See the coupon below.

The Duke of Argyll:

An excellent work of reference.

Lady Henry Somerset:

In observing how social life and social problems are treated in The Historians' History, I note with satisfaction that it is in the best sense of the word a popular Work; that is to say, it is adapted to general needs, it reveals no bias, it is strictly impartial. The classification and general arrangement appear to me to be excellent.

Sir Gilbert Parker, M.P.:

For a work on so vast a scheme, I think the result is remarkably good. On dipping into any volume the interest was seized and held, the imagination stimulated, and the mind fortified by essential facts and elements in the long tale of universal history. These volumes adequately and effectively meet the challenge of my previous words. The distinguished authors have risen to a great opportunity, and the world of thought and reading is richer for their expert and vivid work.

W. Allison Phillips, Esq.:

I have no hesitation in saying that for the ordinary man The Historians' History of the World will form in itself an historical library better than he could possibly hope to get together at a much greater cost. It has, moreover, from this point of view, another merit; for one of the most satisfactory features of the book is the series of very full bibliographies, which, with the short appreciations of the various historians, will prove an excellent guide to those who wish to pursue any particular period or point of history further. The chronological tables will also prove very useful; and, last but not least, the book is provided with an excellent index.

T. P. O'Connor, Esq., M.P.:

Turning over these volumes, I had the sense that for a long time to come there was one great department of human knowledge as to which my resources were now complete. I need never buy another history; for such purposes as come within my sphere of journalist, I can say, with these volumes on my shelves, to the whole world of bookmakers and book publishers, "Nunc Dimittis." I have got all I want.

Sir George Bartley:

I trust that The Historians' History of the World being published at so low a price will enable our schools to make use of this work. If this is the case, these volumes may be the means of doing much for the patriotic education of those who are more and more becoming the actual rulers of our country.

Lord Cromer:

A most valuable addition to my library.

Dr. Furnivall:

I have given a few hours to testing the volumes of the History of England in The Historians' History of the World, and they have impressed me favourably. I haven't found a dull page in them, and they seem free from partisanship. The treatment of England gives me confidence in that of the other countries, and the gain of having a well-made summary of the history of all the chief nations in such a moderate compass is very great.

Sir John Carrington:

For those who like to read history in a large and handsome book—and I confess to being of that number—the format of the volumes is ideal. But, though large, they are not in the least heavy or cumbersome in the hand. The paper and typography are both good, and the illustrations are generally well-chosen and well-printed. The text is fully up to the high standard of its material presentation. It is marvellous in how full and comprehensive and deeply interesting a manner the great panorama of the world's history is unfolded in the pages of the work.

The Hon. W. W. Vernon:

It seemed to me a work of immense comprehensiveness and vast research, and, as far as I could see from a superficial inspection, the result seemed admirable.

J. H. Yoxall, Esq., M.P.:

This is a magnificent and wonderfully useful set of volumes; as a student of history, a writer, a reader, and a consulter of references, I have dipped into them again and again with both profit and delight. The illustrations alone, taken by themselves, afford to the noticing eye a very considerable amount of education.

Would you not like to learn something more about this monumental work? We have a Free Descriptive Booklet, which gives you all necessary information about the nature, scheme, and method of The Historians' History, and contains many specimen pages and illustrations taken from the work. This will be sent to you on receipt of the coupon below. You will not regret the time spent in its perusal.

The Historians' History is a complete world-history, in 25 super-royal octavo volumes, comprising 17,000 pages and about 11,000,000 words with over 3,000 illustrations. It comprises a complete narrative of universal history, covering the earth from pole to pole, and stretching from 5000 B.C. to 1907 A.D.

Each volume contains four times as much as an ordinary octavo, and compares favourably in paper, print, and binding with guinea books; yet the work is sold for only 7s. 6d. per volume; and this price may be paid on easy terms, at the rate of only 4d. a day.

Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace:

As to the spirit in which this work has been written, the following remark by the Editor may be quoted: "The desire to be free from all prejudice in the judgment of historical facts is the keynote of all our philosophy of historical criticism; and the desire to retain interest—human interest—is the keynote of our philosophy of historical composition." The unbiassed critic can say conscientiously that those two desires have been realised to a remarkable extent.

Sir W. P. Treloar, Bart.:

I have already had an opportunity to glance at one or two of the volumes, and I think it is one of the most wonderful productions of this or any other age.

It is in itself a complete and magnificent library of History.

Admiral Sir John Hopkins:

Of the form that the general grouping together of the "World's History" as issued by the Times takes, one cannot speak too highly, as formerly one had to dive about in all directions to find what was wanted, and then probably found the Historian you consulted so biased by some political considerations as to present one view of events only.

G. Harwood, Esq., M.P.:

The greatest recommendation of the book, to my mind, is that it is a "Historians'"—and not an advocate's—History. Here is the advantage of its being written by various authors, all of whom are well qualified by knowledge, yet none of whom are known to be identified with any "views" or "theories." Here, for almost the first time, we have a History which is an interesting narrative, yet which puts fairly all the salient facts. The printing and illustrating certainly add to the pleasure of using the book.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THERE has been a pitiable surrender in a portion of the Unionist press to the principles of the Bishop of St. Asaph's Bill. As we have already explained, the Bill is almost, if not quite, as objectionable and unjust as Mr. McKenna's, and it passes our comprehension how a paper like The Standard, which has done good work in resisting Mr. McKenna's Bill, can reconcile its views with acceptance of the new Bill. The Times has adopted an equally abject attitude on this question. We can only console ourselves by the reflection that nowadays these so-called great papers have ceased to exercise any appreciable influence. The mass of people have discovered by bitter experience that the daily papers are absolutely unreliable as guides. Instead of educating the public, or making an honest effort to do so, they advance and recede, take up and drop again this position or that in obedience to some process of secret wire-pulling, the ultimate aim and end of which is always increased circulation and larger dividends. The word "compromise" is elevated by them into an idol before which they bow down and worship. The result is that while they may be successful in their efforts to capture the shekels (though we deny that such tortuous ways are necessary even for that object), they have ceased to have any influence.

Nothing was more striking at the time of the introduction of the Tariff Reform cry than the complete failure of the newspapers—which were almost unanimously in its favour—to make the slightest impression on the electors. If these latter have come round, or are coming round, to that policy, which certainly seems incontestible, it is because they have thought the matter out for themselves, taking nothing on trust from the newspapers, and caring absolutely nothing what the Times or the Standard or the Daily Mail or the Daily News had to say about it. We hope and believe that the same process will take place in the present case. As soon as the Times and the Standard and the Daily Mail and the rest of them begin to find out that the cause of the Church is, after all, likely to be the winning one, they may be depended upon to come round to it again with striking promptitude and unanimity.

Quite apart from moral considerations, and considered as a pure matter of tactics, what could be more senseless than this Bill of the Bishop of St. Asaph, which is hailed as a happy compromise by the Standard and the Times? The Westminster Gazette of March 30th published an interview with "Dr." Clifford with regard to the Bill. This is what this person is reported to have said :

In the first place, it comes from the House of Lords, and I find it difficult to expect that any beneficent result will ensue from that quarter. Secondly, it is the product of an individual Bishop—and a Welsh Bishop—who probably does not understand educational matters in all their details as affecting England. . . . At present I have not felt inclined to pay any serious attention to the Bishop's Bill.

So that all the Bishop of St. Asaph gets, in return for his well-meaning offer to sacrifice the interests of the Church in the hope of conciliating the Nonconformists, is contemptuous rudeness on the part of the leaders of that body. What, in the name of common sense, is to be gained by attempting to compromise with Nonconformists when this is the way they receive these proposals of compromise? We repeat that, considered on the ground of tactics alone, it is obvious to an intelligent man that the only thing is to fight them to a finish. When they are conquered the time will have come to treat them with every possible generosity and kindness.

On Monday, in the House of Lords, the Bishop of St. Asaph moved the second reading of his Bill. In the result the debate was adjourned sine die. Lord Lansdowne struck a vigorous note of warning, the Bishop of Birmingham protested forcibly and ably against the Bill, and the Archbishop of Canterbury made one of his characteristically cautious and non-committal speeches which may mean everything or nothing. The blessed word "compromise," of course, figured largely in the debate, and altogether it is impossible to say what was the general effect produced. The real battle will, as before, be waged not in Parliament, but in the country. On the same day, at a meeting of the Church Schools Emergency League in the Church House, Westminster, Lord Robert Cecil is thus reported in the Standard :

It [the St. Asaph Bill] was a Bill which would be conceivable when they had been routed and driven from the field of battle, and they might then submit to it if they could get no better terms; but to put it forward at the beginning of the battle as what they proposed for themselves seemed to him to be but very little short of insanity.

To which we cordially say, "Hear, hear."

The Mercur de France for the 1st and 16th of March contains a notice by M. Albert de Bersaucourt of Balzac's periodical La Revue Parisienne, which appeared in three numbers only on the 25th of July, August, and September, 1840. This was the fourth short-lived periodical founded by Balzac alone, or as a predominant associate. With the exception of one unimportant notice and two copies of verses, to one of which Balzac added a long note descriptive of the sextine, the whole Revue was written by him, and what was not included in the édition définitive of his works has been already reprinted by M. de Louvenjoul. There was, therefore, nothing new left for M. de Bersaucourt to reprint. He has made a serviceable collection of quotations from other writers on the subject, and recalls literary controversies of the period, many of which remain very interesting. Gozlan, of course, is much in evidence, especially concerning the wonderful sketch "Z. Marcas," which Balzac first published in the July number of the Revue. Gozlan's lively gossip is, we fancy, fairly well known in England, and requires no further comment. It is more interesting to recall the curious prophetic resemblance of Z. Marcas, Balzac's own creation, with Gambetta, which was first noticed at length by Anatole de la Forge.

Both Z. Marcas and Gambetta were of obscure origin, were beset by enormous difficulties, were born orators, and acute and far-sighted politicians. Even Balzac's description of the physiognomy of Marcas resembles Gambetta. Both died in middle life of the same internal disease, worn out with work. Of this disease and its moral correspondence, Balzac writes of Marcas with his amazing and characteristic power of realisation much as follows (one cannot wait to disentangle his exact words): "Semblable à Pitt . . . qui s'était donné à l'Angleterre pour femme, Marcas portait la France dans son cœur, il en était idolâtre. . . . La France au troisième rang! Ce cri revenait toujours dans ses conversations. La maladie intestinale du fraye avait passé dans ses entrailles. Marcas devait mourir de cette maladie-là." The combination of coincidences is really remarkable. Anatole de la Forge added to them the reminder that Gambetta died at Les Jardies, where Balzac wrote "Z. Marcas."

The conclusions which have been drawn from the tone of this story, that Balzac's opinions were undergoing a change at the time he wrote it, are totally unwarranted. The more so, because, as Monsieur de Bersaucourt points out, Balzac reiterates for the hundredth time his Catholic and Royalist sentiments in the Revue itself. The disinclination to accept the fact that such were his views, or the incapacity to understand their combination with his liberty of expression, may partly account for the futility of English criticism, even the best, on Balzac and his works. More light is thrown upon them, and more just appreciation of their essential qualities, in Monsieur de Bersaucourt's short and quite unpretentious notice, than by the whole body of English criticism, including that of Mr. Henry James and Mr. George Moore, which is the nearest approach that we have yet made to the real Balzac.

It is with real pleasure that we record our sincere approval and appreciation of Mr. Birrell's Irish Universities Bill. To find anything to admire in the present Government is a luxury as delightful as it is unusual. Mr. Birrell is himself so deservedly popular with people of every shade of opinion, and is, moreover, so honourably connected with literature, that the successful launching of his measure becomes a matter of widespread personal gratification to a very large number of people. THE ACADEMY is not a party journal, and it is bound to rejoice when, at last, an opportunity of heartily endorsing the policy of the present Government presents itself.

The Symphony Concert at the Queen's Hall last Saturday was altogether delightful. The programme was very nearly an ideal one, and, if Wagner's Overture to Rienzi was hardly able to hold its own as a representative of its composer's genius with the Concerto for two pianofortes and orchestra (No. 17, in E flat) of Mozart and the great Concerto in C major, for two pianofortes and orchestra, of Bach, we, at any rate, can find nothing to complain of in that. Time and the fluctuating waves of superficial opinion make no real impression of the supremacy of the great classical composers. Madame Sandra Droucker and Mr. Gottfried Galston gave an exquisite interpretation of these two masterpieces; if we were asked to decide we should give the palm rather to their rendering of the Bach Concerto than that of Mozart. If Time makes no impression on the supremacy of Bach and Mozart and the other great classical composers, it may almost as truly be said that he makes none of the power of Sir Charles Santley. His renderings of "Non più andrā" and "O Ruddier than the Cherry" were astonishing manifestations of his superb artistic method. Any one closing his eyes would surely have refused to believe that the voice that filled the Queen's Hall proceeded from a man of his age, and, even if one saw him quite plainly, it would be hard to believe, judging from his appearance, that he was much over fifty.

We note with satisfaction the bare fact that a book by Mr. W. J. Gordon, Round the North Pole, published by Messrs. Murray, is partly illustrated by woodcuts. Some of them are by Mr. Edward Whymper. Whether some of the illustrations are clichés or no, we welcome them because they are woodcuts, quite irrespective of their merits, which we have not even examined. As we have before lamented, it is now rare for any book not published ad hoc to contain woodcuts. Cheap—and, we cannot but think, ugly—photographic reproduction has driven out that charming and expressive art. It is not long ago that a highly-qualified hereditary wood-engraver, thoroughly approved by such learned artists in all kinds of engraving as Mr. Frederick Shields and Mr. William Strang, was forced to give up the practice of his art in order to earn a living by producing water-colour drawings, for which he had little capacity. We wish that some measures could be taken to enable such artists to continue their proper art to some profit.

Mdlle. Scialtiel gave the last of a series of interesting causeries on "La Femme et la Poésie" at the Salle Erard on Thursday, March 26th. Her programme was even more varied than on the previous occasions. Two of the items had not only piano, but also violin accompaniments, specially written for Mdlle. Scialtiel by Monsieur Francis Thomé. As a composer of musical adaptations Monsieur Thomé has few rivals, for he thoroughly realises, especially in his "Elfes" and "Rappelle-toi," that the accompaniment should interpret the poem and not, as is frequently the case, obscure it. In Paillerai's "La Poupée" and Vicaire's "La Fée" Mdlle. Scialtiel was particularly happy, delivering them with much charm and delicacy, and her versatility was conspicuous, for, in the intensely dramatic poem "La Feu," of Richepin, she showed a command of emotion quite unexpected in a recital of this nature.

The "Oxford Book of French Verse," published by the Clarendon Press, consists of an anthology of French poetry from the twelfth century to Paul Verlaine. The selection has been made by Mr. St. John Lucas, with whose admirable work readers of THE ACADEMY will be acquainted. Mr. Lucas is himself a poet of great distinction, and his selection is made with taste and discrimination. The book is further enriched by an introduction which reveals Mr. Lucas as a subtle and learned critic of French poetry. This book is exactly what is wanted by those who wish to acquire a general acquaintance with French poetry which can form the basis of more special knowledge. We can heartily recommend it.

We referred last week to the advertisement given by a Bishop from the pulpit to a very bad novel. Why is it, we wonder, that Bishops and other exalted persons whose commendation is, for some extraordinary reason, so valuable an advertisement, almost invariably bestow their approval on bad work? We can remember no case in which really fine work has been publicly praised from the pulpit or from other exalted quarters. The latest exhibition of this sort of criticism ex cathedra has occurred in the case of a tenth-rate publication, emanating from Harmsworthian quarters, called the "Children's Encyclopædia." We intend in a future issue to deal with this shoddy, catchpenny work, which is "ornamented" by a Preface by Mr. Harold Begbie.

A SONG AGAINST CARE

O Care !

Thou art a cloak too heavy to be borne,
 Glittering with tears, and gay with painted lies (For seldom—seldom art thou stained and torn,
 Showing a tattered lining, and the bare Bruised body of thy wearer) ; thou art fair
 To look at, O thou garment of our pride !
 A net of colours, thou dost catch the wise ;
 He lays aside his wisdom for thy sake
 And Beauty hides her loveliness in thee
 And after when men know the agony
 Of thy great weight of splendour, and would shake
 Thee swiftly from their shoulders, cast aside
 The burden of thy jewelled bands that break
 Their very hearts often it is too late.
 They fear that foes will meet them and deride
 When they are stripped of all their golden state.
 But some are brave but some among us dare
 Cry out against thy torment and be free !
 And I would rather a gay beggar be,
 And go in rags for all eternity,
 Than that thy clanking pomp should cover me,
 O Care !

OLIVE DOUGLAS.

SWINBURNE

In the most tender morning of the world,
 When the old gods had speech with common men,
 They took a wandering mist upon the fen,
 Soft music, where the earliest fountain swirled,
 And the first lovely look from eyes dew-pearled
 When Aphrodite waked ; the young soul then Singing, they hushed asleep within a glen
 Where evermore the sea's white waters hurled.
 The soul hath wakened, and the song may be.
 The strong, sweet notes of passion played, and woe,
 Thrill to the radiant laughter of a child—
 Make answer to the crying of the sea—
 Beating to music that none else may know
 A song like fire, half-tamed and wholly wild.

ROMANCE, REALISM, AND SYMBOL

Types of Tragic Drama. By C. E. VAUGHAN. (Macmillan, 5s. net.)

The Symbolist Movement in Literature. By ARTHUR SYMONS. Second Edition, Revised. (Constable, 5s. net.)

MR. VAUGHAN'S book is composed of lectures delivered in the University of Leeds, where he fills the chair of Professor of English Literature ; and each chapter bears on its face some of the characteristics of a lecture as distinguished from an essay. There is much that is rhetorical and repetitive in form ; there are horrible old clichés like "hung trembling in the balance." On the other hand, there is much of the merit of a good lecture : its brightness, its vivacity, its broad and simple structure ; and the book is able, sound and interesting. Its object is to trace the development of tragedy on its passage from Æschylus to Ibsen, from the classical form through the romantic to the symbolic, taking account of its throw-backs in France and Germany to the classical type. And his thesis is this :

The more we study the history of the drama, the stronger in all probability will be our conviction that the general line of development has been from exclusion to inclusion, from a less to a more complete idealisation of the material offered by human life, from a narrower to a wider rendering of all that the heart of man presents for our observation. . . . It has been, on the whole, a change from the presentation of action to the presentation of character, a gradual shifting of the scene from that which is without to that which is within.

The change from classical to romantic is thus a change from clearly defined issues, sharply cut problems, broadly conceived character and rigidly confined action to something at once wider and deeper. It is far more than a mere change of treatment or relaxing of convention. It implies a determination to bring into the realm of drama much more of the many-coloured, quickly-changing phantasmagoria of life as we know it, in which motives are not always clear, issues are often confused, and characters are capable of infinitely more subtle gradation and intermixture than the strictly classical tragedy permitted. At the same time it must be remembered that from the earliest days of tragedy the romantic element—like cheerfulness into the mind of the man in Boswell who wanted to be a philosopher—"keeps breaking in." Euripides can be romantic enough—especially if we take into consideration the other meaning which Mr. Vaughan gives to the word, the searching of the inner recesses of the human consciousness ; and as to Seneca, the tragedian whom our early Elizabethan playwrights, in common with all the Renaissance, took as the model of the classical drama, his form may be classical, his spirit is often completely romantic. The development, as Mr. Vaughan traces it, was an inevitable development. The classical form might give a more finished and exalted beauty. The ever-increasing curiosity of the human mind demanded a form of drama which the classical mould could not contain ; and so we have the loosely-knit, all-embracing tragedies of Shakespeare, due partly, no doubt, to the very nature of the stage on which those tragedies were written to be played, but still more to the increased content they were compelled to hold. And that content went on increasing, as Mr. Vaughan traces the story (and he traces it fairly and judiciously, with no Procrustean fitting of the facts to his thesis), until it embraced the "mysticism" of Maeterlinck, the "symbolism" of Ibsen, in which curiosity has plunged so deep into the hidden waters of the human soul that speech cannot express its discoveries, and symbol must be employed to make them plain to those who are able to understand. There have been few books on the drama so suggestive, so stimulating, or so interesting as Mr. Vaughan's, which shows a width of outlook, and a subtle strength in the handling of detail which are too often absent from discussions of that much-discussed subject.

On laying down Mr. Vaughan's book we took up the new edition of Mr. Arthur Symons's book on the Symbolists. There is a wide difference between the two critics; but that is not our business for the moment. Few living writers are so competent to deal with the Symbolists as Mr. Symons, for few have either so sensitive a perception or a style at once so delicate and so penetrating. The interesting point for the moment in this symbolism of which he writes is that he carries on for us the story told down to a certain point by Mr. Vaughan. We have seen the change from the classical tragedy, with its clear outline of a statue seen in full daylight, to the half-lights, the vague outlines, the shifting, changing life of the romantic, and have passed through that stage to the threshold of symbolism. Mr. Symons's book admits us to the arcana of the Symbolists. Theirs is "a literature in which the visible world is no longer a reality, and the unseen world no longer a dream." The epoch, he points out, of the Symbolists, of Gerard de Nerval, of Villiers de L'Isle-Adam, and the others, was also the epoch which included Baudelaire, Flaubert, Zola, and Leconte de Lisle. We can, in fact, see this insatiable human curiosity working in two totally opposite directions. On one side the Realists, like the Symbolists the heirs of romanticism. Their aim is, roughly expressed, to catch and pin down, to petrify, to documenter for all time the variegated life which the romantics had only half expressed. They want to drag it into full daylight, to see it all, and put it all on record. And beyond that life they do not pierce. It is enough for them, as it were, to make sure of what they can see clearly. On the other hand, the Symbolists feel that this daily life has been, as it were, worked out. What men do and say is, after all, but a small part of them. Even what they think is but a shadow of the truth. The real truth lies behind all that, in a world that is not this world, a world whose laws are different and very often the exact contrary of the laws of the visible world. And in that world, though they may not know it or deserve it, all human minds have part. Behind and beneath their conscious life is the great unexplored ocean of half-conscious or all-unconscious life; and it is here that the truth is to be found.

But how is the truth to be expressed? The Realist's task is easy enough by comparison. He has only to catch and record the exact words in which men say this or that, the exact things they do or think in such and such circumstances. The Symbolist is only anxious to escape from the exact words and the exact description of the deed, for such things are only superficial truth, or not truth at all. Words, then, when used in the ordinary way, cannot express the real truth; for it is precisely words which are the common coin of the unreal, the visible and audible world. The result is all sorts of devices. We might use as instances the "second dialogue" of Ibsen; beneath the realistic spoken dialogue, which, as Mr. Symons remarks with some justice, is "degraded below the touch of the characters whom it attempts to express," there moves the spirit-dialogue, as it were, in which soul speaks to soul, and one deep calleth another. And here, surely, in this extraordinary combination of the Realist and the Symbolist, lies the deep significance of Ibsen's work. Or, again, there is the remote, formal dialogue used by Nathaniel Hawthorne, whose people talk primly and strangely, not because he cannot, but because he does not want to make them talk naturally, when his object is to dive beneath the natural to the spiritual. Or again, there is the haughty language of Villiers de L'Isle-Adam, with its patrician scorn of common speech; the incoherence of Gerald de Nerval, gasping in the dizzy air of the unseen world; the aristocratic obscurities of Mallarmé. One thing unites all these—including even Ibsen—and many others; the effort to make words more than counters for exchange in the market. To the average writer, words are coins; to the Symbolist they are medals. To the average man they are units of exchange, merely acquired in order to be given away for something else. To the Symbolist they are things of beauty, which will buy nothing, but which, pondered over and absorbed, will open the dream-world to the souls that have the right of entry to it. It is, after all, the old story, that of all art feeling its way towards the conditions of music. Human curiosity, as existing in these rarer spirits, has exhausted the common life, has even acquired a kind of nausea for it. It takes perilous and lonely journeys into the unknown, and finding itself unable to recount its adventures, it creates anew by symbols a spiritual atmosphere in which we may apprehend what cannot be heard or spoken.

IN THE BEGINNING

Adam Cast Forth. By CHARLES M. DOUGHTY. (Duckworth, 4s. 6d. net.)

It is a joy—difficult, perhaps, but indubitable—for a reviewer to discover a book which he feels is, ultimately, past description as it is past mere praise. Sometimes, even in these oft-impeached days of denial, we find a book which stands for more than it expresses, which is, indeed, much like a finger-post pointing to an unknown pleasaunce. Is there not, in the best, the familiar books, something rare, uncapturable, indefinable, perhaps involuntary, which is yet as the perfume of a flower, lodged you know not precisely where, but expressing the three beauties—the beauty past, the beauty present, the beauty to come? And is there not, more rarely still, a solemnity in some books, a rich, slow, strange choral movement, which swells and fills all the listening chapels of the soul, waking even humblest thoughts to a low, noble music? We know not how to describe, save in some such indirect fashion as this last fancy, the grave beauty, the strangeness, the fulness of this echoing poem.

It is short, and oddly called "A Sacred Drama in Five Songs;" properly, there are no songs, though there is a chorus. No one but Mr. Doughty could have written it, and fools will say that no one but Mr. Doughty can read it. Assuredly, those who shrank from "The Dawn in Britain"—from the verse as well as the size of that epic—will not care to attempt even the few pages of this book. The poet's manner is more singular and irregular than ever; his vocabulary is still rich and recondite, his rhythms still sometimes harsh, though more often buoyant and sweet; his whole expression is tense, masculine, perplexing. It is but a week or two since THE ACADEMY was noticing Mr. Doughty's wonderful "Wanderings in Arabia," which affords a memorable example of a fine harmony of prose. Yet more lofty, individual, unconceding is the verse in this volume than the prose of those travels. The style is one no man in his senses would imitate, and no man could soberly devise. Reading it impatiently, or wonderingly, you decide that the only conceivable reason for writing such verse, the only conceivable excuse, is that the style is simply inevitable—is the man. Else inexcusable. But how fit and cherishable it is. This verse has the sound of the great Biblical tongue—its musing gravity, its solemn clearness, as of great waves breaking on the western shore; its deep sincerity. Yet, all this said, there remains another thing to say: you cannot properly estimate Mr. Doughty's manner of verse, apart from his subject and attitude. It is his profoundly religious habit of mind, his religious acceptance of the world, and his religious conception of the immensities of life that are expressed in the strange music of this poetic speech.

Of course, we duly regret Mr. Doughty's choice of mere tradition for subject; how much finer, how much more "modern," would have been a Poem of Protoplasm! Surely, the only chance for poetry is that it should embody "scientific truth," since science alone has any future; and a poem which should be touched with the Tennysonian hankering after science, which should describe the first authentic wriggling of matter into consciousness, were certain at least of a five years' fame. What Mr. Doughty, in his singular conservatism, has written is a poem "founded on a Judæo-Arabian Legend of Adam and Eve," in which—type of the world's wanderers—Adam and Eve, cast out from the Garden's bliss, and separated, are re-united, restored in strength, tried and purged as by fire, and led, through nakedness of earth and spirit, into a new land of mortal habitation. Frankly, to ourselves the benefit of his poem has been by no means small. The author has humanised for us characters so remote and vague as to be almost unreal, owing, no doubt, to defective apprehension in childish years. Persons of the primal drama, containing all potentialities, containing Moses and Socrates, David and Shakespeare; parents of a vast incomprehensible humanity, with promise in their eyes of unimaginable destiny and memory in their hearts of lost bliss unspeakable—they have yet been to us almost as shadowy and mythical as any modern-idea'd man would like them to be. But in this "Sacred Drama" Mr. Doughty, acting on "mere legend," has made more clear, human, vital the august figures standing lonely between an unforgettable past and an inscrutable future.

Had a less religious mind pondered and brought forth a poem on this subject, the result would have been intolerable. Imagine so lofty a theme subjected to the purple and fury of Mr. Stephen Phillips, or the windiness of Mr. Noyes! We do not want to depreciate the talents of these poets, but—if we may be permitted to say it—we are thankful the theme has escaped them, and that it has become the secure inspiration of Mr. Doughty. For he has treated it with the austerity, the simplicity, the weighty grandeur of sincerity, which alone could justify any man in his choice of it. Take the following for proof, the opening of the second "song":

BLIND ADAM

I wake from sleep, and Sarsar rageth not!
How fallen is a great stillness on earth's dust!
I dreamed was Adama with me, my loved wife,
Whose voice was in the Garden mine heart's peace.
Ah! now my vision fadeth!

ADAMA

Dayspring is:
Hearest not thou, O Adam father, birds' glad voice?
Feel'st not thou this new wafted from the earth,
Which in the Eden was, fresh morning breath?

ADAM

No dream is this; but my loved Adama's voice!
Her arms be these, ah! about my neck embraced.

ADAMA

I do behold new greenness of the ground,
Whereon white dew of heaven is fallen this night.
I have not His pearly dew seen since we driven
Were from the Eden!

ADAM

I, to-night, in vision,
Beheld with these dark eyes both field and grove;
Wherein, with God's new blessing, shall we live.
How cometh unto my sense such flowery breath
As in the Garden was!

ADAMA

We have found Grace.
Could thy dark eyeballs see, it is the breath
Of lilies, which the Lord hath caused this night
To spring up and to blow round our bed-place.

ADAM

I lilies do remember of the Garden,
For beauty as the sunbeams, that wont spring
Up in the footprints of God's holy Angels.
Reach of this dew down to me, on the branch,
Beloved, that I therewith might wash my face;
Likewise these palms; and lift them and my voice
To Him Who formed me.

Or this, of Adam's renewal:

How even now is allayed the long disease,
And quickened the old languor of my being!
How, whiles I in the bubbling rindels wash,
Confirmed be these loose joints! In this warm wave
My pithless loins recover former force;
Aye! and wonder of the Lord, these pupils dim Receive, now O I plainly see, their light!

From these extracts, perhaps unduly long for a short book and short review, will be seen, we hope, at once the singular strength and sweetness which Mr. Doughty seems almost to have at command. We do not say the poem is faultless; there are a score of poets who can write faultless lines, but can we seek and find in their work aught of the religious earnestness, the grave beauty, with which "Adam Cast Forth" is endued?

Here is music of a master.

FIFTY YEARS OF MODERN PAINTING

Fifty Years of Modern Painting: Corot to Sargent. By J. G. PHYTHIAN. (Grant Richards, 10s. 6d. net.)

THIS book has considerable merit. Those who disagree with some of Mr. Phythian's opinions or feel that he has not touched some part of his subject which seems to them very important should consider the difficulty of treating the subject at all. To write the history of modern painting is like writing the history of Germany before it became an Empire. There are as many different tendencies in it as there were States in Old Germany. But whereas the States of Germany had some permanence, the tendencies of modern painting are always changing before our eyes, and it is almost impossible for us to decide which of them are mere fashions and which are part of a natural process of growth. We may feel some certainty about the merits or defects of particular painters. We may be pretty sure that Monet's pictures will be admired by posterity and that Leighton's will not. But we cannot be sure that Monet has founded a school for posterity, any more than the Pre-Raphaelites founded one. In these days schools rush so quickly into extravagance that they produce a reaction against themselves in their moment of triumph. Fashions in painting change so rapidly and violently that they obscure the deeper tendencies that underlie them.

Mr. Phythian has done his best to distinguish between fashions and the movements which, so far as we can tell, do express the purpose and tendency of the age in paint. But the mere sub-title of his book, "Corot to Sargent," proves how difficult his task has been. What clear purpose or tendency can we find in an age which begins with Corot and ends with Sargent, with intermediate episodes like those of the Pre-Raphaelites and Puvis de Chavannes and Gustave Moreau and Whistler? It would be impossible to make a consecutive narrative of French painting alone through all these changes, even if it only dealt with great painters. But Mr. Phythian has had to say something about painting in all the countries of Europe where painting is of any account, and in America. He has also thought it necessary to speak of a great many painters who are of no importance whatever. Here, we think, he has made a mistake. A book of this kind will be most useful if it teaches the reader who are the really important artists of modern times; and it can do this most easily by saying nothing about those who are not important. Mr. Phythian seldom speaks of a small painter as if he were great, but he uses up too much of his space in explaining that small painters are not great. He gives, for instance, about six pages to Leighton, and though most of them are taken up with a statement of his deficiencies, they would surely be better occupied with a statement of the excellences of some great man. But since the book is intended to be a popular one, no doubt it was considered necessary that popular painters should be fully treated in it, even if they were not treated very kindly. The consequence is that it lacks even the amount of coherence which it might have possessed. Worthless painters are not in any movement; they only express fashions, and there is no more logical development in the fashions of modern painting than in the fashions of modern dress.

Yet, hampered as he is, Mr. Phythian makes a brave effort to discover the real movement of modern art. He begins with what is only an episode in it, the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. He then proceeds to speak of its main current in a long chapter with the title "The Impressionists and their Allies." Impressionism is a word vaguely used by some and narrowly by others. Mr. Phythian tries to use it neither vaguely nor narrowly. The most determined and the most fruitful effort of modern painting has been to escape from the predominance of the Old Masters, both in subject and in treatment. Except for one or two forerunners, the eighteenth century is overshadowed by the art of the past. It was the end of the Renaissance in painting. In the nineteenth century there was a rebellion—indeed, many rebellions—against the Renaissance. Mr. Phythian would call nearly all the great rebels impressionists, to distinguish them from painters like Ingres, who merely developed certain tendencies of the Renaissance painting and from those also who, like the Pre-Raphaelites, went back behind the Renaissance for their tradition. He has nowhere, we think, clearly expressed this distinction, but he implies it in many places; and it is the main distinction between the two classes of modern painters who are of any account. There are many individual painters who cannot be put absolutely in one class or the other. Corot, for instance, though Mr. Phythian would call him an impressionist, was half a follower of Claude. Watts, though he followed the traditions of the Renaissance, was half an impressionist. But still the distinction holds good; and the movement of revolt from the Renaissance has grown stronger and more extreme with time, especially in landscape painting. There is a great deal of the Renaissance in Corot. There is nothing of it in Monet. He observes the old traditions neither in treatment nor in subject. He has been developed out of what was most new in the art of Constable and Turner and the Barbizon painters.

It is in France that the revolt against the Renaissance has been most extreme, and the reason is that France was more subjected to the tyranny of the Renaissance than other countries. Most of the later English painters have a tendency to Italianise, just because they are further away from Italy than the French. But since Corot and Millet few good French painters have Italianised at all. Even Puvis de Chavannes has far less of the Renaissance in his design than Burne-Jones or Watts. He is more of a mediævalist than the most consciously mediæval of English painters; and it may be that a great new art of painting, if it ever arises, will combine mediæval simplicity of design with the impressionist passion for light. There is no doubt that impressionism cannot be combined with the elaborate design and complex sentiment of the Renaissance. That design and sentiment have already been combined with a fulness of illusion perfectly appropriate to them in the works of Raphael and Titian and Tintoret and Michelangelo. What they did cannot be done over again with a different kind of illusion. The art of painting, if it is to have another prime, must simplify itself in one direction to compensate for its greater elaboration in another. And it will only have the strength to do this if it becomes once again decorative, if it turns from the artificial problems of the frame to the real problems of the wall-space. It is inevitable that Mr. Phythian in his book should say scarcely anything of decorative painting, for he deals with a period in which decorative painting was only practised by a few great men and a multitude of tradesmen. Shall we see a change in the next fifty years, and the beginnings of a new school of mural painters? If not, there will be no new Renaissance, but only a more feeble continuation of the struggle to imitate or escape from the old one.

TWO TRAVELLERS

The Pulse of Asia. By ELSWORTH HUNTINGTON. (Constable, 14s.)

In the Footsteps of Marco Polo. By MAJOR C. DALRYMPLE BRUCE. (Blackwood, 21s. net.)

DAVID said in his haste "All men are liars," and this sweeping statement has received the endorsement of hundreds of generations. More especially has the compliment been lavished upon travellers in distant lands, whose tales of things seen have been drunk in to the accompaniment of lavish helpings of salt, with the usual result of an insatiable thirst for more. In vino veritas, and the proverb is true of stories of travel as of the juice of the grape. With the imbibing of stories told not twice, but many times over, comes an appreciation of the fact that "there is much in what they say." It is also true that the crude flavour of some vintages of travel has given even to the finer sorts an evil reputation, which it is hard to forget. But modern travel, to abandon a metaphor which threatens to get out of hand, rests on a different basis to that of five centuries ago. To Marco Polo, who, of mediæval travellers, most concerns us in relation to the two books under review, travel was merely a means of getting from one place to another, and his story is a genial collection of memories, compiled rather for entertainment than with any scientific object in view. The Venetian was a merchant first, an adventurer secondly and by the way, and an author by accident. Nowadays we travel into the uttermost ends of the earth for the sake of travel, or rather for the sake of what we may learn and teach thereby, and the book that results was, given a safe return, a foregone conclusion before ever we packed our bags and set out for Charing Cross. And in consequence, our books of travel, though they may hold the advantage in accuracy of observation and in co-ordination of facts, though, in short, they may prove something that called for proof, lose sadly in spontaneity and in that inexpressible joy of life that is the portion of the traveller who observes en amateur.

There clings to the serious American traveller, however, scientific though his object be, something of the childhood state of his nation. He sees with young, and sometimes with strangely discerning eyes, not merely the things that he set out to see, but the little unimportant details that fill in the picture, just as a schoolboy notes with feverish delight the peregrinations of the fly that crawls across the very figures that he is engaged in copying from the blackboard. The American traveller will interrupt himself in the midst of a really valuable account of a geological formation in a remote corner of the world to tell of tea-parties and ceremonious hospitality, or to chat about the engaging characteristics of his interpreter. It is utterly unconscious, this inconsequence, and not without its charm.

Mr. Huntington, however he may stray into by-paths of the picturesque, nevertheless sticks very consistently to the main object, both of his journey and of the book he has written concerning it. The proposition that physical geography exercises a preponderating influence upon the history of man seems too obvious to need support; but the amplification of that proposition which puts forward the claim of climatic changes to a similar part in history has not been accorded the welcome which is undoubtedly its due. The theory is, indeed, very generally accepted, but the extent and importance of climatic change within the compass of our era has probably been underestimated by the historian, if not by the geographer. Nor is it to the earthquake, or the volcanic eruption, or to any of the sudden and cataclysmal changes in the conformation of a region that the most permanent changes in the course of history are due; but rather to those slow and scarcely perceptible modifications of climate which give man time to act, and opportunity to adapt himself almost unconsciously to changing conditions.

The desiccation of great tracts of the earth's surface is a phenomenon which is not confined to Central Asia; but it is in Central Asia that it has left the most unmistakable traces, and, in all probability, it is to a long-gone phase of the process that the civilisation of modern Europe is indirectly due. The sand-buried cities and waterless, deserted settlements of the Lop-Nor Basin, hard by the empty watercourses and dry wells, are eloquent testimony to the enormous world-power of thirst. By no other means can Nature conquer man more certainly than by drying up her living waters. And the great tamarisk-mounds of gnarled and dead trunks and roots, wind-gnawed below and wind-piled above, that lie around the sand-buried ruins of Chira, are Nature's tally-sticks of her work; and Mr. Huntington gives a sufficiently vivid picture, both of that work and of its effects upon the human beings who come within its influence. We are tempted to quote largely from his extremely clear account of the formation of the Lop Basin, but still more, from his shrewd, careful, and kindly estimate of the Chantos, the typical oasis-dwelling agriculturists of the world. Mr. Huntington's contentions are more effectually strengthened by this description than by many of his more elaborate and more fanciful arguments.

Major Younghusband describes the Chantos as "the essence of imperturbable mediocrity," and his estimate of their moral qualities is not flattering. Mr. Huntington admits the force of his remarks, but supplements them by a careful analysis of the leading features of the Chanto character, and an investigation of their climatic causes; and he arrives at the conclusion, which appears irresistible, that this character, with its weak amiability, is the immediate and inevitable result of environment, and further, that the same climatic and social conditions will induce a like result in the case of other peoples whose natural tendencies under more invigorating conditions lie rather in the direction of excessive activity. The weakest go to the wall it is true; but if the wall is sunny and sheltering, and life is easy, they are very well content to stay there and vegetate, outside the push and bustle of a more strenuous existence.

That climate is ultimately the deciding factor in the determination of national character seems pretty widely acknowledged. And the special conditions obtaining in this dying land are such, and so placed, as to influence not merely their immediate surroundings but the whole history of the world. Mr. Huntington appears to have established, on good data, his theory that such basins as those of Lop-Nor and Turfan have been subject to fluctuations in the desiccative process, and he appeals both to Marco Polo and to the Chinese historians of the second century of our era to bear him out. He has travelled over deserts which, for Marco Polo, were peopled with devils, and which the Chinese describe as seas of unfathomable slime; he has used his eyes and his brain to some purpose on the spot; and his account of his purposeful wanderings leaves nothing to be desired as a storehouse of data for future investigators. The risks he has run have not been small, and he never fails to pay his tribute to the pluck and devotion of those who shared his dangers, while a quaint sense of humour pervades the whole of his story. His English is at times slovenly to a degree—he slips into such phrases as "Nor were they far from wrong," and "he was out of his head." Still, as we have said before, we deem it beside the mark to quarrel with the language of the United States, which grows less and less like English every day. But his book was worth the writing, and we cannot help thinking that the personality of the author has stood him in good stead in his dealings with the people whom he describes so sympathetically. And ever he holds before his eyes the idea with which he set out, an idea not new, not even obscure, but to which he gives a greater value and importance than has hitherto been its portion, by the dramatic suddenness with which he uses it as the moral of some tale of adventure which of itself was all enough to claim the attention and fascinate the imagination. The story of Handum Bai and the lost camels is worthy of a high place among tales of adventure, and it concludes thus:

Judging by what I later saw of the topography, the man must have travelled twenty-five miles each way in his chase after the camels—fifty miles in twenty hours without food or water. The experience was to me a revelation of the inexorableness of the desert. It was still more remarkable as an illustration of the intensity and endurance which lifelong contact with the desert in the care of his camels had developed in Handum Bai, a man of the mild Chanto race. None of my other men would have done so hardy a deed—only Handum, who from early childhood had endured heat and cold and fatigue in the desert, far from the enervating influence of the easy agricultural life of the oases. Such intensity is often supposed to be a result of Mohamedan fanaticism and fatalism. More probably it is the result of life in the desert. There none succeed except those who, though often lazy and dilatory, are capable at times of becoming almost monomaniacs, fanatics, animated by the will to do some deed in spite of heaven or hell.

The two supplementary essays at the end of the book, on "The Caspian Sea and its Neighbours" and "The Geographic Basis of History," are equal in interest, but, we cannot help thinking, very unequal in value. Mr. Huntington is led to believe by his observation of the great fluctuation of the level of humidity in the Central Asiatic basins that the level of the Caspian may have varied to an extent almost if not quite great enough to account rationally for the continual variations in the accounts of ancient geographers, from Herodotus to Ptolemy, concerning the supposed inlets and outlets of this fickle stretch of inland sea. Adding to these ancient variants the mediæval accounts of the Persian and Arab writers, we have a pretty series of contradictions, which can only be reconciled or accounted for on some such hypothesis as that of Mr. Huntington.

But when we come to the last chapter we are sorry, for it seems to us to go just beyond those bounds of probability within which the author had kept so far. The extravagance, panic, hysteria, and crime of the great cities of America—all the crises in political, social, and financial history, are fathered upon the weather, and we think that the burden is greater than it can bear. The less rain and the more wind, the more crime; a hypothesis which, while it might account for the "immorality" of the Chantos aforesaid, could not account also for their amiability, for that is a quality not conspicuous in the midst of a Western financial scare; and surely on such a hypothesis the English character should be even more a mass of contradictions than it is.

After this book, written with a mission, albeit most readably written, it is interesting to turn to another equally interesting, for totally different reasons. Major Bruce owns at the outset that he wandered for the love of it, and he is troubled by no speculations concerning vast issues. But he justifies the title of his work by careful reference to the statements of Marco Polo as to topography and customs, with the result which no longer surprises us, that the Venetian is nearly always corroborated. And he marks each step of his route by reference to the great travellers of old time, among whom not the least interesting is he who first introduced the news of Buddhism into China, Chang C'hien, who passed over this very Khotan-Lop-Nor route 140 years before our era.

Very delightful it is to read these two books—that of the American scientist and that of the English soldier—side by side. For the two men passed over practically the same main route, with their eyes wide open, and seeing everything from two totally different points of view:

Being unable to devote ourselves (says Major Bruce), much to our regret, to the study of buried cities, we decided instead to accept the offer made by the Beg (of Niya) to hawk and hunt boar with him on the following day.

We venture to think that the difference is not merely individual, but national. And by the side of Mr. Huntington's appreciation of Handum Bai we would place this description of the Beg of Niya:

There . . . he left us, but I can see his tall, upright figure now. Built in a larger mould than is usual among his compatriots, he was a man of silent, reserved character. Possessing in addition a tireless frame, a keen love of the open, and a very warm heart, our friend was as good a specimen of one of nature's gentlemen as could be found.

It is the man that matters to Major Bruce, not his environment nor his scientific significance. And a characteristic touch is conveyed in the sentence:

I have said that the site of Lou-lan lies north-east of Lopnor, and have unintentionally [the italics are our own] introduced what is known as the Lopnor controversy.

Indeed the charm of this book, which is undeniable, lies in its racy characterisation, its unfailing good humour, and its sportsmanlike enjoyment of life in many varying aspects. We must conclude an already over-long notice by quoting a delightful passage concerning the ceremonial visit of an Amban:—

Before the visit was concluded he began to complain of a cough, besides detailing the symptoms from which a brother who lived with him, he said, was suffering. A few minutes previously we had been unwise enough to allow him to see the small medicine-case we carried, which we ought to have known would be quite sufficient to inoculate him with all the diseases it was designed to cure. . . . We promptly recommended, and handed to his head factotum for the old gentleman's use, four Dover powder tabloids. When it came to prescribing for the absent brother . . . Dover powders, our own favourite medicine, we did not like to prescribe; as in the East, etiquette forbids an inferior even to suffer from the same form of malady as a superior, and the Amban was already booked for Dover powders. There seemed nothing for it but to strike out a new line and hope for the best; so to ensure the absent brother receiving every chance we fell back on that ever-popular remedy, quinine. . . . We eventually helped the Amban into his Peking cart, triumphantly bidding him what, in spite of prescriptions, we hoped was only a temporary farewell.

We do not wish to imply that this book is no contribution to the literature of Central Asiatic exploration, for that would be a totally false impression. But it is a book that may be read as well in an idle hour as for the purpose of gleaning the valuable information that it contains.

ECONOMICS FROM NORWAY

Production: a Study in Economics. By P. H. CASTBERG. (Sonnenschein, 10s. 6d.)

THE great merit of Mr. Castberg's book is its concreteness. This is probably due to the fact that he is not a professor of economics, but a business man who has studied the economics of industry in direct contact with its actualities. Economics has, it is well known, lost much of its abstract and pedantic character in recent years. In this respect Mr. Castberg is extremely modern. One looks, fortunately, in vain, for those theoretical discussions often merely about words and figments of the economic imagination which ruled so largely in the days when economic formulæ figured as unalterable laws of Nature. Assumptions a priori have disappeared, and instead we have an analysis of the actual process of production, distribution, and exchange in contemporary industrial society. It is not philosophy nor science, but an explanation of a practical empirical system such as we know it at present, plastic, and which has nothing final about it any more than have a nation's laws. Economics loses its literary and academic prestige, but gains in usefulness. We learn more thoroughly the mechanism of industry, but it would be impossible to say of Mr. Castberg's pages that they tend to culture. They set out and explain a very complex set of facts which are very useful and necessary to be known by business men or other men of affairs, but are quite dehors of any scheme of liberal education. Men used to read a text-book of economics as they would read logic or mathematics. Adam Smith taught them to consider it as a branch of ethics. Economics in this sense has been exposed and deposed, and now it has about as much of philosophy as the tables of weights and measures.

We see this very clearly in Mr. Castberg's treatment of Protection and Free Trade. He is a Norwegian, and Norway is a Free Trade country with a tendency, as we gather, towards trying the method of Protection. Norway is, like the United Kingdom, one of the few relics of the system which, in the days of the economists of doctrine, prevailed generally over Europe. Turn up our own economists of to-day, and it will be found that they are sitting on the rail and are dubitative whether to get down on one side or the other. Dogmatism has disappeared, and they give up their own so-called science declaring that it is not competent to settle the issue between Protection and Free Trade—a curious conclusion when we remember that all the economic text-books, from the "Wealth of Nations" downwards, had Free Trade as their fundamental axiom. When the sweet simplicity of a theory vanishes nothing remains but to wrestle with the hard facts; and judged by their text-books, the economists have found them too stubborn to be reduced to any definite conclusion. Mr. Castberg is no exception. He balances and balances one fact against another, and the upshot of it all is very undetermined. In the case of small nations he appears to be rather decided that they will not gain by Protection. As to the greater nations, we think it may be fairly inferred that he believes they benefit by Protective duties. This book, then, like all recent text-books on economics, may be eliminated as far as the controversy between Free Trade and Protection is concerned. They none of them speak authoritatively; and they have dropped all pretensions to do so. It is a desirable change from the time when they lorded it over us with dogmatic doctrines that have done incalculable harm. Mr. Castberg recognises the limits which separate economics from sociology and politics, and, we may almost say, from metaphysics; for discussions on wealth and value are generally too remote and abstract to have any relation to ordinary usage and practice. We may mention that the book was originally intended for Norwegian students, but this is really an irrelevant consideration.

FRANÇOIS VILLON

THE political propagandist in search of telling "election literature" has before now owed much to the poet. The supporters of Mr. Asquith's "temperance" proposals might do worse than to borrow from François Villon's "Ballade Joyeuse des Taverniers." By slightly altering the last line, which forms the refrain, they could turn it into a very telling denunciation of those wicked and detestable persons who indulge in the pernicious habit of selling alcoholic liquor. It is true that Villon himself, being a poet, was so far from being an enemy to the vendor of good wine that his "Ballade" is directed exclusively against the adulterator; but this little detail need not, and surely would not, trouble a "temperance reformer."

Prince, de Dieux soyent mauditz leur boyaulx,
Et crever puissent par force de venin
Ces faulx larrons, mauditz et desloyaux,
Les taverniers qui brouillent nostre vin.

So runs the envoi to Villon's "Ballade," and the whole poem is made up of a vivid and genial denunciation of these erring taverniers, on whose heads he calls down a list of pains and penalties which would warm the heart and satisfy the "sense of justice" of the most advanced disciple of the cold-water school. It is a delightful poem, full to the brim of high spirits and geniality, though to read it casually one might suppose that Villon, who in reality was incapable of being unkind to a fly, was a terrible sort of person. Poor Villon has never been given the credit due to him for the beautiful qualities of human love, of sweet humility, of warm-hearted kindness that distinguished him all through his miserable life. Even Stevenson, in the sympathetic essay he has left us on this great and splendid poet, has not been able to resist the temptation of giving an impression of Villon which amounts to a caricature of the real man. Théophile Gautier, in his essay on Villon, has this fine and touching thought. He says:—

Je trouve un singulier plaisir à déterrer un beau vers dans un poète méconnu; il me semble que sa pauvre ombre doit être consolée, et se réjouir de voir sa pensée enfin comprise; c'est une réhabilitation que je fais, c'est une justice que je rends; et si quelquefois mes éloges pour quelques poètes obscurs peuvent paraître exagérés à certains de mes lecteurs, qu'ils se souviennent que je les loue pour tous ceux qui les ont injuriés outre mesure, et que les mépris immérités provoquent et justifient les panégyriques excessifs.

I feel the same about Villon's character. His poetry is secure in the opinion of all lovers and judges of good poetry. He is incontestably one of the very greatest poets that France has produced, and modern French poetry owes to him an inestimable debt. But his character is in sad need of rehabilitation. It is quite true that Villon was an outcast and vagabond, sometimes a thief, that he consorted with scoundrels and cut-throats and harlots, and that he narrowly escaped being hanged; but to assume that therefore he was necessarily a wicked man, to be execrated by all honest people, is to adopt the attitude of the Scribes and Pharisees. In the pit of all filth and impurity, and wickedness and despair, and horror that Villon lived we see enshrined this miracle which justifies the ways of God to men, that he preserved a beautiful and serene splendour of soul, a divine and constant light of better things. He sinned and suffered, and bore imprisonment and starvation; he was condemned to, and received, the punishment of the lash; he was sentenced to be hanged, and reprieved at the last moment; he lay for nearly a year in the noisome dungeon of Thibault d'Aussigny, fed on bread and water, and brought to the verge of death by starvation (for some trifling ecclesiastical offence), and yet he never cursed God or even, altogether, man. This is how he speaks of the Bishop who meted out to him this inhuman treatment:

Peu m'a d'une petite miche,
Et de froide eau, tout ung esté.
Large ou estroit, moult me fut chiche.
Tel luy soit Dieu qu'il m'a esté.

Voycy tout le mal que j'en dys :
S'il m'a esté misericors,
Jésus, le roy de paradis,
Tel luy soit à l'ame et au corps !
S'il m'a esté dur et cruel
Trop plus que cy ne le racomple,
Je vüeil que le Dieu éternel . . .
Luy soit doncq 'semblable, à ce compte !
Mais l'Eglise nous dit et compte
Que prions pour nos ennemis ;
Je vous dis que j'ay tort et honte :
Tous ses faicts soient à Dieu remis !

Even in the case of this his deadly and cruel enemy he cannot bring himself to curse outright; his bitter sense of injustice and persecution breaks out into a cry of resentment and anger, but the words are hardly out of his mouth before he repents of his outburst and reproaches himself for his very natural expression of resentment. It seems to me that it is a pretty fine thing for a man to be able to undergo the most cruel and brutal persecution, the most unmerited torture and agony of mind and body, and yet to be able to keep from bitterness of thought or word.

That in the actual facts of life Villon sounded at times the lowest depths of degradation there can be, unfortunately, no doubt; the brilliant, ruthless, and appalling "Ballade de la Grosse Margot," which is so terrible a poem that it leaves the reader physically sick and shaking, is evidence enough of this without the corroboration of contemporary history. I cannot do better than quote Gautier again on this subject. He says:

Ce qui sanctifie ce tableau impur, ce sont les deux vers sombres et désespérés qui en sont comme la dernière touche:

Ordures avons, et ordures nous suyt;
Nous defuyons l'honneur, et il nous fuyt.

Incidentally I will ask my readers to pause and reflect on the splendour of the French language. Sombres et désespérés. What heights and depths of imaginative horror are contained in those three words.

There was through all Villon's life one element of purity and beauty which never left him—it was his love for his mother and his mother's love for him. Often as I have read his "Ballade à la Vierge," which he made for his mother I have never read it without tears:

Femme jè suis povrette et ancienne,
Ne rien ne sçay; oncques lettre ne leuz;
Au moustier voy dont suis paroissienne
Paradis painct, où sont harpes et luz,
Et ung enfer où damnez sont boulluz:
L'ung me faict paour, l'autre joye et liesse,
La joye avoir faict moi haulte deesse,
A qui pecheurs doivent tous recourir,
Comblez de foy, sans faincte ne paresse.
En ceste foy je vüeil vivre et mourir.

Elsewhere he has this touching reference to her:

ma bonne mère
Qui pour moi eut douleur amère, (Dieu le Scait) et mainte tristesse.

And this love for his mother sanctifies and defends his whole life; he took it with him down into the depths, and I for one will never believe that it did not raise him up again into the heights at last:

Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it; if a man would give the whole substance of his house for love it would utterly be contemned.

Even for that lower love for a mistress who died he could find this beautiful phrase:

Deux estions et n'avions q'un cœur—

a phrase surely which it would be difficult to match for the simplicity of perfect art in any literature of any age.

Villon has been found fault with by certain critics because he was untouched by the beauties of Nature; it seems to me that one might as well blame a child born and bred in one of the most hideous slums of one of our great cities because it preferred the melody of the barrel-organ to the voice of the nightingale. Beauty in art is "that which cometh out of a man," and it is the glory of a great poet like Villon that he turned the common, and often hideous, things of his own life into phases and images of beauty. As has been said of another more recent man of genius, who, in the tragedy of his life, had no small affinity with Villon, he found:

Under the common thing the hidden grace,
And conjured wonder out of emptiness,
Till mean things put on Beauty like a dress.

This is the glory of the poet's art, and such lives as Villon's, for all their seeming sordid failure, yet blossoming as they have done into the glorious flowers of perfect poetry, are more than equal in the Scale of Eternity to thousands of lives of outward respectability and unctuous rectitude. As Gautier remarks:

Les bons poètes sont encore plus rares que les honnêtes gens quoique ceux-ci ne soient guère communs.

A. D.

N.B.—For the benefit of those who are not familiar with fifteenth-century French I have compiled a Glossary of words used by Villon, and quoted by me in this article, with their modern French equivalents. The first quotation is plain sailing. In the second, the lines on Thibault d'Aussigny, Peu=nourri; miche=pain; moult, of course, is beaucoup; misericors=miséricordieux; cy=ici. In the "Ballade à la Vierge," ne=ni; luz=luths; paour=peur; La joye avoir faict moi=fais moi avoir la joie; doib-vent=doivent; fainctes=momeries ou mascarades.

SIMPLE BIBLE TEACHING

HE was a very old-fashioned country parson. He told me that he was the ninth in succession of his family to hold the benefice of Llanfihangel Ystrad, and a good many of the books in his study looked as if they had descended to him from the first Rector of his name. He was a thorough Churchman, rather of the antique Caroline than of the modern "ritualistic" type, and the parish was so remote, so lost in a maze of mountains, that the church had remained as it had been in times past. It had only been necessary to set up a rood with St. Mary and St. John on the otherwise perfect rood-screen, to drape the two stone altars on each side of the chancel-door with carpets of decent stuff, and, in the way of defence, to withstand a High Church squire who wanted the fifteenth-century oak benches to give way to pitch-pine horrors; there was nothing more to be done. And so it was with more than astonishment that I heard old Mr. Meyrick, holding up a measure of old port in an old wineglass, drink a fervent toast to the health of Mr. McKenna.

"Joking?" he said to me. "Certainly not; why should you think so? Is not this new Bill of Mr. McKenna's going to secure Simple Bible Teaching in every school in England and Wales?"

"Yes, I know," I replied; "but you don't understand."

"Understand? What is there to understand? The phrase is a perfectly clear one. Simple Bible Teaching is what we've wanted for the last three hundred years; it's the lack of it that has brought us to the verge of ruin; the omission to give such teaching has been the shame and scandal of the English Church, and I, at all events, have always considered that the enormous exodus from the Catholic Church into Anabaptism, Wesleyanism, Congregationalism, and such fraudulent folds is amply explained by our gross neglect of our plain and obvious duty. Depend upon it, if men can't get the real article they will do the best—or the worst—that they can with the adulterated and, maybe, poisonous substitute. If you refuse to give people the Word of God, they will provide themselves with the word of Calvin or the word of Blavatsky. No, we have been terribly blameworthy; but now everything is going to be set right. So I drink again to Mr. McKenna and Simple Bible Teaching."

"Do you really imagine that the Nonconformists mean to . . . ?"

"My good man, you seem to treat Nonconformists with an utter lack of charity, to ascribe to them motives and methods which would disgrace the worst Jesuit in popular Protestant fiction. I confess that I have had fault to find with them now and again. John Williams, for example, of this parish, was an enthusiast for the Sunday Closing Act; and I am afraid that there is no doubt that he has been keeping a 'shebeen' ever since. Still, let us be fair; we must not condemn the whole body of Dissenters for the faults of a few of them; and I must say that their attitude to the new Education Bill does them honour. Of course, the teaching of the schools will have to be supplemented on Sundays by the parson; still, when the State gives us Simple Bible Teaching, it will be giving us Churchmen a boon that we ought to have provided for ourselves a very long time ago."

He looked happy and contented; his face was what is called "straight;" he really did not seem to be joking. I asked him, after a bewildered pause, how he defined Simple Bible Teaching. "How do you define simple arithmetical teaching? The teaching of the contents of the arithmetic book, surely? The pupils of such a course would be expected, I suppose, to make themselves acquainted with certain facts and rules and processes as contained in their text-book, whatever it might be. The teacher would not be expected to enter into any explanation of the Pythagorean theory of numbers, nor would he be allowed to quote from the 'Philosophe Inconnu,' nor to explain a problem by Algebra. Surely it is all very simple—simple in every sense."

"But would you mind going to the point: What is Simple Bible Teaching?"

"I am really afraid that you are an example of the Church's neglect; you will have to go through a course in good Mr. McKenna's schools when they are established. Well, let us take the first chapters of Genesis. Without going into needless and excessive detail, you have in those chapters the story of how the whole human race was ruined by disobedience to what appears to us to be a purely technical and material regulation. The teacher, of course, need not deduce from this fact the evident conclusion that in the Bible material channels, material actions may, and do bring both grace and disgrace; he is at his desk to impart the simple contents of the book. Then, to pass on to the next great event—the giving of the law; the children will learn the bare and simple outlines of the ritual and ceremonial law of Israel, will be taught that this immense scheme of ceremony was inspired by the Most High, that the chosen religion given from heaven to the chosen race of heaven was by no means a system of vague piety, of good feeling all round, of social endeavour, of philanthropic effort, but rather the combination of a strict moral code with a vast and minute ritual process by which the unseen world of Reality and Divinity was to be brought to men. The master will read out such texts as these:

"And of the blue, and purple, and scarlet, they made cloths of service, to do service in the holy place, and made the holy garments for Aaron; as the Lord commanded Moses."

"And he made the ephod of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen."

"And the curious girdle of his ephod, that was upon it, was . . . of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen; as the Lord commanded Moses."

"From such passages pupils of moderate intelligence will deduce the natural conclusion that neither ceremony nor even attention to the smallest minutiae of ceremony can be pronounced foolish, trifling, or displeasing to Heaven. Further, the Simple Bible teacher will show that this Divine religion was also a sacrificial system, and a system that was to be administered by priests; and, again, children in quite low standards will see for themselves that sacerdotalism (or a priestly Church) cannot be repugnant to the Divine Mind. Passing on through Jewish history, the description of Solomon's Temple will, as naturally, enforce the lesson that extreme splendour and magnificence in the earthly temple, which is the dim image of the heavenly, are pleasing to the Most High; and if some of the little boys and girls are moved to make odd comparisons—well, that cannot be helped. On Friday they may have read:

"So Solomon overlaid the house within with pure gold; and he made a partition by the chains of gold before the oracle; and he overlaid it with gold. And the whole house he overlaid with gold, until he had finished all the house; also the whole altar that was by the oracle he overlaid with gold."

"They may have read, I say, many such glowing and golden descriptions, while they will also have been instructed that Solomon, who caused all these glories to be made, was by no means of the fetish-worshippers' order of intelligence, as appears from his exclamation:

"But will God indeed dwell on the earth? behold, the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain thee; how much less this house that I have builded?"

"Well; if some of the children, after all these splendours and majesties, are a little disappointed on Sunday with the architecture and decoration—say, of Bloomsbury Baptist Chapel, or of 'Dr.' Clifford's meeting-house, or of the City Temple—that will not be the fault of Simple Bible Teaching. We cannot corrupt the Bible; we cannot make Solomon inlay his temple with stucco within and without; we cannot say that with the cheapest grey bricks did he build it in a cheap and nasty parody of a foreign cathedral; nor can we affirm that the front thereof was exceeding showy, and the architectural ornament thereof maniacal; but the back parts thereof were as it were in the similitude of a disused warehouse. We cannot, I say, venture so to tamper with the Sacred Text, for if we did so we should not be giving Simple Bible Teaching. And if some tiny tot should ask his teacher why there were no Pleasant Sunday Afternoons or political meetings (with 'cheers' and 'No, no's') in Solomon's Temple—well the master must remind the child that his question is sectarian and denominational."

"There will be, of course, more general lessons; the children will be shown that the whole Bible, from the first chapter to the last, is full of wonderful and supernatural events; they will be more particularly instructed in such occurrences as the Incarnation and Resurrection and Ascension; they will be thus placed on their guard against a state of mind which, I am afraid, is prevalent in certain quarters—a state of mind which may be condensed into the sentence, 'I have lived for twenty years in Westbourne Park, and have sat under Dr. Clifford during the whole of his pastorate, and I have never seen anything remotely resembling the Glory of the Lord; therefore there can be no such thing.'"

"Then will come the great question of all. The children will naturally wish to understand the relation between the Old Testament system and the New. They will ask whether the Christ in theory and in practice did not reprobate and condemn the whole legal system, both in morals and ceremonial; whether He did not point out the folly of sacerdotalism, the vanity of elaborate services, the futility of material splendour as applied to the Temple of the Most High. The task of answering this question will be simple enough; the master will be forced to instruct his pupils that the Christ gave the most express and solemn approbation to the entire Jewish Order. It is true that He dispensed His disciples, on occasion, from certain ceremonies of daily life (such as the washing of hands), but, on the other hand, He bade them in general terms carry out all the directions of the Scribes and Pharisees, because they sat in Moses' seat. He was obedient in His own Person to the ritual requirements of the law, He ordered the lepers that had been cleansed to fulfil their obligation to the sacerdotal order, and so far from reproaching external observance, He pointed out the hideousness of the contrast between the outward splendour and the inward corruption. For the Temple He had the greatest reverence, not only frequenting it daily, but purging it of those who treated it as a place of business. Once and for all the Simple Bible scholars must be instructed that, so far as the Jewish Regulations have been repealed, this is the work of the Church and not of the Christ, and that there is no warrant from the Christ for the abolition of the Sabbath and the institution of that totally different festival, the Dies Dominica. Indeed, the pupils must be taught that there is not so much as a Biblical warrant for this particular change, for the statement of St. John that he was in the Spirit on 'the Lord's Day' cannot be made to mean that the Sabbath had been abolished and that the Lord's Day had taken its place. They must be specially warned against the vulgar belief that our Sunday stands in any conceivable relation to the Jewish Sabbath—so far as the Bible is concerned—and if they make further inquiries on this point they must be referred to their respective pastors.

"The result, then, of the question as to whether the Christ reprobated Jewish ceremonialism and sacerdotalism is a decided negative; and the intelligent child will be prepared to be told that not only did the Christ applaud and approve the old ritual and the old ceremonial, but that He Himself gave the highest of all sanctions to the sacramental system by the foundation of the two great sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; that He ordered His disciples to use oil as a sacrament for the cure of the sick; that He made use of the sacrament of clay when He gave sight to a blind man; that there is no foundation whatever for the belief that the Christian religion as taught by Christ is solely a matter of good nature and social kindness. It will appear, on the other hand, from a study of the New Testament, that, while the literal morality of Judaism has been ineffably exalted into a transcendent morality, that while the Rite of Initiation is now Baptism and not circumcision, the great and palmary distinction between old and new is to be sought in the Eucharist which propounds an object which Jewry had never dared to dream of—the actual union of God and men, by means of a sacramental, mystic, and sacrificial feast. The Jew was ordered to do this or that that his "days might be long in the land," in that land which was to be his earthly paradise. The Christian hears the words:

The teacher will call the attention of his pupils to this passage; he will cause them to compare it with the account of the institution of the Lord's Supper in the three other Evangelists, and also with St. Paul's admonition to the Corinthians on the same matter. He will not fail to point out that the Jews who were present when this great doctrine was first uttered by the Christ seemed unable to understand or believe it.

"Well, of course, there are many other topics that will suggest themselves. Simple Bible Teaching will naturally include the foundation of the Church as a visible, ordered society, with its recognised heads, the Apostles, with its sacraments as before mentioned, with its ritual observances, with a Divine promise that the powers given should be perpetually continued. Further, it will be shown that the Apostles, to whom these promises were made, really believed in them and acted on them; that they believed themselves, for example, to have the power of conferring the Holy Ghost by the imposition of hands and by breathing, and that the Simple Bible actually informs us in many places that the Holy Ghost was really and veritably given in this ritual and sacramental manner. It will also appear that the Apostles assumed that they possessed the power of continuing their own Order, just as a Master in Freemasonry possesses the power of making another Master, and that this power was exercised in the case of Mathias, chosen and consecrated in the place of Judas, who, it may be stated by the way, was the determined foe of ritual observance. And, again, there will be no avoiding of the phrase, 'it seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us,' used by the Apostles; nor will the master forget to record the Apostolic warning against the dangers of the private interpretation of the Bible; nor, again, the Apostolic admonition to reverence tradition and to be guided by it. Finally, a year's course of Simple Bible Teaching will fitly conclude with some simple lessons from the Apocalypse, showing that as on earth in the Old Dispensation there was ordained an elaborate ceremonial, so in Heaven for the New Dispensation there is also ordained an elaborate ceremonial, with incense, lamps, vestments, and prostrations.

"You see, then, don't you, the immense debt of gratitude that the Catholic Church will owe to Mr. McKenna and to Simple Bible Teaching?"

"Do you imagine for a moment," I said, "that the scheme you have outlined is what McKenna and the Dissenters mean by the phrase that they are always using?"

"Yes, I do," he replied. "I am compelled to believe it."

"Why?"

"Because if I did not believe it, if I thought that when they talked of simply teaching the Bible they really meant simply teaching the opinions of 'Dr.' Clifford, or of Mr. Campbell, or of Mr. Hocking, about the Bible—well, then I should have to believe that they were a pack of the most impudent liars and hypocrites that the earth has ever seen. And I should be sorry to have to adopt such a conclusion."

ENGLISH FOLK-SONG

THE collection of English folk-song is work which will not wait. Those who are devoting themselves to it tell us that a pure melody is never obtained from a singer under the age of sixty years, and that those who have a large store of songs stowed away in their memories are generally nearer to eighty than sixty. Obviously, then, in another decade it will be impossible to record the vast majority of the songs which the old people of to-day treasure, but which the last two generations have discarded in favour of more fashionable town-made music. If the enthusiastic musicians who have taken up the matter were to spend all their efforts at present in garnering the harvest while still there is time, no one could blame them, in spite of the fact that the actual collection of the songs is a very small part of the work which has to be done. Mr. Cecil J. Sharp, however, has realised that it is better to carry on the important work of discrimination and classification of material concurrently with that of collecting, and while it is still possible to test theories and form conclusions from actual practice. He has, therefore, given us a valuable contribution to what may be called the theory of folk-music in a volume called "English Folk-song—Some Conclusions." These conclusions, drawn with the utmost directness, go to the root of the matter. The chapters on the definition of folk-song, its origin and evolution, are admirable, and must help to clear away the mists which still surround the subject. The distinction between folk-song and popular songs cannot be too much insisted upon, and in explaining what is meant by the evolution of a tune Mr. Sharp lays the ghost of an old controversy once and for all:

Every note, every phrase of a folk-tune proceeded originally from the mouth of a solitary singer. Corporate action has originated nothing and can originate nothing. Communal composition is unthinkable. The community plays a part, it is true. Its part is then to weigh, sift, and select from the mass of individual suggestions those which most accurately express the popular taste and the popular ideal; to reject the rest.

The analogy of the flight of a flock of starlings illustrates the process very happily:

Many thousands of these birds will fly together in a compact mass; they will wheel about in the air and describe orderly evolutions without hesitancy and with a precision which argues complete unanimity of purpose. If attention be concentrated upon the bounding lines of the moving and living mass, it will be noticed that these are not so clearly defined as, when casually observed, they appear to be. The edges, instead of being smooth and even, are rough and jagged. Further observation will show that these irregularities are due to the aberrations of flight on the part of individual birds, who are constantly separating themselves from their fellows, darting out at acute angles to the line of flight and then swiftly returning to the flock. Every now and again, however, it will be seen that one of these birds is followed by all the rest, and the course of flight of the whole mass is immediately changed.

So with the folk-tune; variations are continually suggested by individual singers; but only when the suggestion happens to appeal to the taste of the community does it make a permanent addition to their melodic store. Mr. Sharp gives plenty of illustrations of tunes and their variants, and shows how—as, for instance, in the case of “Come all ye faithful Christians”—a combination of many causes will sometimes transform a tune out of all knowledge. Chapters on the “modes” and their treatment by English folk-singers follow. Whatever he tells of his personal experience among folk-singers, of their preference for certain modes, and their way of treating them, is of great value, and will be of still greater interest if it leads other collectors to give us their experiences of a similar kind for purposes of comparison. When, however, Mr. Sharp leaves this personal side of the question and begins to lay down rules for the harmonising of modal melodies he does not carry his readers with him unreservedly. He only gives one positive rule, that the harmoniser should:

Confine himself—at first, at any rate—exclusively to the notes of the mode, and seek to realise and to feel the relative values and specific qualities of its seven diatonic common chords.

But that is where the difficulty comes in. What are these “relative values”? They have never been defined with any clearness for harmonic purposes, except as regards the modern major and minor modes. Take, for instance, the Aeolian mode, in which Mr. Sharp gives an example of Brahms’s misuse of modal harmony to the tune of “Der Reiter.” He says:

The G natural, which occurs in the melody six times, is throughout treated not as the seventh note of the Aeolian scale of A, but as the fifth degree of the major scale of C.

As a matter of fact the six G’s only make three harmonic progressions, and out of those three Mr. Sharp harmonises one, just as Brahms does, as a part of the triad of G leading to that of C. But, apart from the mere failure in his example, by what authority should the chord of E minor take a more prominent place in the scale than the chords of C or G, which will harmonise the seventh note of the scale equally well? Surely Mr. Sharp gives it prominence because as a modern musician he still has in mind the idea of E as an harmonic dominant of A minor even when deprived of its leading note; but it was not so felt originally in modal music, and it was only when the leading note became raised in musica ficta, and so could only be harmonised as part of the chord of E that its position became assured.

As the book makes no pretensions of being a treatise on modal harmony, and the subject is compressed into a few short pages, it is only necessary to emphasise it as a point demanding special attention. More important is the chapter on “Rhythmic Forms and Melodic Figures,” which examines the melodic structure of English folk-song. The result is a little disappointing. Though Mr. Sharp brings forward many melodies in which the phrases are arranged in distinct patterns, with repetitions of phrases at stated intervals to produce balance of form, yet, on the whole, the shapes are of the obvious kind, and scarcely an instance shows a highly-organised melody. The rhythms, too, are rarely striking or forcible, and in the frequent instances of what are called irregular rhythms there is evidence to show that often they result rather from an imperfect sense of rhythm in the singer than from a highly-developed one. Mr. Sharp admits that the English folk-tunes “will more often squander their ideas than husband them;” and his evidence in the shape of examples goes to prove that they excel in a wealth of expressive melody which has very few leading characteristics.

This fact has to be remembered in judging of the value of what evidently is Mr. Sharp’s fondest dream—that ultimately a new English school of music will arise founded upon our national folk-song. The question of whether English folk-song can form the foundation for such a school is a wider one than whether the folk-song is in itself beautiful and worthy of preservation. Any dozen tunes chosen at random from any trustworthy collection will prove the latter point conclusively, but it would require a close scrutiny of the whole field to discover the germ of a new school underlying it. The mere fact that Russia and Norway have built up a distinctive style from their folk-music proves nothing for England until we can take a more comprehensive view of our folk-song than can be done at present. These last pages, “The Future of English Folk-song,” are entertaining reading, partly because of the author’s delightful enthusiasm and partly because he throws off the judicial attitude of the investigator and frankly revels in speculation. In the former at least we can join him heartily, and there can be no doubt that his book will do much to bring recruits to his cause. It may, perhaps, induce some to make pilgrimages into the country in search of folk-tunes, and to beginners in this quest Mr. Sharp gives some practical hints. It will certainly arouse the interest of many who can take no practical share in the work and give them more accurate knowledge of the subject; and, lastly, it forms the starting-point for a critical and scientific literature on English folk-song, and by clearing the ground of preliminary questions prepares the way for the writer and others to arrive at more authoritative conclusions, and to place them before the public.

THE THEOLOGY OF NEWTON HALL

THE first course, called the “Creed of a Layman,” instructed the neophytes of Newton Hall in what they were to believe—and there was a good deal of it, and it took a lot of believing. Now the student is to account for and defend his creed if called upon to do so, and, consequently, he has an enchiridion * here put into his hands by one of the generals of what we must still call (pace Mr. Harrison) the atheistic Salvation Army. Of course, theology is an unkind term, for the brethren have abolished all such; so when they explain their creed they call it philosophy. But why common sense? There is no communal sense about it. The three hairdressers, the milkman, the milliner, the four professors, and the two housemaids who form the congregation do not profess to represent the community, or to body forth the humanity they worship. Nor is their sense common—meaning usual or vulgar—for they are a most chosen people; and when they picnic at Shakespeare’s grave, or sing in chorus the “Marseillaise” or “Ring out wild bells,” there is nothing common about their senses, no ordinary humour, and when they hawk Harrisonian creeds “at cost price” they are most uncommon persons. But there is in this book some tentative overture to the man in the street, some wistful glancing towards a general consciousness, and it may be in this hope that it is entitled common sense. The hope is but a sporting chance, for however much you scratch and re-scratch the ordinary man you will not find a Positivist in him until you plant it there, and even then it usually gets lost. You can find much that belongs to Mr. Harrison, but nothing that is peculiar to him. The ordinary man hates “metaphysic” and its jargon. His head aches with the terms. He feels he is blindfold among possible horse-thieves, and he does not want to think what he knows already. He is with Mr. Harrison in this and also in his respect for religion in the abstract, as the one force which is stronger than lust and selfishness; but when he is told that questions such as Who made the world? What is the chief end of man? Do folk live after they are dead? and so on, are frivolous questions and should never be asked, then he sees that he is in a philosophy of the rarer sense or nonsense. When he is further invited to ascribe a ritual reverence to humanity, then he is so far from feeling that this was his real but unexpressed notion always that he laughs. Now it is very naughty to laugh. Mr. Huxley laughed heartily and boisterously, and spoke of eviscerated Popery and bowing down to a wilderness of apes. It has saddened Mr. Harrison for all that Huxley has been dead these thirteen years, and he gravely explains that he does not adore anything or anybody, not even Newton, and that he is not an undiluted humbug like Jos. Smith the Mormon, and feels very hurt indeed when called such things, and indeed he does not worship Mrs. and the Misses Harrison, as Comte told him, and he implies that he does not even touch reverently the several organs of his body every day—a practice which was recommended, as more scientific than private prayers. He does not see why Agnostics should be so hard on other Agnostics, just because he says that Agnosticism cannot be a permanent resting-place, for even the three hairdressers get tired of "I do not know, I am sure" for an answer and go off sneakingly to their parish churches. We must have something to love and revere, explains Mr. Harrison, and the Unknowable, even if spelt in capitals, will not do, and that something must be known to us by science, or else gentlemen with scalpels and microscopes will scorn us. Consequently we suggest "humanity." And what is that? says the delighted reader. Do you mean all the garlic-breathing, red-nosed, gin-drinking, forked radishes I see about me? or am I to see Robespierre's grisette, la belle Raison, on a dais in Newton Hall and ogle her with erotic hymns? No! replies the general. I mean the "permanent and collective power of the human organism;" for that you must feel gratitude, love, and reverence. Permanent bolts out the flatulent catarrhal element, collective the anti-Social roguery in us all, and organism—well, organism is a fine word, and may refer to civil society, law, the commercial system (which the prophet Comte so dearly loved), or to the synthesis of bones and muscles in the frame of man as required. Why not the permanent and collective power of the canine, stellar, or angelic organism? you ask. Not dogs, says the Positivist, for men have "infinite capacities of intellectual, moral, and practical life" which other animals have not. Surely this is most provincial and a grievous falling away for an Agnostic and an Evolutionist? Passing the trifle of the infinite, here (p. 147) recognised and affirmed, surely there lurks in the dog—in Ponto and Toby—all the capacities of evolution which reared Newton from the amoeba? Stars, of course, are different. The relativity of knowledge shows that if telescopes were smashed and eyes put out the stars would fall from their courses. Besides, if not, the heavens declare the glory of Tycho Brahé, and the firmament showeth the handiwork of Sir William Christie and the Magi, consequently the collective power of stars is quite human after all. As to angels, they cannot be allowed in Newton Hall, where Gloria in Excelsis Deo is ruled out of order compared to the "Marsellaise." Dr. Bridges, too, has shooed all nine orders of them most effectually, leaving humanity—i.e., Smith, Brown, Jones and Co.—free to form a permanent and collective organism, if they can; and even if they cannot, they may each enjoy an exhilarating form of immortality, the immortality of a stone flung into a pond, which sinks immediately into the mud, but sends ripples all over the surface, rocking the baby gnats and tossing the duckweed and the potamagons for several seconds still to come. Humanity, too, is to be known by science. That is puzzling. Most of us know what we do of it by rocking-craddles, milk, kisses, fisticuffs, tears, winks, becks, nods, whistles, frowns, and such like, not by science, unless every experiment is science, and not only ordered things tied up in trusses. Still, in case humanity is too elusive for worship, Mr. Harrison tells us that there are two more gods (of course, he does not call them gods, only dominant objects of human regard) whom we can cultivate. These are Earth and Space. Humanity is apt to dive into fobs, to put its hand into placket-holes, to get old and deaf and theological and less positive than it ought. It must be most refreshing to have earth and space in reserve in the background. Thus, like Antæus, Mr. Harrison draws in new power from the wormy mother, and although he is decidedly fearful lest some priestly Hercules strangle him in mid-air, yet at the last resort there is still space, and plenty of it; a little cold, perhaps, but quantity rather than quality is no mean asset in a god. It seems unkind to suggest that "science" has not yet told us what humanity means, or what ether means, or what elements mean, or what protoplasm means, or what sensation is; and that Mr. Harrison belongs to a generation which was cocksure about very doubtful thesis. He falls foul of Mr. Balfour, who first doubts everything, and inclines to doubt the Catholic Faith less than most things. That may be, and is, a weak conclusion, but the philosophy of common sense cripples the robustest credulities. It is not common, not philosophy, and not sense. Yet Mr. Harrison lives by his salt, and there is no little of that in his book. Here is some of it:

The profound instinct of all healthy spirits recognises that a state of no-religion, of deliberate acquiescence in negation, of non-interest on principle in these dominant questions is weak, unworthy, even immoral. It is in vain that the man of science and the man of affairs ask to be left alone to do their own work in their own way, to leave these ultimate problems to those whom they concern, or to those who care for them. The instinct of all good men and women feels that a man without a genuine religion—a man to whom the relation of Man to the World, Man to his fellow Man, is a mere academic question, a question to be put aside—is a source of danger and corruption to his neighbours and the society in which he lives.

"NAPHTHA"

THE usual account of naphtha is that which derives the Greek word from an Arabic form; but, as is pointed out in the "New English Dictionary," the latter seems to be merely the Greek name with an Arabic spelling, which represents the Greek th by the sixteenth letter of the Arabic alphabet. There is, however, another form, naft or nift, spelt with the common t, which is the third letter of the alphabet. Both forms are given in Palmer's Persian Dictionary; the first in col. 658, and the second in col. 657. The distinction seems to be that, whilst the first form is borrowed from Greek, as said above, the simpler second form seems to be a real Persian word, and may be taken as the ultimate origin of the Greek and Arabic forms.

I take this statement from Horn's Etymological Persian Dictionary, Section 1035. He says that the Pers. neft (as he spells it), meaning "naphtha," is to be compared with the Zend napta-, meaning "moist." If this be right, the word is Persian, and its origin becomes known.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "SEA"

I AM afraid that hardly any of the conclusions suggested in Mr. Dodgson's letter are likely to be accepted by the best authorities.

The Gothic huljan is allied to the Latin celare, and cannot be connected with silua.

The connection of the Latin mare with a root meaning "to gleam" is just a possible guess, but cannot be said to be convincing.

The Greek for "ocean" is spelt with a kappa, and cannot be connected with the Latin oculus, the root of which appears in Greek with a pi, as in our borrowed word opht, and is therefore not ok-, but og-.

The connection of the Gothic saiws, sea, with saihwān, to see, is impossible. It is unlucky that Gothic uses the symbol ai in two different and unconnected ways; but such is the fact. In saihwan the ai represents short e, and the root takes the form seq. But in saiws the ai is really a diphthong, and the Germanic type is either saiwiz, or else, as Uhlenbeck writes it, saigwiz, on the strength of a possible connection with the O.H.G. gi-sig, a lake or pool. In other words, the forms saihwan and saiws have nothing in common except the initials.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Leaves from a Life. (Eveleigh Nash, 10s. net.)

THE author of this work has been pretty soundly castigated by reviewers on the score of ill-taste. It is, of course, only right that reviewers should point out a fault, and yet there seems to be something ungrateful in doing so in the present instance, for if they were at all human they cannot have helped being amused by the passages to which they take exception. Most people's recollections are so sugary and insipid when they speak of their friends and acquaintances, that this lady's trenchant frankness is really refreshing, however much to be deplored. "Another eccentric couple, whom I, at any rate, hated," is a refreshing change, say what you will, from the "Another celebrity, whom, with his charming wife, we were privileged to know," which an ordinary memoir-writer would have said. One is indignant, no doubt, at being told that the mother of somebody still living was not "a pleasant inmate of any young household," that a famous person—it would be imitating the indiscretion to give names—made himself ridiculous by—well, it doesn't matter—and that various other people did silly or painful things; still, if indignant, one is interested. The book cannot be agreeable reading for the children of those people, and they have a right to complain. It is to be said, however, that the indiscretions are by no means all the book, and that otherwise it is a very bright and vivid chronicle of the artistic and literary world in the 'sixties and 'seventies.

The anonymous author is obviously a daughter of Mr. Frith, R.A., and it is fair to say that if she is frank about the weaknesses of other families, her own does not altogether escape. Charming children they must have been. They were staying with friends in the country, and:

Monsieur Lombinet painted beautiful little landscapes, and one of our duties was to take him his luncheon. . . . Much as we liked him, we could not refrain from playing him a trick. He had to cross a plank over one of the ditches on his return home, and he was always curiously nervous over this simple performance. We bided our time, got a shorter plank, and placed it so that it looked quite all right, but so nicely balanced that the moment the unfortunate artist stepped on it, it went up in the air, and he and all his paraphernalia went headlong into the ditch, from which he emerged one mass of mud, and speechless with rage and fright.

One can imagine the joyous laughter of the little darlings. At another time they played a trick on their grandmother which made the old lady think she had a paralytic stroke, and:

We found great joy in furtively watching her pinch herself now and then to be quite sure that feeling had not left her arms and legs.

It is not surprising, perhaps, that this angel child has grown into a woman not very careful of other people's sensitiveness. All the same, it is an extremely amusing book.

War Songs of the Greeks, and other Poems. By D. R. FOTHERINGHAM. (Deighton Bell, 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. FOTHERINGHAM is well remembered as having done good service in his capacity of Chaplain to the Philhellenic Legion in the disastrous Greco-Turkish War of 1897, and his enthusiasm for the Greek and for the Greek cause, though it was not always shared by those who followed the course of events, none the less calls for admiration, in that it took so practical a turn. Indeed, that war is an everlasting puzzle to many of those who, like the present reviewer, know the Greeks and have good reason to appreciate their many high and lovable qualities; but the influences which brought about the series of painful incidents that figured as a war were far less traceable to the weakness of the individual Greek character in the face of danger than to the weakness of organisation and the instability of central authority, which were in ancient times, as in 1897, the danger of the Greek States. That there were steadfast souls in the Greek Army no one who remembers Malonna and isolated incidents at Domoko will be likely to deny. And in the light of such knowledge it is possible, if not to excuse, at least to explain the wide difference between the fighting of '25 and '97. Mr. Fotheringham is able to claim that knowledge in a special degree, and in publishing these excellent renderings of some of the Klepht songs he brings forward not only the inextinguishable poetic genius of the Greeks, but also the fighting spirit, which is their true though tarnished inheritance.

The translations themselves are, on the whole, good, though not distinguished. Seeing that the Greek metres are so easily adaptable to English verse, it is sometimes a pity that the translation has not preserved the metre of the original, especially when the metre actually adopted differs only in the matter of a syllable or so:

Προσκύνα Λιάμο' τὸν Πασᾶν, προσκύνα τὸν βεζίρη.

is not strictly translated by

Now, yield thee to the Sultan, and kneel to his command, either in sense or metre; and in

Oh! this is not Janina, where soft the fountains play the accent of the place-name is violently misplaced:

Δὲν εἶν' ἐδῶ τὰ 'Ιάννινα τὰ φιλίσης σαράβνια

But the poems are well selected, and the enthusiasm of the translator, to say nothing of his personal part in the scenes on which these songs are so melancholy a comment, renders the book an acceptable one to lovers of Greece of to-day.

The Old Venetian Palaces and Old Venetian Folk. By THOMAS OKEY. (J. M. Dent and Co., 21s. net.)

"I NEVER saw palaces anywhere but at Venice," wrote Hazlitt; "those at Rome are dungeons to them." Mr. Okey's beautiful book is an eloquent tribute to the departed glories of the great Republic. It must be said at the outset that Mr. Okey demands from his reader a sufficient acquaintance with the main facts of Venetian history and more than a casual knowledge of the topography and architecture of Venice. Happily, Mr. Trevor Haddon has come to his aid, and, with the help of his delightful illustrations, it is possible for even the untravelled student to wander at will through the streets and byways of the city on the lagoons and view the wonders of the Grand Canal.

It is of the golden age of Venice that Mr. Okey writes for the most part—that resplendent period when the Queen of the Adriatic flaunted her magnificence before the gaze of an astonished world. One wonders what ghosts still haunt the corridors of those great patrician palaces which remain in this twentieth century as the eternal witnesses to a time when life loomed large and opulent for a gay and pleasure-loving people, a time when neither sumptuary laws nor conventual regulations availed to check the extravagance or the vice of men who claimed to have found the segredo per esse felice, and who assuredly were no half-hearted votaries in the pursuit of their pleasures:

Here on earth they bore their fruitage; mirth and folly were the crop:
What of soul was left, I wonder, when the kissing had to stop?

Mr. Okey has had frequent recourse to the diaries of that indefatigable writer Marin Sanudo, and from those chroniques scandaleuses—a little too frank, maybe, for modern taste—he has rescued many a piquant story of Renaissance life and manners. Those eight volumes of local gossip have, indeed, proved of inestimable value to the modern writer on Venice. No incident is too trifling for the garrulous old writer to chronicle. He shares to the full the scepticism of his time, and is impatiently contemptuous of those signs and portents which imposed on the credulity of a superstitious populace. Here is a characteristic story, not without interest at the present moment, in view of certain controversies with regard to the so-called "Modernist" movement :

On August 26th, 1520, the Patriarch's Vicar presented a Papal Bull to the Council damning the scienza and the works of Fra "Marin" Luther, the German. None is to read or possess his books under pain of excommunication. Licence was given to the Vicar to repair to the shop of the bookseller, Zordan Tedesco, at S. Maurizio, together with the Secretary of the Ten, and seize and confiscate all his stock. "Yet," chuckles Sanudo, "I have one, and it is still in my library."

So does history repeat itself !

To lovers of Venice—and who that has known her can fail to love her?—this book will prove a most welcome acquisition. Mr. Okey writes with all the fervour of the genuine enthusiast of this city of splendid palaces and slow-gliding gondolas :

A fairy city of the heart,
Rising like water columns from the sea ;

and he has succeeded in communicating something, at least, of his enthusiasm to the reader, while the more dispassionate student of history will be grateful for a work so truly illuminative of the Renaissance period, and written with such evident care.

The Bible Beautiful. A History of Biblical Art. By ESTELLE M. HURLL. (Sisley's, Limited, 7s. 6d. net.)

Christmas Faith and Fact. Readings on the Incarnation. Illustrated by Painter and Poet. Arranged by AGNES L. ILLINGWORTH. (Mowbray and Co., 3s. 6d. net.)

The Resurrection and the Life. Readings for the Great Forty Days and Whitsuntide. Arranged by AGNES L. ILLINGWORTH. With Twenty-six Full-page Illustrations. (Mowbray and Co.)

THE writers of these three books are interested from different points of view with the same great subject—the service of Art to Religion. Mrs. Hurll follows the history of that service, and Mrs. Illingworth directly contributes to its restoration. In order to obtain for Mrs. Hurll's book the attention which it deserves, it is unfortunately necessary to advertise at the outset that its very unprepossessing cover is no indication of its merits. The title is not a very happy one, for Mrs. Hurll does not treat of beautiful copies of the Bible, but of scenes from the Old and New Testament, used as subjects for decorations, and later for easel-pictures. In the space of some two hundred and fifty pages Mrs. Hurll can, of course, do no more than sketch her comprehensive theme. This she does with care and judgment, so far as she follows established criticism faithfully, but she has not enough independent critical faculty to judge of later artists, and her last two chapters "The Bible in Modern Art" would have been better omitted. Her comparison between the Nazarenes and the Pre-Raphaelites, for instance, and her estimate of the latter, are not at all to the point. In the first eight chapters she gives a clear sketch of Biblical subjects to be found in the catacombs, in mediæval decorated books, in the sculptures, mosaics, frescoes, and oil-pictures of Italy, the Netherlands, and Germany, up to and including the Renaissance, not forgetting the German engravers. She adds indices of the artists, places, and subjects mentioned in her book, and two very useful appendices—one giving an outline of the subjects in the "Biblia Pauperum," and another selections from the "Byzantine Guide to Painting." She shows a real love of pictorial art and great interest in Biblical history, also her fairly broad-minded but frankly Protestant principles, which she satisfies occasionally by protests against preference of scenes from the legends of the saints over those from the Bible narratives. Her book contains over forty rather good and distinctly well-chosen half-tone illustrations.

Mrs. Illingworth has collected passages from writings on the Incarnation, ranging from "The Shepherd of Hermas" and St. Ignatius's "Epistles" to the present day. Her object (as she tells us plainly in her preface) is "for the 'more confirming of the Faith.'" To this end she adds some forty reproductions of pictures representing the Nativity or the Adoration of the Magi, by painters ranging from a decorator of the catacombs to Rossetti. She introduces them aptly by a passage from Faber, beginning, "Christian art, rightly considered, is at once a theology and a worship." Mrs. Illingworth's list of authors is comprehensive. The great names are there, of course: the saints, from St. John and St. Paul to St. Teresa; Aristides, Origen, Tertullian, Thomas à Kempis, Tauler; the great Anglicans—Hooker, Law, Jeremy Taylor, Liddon, Pusey, Isaac Williams, and (still living) Dr. Illingworth and Bishop Gore. But the book contains some surprises :

I cannot think that any estimate of our Lord's work and Person which starts from the ethical aspect can be other than fatally deceptive. This was not that which the Apostles preached, and this could not have conquered the world.

It is the positive vigour of the late Bishop Westcott that we find surprising in this passage, not his orthodoxy; also the definite orthodoxy of the passage from Frederick Denison Maurice. We are still more surprised to find Bunyan "so orderly led" thither :

In the midst of the throne, thought I, there is the Godhead; in the midst of the elders, there is His Manhood.

But we have been most curious to see what Mrs. Illingworth could deduce from Lafcadio Hearn on the subject. It was not until the last line of the passage that we divined her meaning. Hearn tells how he saw a hardened Japanese criminal brought to contrition by the influence of personal love; Dr. Illingworth's book, "Personality Human and Divine," supplies the appositeness of the quotation. Mrs. Illingworth has chosen her illustrations with very great taste, and shows her knowledge of pictures by including so many more rarely reproduced. This makes her book much more attractive to less actively pious readers, and carries out her object, enticing them to make themselves acquainted with the written dogmas which the pictures figure. She has not been so successful in her selection of poetry. Some of her quotations are mere reverent expressions of piety in verse, and do not approach the same level of art as her pictures; of course, Milton's four stanzas, and in another genre, the exquisite carol, "Lullay, by by, lullay," are on that level at least.

Mrs. Illingworth's former book has already obtained its own public. We draw attention to it here because it is arranged on the same plan as the present one, our remarks apply generally to it, and it is particularly suitable to the coming festival.

The Life and Voyages of Joseph Wiggins, F.R.G.S., Modern Discoverer of the Kara Sea Route to Siberia. Based on his Journals and Letters. By HENRY JOHNSON. (John Murray, 15s. net.)

I HAVE a prejudice about book-writing, for I think a man has no occasion to write of his deeds and doings until he is on the point of finishing his work. Then, when he has nothing else to do, he may sit down and detail the labours of his life.

These are the words of a strong man who set out to do certain things—and did them; a man of action, determination, initiative, and resource. He knew that the Sea of Kara was to be conquered, and he conquered it. He knew that the opening (or reopening to the punctilious) of the Yenesei route to Siberia was feasible, and he proved it. The tale of his life, set forth with much care and loving kindness by Mr. Johnson, is an inspiring and inspiring one; he had to fight heavy odds, to assert himself, to further his scheme in different ways and against strenuous opposition. He has been compared to Hawkins and Frobisher. Sir Robert Morier called him "a great historical man." He was above all a pioneer, for Wiggins was practical from the top of his head to the soles of his feet; he did not work for honour and glory alone, although a due meed of these were surely his, but he had a definite commercial object in view, and this was his goal throughout the long winters of his discontent. The book is well done, sufficiently illustrated, and fully indexed—a worthy record of a noble man.

FICTION

The Kiss of Helen. By CHARLES MARRIOTT. (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.)

THIS is no ordinary novel. The reviewer, conscious of the triteness of the phrase, is impelled to its use by sheer necessity. Mr. Marriott, we might add, is no ordinary novelist. He is accustomed to bring a critical and questioning intelligence to bear upon the myriad problems of life—a little scornful, it would seem, of the facile solutions and frank evasions of the man in the street or the student in the library.

In subtlety of characterisation and trenchancy of dialogue "The Kiss of Helen" registers the high-water mark of Mr. Marriott's art. His hero, Paul Trecarell, is very much the ordinary man. We find him an aspirant for the priesthood, we know him, for the most part, as an architect, and we leave him a public orator. He appears in the first chapter as a somewhat colourless though distinctly impressionable boy of seventeen. For the development of a mere male into a man a woman is generally required, and in the case of Paul Trecarell it needed two. The first—her name is Joan Keverne—he had met and kissed in Cornwall, where she had been spending a short holiday. The morning after she had left suddenly, leaving no trace; maddened with disappointment, Paul hurries to London and institutes inquiries. He discovers, to his horror, that the virgin goddess of his adoration had been living under the "protection" of a man named Colmore, a sort of bloodless statistician, and that she had recently left him. In the revulsion of feeling that followed, he determined to dismiss her from his thoughts:

She had been merely the occasion of a passion which he now knew to be guilty. It was impossible, he thought, to love innocently an immoral woman.

Some years afterwards he meets Ierne Pixell, proposes, and is accepted. At this stage of the narrative Joan reappears. Paul finds her the keeper of a tea-shop for artists somewhere in Chelsea. The old passion reasserts itself, and a holiday in Cornwall with the Pixell family reveals to Paul many things, among them the fact that the most deep-rooted passion of his life is in no way connected with Ierne. Ierne is domesticated, but perceptive. She releases Paul from his engagement, not without a certain generosity and grace of manner. Shortly afterwards the tea-shop is raided by the police under a misapprehension, and, in the trial that follows, the Colmore incident leaps to light. Joan's distress appeals to Paul as his opportunity, and he asks her to marry him. She refuses, regretfully, but very definitely. For them, she gives him to understand, there can be no marriage, as the world uses the term. She had never forgotten, it appeared, the kiss given in Cornwall many years ago, and since that time she had lived for a certain ideal. So she offers Paul love, without "confectionery."

There was, after all, a free love that was neither the ludicrous complication of marriage generally understood by the term, nor a foolish denial or cowardly evasion of sex.

That is Mr. Marriott's solution of the problem. We may congratulate him, in conclusion, on a great artistic achievement. Furthermore, "The Kiss of Helen" is a book that sets one thinking.

Many Junes. By ARCHIBALD MARSHALL. (Methuen and Co., 6s.)

THERE is always a certain distinction about Mr. Archibald Marshall's novels, though few novelists so persistently elude any attempt at classification. He excels in that quality vaguely but conveniently known as "atmosphere." "Many Junes" is full of atmosphere. It is the atmosphere of the English country-side—a little melancholy, as when the twilight is stealing over the landscape, and the first pale stars appear—an atmosphere that subtly suggests the buried hopes of forgotten days.

Mr. Marshall has taken as his hero a man whose life is dominated throughout by disappointment, who somehow always contrives to miss the prizes that life holds for the more fortunate. So slight is the theme that in the hands of a less experienced artist it would have inevitably courted disaster, but Mr. Marshall is sure of his ground, and it has to be said that he has given us a novel of vivid and, indeed, entrancing human interest. We are first introduced to Hugh Lalacheur as a shy and somewhat sensitive boy, whose affection centres round his sister. This sister is removed by marriage, and, later, more irretrievably by death. His father, a naval officer of an obstinate and irascible temperament, dies while Hugh is still young, leaving his son to face the world as best he may. There follow some years of loneliness, relieved only by a solitary friendship. At last, in sheer despair, as it would seem, Hugh seeks relief from the aching monotony of life in marriage. But Mabilia Churton is a heartless vulgarian, and Hugh is scarcely engaged before he realises the hopelessness of his position. At about this time the death of a cousin in Norfolk leaves him the possessor of some considerable estates and a baronetcy of ancient origin. He goes down to Norfolk to survey his new property, and there he meets Margaret Paston. For a few days life becomes an idyll, but it is only for a few days. The ugly truth, which could not well be suppressed, leaks out, and Margaret, horrified but still faithful, yields her lover to the other woman. So the years pass by, each laden with disappointment and disillusion, and we leave Hugh, a grey-haired and silent man, feeding vainly on dreams and fond regrets for a happiness that might have been. "I was always a little afraid of happiness," he said on one occasion. But the story is something more than a tragedy of temperament, for we cannot resist the conclusion that the Fates themselves had been a little unkind to this hero.

Isle Raven. By OWEN VAUGHAN ("Owen Rhoscomyl"). (Duckworth and Co., 6s.)

A TALE full of thrilling incident. Too much incident and too thrilling, perhaps, for the year of which it is written—Coronation year of this our twentieth century. It begins with a motor-car mishap—a motor upset by a harrow driven across the road to stop it—and in the incident four out of the six principal characters are involved. It ends with all six in a cave below ground, approached only by a shaft fifteen feet high, and with bloodhounds baying at the mouth of the shaft.

Isle Raven is possessed of a population with primordial passions—with a love of the soil surpassing that of Western Irishmen—relics of a seventeenth-century buccaneer and his followers. It was granted by Prince Rupert to Michael Poynz (Black Michael) for his services to King Charles at sea.

There are several claimants to Isle Raven—firstly, the islanders who are in possession when the tale begins and ends; then the owner of the upset car, Rossiter Armitage, who, with his lawyer Yale, comes to assert his right to succeed his uncle, Armitage Rossiter, who nearly perished in his yacht off the island, which he finally bought; thirdly, Elen Walwyn, who, with her lame sailor-lover, saved Rossiter from shipwreck, and whose devotion he repaid one day, sitting above a cliff over the sea, by a deed conveying to her the possession of the island—but at the cost of her own undoing. She flung the silver case with the deed enclosed over the cliff, and it fell on the Stack rock—a pinnacle which rises from the sea quite close to where the shameful offer was made. Kate Silifant is another of Black Michael's would-be heirs, and buys from Armitage his reversion; and Watkin, Elen Walwyn's foster-brother, represents the wild islanders. It is a triangular duel. The islanders are against all claimants—Armitage, represented by his lawyer, Yale; Elen Walwyn, backed by Lawyer John Mathias, with the spitfire Kate Silifant in reserve. Mathias is her devoted lover. Yale falls a victim to Elen Walwyn's charms with great good judgment, for she is the one real lovable character in the book. By a curious chain of emotions Mathias is led to scale the Stack rock to rescue the silver case containing Elen's title-deeds, and so to annul the title bought by Kate from Armitage, and jumps from the top of the Stack into the sea to save Kate from drowning at the hands of Watkin, the island champion, and for the moment her ally.

Then Watkin catches all the other actors (literally) in his net and lowers them into the cave, with the exception of Mathias, who finishes a series of Titanic combats with Watkin by falling, hugged in his grip, to the bottom of the shaft, where he dies, after handing to Elen Walwyn her title-deeds. The tale is marred by the use of twentieth-century slang whenever Armitage appears; otherwise he is rather a nice young man. And really we recommend that in a new edition Mr. Rhoscomyl should put back the clock two hundred years or so. The wonderful adventures contained in these 301 pages are rather hard to digest, told of these modern times. There is much pretty appreciation of scenery and the writing is generally graphic. But it is hardly artistic to end a romance with an epithet hurled at a lady indescribably thus—"You ———."

A Comedy of Moods. By GREVILLE H. TEMPANY. (Constable, 6s.)

MR. TEMPANY'S "Comedy of Moods" has many defects—and one outstanding virtue. It is too short, too slight, too careless in some respects, too careful on one particular occasion, and it is undeniably clever. If it be, as from its amateurish technique we judge that it is, its author's first essay in fiction, it is rich in promise. It contains, indeed, one portrait—that of Sir Cullingham—that is masterly: a study in egoism that comes very close to Mr. Meredith's work. To Sir Cullingham the man "who would be hero" all the other characters are subordinated, and Mr. Tempany's perspective is faulty. We consider, too, the apparent lack of observation (the impression may be due to the author's lack of interest) displayed in some of his pages inexcusable in the creator of Sir Cullingham. With the exception we have noted, only Lady Hexley stands out clearly and distinctly—a sympathetic sketch of a charming, vivacious, clever woman. For these two characters—more particularly, of course, for the first—we could forgive our author more serious faults than we find in his book. Some of his dialogue reaches a level that is seldom touched by the best of our modern novelists. We confess that Mr. Tempany has not only delighted us—he has piqued our curiosity. We shall look forward with a keen anticipation to his next book. There should be a big future for a man who can write as he can at his best.

She Loved Much. By ALFRED BUCHANAN. (Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

THE title of Mr. Buchanan's book evidently refers to Elsie Lorraine, who lives with Norman Blair, a Manchester journalist, for two years, and then deserts him for some unaccountable reason. The author thinks it is because she has a delicate feeling that her association with the "coming man" is not for his good, but, as analysed by Mr. Buchanan, her emotions are somewhat superficial, not to say false. As it is, Norman goes to London alone, though he has, while in Manchester, made the acquaintance of Genevieve Jay, "the great London actress," and she is interested in him. Of course, the journalist has to struggle towards the height of fame viâ poverty, humiliation, and the rest of the difficulties encountered on the conventional pathway to Parnassus. Equally conventional are the persons Blair meets, beginning with the all-powerful and cynical critic, Wilfred Storer—a very familiar type by now—the Hon. Walter Courtney, the lover of Miss Jay, Mrs. Wintersmith, the modern seeker after budding genius for her drawing-room, and Lieutenant Hale, who wishes to marry Elsie Lorraine, despite the two-year episode at Manchester.

Courtney is the fairy godfather of the piece. He sends Elsie to his country house, orders Wilfred Storer to make Norman Blair famous, and behaves with generosity towards the struggling author, though anybody else would have noticed that his fiancée, Miss Jay, was really in love with Blair. She proposes to him, and is refused, and when later Norman writes a farewell letter from "the banks of the Yalu"—he is by now a war correspondent—she casts aside her passion and accepts the Honourable Walter. Throughout the book we get a few glimpses of Elsie, and all her actions tend to mystify the reader as to what the author meant by the title of his book. The reason is, of course, that Mr. Buchanan is not equal to the task he set himself, and the death of Elsie comes as a relief to his pen, for he writes better when the girl is out of the scene. It would be unfair to him, however, not to admit that his book bears evidence here and there that he can write with some distinction, and, if "She Loved Much" cannot be described as a success, the author should improve with experience.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE BISHOP OF LONDON AND THE LICENSING BILL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am sure that a great many laymen of the Diocese of London will have read your remarks respecting this matter with sincere approval. If the Bishop of London only knew what some of the best laymen in his Diocese are saying of his performance at the teetotal, Dissenting Memorial Hall gathering last Saturday he would be a little more careful. That meeting was called a "conference," but, judging by the reports, it was a rabid teetotal meeting of the ordinary type. The Bishop of London only a week or two before declined to enter into any argument about the Bill with Mr. Boulter, who had sent him a reasoned statement of the case from the brewers' point of view. He also said that he would reserve himself for the House of Lords when the Bill reached that assembly. Had his lordship made the promise to go to that Dissenting flare-up when he wrote that letter to Mr. Boulter, or did he forget, when urged to take part in the affair, what he had said to Mr. Boulter? The letters were published in most of the newspapers. It is surely not surprising that diocesan funds are suffering, and that the hat has had to be sent round with such persistence for the Portrait Fund, which still lacks some hundreds of the sum required.

A LONDON LAYMAN.

London, S.W., March 28.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Il n'y a de vrai que l'amour. Are the opening words in this week's ACADEMY quite in harmony with those quoted by your correspondent "H. M." on p. 626? For you denounce the Bishop of London as having no claim to speak for the Church of England merely on the ground that some years ago he recommended an ephemeral book written for a special purpose, and declare him to have a positive genius for doing and saying the wrong thing. This will hardly be the note struck in the Egyptian Hall to-morrow (March 30th), at the presentation of the Bishop's portrait by the Lord Chancellor—but this is by the way. However, the reason for your sweeping reproof is not hard to discover: you dislike his brave support of the Licensing Bill! It seems to me that you give the Bishop no credit at all for his noble motive in either case, and that is to be guilty of a breach of charity. For when he publicly mentioned the said book it was at a time when the fact, the great cardinal fact, of the Resurrection of Christ was being made the common topic, and he saw the necessity of counteracting it on its own level in popular style, and he would probably allow that parts of the book are as you describe them; and now that he is advocating the cause of temperance his motive is nothing less than the salvation of thousands from the deadly grip of drink, that noisome demon which has desolated so many of the homes of this fair land, and robbed the nation of its choicest asset in the honour and self-respect of men and maidens. Sir, in the course of a longish life I have learned enough of the countryside to be sure that if it were not for the multitudinous taverns and their low associations England would not be having to deplore, far and wide, the beggary and shame, the falls from virtue, the stupid barbarities and vile passions, the ruined homes and forsaken altars, that bear witness to the cruel spite of "Legion," the drink-demon, and its sister Lust.

A. W. H.

March 29, 1908.

[We were careful in our note to say that we gave "the Bishop of London every credit for the best possible intentions." But people with the very best intentions very frequently do the most unwise things. A. W. H. describes the Bishop's support of the Bill as "brave" and "noble." There is nothing brave or noble in supporting a measure which one approves. It is simply what one expects from any ordinary decent man. And why is it any more brave and noble for the Bishop of London to support the Bill than for the Bishop of Chester to oppose it? All this foolish talk about bravery and nobility in connection with a matter of politics and economics should be relegated to its right place—the stump of the demagogue. It is what one expects from the mouth of Mr. Lloyd-George and the rest of his class of politicians. We have no place for it in THE ACADEMY.—ED.]

"THE METROPOLIS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—While I agree with your allegations regarding the extent of the corruption which exists in the American cities, especially New York, I hardly think it fair to assume or suggest that American society, as a whole, is rotten with it. The population of all the big cities of the United States is practically of the same character and racial origin as that which pollutes with its presence the Whitechapel, Soho, and other districts of London, Manchester, and Leeds. To expect this Yiddish, Italian, and Slavonic rubbish to breed anything but vice, ignorance, crime, and corruption is as unreasonable as it would be to expect pigs to produce anything but filth. The freak-dinner society Mr. Sinclair describes is composed of this imported carrion grown rich. Like our own smart society, which Father Vaughan arraigns in his sermons, and Messrs. Sutro, Pinero, and Shaw depict in their "society plays," it is Semitic rather than Anglo-Saxon, and, therefore, the decent Anglo-Saxon society of the United States should not be held responsible for its acts. It is as absurd for the reader of Sinclair's book to assume that all American society is corrupt as it would be for the American witness of our Jewish or Irish written society dramas to imagine therefrom that all English society is corrupt. Sinclair describes only that portion of American society he has become personally acquainted with, just as Pinero, Sutro, and Shaw depict only that portion of English society which they have become acquainted with.

The success of Sinclair's "Jungle," to which you refer, was due to his extraordinary good fortune in publishing it about the same time the Chicago packers decided to stop advertising in the American and English newspapers. Previous to then many unsuccessful attempts had been made to expose the methods of the Chicago packers, as these methods were well-known in Chicago. When in that city I wrote to several London newspapers on the subject, but, as the packers were then advertising very generously in the London dailies, my letters appeared only in the waste-baskets. The decision of the packers, however, to stop advertising had the same effect on the Press of both countries as did the decision of Messrs. Lever Bros. to curtail their advertising expenditure. Until, therefore, the packers saw the error of their ways, and restarted advertising, the "Jungle" was boomed very extensively in the American and English Press, and the methods of the packers exposed.

It is possible that if all the Jewish sovereign-cure mongers, and free-watch philanthropists of this country were to stop advertising, the alien and Celtic crooks who have captured the London daily Press would be moved to boom a certain little book I am publishing, called "England under the Jews."

JOSEPH BANISTER.

89, Farringdon Street, E.C., March 28, 1908.

[The whole question of American corruption (which is by no means confined to New York, or even to the big cities of the Union) has been dealt with so extensively in our columns that we do not care to reopen the subject. Occidit miseris, and the readers of THE ACADEMY are probably tired of America and its unpleasant ways. But, at the same time, we cannot think that Mr. Banister is justified in assuming that the abominations of America are to be attributed chiefly or solely to the Jewish, Italian, and Slavonic "rubbish." It must be remembered that if the scum rises freely it is boiling in an Anglo-Saxon pot; in other words, that the whole framework of the United States cosmos is of Anglo-Saxon origin. The Slav and the Italian are by no means bad fellows in their own countries; at all events, they show no inclination for the frantic follies which are one of the chief marks of social life in the States, and, if we are not mistaken, the names which appear in the often-recurring American "scandals" are not often of Slavonic or Italian colour. And, again, we believe that the Irishman in America is distinguished chiefly as a successful keeper of "corner-saloons" and as a potent influence, both of hand and brain, in what are called "politics" in American and general scoundrelism in English. Now, the Irishman of the Galway coast and of the Connemara bogs has doubtless fruits (like the rest of us), but it is the great Anglo-Saxon democracy which transmutes him into a noxious and dangerous Yahoo.

We are afraid that there is a good deal to be said for the "advertisement" theory as advanced by Mr. Banister. The question is delicate enough, but those who have some pride in the English Press must be grieved when they see a whole column in a paper of repute devoted to the praise of some new powders which "cure cancer."—ED.]

COMPARATIVE PHILOLOGY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As a student of comparative philology for more than forty years, and as a sincere friend of THE ACADEMY, I most earnestly entreat you, as you value the representation of THE ACADEMY as a literary and scientific weekly review, not to admit letters from Mr. E. S. Dodgson on the subject of comparative philology. In the letter which appears in this week's ACADEMY on the etymology of "Sea," there is scarcely a line which does not contain a gross blunder. The letter clearly shows that the writer is absolutely ignorant of the elements of old English or of Gothic-scholarship. There is not a single etymology which is suggested in this astounding letter that would not be laughed out of court by any competent scholar.

I am quite sure that if you had only been told how bad the communication was you would never have given it the hospitality of your columns. I tell you now so that you may be warned in future.

You listened to my advice on philological letters in the case of the late Mr. Hall; I think that it will be to the interest of THE ACADEMY if you listen to me now, or at any rate take the advice on the matter of some competent scholar.

A. L. MAYHEW.

18, Bradmore Road, Oxford, March 28, 1908.

[We do not editorially profess to be authorities on comparative philology and we decline responsibility for views expressed in our correspondence columns. We constantly admit to its hospitality correspondents with whom we are in profound disagreement, and the responsibility for any mistakes and blunders they may make must rest on their own heads. Admitting that Mr. E. S. Dodgson's etymology is at fault, of which there appears to be little doubt, the value of his letter lies in the fact that it has drawn from Professor Skeat an authoritative pronouncement. Regarded from this point of view, correspondents who write and make inaccurate statements in the columns of THE ACADEMY are really often conferring a benefit on our readers, since they afford the means for the exposure of error.—ED.]

THE SICILIAN PLAYERS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—If Mr. Morant detects any wavering in my attitude, that is purely a matter of fancy on his part. I have looked in vain in my first letter for any indication of having called Cav. Grasso "a mere tyro of a really great artist." The description in itself is absurd. I did say something about "the initial efforts, in England, of a really great artist," which is quite a different thing. I still hold to that statement, that he is a great artist. I said Signora Aguglia was an "exceptionally clever mime." There are many English actresses in melodrama to whom I would apply the same description. The late M. Lauri, the animal impersonator, was an exceptionally clever mime.

My contention was that the Sicilians' art did not rank very high, and I expressed my regret that some people should have vastly overrated it. And Mr. Morant, who formerly spoke of their "magnificent" and "wonderful" acting, now says:

Without maintaining that the art of the Sicilians is necessarily the highest art, I do maintain that in their own province of Art they are extraordinarily good.

Well, I have endeavoured to locate that "province," and it seems that in doing so, in company with several other critics, I am to be labelled effeminate, in addition to having Ibsen and Shaw thrown at my head. Why drag Ibsen and Shaw into the controversy?

If Mr. Morant seriously contends that a man possessed of any of the passions he names does not care a single jot for the cold dictates of reason, then I can only say that my knowledge of human nature leads me to a different conclusion.

I maintain that the mental states supposed to be present in Malta were not, in certain instances, perfectly presented—notably by Signora Aguglia in the second Act—although I went to the Shaftesbury Theatre minus “the stiff shirt-front,” and therefore fully prepared to give vent to my feelings. In fact, it was because I was disappointed of my emotional feast that I have penned these complaints.

If Mr. Morant cannot accept the theory adduced, which has the weight of historical evidence with it, I am sorry I cannot invent any other. As he says that, in his case, it is a matter of taste, and he makes certain definite statements regarding Signora Aguglia's acting which I have already denied, I do not think any useful purpose will be served by my continuing the argument.

THE STIBBERT ART COLLECTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—THE ACADEMY published a letter of mine so long ago as October 18th, 1906, denouncing “il gran rifiuto,” as it may be appropriately termed, of the British Government to assume the care and protectorate of Mr. Stibbert's vast art-legacy to the English folk residing in Florence.

Up to the 26th inst., according to the Florence Herald, the Museum remains severely left alone, and only a solitary curator bars the threshold.

A board of control has not yet decided to whom and when the English or other visitors can be allowed to enter, nor is it likely to decide, as it is said “never to meet,” and only a few of the members have united in “a picnic” eighteen months ago for the purpose of considering if £32,000 bequeathed to endow and maintain the villa is a sufficient maintenance.

Between the lethargy of our Government and the accustomed torpor of the Florentine Municipality the gift horse seems condemned “to eat its head off.”

This “scandalous affair” has ended so far that, quoting the Florence Herald, “literally nothing has been done in two years, and there is no sign of the Museum ever being opened.”

Is Sir Edward Grey so busy caring for the past negligence of the Foreign Office that he has no wish or time to cultivate the fine arts since his accession to office? “Glance and pass on” is the worn-out motto of an establishment which obeys to the letter any formula which saves trouble and expense.

I speak from knowledge and sad experience.

TOLSTOY'S EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In September of this year Count Leo Tolstoy completes his eightieth year, and it is proposed to celebrate his birthday as an event of international importance. The peoples of all civilised countries are asked to join in doing him honour, both as the greatest representative of Russian literature and as a social reformer who has set a high ideal of life before the world.

A central committee has been formed in Russia with the intention of inviting representatives of literature and social progress and of the learned societies from all parts of the world to unite for the occasion in St. Petersburg or Moscow. Besides the international address which it is proposed to present to Count Tolstoy at that time, two further schemes in his honour have been suggested—first, to issue a cheap edition of his principal works in the leading languages of Europe; and, secondly, to secure his home as a public possession, to which pilgrimages may be made in future times, as to Stratford-on-Avon.

To assist in these objects a committee has already been formed in Paris, including such well-known members of the “Institut” as M. Anatole France, M. Leroy Beaulieu, and M. le Marquis Melchior de Vogué.

The British committee is now in process of formation. The following have already consented to give their support to the proposal:—George Meredith, Thomas Hardy, H. G. Wells, Mr. Henry James, Mr. J. M. Barrie, Mr. J. Galsworthy, Prof. G. Murray, Hon. Maurice Baring, Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, Mr. Laurence Irving, Sir Donald Wallace, Mr. Aylmer Maude, Prof. P. Vinogradoff, Mrs. Garnett, Mr. H. W. Nevinson. Mr. Edmund Gosse has kindly consented to act as president of the committee.

It is hoped that our country's share in the proceedings will be worthy of the high service we have received from this great artist and teacher, and of the wide admiration with which he is regarded among us.

The British committee proposes to work in co-operation with the Russian, the secretary of which (M. Michel Stakhovitch, Marshal of Nobility for the province of Toula, in which Count Tolstoy resides) has lately visited London.

P.S.—Contributions may be sent to Messrs. Barclay and Co., Ltd., 1, Pall Mall East, S.W. Cheques to be made payable to “Tolstoy Fund.”

ALCOHOLISM AND INSANITY

SIR,—Mr. Harold Spender's article in the Daily Chronicle on the new Licensing Bill is a typical production of the extreme temperance (so-called) advocates. On the question as to whether alcohol is one of the most frequent causes of insanity, there is good reason to believe that they confound cause and effect. Dr. F. W. Mott, F.R.S., Physician to Charing Cross Hospital, and Pathologist to the County Asylum, holds a brief for neither side. That gentleman read a paper at the meeting of the British Medical Association at Exeter entitled “A Discussion on Alcohol and Insanity.”

In this paper Dr. Mott made a general attack on the statistics relating to insanity that are usually quoted, giving details showing the nature of the investigations upon which the assertion is based and arrived at the conclusion that alcohol as an efficient cause of insanity is not so great as the published reports of the Lunacy Commission indicates; the Doctor goes on further to show that alcohol does not per se produce a permanent mental derangement such as constitutes our definition of insanity. In short, alcohol only produces insanity when it is associated with some other cause, either a latent, congenital, or acquired defect.

THE VEDRENNE-BARKER MANAGEMENT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you let me express a little regretful surprise that a recent lamentable event should have passed without notice in your columns? It is to the closing of the Vedrenne-Barker management at the “Savoy” that I refer.

For two or three years we have had an almost continuous series of plays which, though liable to various adverse criticism, at least have stood for an advance in the work of humanising and intellectualising the stage. True, there was perhaps too much of Mr. Shaw, but when it is remembered that, apart from Mr. Shaw, plays by Mr. John Galsworthy, Mr. St. John Hankin, and Mr. Granville Barker himself (to name merely those that occur to me at the moment) were produced, you will, no doubt, agree that there was a serious and honourable attempt to offer “the public” something more worthy than is to be found in the Haymarket or Strand.

Well, the attempt has failed. From whatever immediate cause the failure has proceeded, I think there can be only one ultimate cause—that is, “the public” simply do not want good and thoughtful plays. I am not asserting that only at the “Court” or “Savoy” have good plays been presented, but it is perfectly well-known that only at these theatres, and only under the Vedrenne-Barker management have we been given a succession of serious and valuable plays, adequately produced, and represented with a uniform excellence that is quite impossible under the present “star” system obtaining elsewhere.

Well, again, the courageous attempt has failed, after a fairly prolonged fight. There is not, apparently, a sufficient public among London's six millions to support a theatre where drama is produced for drama's sake. Why, then, should we lament any longer the enormous and humiliating disparity between the intellectuality of the modern play and the intellectuality, say, of the modern novel? Why not recognise frankly that we have precisely the drama we want? It is only a few weeks since you yourself, Sir, were reminding us that we have the journalism we deserve; it is equally clear that we have the plays we deserve.

Is it not a little singular that the month which has seen the Shakespeare Memorial controversy fanned into some faint degree of warmth should also see the extinction of almost our last claim to possess drama worthy of the inheritors of Shakespeare? Remembering your recent remarks about journalism, one is tempted to think that it would be as ridiculous to erect a Shakespeare Memorial—theatre or statue—as it would be superfluous to erect a Harmsworth memorial—statue or madhouse.

THE PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION SOCIETY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I ask whether you will direct public attention to the April issue of Representation, and particularly to Sir Richard Cartwright's advocacy of Proportional Representation as the remedy for the evils arising in Canada from defective electoral methods?

Will you also kindly announce the meeting to be held in Caxton Hall on April 10th, under the auspices of this Society? In France Proportional Representation meetings are being addressed by members of all the Parliamentary groups, and the Caxton Hall meeting will, in like manner, be addressed by representatives of different parties.

Messrs. Methuen's New Books

THE POEMS OF WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

With Introduction and Notes by NOWELL C. SMITH, late Fellow of New College, Oxford. With 3 Frontispieces. In 3 Vols., demy 8vo., 15s. net.
Mr. Nowell Smith aims at giving the reader an accurate text according to the latest edition of the poet's lifetime, with an Introduction, a Chronological Index to the poems, and Notes. In the Notes compression has been much studied, but it has been Mr. Nowell Smith's aim to leave no passage about which the average cultivated reader might feel a difficulty without an explanation or an attempt at one, and, by indicating the sources of quotations, to assist in appreciating Wordsworth's literary affinities and methods.

ADVANCED GOLF. By JAMES BRAID, Open Champion, 1901, 1905, and 1908. With over 90 Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 10s. 6d. net.

This book is intended for all players who have already obtained some knowledge of the game, even if only a slight one. By taking it for granted that the reader has thus had some instruction in the most elementary principles of the game, and has practised it a little, the author is enabled to dispense with many chapters usually contained in books of golf, and the space thus set free is devoted to a complete exposition of the fine points of the game such as has never been made before.

THE COMPLETE COOK. By Miss L. WHITLING, late Staff Teacher of the National Training School of Cookery. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

Two special features are—first, the footnotes given with most recipes, suggesting how to simplify, enrich, or vary the ingredients, utensils, mode of cooking, &c., in such a way that the actual number of recipes given is almost doubled. Second, the simple measures used in lieu of scales and weights, which are valueless to travellers, to those stationed abroad, and to the average cook with her racial antipathy to their use.

The Principles of Cookery and the rules deduced from them are given almost for the first time in print.

A STAR OF THE SALONS. By CAMILLA JEBB. With 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 10s. 6d. net.

The life story of Mlle. de Lespinasse, her times (1732-78) and her contemporaries, her strange early history, her friendships and her love story.

THE REAL INDIA. By J. D. REES, C.I.E., M.P. Demy 8vo., 10s. 6d. net.

This work gives an abstract of the history of India, showing how the present dispensation arose, and how it differs from its predecessors. Chapters deal with how India is actually governed, with the land system, with the Native States, with the frontier question, with the problems of the present day in India, and possible or desirable reforms.

THE ROMANCE OF GEORGE VILLIERS, FIRST DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, AND SOME MEN AND WOMEN OF THE STUART COURT. By PHILIP GIBBS. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 15s. net.

"A lucid, impartial, and most entertaining account."—Daily Chronicle.
"Full of interest and action, this new biography must be pronounced a sound and attractive contribution to the lighter side of seventeenth-century history."—Manchester Guardian.

"This career, unfolded with painstaking reference to authorities, is as fascinating as any romance."—Glasgow News.

"With deft, felicitous touches Mr. Gibbs reveals the heart of the man beneath the velvet and pearls, a heart so courageous and gallant that men and women alike yielded to its charm."—Daily Telegraph.

"A flowing narrative, packed with scholarly detail, and diversified by general pictures of the life of the English Court in the reign of the first two Stuarts."—Scotsman.

ON NOTHING AND KINDRED SUBJECTS. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P. Fcap. 8vo., 6s.

"The reader of this delicious book will enjoy the fruits of a wit scintillating and self-sufficing."—Daily Telegraph.

"It is all delightful writing, with that particular smack of quaintness in the English that is Mr. Belloc's own."—Outlook.

"Luminous, humorous, and uplifting pages."—Daily Chronicle.

"It is all very delightful."—Daily News.

FURTHER STUDIES IN THE PRAYER BOOK. By JOHN DOWDEN, D.D., Hon. LL.D. (Edinburgh), Bishop of Edinburgh. Crown 8vo., 6s.

This book deals with some of the more minute problems in the history and interpretation of the Book of Common Prayer. The Order of the Holy Communion receives special attention. A guide to the literature of Prayer Book history and criticism is prefixed.

PRECES PRIVATÆ. By LANCELOT ANDREWES, Bishop of Winchester. Translated by F. E. BRIGHTMAN, M.A., Canon of Lincoln. Edited, with an Introduction, by A. E. BUEN, D.D. Small pott 8vo., cloth, 2s.; leather, 2s. 6d. net. [Library of Devotion.]

THE CRIMES OF ALI PASHA AND OTHERS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. With 9 Illustrations. Crown 8vo., 6s.

THE SAINTS IN ART. By MARGARET E. TABOR. With 20 Illustrations. Fcap. 8vo., 3s. 6d. net.

This book gives short accounts of all the more important saints represented in art, with the legends connected with them, and explanations of their attributes, or symbols.

FAMOUS FRENCH SALONS. By FRANK HAMEL. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 12s. 6d. net.

The book deals with those in the very forefront among Salonnières—namely, Madame de Rambouillet, la Grande Mademoiselle, the incomparable Ninon de Lencloux, Madame de Sévigné, Madame de Maintenon, Madame du Deffand, Mlle. de Lespinasse, Madame de Staël, and Madame Récamier.

DISEASES OF OCCUPATION. By THOMAS OLIVER, M.D. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 10s. 6d. net. [The New Library of Medicine.]

The object of the book is to present to the general reader, to statesmen, employers of labour, medical men, and all interested in industrial hygiene a short, but comprehensive, account of diseases due to occupation.

"SCORPIO"

A book of thirty odd sonnets—Shakespearian form—pronounced by an American critic as possessing: "A Juvenalian gift of satire and a magnificent invective, as mordant as it is tremendous." Another has said of these sonnets: "Their form is classic. They are gems. Rich gems—rubies." Shakespeare-lovers, who have been as disgusted as this new Southern satirist at G. B. Shaw's comments thereon, will see the latter handled "without gloves" therein.

A Famous Novelist

discusses

The Romantic Appeal of History

Sir Gilbert Parker, M.P., here tells us what, in his opinion, a World-History ought to be, and states that The Historians' History of the World fulfils this ideal.

"The serious mistake that people make in regard to history," said Sir Gilbert Parker in a recent interview with our representative, "is to think of it merely as an accumulation of facts and dates. That is why history is badly taught, and why children and many older folk look upon historical reading as a dull exercise. Dates are nothing more than milestones—century-stones—marking various periods and events along the highway of history. It is useful to know them, but there are other things better worth knowing. As a boy I was an omnivorous reader of history, but I was often much distressed because I could not keep dates in my mind, yet I could remember by heart vivid pages of histories I had read; my imagination was set on fire by the glamour of great historical characters, by the stirring scenes, the great deeds, the adventures and romance in the lives of nations. The pageant and march and living force of history remained in my mind, though the dates escaped.

The Continuity of History

"After all, the dates did not much matter. They can be got from a dictionary, and what people should be taught to understand is that history is not a mere record of events, of isolated facts, but that it is a great continuous chronicle of personalities. History goes, not from date to date, but from man to man, from people to people, from the man and people of one age to the man and people of another age. It narrates the movements of peoples and of nations, as well as of individuals, and if history is well written the story of a reign or of an epoch should be as interesting, as human, as fascinating, as the life-story of a single great character. For, after all, government is the executive act of a people, as anything done by one man is the executive act of an individual; and just as the human being grows from childhood to manhood, from weakness to strength, from ignorance to knowledge, so a nation has its evolution, its growth, and its decay.

The Historical Imagination

"Historians above all things need imagination and human sympathy. Take Froude—inaccurate certainly, sometimes in detail, and, therefore, appalling to the expert who finds a button on the coat missing, as it were; but Froude had the power of painting vivid, revealing pictures which make a lasting impression upon the imagination, of getting to the heart of a character and of a people, and so making them life-like and real; of seeing men and women, mobs and armies, homes and workshops throbbing with life, behind great national movements; of putting upon the stage the drama of history.

"Accuracy, of course, is important—vastly important. It is bad if the historian is loose in detail and careless in research, but the merely accurate man goes often just as wrong, errs more, indeed, than the historian who is sometimes inaccurate but has imagination and humanity. History can only be truly accurate when it is written with human sympathy. Unless a historian has the power of placing their accoutrements and the loud laughter of the gallant pioneers. I can feel the atmosphere of a virgin land throbbing with life, burning with hope, thrilling with energy. That is the way to write history, that is how it makes an irresistible appeal to the imagination."

Since granting this interview, Sir Gilbert Parker has examined, over the period of a fortnight, The Historians' History of the World. In a later interview with our representative he thus expressed the result of his examination:

"For a work on so vast a scheme I think the result is remarkably good. On dipping into every volume the interest was seized and held, the imagination stimulated, and the mind fortified by essential facts and elements in the long tale of universal History.

"These volumes adequately and effectively meet the challenge of my previous words. The distinguished authors have risen to a great opportunity, and the world of thought and reading is richer for their expert and vivid work."

The opinion here printed comes with great force from Sir Gilbert Parker. To the sound comprehension of the ideal of good history which is expressed in this interview he adds that wide and varied knowledge of human nature which equips the successful novelist, and that instinct for practical problems which marks the serious politician. Can you afford to neglect a work which such a man praises so highly? Would you not be wise at least to acquaint yourself with its scope and object by sending for the free Descriptive Booklet—and by doing so to-day?

The Free Booklet

You will find full details of The Historians' History in the Descriptive Booklet, which the annexed coupon enables you to obtain gratis and post free. In this interesting Booklet we give you an adequate, though necessarily brief, account of the nature, scheme, and method of the work.

The Historians' History is a complete world-history, in 25 super-royal octavo volumes, comprising 17,000 pages and about 11,000,000 words with over 3,000 illustrations. It comprises a complete narrative of universal history, covering the earth from pole to pole, and stretching from 5000 B.C. to 1907 A.D.

Each volume contains four times as much as an ordinary octavo, and compares favourably in paper, print, and binding with guinea books; yet the work is sold for only 7s. 6d. per volume; and you may pay this price on easy terms, at the rate of only 4d. a day.

himself in the position of the people and the characters and the events he is describing, of understanding emotions, of realizing forces, of seeing the meaning and trend of movements no accuracy of fact will save him; because his deductions from the facts will be false. Macaulay, of course, had the supreme gift of throwing himself into an epoch and living, as it were, in the characters of history. Froude, as I have said, had the same gift, and Freeman, and Green, and Lecky.

The Vivid Appeal of History

"Then take a historical writer from the other side of the water—Francis Parkman, author of 'Montcalm and Wolfe,' 'The Oregon Trail,' &c. Some of his scenes have made an indelible effect on my imagination. Even as I speak I can see, vividly and strongly, some of his pictures in prose. I can see the new-made, red-sanded streets of Richmond, Virginia, with their low-pillared 'Colonial' houses. I can see the Cavaliers galloping through them in the bold costume of the period, the surf of dust rising behind. I can hear the clatter of

LIFE AND LETTERS

It was a curious coincidence that the resignation of the late Prime Minister was announced on the very day on which the Licensing Bill was set down for its Second Reading. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's retirement has postponed the Bill in question—not exactly to the Greek Calends or to Nevermas, but still for some weeks—and one wonders whether during this interval the voice of common sense will succeed in making itself heard. And it may be remarked that by the voice of common sense we do not mean the voice of the great brewing companies. The brewers have been vilified in the silliest fashion; it has been impossible to read some of the teetotal speeches without being reminded of that famous animal which was méchant—"when you attack him he defends himself." Still the brewers are shopkeepers, and the interests of the shopkeeper are not necessarily those of the lieges. The problem to be solved is not so complicated that a Dupin should be called into consultation; it is, we take it, something like this: "There is an enormous deal of drunkenness in England, and therefore an enormous deal of misery; how is this evil state of things to be bettered?"

Not, surely, by any such plan as that propounded by the Government. A witty journalist has pointed out that the habitual drunkard is a fellow of diabolical ingenuity and infinite sagacity: you close his favourite haunt, the Red Lion, at No. 20, and he is by no means at the end of his resources; he simply walks up the street and goes on getting drunk at the Blue Bull, No. 40. Such misapplied ingenuity seems incredible, but we are assured that it is so. And even if you shut up every tavern within his reach for a whole Sunday his tortuous brain rises to the height of this new emergency, and he actually "gets the stuff in" on Saturday night. Those who have been in Glasgow on a Sunday night are aware that the drunkenness of that city is of the most hideous and disgusting sort; and dwellers in South Wales are said to have strange tales to tell as to the Sabbath revelries of the pious Cymri. And, by the way, it is curious to note in a Sabbatarian country how in quite small Scotch towns the chemists' shops are open all Sunday. No; if experience goes for anything, it is clearly enough proven that by halving the licences you do not halve the drunkenness.

It is odd how often the obvious solution of a difficulty seems to elude the eye. There are certain puzzle-pictures in which you are required "to find the tiger," and after gazing for a quarter of an hour or so you will see the tiger positively leaping at you out of the picture. There was once on a time a firm of brewers whose business went down by leaps and bounds year by year. Meetings were called, the matter was argued, the most elaborate financial reasons for the downfall were given; but no one even hinted that the taste of the beer might conceivably have something to do with the trouble. And, in the same way, no one seems to have speculated on the possibility that the drink mania—the drink disease—is very largely to be accounted for by the infamous and abominable poisons which, in the words of Hardy, disgrace the name of "stimilient." There have always been drunkards, there always will be, just as there will always be scattered cases of plague and leprosy; but it is to be noted that drunkenness—the disease, the mania, the national evil—is a thing of modern growth, coincident with the free vending of every kind of venomous liquor under specious designations such as beer and whiskey. Let all this poisoning of the populace be absolutely and entirely forbidden; let beer be solely made of malt and hops; let whiskey be the product of malted barley, distilled in a pot still, with a Government guarantee of sufficient age; let it be as easy (on payment of a licence) to open a tavern as to open a sweet-shop—well, neither the brewers nor the teetotalers would be pleased, but the benefit to the public would be immense. And the solution of the problem would be advanced still more if the duty on beer were very much diminished, and the duty on spirits were largely increased. Whiskey is a Highlander's necessity, perhaps; but it is an Englishman's luxury, and they who desire luxuries may fairly be called upon to pay for them. Here, then, are the outlines of THE ACADEMY's Licensing Bill, which will, no doubt, become law when honesty and common sense prove stronger than the dividend-hunters and the furies of an insensate Manicheism—in other words, à la venue des Cocqigruës.

The most interesting article in the March number of The New Quarterly is a study by Mr. Clutton-Brock on the causes of failure and success in "Prometheus Unbound." We cannot subscribe to his conclusions unreservedly, but he has much to say of a thoughtful and suggestive order (and naturally avoids the obstructive flood of parallel passages from other poets which characterises the writing of critics of another school). Mr. Clutton-Brock's thesis is that the poet's form is imposed upon him by his public, and that this constitutes the life of his form. He gives Keats's appreciation of the fact that the form of "Hyperion" had ceased to interest his contemporaries as the reason why he gave up writing that poem. Mr. Clutton-Brock judges that Shelley never arrived at a full consciousness of these difficulties. As he observes justly, it was impossible for "Prometheus Unbound" to be wholly successful as a drama, because there are no characters in it, "but only forces and voices," and again, because though his "intellect could concern itself with political processes, . . . his imagination could not be fired by them." Shelley, indeed, recognised that the "essence" of this poem "was not action . . . but the expression of emotions caused by certain events that were left obscure."

Returning to the question generally propounded by Edgar Allen Poe, Mr. Clutton-Brock proceeds to consider "whether 'Prometheus Unbound' has any real form at all, or whether the plot is only a pretext for a number of separate poems." "The great value of form in a work of art is," says Mr. Clutton-Brock, "that it gives a cumulative power to all the parts of that work." He well compares the form of Shelley's poem rather to that of a symphony than of a drama, also calling it "one extended and diversified lyric," and expressing his doubt "whether any poet except Shelley ever experienced an emotion so comprehensive and persistent." Expressing what we take to be Mr. Clutton-Brock's meaning, we would slightly alter his expression, for the purposes of this note, and describe the emotion of the poem as progressing by accumulation rather than by development; for he refers in one passage to a "development of emotion." There is a good deal more of sensitive criticism in Mr. Clutton-Brock's article, but we have said enough to indicate his line of vision.

We have received two very attractive "Winchester Charts of Italian Painters," compiled by M. J. R.—the first, "Schools of Florence, Umbria, and Siena," lithographed by Messrs. Warren, of Winchester, and the second, "Painters of North Italy," published by Messrs. Mansell. They present at a glance, in a species of genealogical tree, distinctly printed in different colours, and mounted on thin canvas, the main body of Italian painting, with the influences which formed each painter. Tables of contemporaneous events and of painters of foreign schools help to fix the dates on the memory. The trees and the short notes are added in convenient corners, based on the criticism of Mr. Berenson. A feature of the charts is their attractive covers, which consist of well-printed chromo-lithograph facsimiles of two celebrated bindings. The first represents the exquisite twelfth-century Byzantine ivory covers of a Psalter, which were probably executed for Melisenda, Queen-consort of Jerusalem (1131). The second is a copy of the tooled-leather Venetian binding to the "Hynerotomachia" of Polyphilus, now in the British Museum. The latter especially does Messrs. Mansell much credit. It is very cunningly reproduced, even to the extent of a suggestion of a slight "tack" belonging to old leather. We fully endorse the opinion of a writer in these pages on the value of ocular demonstration in impressing information on the memory, and if these charts are as correctly drawn up as they are attractively produced they ought to be very serviceable to all amateurs of Italian painting. As the compiler points out, plenty of space is left for the insertion of the names of painters which have been omitted, an arrangement which will make the charts all the more useful.

We have loyally supported the Stage Society, which, now that the Court management has practically ceased to exist, is the chief cradle of the drama in England. But the production at the Haymarket last Sunday evening strained the loyalty of ourselves and a great many members of the Society to the breaking-point. The Stage Society was not founded for the production of half-witted plays about half-witted people, which could only be represented by half-witted actors. Though Mr. John Hare and Mr. France did their best to conceal their intelligence, all the artists naturally failed to be intelligible; and this is, of course, greatly to their credit. The Committee of Management made a very great mistake in producing the play, thereby laying itself open to the charge of having done so purely because it was prohibited by Mr. Redford. It is impossible to suggest any other reason for its production, and it would be interesting to learn what merits that able body found in it.

In response to a somewhat jejune note on woodcuts in our issue of April 4th, we have received a copy of a new magazine, The Mask, which appeared for the first time in March, and had escaped our notice. The Mask describes itself as "a Monthly Journal of the Art of the Theatre: illustrated with wood-engravings, lithographs, etchings, &c." Its publishing office is in Florence, where it can be obtained for one shilling a month, also apparently from the London agent, Mr. D. J. Rider, 36 St. Martin's Court, Charing Cross, who informs us that "It is the intention of the editor to have the paper illustrated principally with woodcuts." The first number is mainly devoted to Mr. Gordon Craig. Most of the articles are either written or illustrated with woodcuts by him or are about him. The best of the woodcuts is on the cover. We confess that we are more interested in Mr. Craig as an artist of stage décor. An article by Mr. Edward Hutton on "The Real Drama in Spain," and "A Note on Masks" by Mr. John Balance are of interest. Of greater value is an extract from a learned letter by Mr. Herbert Horne on the provenance of the wonderful and well-known figure of a geometrised man, which is reproduced on the first page of the number.

Mr. Horne points out that the reproduction is made from the "Vitruvio, in volgar lingua reportato" (printed in Perugia in 1531), by Caporali, who took it from Caesariano's translation of Vitruvius, printed at Como in 1525. Mr. Horne's judgment is: "That the design is Lionardesque (that indirectly it was derived from Lionardo) there can be no doubt." He also supplies the description of the figure inscribed on Caesariano's version: "Humani corporis mensura et ab eo omnes symmetrias enrythmias et proportionis geometrico schemate invenire ut adest figura." As to Caesariano's explanation of the cut, even Mr. Horne admits that it is "terribly abstruse." The figure is so striking that it alone would make the magazine worth its shilling.

There is also an attractive article, with reproductions, consisting of a treatise "upon the construction of a theatre in wood: upon scenery and the different contrivances for lighting the scene," extracted from Sebastiano Serlio's book on architecture, published at Bologna in 1560. It is well translated, and contains copious extracts in the original Italian. The two plates of designs for the comic and the tragic scene are particularly interesting. The tragic scene especially marks the purpose for which the bizarre pen and water-colour designs of certain rather obscure Italian artists were executed. These are not often met with in England.

These two articles mark the object of The Mask, which is floridly announced thus:

Not assist in the so-called reform of the modern Theatre (for reform is now too late), not to advance theories which have not been already tested, but to announce the existence of a vitality which already begins to reveal itself in a beautiful and definite form based upon an ancient and noble tradition. The Mask represents the Theatre of the Future [which] necessarily embraces all that has to do with the Theatre of the Past. The hope of the Theatre of the Future is rooted deep in the fulfilment of the Theatre of the Past.

The type in which the magazine is printed is agreeable in form, but trying to the eyes. If many of the intending contributors are able to exercise any measure of the charm of one of them—Miss Ellen Terry—the success of the undertaking should be indeed assured.

Mr. Robert Blackie has been writing to the papers indignantly protesting against a statement which has been publicly made that the National Liberal Club is one of the biggest drinking-places in the world. He says:

I beg to give this statement an unqualified denial, and unhesitatingly state we have in this club a large percentage of abstainers, and less alcoholic drink consumed per head per member than any similar club. We regret to have to contradict Mr. Blackie quite flatly and categorically. It is perfectly true that the National Liberal Club is one of the largest drinking-places in the world. And if, as Mr. Blackie says, there is a large percentage of abstainers—and we don't doubt it for a moment—that only proves that the other members who are not abstainers make up for the abstainers. Unlike Mr. Blackie, we do not make statements of this kind without supporting them by proofs. In the year 1905 the National Liberal Club made a clear profit of £390. The receipts from the sale of provisions, wines, spirits, beer, stouts, cigars, and cards amounted to £33,183. The cost was £24,480, so the profit in this department was £8,703. By analysing the item "stock in hand," £10,048, and finding that wines, spirits, beers, and mineral waters made £9,701 of that amount, it may be concluded that nine-tenths of the profit of £8,703 comes from this source. This means, of course, that the National Liberal Club subsists on the profit which it makes out of the trade in liquor. We are indebted for these figures to Mr. T. W. H. Crosland's wise, witty, and valuable book, "The Beautiful Teetotaler," but we have also taken care to verify their accuracy. The figures were given in public by a Member of Parliament. We challenge Mr. Blackie to repeat his statement in face of these figures.

THE JOURNEY

All day he drowzes by the sail
 With dreams of her, and all night long
 The broken waters are at song
 Of how she lingers, wild and pale,
 When all the temple lights are dumb,
 And weaves her spells to make him come.

The wide sea traversed, he will stand
 With straining eyes, until the shoul
 Green water from the prow shall roll
 Upon the yellow strip of sand—
 Searching some fern-bid tangled way
 Into the forest old and grey.

Then he will leap upon the shore,
 And cast one look up at the sun,
 Over his loosened locks will run
 The dawn breeze, and a bird will pour
 Its rapture out to make life seem Too sweet to leave for such a dream.

But all the swifter will he go Through the pale, scattered asphodels,
 Down mote-hung dusk of olive dells,
 To where the ancient basins throw
 Fleet threads of blue and trembling zones
 Of gold upon the temple stones.

There noon keeps just a twilight trace ;
 'Twixt love and hate, and death and birth,
 No man may choose ; nor sobs nor mirth
 May enter in that haunted place.
 All day the fountain sphinx lets drip
 Slow drops of silence from her lip.

To hold the porch-roof slender girls
 Of milk-white marble stand arow ;
 Doubt never blurs a single brow,
 And never the noon's faintness curls
 From their expectant hush of pride
 The lips the god has glorified.

But these things he will barely view,
 Or if he stay to heed them, still
 But as the lark the lights that spill
 From out the sun it soars unto,
 Where, past the splendours and the heats,
 The sun's heart's self for ever beats.

For wide the brazen doors will swing
 Soon as his sandals touch the pave ;
 The anxious light inside will wave
 And tremble to a lunar ring
 About the form that lieth prone
 Before the dreadful altar-stone.

She will not look, or speak, or stir,
 But with drowned lips and cheeks death-white
 Will lie amid the pool of light,
 Until, grown faint with thirst of her,
 He shall bow down his face and sink
 Breathless beneath the eddying brink.

Then a swift music will begin,
 And as the brazen doors shut slow,
 There will be hurrying to and fro,
 And lights and calls and silver din,
 While through the star-freaked swirl of air
 The god's sweet cruel eyes will stare.

Shakespeare's Legal Maxims. By WILLIAM LOWES RUSHTON. (Liverpool: Young.)

Shakespeare's Use of the Supernatural. By J. PAUL S. R. GIBSON. (Cambridge: Deighton Bell; London: George Bell, 3s. 6d. net.)

THE first four volumes on our list are items in an admirably-planned Shakespeare Library recently undertaken by Messrs. Chatto and Windus, a scheme which includes an "old spelling Shakespeare," the "Shakespeare's England," to which "Laneham's Letter" and the "Rogues and Vagabonds" belong; and the "Shakespeare Classics," among them the works of Greene and Arthur Brooke in the list above. The general editor is Dr. Gollancz; but the moving spirit at present is evidently Dr. Furnivall, that noble old scholar who touches nothing without making it surprisingly interesting, and whose boisterous enthusiasm for English literature gives him a pleasure even in "The Historians' History of the World," and is more infectious than the schoolboy's joy in cricket or the woman's in new hats. Look at him over Laneham's Letters! What are the facts? Robert Laneham was a London mercer, and (like his editor) "a most amusing, rollicking chap." He went to Kenilworth to see the great entertainment given by Leicester to Elizabeth in the summer of 1575. On one of the nineteen days the men of Coventry revived their "old storiall sheaw," the Hock-Tuesday play; and at the head of them marched a friend of Laneham's—one Captain Cox. Now Captain Cox enjoyed the rare distinction in those days of owning a library; and Laneham, being, as we have said, something of a Furnivall himself, dashes off from the Hock-Tuesday play to give some account of Captain Cox's library. It was, indeed, a most interesting library, containing many things that modern students would give one eye to have a look at. At any rate, it is Dr. Furnivall's chance. And as Appendix to Laneham's little letter we have three times as many pages, and more, of right Furnivallesque comment, description, criticism, and detail about Captain Cox's books and ballads, written in a style that varies between Carlyle, the British Museum Catalogue, and the cricket reports in the Sportsman. And a great treat it all is for the student of old literature, the bibliographer, and the mere man. Crammed with learning, bubbling over with enthusiasm, and deliciously fresh in style and spirit, it is a pure delight:

Mr. ——— doesn't know much about Early English, but his book may be handy to many who can't get at the original.

Our pity for Mr. ——— (who is probably dead, for that note on his work was originally published nearly forty years ago) cannot blind us to the advantages of Dr. Furnivall's style.

Laneham's letter has been for many years inseparable from Dr. Furnivall and Captain Cox, but there is one other thing which has kept it alive. It is the locus classicus for the Hock-Tuesday play in which Captain Cox took part. The play was, even in Elizabeth's days, not a survival, but a revival. It had been "woont too bee plaid in oor Citee yeerely," but was "noow of late laid dooun . . . by the zeal of certain theyr Preacherz, men . . . sumwhat too sour in preaching away theyr pastime"—interfering Puritans, of course, who hated all innocent merriment. Tradition had it that the play was instituted to commemorate the massacre of the Danes by King Ethelred on St. Brice's Night (November 13th), 1002, or the national deliverance from the Danish usurpation by the sudden death of Hardicanute at the accession of St. Edward the Confessor. The game consisted in a fight, with many evolutions, between the Danish "launsknights on horsbak" and the English, with alder-poles in their hands. At the end the Danes were defeated, and led away captive by the English women. Tradition is probably wrong. Folklorists see in the Hock-Tuesday game the same origin as they see in hockey and football, and the Haxey Hood in Lincolnshire, and such children's games as "Oranges and Lemons"—the attempt to win from rivals some part (in the case of hockey and football, the head) of the sacrificial victim, which, buried in the fields, may bring fertility during the coming year. That was what the men of Coventry did—though they knew it not and supposed their game to date from the fifteenth century—on Hock Tuesday, the Tuesday following the second Sunday after Easter. And there might be some excuse for the "sour Preacherz" too, if only we could suppose them aware that it was a pagan custom they put down. Another point of interest is that the revival before Elizabeth was one of the last flickers of the amateur dramatic performer, who was finally snuffed out by the victorious professional in the great days of the English drama.

"Rogues and Vagabonds" is another delightful, Furnivallian book, which the editor produced originally in 1869. It consists of Awdeley's "Fraternitie of Vagabondes" (1561), Harman's "Caueat" (1566), and certain plagiarisms of both works; and one of Dr. Furnivall's bibliographical achievements is to show that Awdeley was the first, not the second, in the field. Both Awdeley and Harman describe the rogues and vagabonds, male and female, the "rowsey, ragged rabblement of rakehells," which the dissolution of the monasteries and the economic conditions of the time, and, let us add, a truly English love of not being bothered or "mothered," let loose on the country-side and in the streets. Good company they are. The account of them inspires us with a longing to make the acquaintance of some of these "roges"—Mr. Waren, say, or Humfrey Warde—whose names are perpetuated by Harman, and of their attendant "mortes," "doxies," and other female companions, graduates in the thieves' strict orders of precedence. Harman in particular is worth studying. He is an admirable teller of stories, and he has one which would not disgrace a Nuremberg Schembartlaufen, a French puy, or the Wife of Bath. It is, indeed, one of the drollest fescennine stories in print. And the whole picture of the villainous, gay, free crew is vastly refreshing in these days of public or municipal interference with private liberty—when they want to send the gypsy children to school.

In the "Shakespeare Classics" we are on more serious, though not perhaps more important ground. Shakespeare—as all but critics of the Coleridge-Bradley order have come to realise—was the master-plagiarist. He took his materials where he found them, and showed himself Shakespeare in the way he used them. Nihil teligit—but we need not continue the misquotation which has forced its false Latin on the unscholarly world of Fleet Street. Read Arthur Brooke's lumbering, wobbling (we feel sure that Dr. Furnivall has used that word somewhere, though we cannot now trace the passage) poem of "Romeus and Juliet," and compare it with Romeo and Juliet. Even if some one discovered the other lost poem or play which Mr. de Wulf Fuller recently established as the original of the Dutch play on the subject, and in part of Shakespeare's play as well, the comparison would only help to prove all over again that Shakespeare could borrow, and borrow and be a creator. Greene's "Pandosto" we are glad to have for its own sake, no less than for that of "The Winter's Tale," for Greene, among those earlier University men who came to transform our literature, is one of the most interesting and delightful. Both volumes are ably edited, especially the "Romeus and Juliet," which has a model introduction.

Messrs. Harrap have conceived the happy thought of issuing their admirable reprint of the First Folio (edited two years ago by Charlotte Porter and H. A. Clarke) in separate volumes, with new introduction, notes, and so forth by Professor W. H. Hudson. Mr. Hudson is one of the best of our popular lecturers on literature. He adopts a very sensible view of Shakespeare, which appears clearly, for instance, in his remarks on the pedagogic theory in "Loves Labour's Lost," and the little volumes are thoroughly attractive and sound.

We are glad also to welcome a reprint of Mr. Rushton's valuable little illustration of Shakespeare's knowledge of the law by the quotation of legal maxims, together with the passages clearly founded on them. There are some annoying misprints in the Latin, and Mr. Rushton has not made as clear as he doubtless wished the exact story of the misprision and confusion which have given his book a rather strange history; but its substance is of great service. Finally, Mr. Gibson publishes the essay on Shakespeare's Use of the Supernatural, which won the Harness Prize at Cambridge last year. He would not wish it to be taken, no doubt, as a piece of profound criticism; but it usefully collects and arranges all the passages in which Shakespeare deals with fairies, ghosts, witches, and so forth. He should not have omitted such important ghost-plays as Chapman's Bussy D'Ambois and The Revenge of Bussy D'Ambois from his comparison of Shakespeare's ghosts and devils with those of other contemporary dramatists; but that part of the work is, on the whole, well done, and the book shows sense as well as care.

THE FATHERS OF OIL-PAINTING AND THEIR CHRONICLER

Hubert and John Van Eyck: their Life and Work. By W. H. JAMES WEALE. With Photogravure Plates and other Illustrations, many Reproduced for the first time. (John Lane, £5 5s.)

THE great altar-piece of Ghent, representing the Adoration of the Lamb, with its twenty-three attendant pictures is, if the words be strictly understood, the most amazing monument of oil-painting that exists. It is, perhaps, of all the great pictures of the world the best known to the general public in England, both by reason of the proximity of Ghent, and also through the colour reproductions of the old Arundel Society and a host of others. The knowledge that it was the work of two brothers, Hubert and John Van Eyck, whose united lives lasted from about 1365 to 1441, that they invented oil-painting, and that this was their first and most important work, is quite sufficiently accurate for the purposes of the public. It merely needs reminding when it visits Ghent, that the four central panels only of those which it sees in the little chapel in the Cathedral are the actual work of the Van Eycks; all the rest are inferior copies. The originals of these now hang in the Royal Gallery of Berlin, with the exception of the Adam and the Eve, which hang in that of Brussels. The work of the two brothers cannot therefore be seen at once in its entirety. The portrait of John Arnolfini and his wife attracts, by its brilliancy, its minuteness of detail and its lifelikeness, the least observant visitor to the National Gallery. Every one knows that it was painted by the younger brother John. Nearly as well known to every student of art is the name of Mr. W. H. James Weale. Since before 1859, when he published an archæological guide-book, he has devoted his life to the elucidation of the fifteenth-century art of the Netherlands. No one has brought more patience, enthusiasm, and critical acumen to bear upon that difficult subject. Even now, at the age of seventy-five, with his characteristic courage, he bids us hope in the "Foreword" to his handsome book, that :

He may yet issue similar volumes on Petrus Christus, Hugh Van der Goes, and Roger De la Pasture [Roger Van der Weyden].

But we must for the moment regard his present volume as, at least in form, the magnum opus of his life. Critics approach to write of it reluctantly. We should like to express our congratulations to Mr. Weale in a chorus of praise. But he asks in his "Foreword" for criticism, not panegyric, and he, if any writer, is entitled to judgment in accordance with his avowed object :

Should any . . . omission be remarked, he will feel greatly obliged by his attention being called to it. He particularly wishes those who may consult this work to remember that it has no pretensions to literary merit, the author's aim being simply to provide those who, in the future, may attempt to write the history of the school of painting in the Low Countries in the fifteenth century with as complete a guide as possible to all that has been published concerning its founders up to the present date.

The late exhibition at Bruges stimulated valuable criticism on the whole subject. In England alone, that safest and most comprehensive of critics Mr. Claude Phillips has written on the Van Eycks particularly, with Mr. Roger Fry, who has now, alas ! to "voice" America, and another writer always conspicuous for fine natural taste—Sir Martin Conway. This raises for us another difficulty ; and there is a third. Youth is knocking at Mr. Weale's door, very critical, very learned, and as appreciative of Mr. Weale's immense services as the rest of us. Elisha's shoulders are already broad enough to wear the master's mantle. Our third difficulty has been the question whether we should wait and risk the duty of disloyalty to the succession, or deal with Mr. Weale's book in haste and risk being torn in pieces afterwards. We personally chose the first course, and are now cast on another dilemma. We must either skirt the subject, as we have been doing, or echo Mr. Eric Maclagan's admirable and exhaustive article in the February number of the Burlington Magazine, as we now intend doing to some extent, without further acknowledgment.

After the "Foreword," from which we have quoted, Mr. Weale gives a "Chronology," comprising the years 1422 to 1441, the year of John Van Eyck's death, noting the ascertained events in the lives of both brothers, and public events closely connected with John's. The Documents on which this list is based follow, mainly transcribed in extenso. These are so collected, and one, Mr. Weale tells us, is here printed, for the first time. Next comes a Bibliography, first, of Manuscripts and Early Printed Books from about 1430 to 1795 ; secondly, of Later Books on the Biography and Art of the Van Eycks, from 1753 to 1907 ; and thirdly, of books on their Discoveries and Technique, from 1678 to 1907. Next comes a Biography, necessarily very short, of Hubert, and a separate one, much longer, of John. The main section of the book, "Paintings," is divided into chapters on The Adoration of the Lamb ; on paintings by John ; on those attributed to either brother or both ; on those that have been lost ; and General Observations. Some six pages of Addenda, and a general Index close the book.

The main question concerning the Van Eycks is the discrimination between their works, and the main ground of dispute is, of course, the great altar-piece at Ghent. Until the almost simultaneous discovery in 1823 of a manuscript containing four lines said to have been inscribed on the frame, and of those lines themselves which state that Hubert "inceptit" and John "perfecit" the picture, it may be roughly stated that the whole body of their paintings were ascribed to John. Since then the claims of Hubert have been constantly growing. The more enthusiastic Hubertines are represented in England by Mr. Claude Phillips, and in perhaps a rather less degree by Mr. Roger Fry. Mr. Weale has expressed himself equally strongly in former works, in the same sense, assigning in the altar-piece the Adam and the Eve only to John. He now reaffirms this decision. There is no reason to suppose that he has changed his opinion as regards other works, but in the present volume, in accordance with his design, he expresses himself guardedly, generally merely placing references to his own works with those of other writers in the list which he prints after his description of each picture. On the other side, Mr. Eric Maclagan is a pronounced Johannist. As regards the altar-piece, the question seems to us, in company with so great an authority as Dr. Bode, to be at present irresoluble ; and since the altar-piece is the only work in which the participation of Hubert is proved by extrinsic evidence, his authorship of other works cannot be ascertained until we know more surely what the essentials of his peculiar style were. At present there is much arguing in a circle. Intrinsically, the differences in style now visible in the altar-piece seem to us equally compatible with the development in the work of one man during the years in which it was in progress, as with the work of two men in such intimate association as were the two brothers. For it must be remembered that Hubert was considerably older than John and must, until his death at least, in 1426, have exercised a direct influence over John's development. Nevertheless there are diverse elements to be found in the body of painting recognised as Van Eyckian, which may be called Hubertan and Johannine, and the Hubertan element seems to us most absent from the majority, but not from quite all of the eleven works included by Mr. Weale in the chapter of his book entitled "Paintings by John Van Eyck." On the other hand, we do not find the Johannine elements sufficiently pronounced in any part of the altar-piece to attribute it mainly to John, unless it be in the portraits of the donors and the Adam and Eve. Among the works ascribed to one or the other of the brothers, we cannot suppose that any of the versions of The Vision of St. Francis were painted by either of them. Of the other works included under this category, The Portrait of a Goldsmith, The Portrait of an Esquire of St. Anthony, the Dresden Madonna and Child Enthroned, the Staedel Madonna and Child, and the portraits of Arnolfini, and of Sir Baldwin de Lannoy, seem to us to exhibit the Johannine elements most, in varying degrees.

We have little reluctance in expressing these general opinions, and let us assure our readers who have most reverence for authority that they may do likewise with safety, because highly competent critics have confidently assigned nearly every panel of the Ghent altar-piece to both brothers exclusively. As to the other works, the voice of authority is still more polyphonous. The famous Fountain of Living Water at Madrid, of which the original disappeared before 1815, is nevertheless attributed by Madrazo to John ; Kaemmerer thinks that it may have been painted by Christus ; Bode states that it was not, but agrees with Seeck that it is probably a copy of a picture by Hubert ; while Hymans says that Van Eyck can have had nothing to do with either its composition or execution.

Not the least valuable part of Mr. Weale's book for purposes of identification is its numerous illustrations, over forty in photogravure and nearly one hundred in half-tone. We would say one word on the form of the book. It is evident that the number of books such as this, so valuable to students, must decrease unless they can be made to pay.

We therefore make the following suggestion, distinctly subject to that requirement. We would ask publishers to consider whether the text could not be issued in a more portable form, with sufficient margin for annotation, accompanied by the illustrations loose in a separate portfolio. If necessary, such an addition might be issued concurrently with the present volumes, even at the same price. At present, in order that the illustrations may be on a sufficient scale to show detail, the volumes become so bulky that they can neither be carried nor read conveniently. Since the pictures which these books collect are scattered throughout Europe and even in America, students are deprived of the use of their copy precisely when they most require it for reference.

HELLAS IN A HURRY

Greece and the Aegean Islands. By PHILIP S. MARDEN. (Constable, 12s. 6d. net.)

OF all the light-hearted yet solemn, merry yet conscientious people in the world, the American in Greek lands is the most lavishly endowed with these contradictory qualities. His eyes are everywhere, his reminiscences of classical story are ever ready to bubble forth, his inaccuracy is as alarming as his sentimentality. And, in the representative person of Mr. Marden, he writes a book which brings back, almost poignantly, the light and the life, the humour and the pathos of Greek travel, to those for whom Hellenic days are, for the time, out of reach. How well we remember that American enthusiast, endowed as he was with a buoyant persistency which more than made up for a total lack of the speech of modern Greece: the kind of American, who, though a grave, grey-bearded professor in some strangely-named Transatlantic University, could find it in his child-like heart to weep aloud with joy at the sight of the home of Odysseus; who, in the guise of a business man ordinarily shrewd, could allow himself to be outrageously swindled by some peripatetic vendor of sham antiquities, for the sheer joy of carrying off to "my country" some shameless forgery of an "Attic vase;" the young schoolmaster, who, covering half the world in a honeymoon that was a very debauch of sentimentality, could, with his no less sentimental bride, find his eyes dim with sympathy for those long-gone brides of death who still toy with their jewels in the Kerameikos. He is an engaging type whatever form he may take, and there is ever a schoolmaster and a Professor among his number. We have met many Americans in many lands, but in Greece they are nearly all alike in this one trait of overflowing, slipshod sentimentality.

We love them for it, and we welcome Mr. Marden's book for its revival of many pleasant hours and days spent in their company amid the scenes that he describes. There is not, we think, a single new fact in the book; it cannot be relied upon in matters of history and archaeology; it lays no claim to profundity of learning; even its observation of modern things is of the most slapdash order. For example, the prison at Athens, near the monastic station, is labelled "Old Church in Turkish Quarters, Athens." True, the prison was once a mosque, and that, no doubt, is good enough. The Kapnikarea Church, one of the most striking churches in Athens, is robbed of its name, and the fact that the making of a new road was not enough to cause the uprooting of an old church seems to afford much amusement to the child of a new world.

He is sweeping in his epithets throughout, and, perhaps, limited in his opportunities for observation: for the trail of hasty travel is over all his writing. Otherwise we should resent such a collocation of words as "treeless Attica." Are the olive groves that surround Athens nothing? Have we not wandered for the best part of a day through the woods of Elatias, or the green thickets of Tatoï?

A little investigation, too, would soon have satisfied this hasty maker of a delightful book, that the fustanella is not "the old-time garb of the Greek." The loot of Epirus and the fancy of King Otho made it the "national costume" of Greece after the revolution, and that was not the day of "old-time Greece." Imagine Pericles in a petticoat, or Plato in pappoutzia!

But never mind. The flowering meads of the Branchidae have lingered in Mr. Marden's memory: woody Samos was a delight to him: and, most of all, scarred Santorini found its way into his heart. For that we can thank him: for to us Thera will always stand out as Nature's great paradox—a paradise upon the very lips of hell. And despite the shortcomings, stylistic or material, in which our hasty traveller's book abounds, we can honestly say that it reproduces the atmosphere and the scene of Greece and the Isles far more truly than many graver records of travel and observation in the same historic corner of the world.

AN EPOCH-MAKING BOOK

Discoveries in Hebrew, Gaelic, Gothic, Anglo-Saxon, Latin, Basque, and other Caucasian Languages. By A. E. DRAKE, Sc.M., M.D., Ph.D. (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner, and Co.)

It cannot be disguised that this is a most ambitious work, and claims, in fact, to be an "epoch-making" book. The author takes up once more the old question as to the possible relationship between Semitic and Aryan, with the express object of "showing fundamental kinship of the Aryan tongues and of Basque with the Semitic tongues." The net result, however, is not so much that there is a cognate relationship between them, as to show, for all practical purposes, that the Hebrew is really the original whence a great part of the Aryan languages was borrowed. This is more clearly expressed in the postscript, where it is said that especial attention should be paid to "Gaelic, Anglo-Saxon, and Gothic," because:

These languages have changed least of the Aryan tongues since separating from ancestral Semitic.

The book contains, in fact, a list of 803 Hebrew roots; and a good idea as to the relative values of the various Aryan tongues can be obtained from the results. It appears that of all these the most valuable is Anglo-Saxon, which exhibits nearly 600 derivatives; next comes Gaelic, with over 450; next Gothic, with about 425 (only it must be remembered that the remains of Gothic are but scanty, or it would loom more largely); next Latin and Basque; and lastly Greek and Sanskrit. The Sanskrit derivatives are only 173, showing that it is the poorest and most corrupt of the whole set; in opposition to the preconceived notions of many.

The arrangement of the work is admirable. The system of transliteration adopted involves mathematical symbols that cannot easily be here introduced; but it is very simple and precise. Thus there are four letters denoted by h, but differently numbered—viz., alpha, he, cheth, and ain, and so on. It is perfectly easy to refer from these to Gesenius's Dictionary. As each root is numbered, we here refer in each case to the number where results will be found.

The author has no doubts, or but very few. He makes it clear that he is wholly opposed to the "etymologists," and that he looks upon the modern system of comparative philology as being quite inadequate. His new evidence will be "found to be abundant, unquestionable, and unequivocal."

Seeing that the results are "unquestionable," it is not for us to question them; we are humbly content to present them for consideration.

The leading idea of "etymologists" has certainly been to frame exact and rigid laws of phonetic change; and especially to exhibit the perfect harmony of the system of vowel-gradation which is so admirably preserved, for example, in the seven strong conjugations of Germanic. But all this is but lost labour, and may safely be neglected, because the system of triliteral roots practically assumes that the vowels are of no account at all. Neither do the consonants matter much; for the table on p. 34 shows at once that a Hebrew p appears in Anglo-Saxon as p, b, or f; and the same is true of the Hebrew b and v. All labials are, in fact, equivalent. Among the gutturals the range is still wider. The Hebrew h₂ and h₃ (he and cheth) appear in Anglo-Saxon as h, hw, w, c, or g; while kaph also appears as h, hw, w, c, g, or even as cw. The range of koph is precisely the same.

There was no original distinction between w and hw, nor between w on the one hand and c (k) on the other. The knowledge of these fundamental facts is obviously all clear gain. The liquids are nearly all interchangeable; at any rate, l appears in Anglo-Saxon as either l or r, and m and n both become m, n, or r indifferently.

Grimm's Law, as it is called, is really of no value. Just as the schoolboy, when asked whether the sun went round the earth, or the earth round the sun, impartially said that it was sometimes one and sometimes the other; so it is with this famous "sound-shifting." Sometimes the Lat. g became Eng. c, as in comparing L. ager with E. acre; but it might easily be the other way about, as in comparing L. capere with E. give, both being from the "Heb. qabal, to take, receive, accept" (647). Or the g may remain unaltered, as in comparing L. ager, sick, with A.-S. eglian, to ail, both being from the "Heb. h-l-h (cheth-l-he), to be weak, sick" (No. 246). An A.-S. b answers either to L. f, as in L. forare, E. bore (80), or to L. v, as in E. bread, L. vorare, to devour, from "Heb. barah, to eat," where h means he (112). The author further includes, under the last number, the Gk. bora, food; the Welsh bara, bread, seems to have escaped him. Brugmann and others are thus seen to be absurdly wrong in their treatment of the b in the Gk. bora as if it were a labialised velar g. They are equally wrong in connecting the Gk. bous, Lat. bos, and Gaelic bo with the E. cow; for they are all three from the "Heb. baqar, cattle, oxen;" No. 106. The E. cow, on the other hand, is from "Heb. gahah (gimel-ain-he), to low;" whence also "A.-S. cu, cow; L. ceva, a kind of small cow; L. vacca, a cow; Gaelic eigh, to cry, shout; L. voco, to call, vox, voice; Gk. iacho, to cry, shout." So that the cow is "the shouter;" No. 142. It is well explained that "the radical g has become c in L. ceva and v in L. vacca; radical ain has become v in L. ceva and cc in L. vacca." Two notes are appended; one is that "etymologists have not considered L. ceva cognate with L. vacca;" and the other is to the effect that "I do not feel certain that Gael. eigh, L. voco, belong to this entry." Neither do we.

Space fails us to give even a slight indication of the vast number of wholly new results given in this remarkable work. The merest statement of a few must suffice. Actual reference to the numbers given will supply the proof in each case.

The A.-S. gat, shortened from Goth. gailin, a kid, is closely allied to L. gutta, a drop; because both the kid and the drop are little (664). The c in L. creo, I create, and the g in Goth. aigan, to own, are identical in origin; though "etymologists have not considered Goth. aigan cognate with L. creo" (674). The A.-S. beon, "to be," only differs from A.-S. habban, "to have," in having lost radical h (he); and the same is true of L. fui in comparison with habeo (176). The E. tree explains the -ler in raf-ler and the -trum in L. ara-trum, a plough (236). The original sense of E. less, as the comparative of little, is given by the L. lassus, faint, tired (252). The E. hasel is far older in form than the L. corylus; it preserves the original h—i.e., chelh (263); and "etymologists consider the r in corylus to be from earlier s." For once, they are right. The L. vago, I wander, and quaero, I seek, are mere variants (273). Tree is the same word as with-y, all but the suffix; compare also L. vitis, the Basque adar, a branch, and the Basque ola, a pole of a hen-roost (236). Wolf is a variant of whelp (352). Naked is closely allied to night, from "Heb. nagad, to tell, declare, to exhibit, to show openly." So that night means "the revealer" (445). London appears in Gaelic as Lunnainn; from the Heb. lwn, to pass the night, lodge; it is a place where you can get lodgings for the night (384). We doubt whether justice has been done to the root qatal, to kill, slay (663). All that is obtained from it is the Gael. Gaidhcal, a Gael, which is entered here "in query, of course, as the real meaning of the word has long been forgotten." But we would remark that it is exactly preserved in the E. word kettle, with an obvious reference to 2 Kings iv. 40, "there is death in the pot."

We regret that want of space forbids us from doing justice to this great work. It is quite certain that it must be estimated in one or other of the only two possible ways—either it is the most important book on philology that has appeared of late years, or it is the most worthless. The author's methods are so clear and explicit that no moderate opinion is possible. The reader must decide for himself.

THE COMING STRUGGLE IN EASTERN ASIA

The Coming Struggle in Eastern Asia. By B. L. PUTNAM WEALE. (Macmillan and Co., 12s. 6d. net.)

THIS comprehensive volume is a warning to the world to prevent a Yellow Peril becoming a reality. It is admirably written and illustrated, and by consecutive evidence and closely-reasoned argument lays before us the economic and political conditions now existing as the result of the war which ended with the Peace of Portsmouth, and it contains a careful revaluation of the old forces in the Far Eastern situation.

The book is divided into three parts. Part I. deals with the Russian Empire in Asia, with a useful study of military conditions during and after the war; Part II.—the New Problem of Eastern Asia—deals with Russia's great rival, Japan; and in Part III. the wonderful and growing change in China receives careful examination, and certain aspects of the position in the Pacific—notably, the attitude of the United States—are clearly outlined. In Part I. Mr. Putnam Weale takes the reader on long journeys in Russian Asia, and they are full of interest and of picturesque backing. First we go to Vladivostok, Queen of the Far East, then up the Ussuri Valley Railway to Khabarovsk, the seat of government of the Pacific provinces, and so, by water, the great River Amur, to Nicolaievsk, where at the mouth of the river and on the sea of Okhotsk (ice-bound half of the year) the Russian population exceeds the English population of any town in Asia. Two thousand miles of steaming up the Amur brings us to Stretensk, and so inhospitable are its banks that probably the Amur can never be more than a chain 2,000 miles long connecting Lake Baikal with the sea.

West of Lake Baikal a wonderful development is sketched from 1643, when the first Cossack expedition reached the Amur, until to-day. Here in the country ranged by Girghis Khan and his Tartars a Europe has sprung up in Asia, and it is urged that the true Eastern boundary of Russia is now Lake Baikal, and not the Ural.

Before leaving Russian spheres of interest the city of Harbin is passed, where two pioneers encamped in 1897 on bare veldt, and where now are 80,000 Russians and twice as many Chinese and Koreans. Harbin stands in the fertile valley of the Sungari, which can provide over three million pounds of flour a day—enough when the Peace of Portsmouth was signed to have rationed two million men with bread.

We are assured that the war has not lowered Russia's prestige with her Chinese neighbours, with whom Russians are on much better terms than are the Japanese, to whose sphere in Manchuria we now pass. Chang-tufu, the most northern Japanese station, is 113 miles south of Harbin. There we are in a new world, a world of Japanese activity, an activity which seeks to banish that of all other nations and to create a monopoly in everything. The open door, the equal opportunity, has not yet appeared to appeal to the busy occupiers.

Part II. opens with an admirable digest of the two prevailing lines of thought about Japan and her people—an optimistic idealism, or suspicious pessimism. The author seems to suspect that this gifted people:

Hide in secret depths an ardent desire for the hegemony of Asia, and to this end are quietly and steadily planning the downfall of the Caucasian in the Far East (p. 325).

We are given a sketch of the dynastic and political history of the country from the restoration of the power of the Mikado in 1868 to the grant of a Constitution in 1889—but a Constitution which leaves to the Emperor such Imperial powers that he can govern the country for months without the aid of Parliament. Three chapters are devoted to Finance, Industry and Commerce, and the Army and Navy, and Japan is represented to be working up to the next climax of her history—1915—when her treaty with England will expire. Ample tables analyse details of revenue and expenditure, of trade and commerce. The progress of trade is great, but, with greatly-increasing expenditure on armament and with a huge debt-charge, Mr. Putnam Weale estimates that the development of Japan's export trade is of paramount importance for the ultimate security of the interest on the money she has borrowed.

The history of the Japanese Army, from the introduction of conscription in 1871 to the hour of its trial in 1904, is very interesting. When war with Russia began there were actually available 750,000 men. So elastic and progressive is the military system that in a few years Japan will dispose of double that number, and in 1915 of more than two million men. Half a chapter is devoted to the Japanese Navy, which this year will be three times as strong as it was in 1904, and for which in the 1907 Budget there has been provided an immense building programme. The first two battleships designed and built in Japanese yards will be, when completed, the two most powerful warships in the world. And others have been laid down still larger and more formidable. Mr. Putnam Weale insists that such a Navy is not needed for defence. The Russian Pacific squadron has disappeared. Japan must, then, be preparing to meet some new flag in Far Eastern waters. He concludes that it is the flag of the United States.

Then follows a chapter on Greater Japan:

The possible Japan of to-morrow—which is only as unlikely to arise as would the British Empire of to-day have appeared to people living in the eighteenth century (p. 500).

In Korea, Manchuria, and Formosa this Greater Japan is in the making, and an overspill of population is encouraged into all adjacent lands, fostering the growth of Japanese interests and spreading this one idea—the restriction of all development work inspired by Europeans, because all such influences (in China, for instance) will have to be overcome by a Power which aims at substituting in the future its own culture, its own interests, its own system.

Part III. deals with the later development of China. At last a real attempt is being made to prepare China for a Constitution—to educate the people to rule themselves. And as the basis of a reformed Empire there seems some prospect now of an efficient Army being called into being. Funds have been provided for a cadet school where 1,000 boys will be trained, and military education for 4,000 cadets will soon be provided. Arsenals are being organised (a fair field for British enterprise). As for the Navy, China's present effort is limited to policing her great rivers, but she has many cadets (officer and seaman) on board British warships who may form the nucleus of a Navy of the future. Railways need vast development. China has 5,000 miles of railway made or in the making—20,000 miles are wanting. But for a constructive policy revenue is required, and Mr. Putnam Weale urges the Powers to follow England, and to sign the new Chinese commercial treaties which will secure to Peking a revenue independent of the Provincial Viceroy.

The Chinese are the most honourable of all commercial people, and England's name is good with them and our trade position is fairly upheld. But again our allies, the Japanese, are competing very actively, and are doing their utmost to supplant us in the richest of all fields—the Yangtse Valley—our own special sphere of influence. In railway construction and mining the Chinese are stubborn and exclusive. And this Chinese stubbornness is welcomed by Mr. Putnam Weale, whose fear of the immediate future is a collision between the United States and Japan. With Russia profiting by the opportunity thus offered of taking her revenge, and the consequent summons which England would get to go to the help of her ally, he welcomes the American fleet to their Pacific seaboard; for the two only barriers to the domination of Japan which he trusts are (1) Chinese stubbornness and Chinese rivalry ("which may suffice until the completion of the Panama Canal"), and (2) a naval combination of all Anglo-Saxondom. We hope that the friendly invitation proffered by Japan to Admiral Evans's squadron to visit Yokohama may bring to Mr. Putnam Weale some measure of calm.

MRS. DEARMER'S NEW BOOK

To call Mrs. Dearmer's latest book ("The Alien Sisters," Smith Elder) a very good novel would be to give a very inadequate and, indeed, a misleading idea of it. It certainly is a good novel, in my humble opinion the best novel that has appeared for a very long time, but the word novel covers such a very large sphere of writing that it has a great vagueness. A novel may be a piece of comedy-writing with a dash of tragedy, or a tragedy with a dash of comedy. It may be a story of imaginary people going through certain adventures because the author chooses that they should. He tells you that A fell in love with B, and you are bound to believe it, it is the thing postulated. Being unused to reviewing novels, I feel that I am failing to make clear my meaning, and the only thing is to put it in another way. There are novels which never give you the opportunity of forgetting that you are reading a novel as you turn over their pages: they may be good or bad; if they are bad, there is nothing more to be said about them; if they are good, it is because there is pleasure to be got from the art of the writer and not from the novel itself. Such, for example, are the delightful novels of Jane Austen. They are really comedies of manners, the people who move in them are actors, puppets, and they have no real existence. However highly one may rate the art of this sort of novel-writing, it is not, I think, the highest.

It is very difficult in dealing with contemporary art in any of its branches to be absolutely certain that it is really great. Living in the midst of the whirl of artistic and inartistic production, it is surely almost impossible to see contemporary work in its absolute value. How can one view such work in its true proportion, and how measure it accurately? If Mrs. Dearmer were a poet I would venture with greater certainty (or, as my enemies would say, cocksureness) to make a definite assertion, for I happen to flatter myself (perhaps quite mistakenly) that I am an exceptionally good judge of poetry. When it comes to novels I don't flatter myself at all. I am reduced to that lamentable state of mind which finds voice in the time-honoured words of the typical philistine: "I know what I like." (All this, by the way, is sheer modesty, and does not proceed from a desire to "hedge.") I consider then that "The Alien Sisters" incontestably belongs to the sphere of the higher form of novel-writing, and even in that sphere I should place it very high. The strength of the book is that it is not a mere story, it is not a comedy of manners, though there are some very pretty comedy scenes in it; it is a book in which events happen and people do certain things because it is inevitable that they should. One feels instinctively and immediately after reading a few chapters that Mrs. Dearmer is one of those who realise in an exceptionally strong degree that all material life is controlled ceaselessly by spiritual forces, by forces of good and evil, by principalities and powers, by angels of light and darkness. In many senses it is a terrible book, terrible in its calm relentlessness. Mrs. Dearmer understands what so many writers of fiction forget, that tragedies in real life do not often happen in tragic scenes and settings. Life goes on to an accompaniment of laughter, of conversation, of trivialities, of breakfast, luncheon, and dinner; and under it all, unseen and slow, tragedy, splendid or sordid, winds to its inevitable catastrophe.

"The Alien Sisters" are two daughters of Sir Raymond Templeton: Rose, the daughter of his mistress, Rosalie de Winton, whom on his marriage he pensions off, and Ruth, the daughter of his beautiful and saintly wife, Elizabeth. Fate throws Hugh Templeton, the nephew and heir of Sir Raymond, into Rose's way. He is a fascinating, brilliant young man, extraordinarily good-looking and clever, absolutely unscrupulous (I don't think a man would have had the heart to make him quite such a scoundrel), and an epicure in vice, to the extent that in its sphere excess of any kind would never commend itself to him. He takes Rose away to live with him in a cottage in Cornwall, and then, going away on a visit to Templeton Manor, he meets his cousin Ruth, the other sister; the relationship between the sisters is, of course, at this stage, quite unknown to them or to any one else, except to Rosalie, Rose's mother, and her father. At Templeton, Hugh falls in love with and becomes engaged to Ruth, abandoning Rose as cynically as he had taken her. The story of the development of this simple but poignant situation must be left to the reader. I am not to spoil their pleasure in reading the book by "giving it away." I will only say that it is worked with tremendous power and emotional force, and with admirable artistic restraint. There are some wonderful studies of character in the book: Rosalie de Winton, Rose's mother, is a gem. Never have I read a more faithful and telling portrait of the worst type of lady who, to take refuge in French, is a leading light in la haute prostitution; it is both witty and terrible, and for sheer realistic comedy it would be difficult to beat the scene in the third chapter, when Rosalie tackles the servant girl who has announced her intention of leaving, and whom she blackmails into giving back her week's wages by threatening to give her in charge for stealing two lamb-cutlets. Mrs. Dearmer explains in the Preface that Rosalie is studied from life:

Perhaps it is as well (she writes) to state that Rosalie alone of my personages is drawn not from general, but particular, observation; her cruelties and meannesses merely reproduce the real actions of a woman whom chance once brought in my way. I witnessed myself the death of the over-affectionate dachshund, which is casually recounted by her to Lord Berkhamstead.

(Rosalie throws it out of a third-floor window into the street.) The fact that the character is studied from life does not detract from the extremely brilliant art of portraiture that Mrs. Dearmer has brought to bear on it. Rosalie will stand for a very long time in English literature as the supreme cocotte of modern fiction. I should not like to be misunderstood or to be suspected of the pharisaism of condemning or libelling a whole class. She is only typical of one sort of cocotte, and she is exactly that type of which it cannot be said that "she is what men have made her." The drawing of the character of Rose, the daughter of this horrible woman—a sweet, beautiful, tender drawing of a girl, who, cruelly wronged and afterwards degraded, is yet through it all lovely and lovable—is a masterpiece; she is necessarily so much the more interesting of the two sisters that Mrs. Dearmer has perhaps been more successful with her than with Ruth. At any rate, I must confess that I find it hard to imagine that any man of taste would have left her—at any rate so soon. The average man of the world's criticism of the character-drawing of Hugh Templeton would, I suppose, be that no man of his birth and breeding would be such a scoundrel as to leave a girl like Rose practically without money. "We may be immoral, but we pay," he might justly say. The answer is that Hugh Templeton is not necessarily to be regarded as typical of the whole of his class of sensualist any more than Rosalie is of hers. He is an exceptional scoundrel, that is all. But exceptional or not he is a convincing portrait. "The Alien Sisters" is a very great book, containing a very great moral purpose.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE SECRET TRIAL

BY ONE WHO KNOWS

[On Friday morning the Oxford crew rowed a secret trial. Nothing is known of their performance.—Daily Paper.]

"Old Blue" ought to have been able to take the joke in better part than he has done, even if they did invent a little ruse to get rid of him.—Daily Telegraph.]

A FEW days before last Saturday's race an event took place which we think it right to lay before our readers without further comment. The Government will, no doubt, know what to do when the facts narrated by THE ACADEMY come to their notice. We have never shrunk from revealing the shortcomings of other people, at any cost to ourselves; and it is not for us to estimate, on this occasion, the gratitude felt for our self-sacrificing candour by our astonished but determined readers.

Though a large number of the general public were on the towpath at the time, Mr. Muttletbury and Mr. Escombe, the well-known Cambridge coaches, threw discretion to the winds and bade the Light Blue Eight come out into the open where they could be seen. The boat was launched in broad daylight amid the murmurs of the bewildered Oxonians; and after a little natural hesitation the men came forward beneath all the blinding light that beats upon a University Crew. Among the first to surmount this pardonable timidity was Stuart, whose clarion tones of encouragement re-echoed from the Concrete Wall as he called on his gallant comrades to dash her through the foam.

The click of a hundred cameras rose above the roar of lead-pencils hurrying over cream-laid paper, as one reporter after another spied his helpless prey; and the peaceful atmosphere of that pleasant space of Putney waterside was rent by the remorseless ticking of a score of chronographs. Still Stuart stuck gamely to his task. Pale, but determined, Mr. Muttletbury held the launch upon her course, until both he and Mr. Escombe began to breathe a little freely in the more secluded waters near the milepost. The crew were eased.

A face once well known at Tattersall's rose from the rushes near the Craven Steps, and quickly disappeared, its features blanched with terror. The whirr of a powerful motor was heard soon afterwards, evidently making its way with all speed to the City. The Cambridge Eight moved slowly on.

Behind the wall of Harrod's the eagle eye of the junior mentor on the launch detected the flutter of some dark blue cloth. A low word, hissed from between Mr. Escombe's clenched teeth, was enough. The faithful Bill East knew his duty, and he did it. Swiftly the quiet ripples of the reach were cloven by the strong shoulders of the Royal Bargemaster, who had slipped silently and grimly into the stream. A short struggle on the bank ended in a stifled cry, and all was over. "No one shall know the dreadful secrets of the Cambridge style," muttered Mr. Muttletbury, as the launch swept on her way. "What?" said a cool but determined voice behind him: "No one? Ha! ha! you are observed." Beneath the rough but serviceable habiliments of Bossy Phelps a form stood motionless behind the startled coach. He might have remained unrecognised but for the instinctive twirl he just then gave the stiff moustachio which bristled upwards to his dauntless cheek-bones. "Your Majesty," said Mr. Muttletbury, with his usual ready tact, "Fear nothing, dread nought aboard this gallant ship. The torpedoes in her hold are not, believe me, for a Friendly Power." "'Tis well," replied his Imperial interlocutor; I have but one simple question, and I will land at Thornycroft's. Tweedmarch has offered to bet me three to one on Oxford.

Shall I take him?" For once the celebrated Cambridge heavyweight was speechless. His manly features, suffused with a dull purple, were turned away; his tongue refused its office. The launch drew up near the Doves, and the mysterious visitor landed, with the one cryptic farewell: "You shall see Berlin at Henley."

"At last," breathed Mr. Escombe, with very evident relief, as the Cambridge crew, followed by their devoted adherents on the towpath, armed to the teeth, paddled on with slow determination down the Devonshire meadows. As they neared Barnes Bridge a shadowy form might have been detected on the girders of that uncomely but indispensable structure. Around its neck were hung three phosphorescent stop-watches, a fourth was on the right foot, two more were firmly clenched in each hand; the strap of a pair of Zeiss glasses encircled its short but burly frame, and from a breast-pocket protruded the brass eye-piece of a nautical telescope. "You cannot escape me, gentlemen," said the shadow, merrily. "Oxford were out before you, and I have their time. Between friends, I may tell you it was 28 minutes 30 seconds, and the speed at which the timbers were immersed on passing Ashlone Road was 59. I had a cyclist concealed upon the balcony of the Thames Rowing Club, another in the swamps of Chiswick Eyot, a third astride upon the Stone at Mortlake. Each stopped his watch as the Crew went by, my own was started as they vanished in the distance. It was a simple task to re-unite my happy band of toilers in yon railway-wagon, add up their various totals, subtract the full strength of the tide at Greenwich, and arrive at the infallible conclusion I have just imparted to you. Sir, there are no flies on Oxford—or on me." He spoke and vanished. It was the ghost of old Ed. Plummer, who had left his daily task of clocking Charon on the Styx and visited our upper earth again as soon as tidings reached him that the Dark Blues were to do a secret trial.

The gloom of evening had fallen over Putney. The racing ship apparently reposed in peace upon her usual stools within the London boathouse. The oars apparently were rested in their usual place close by. The launch apparently was waiting at her usual station off the Hard. Suddenly the click of buttons upon thowls, the hoarse whisper of a coach's voice, the swish of blades through wind-swept water, broke on the silence of the coming night. A stranger paced the towpath anxiously, for he had lost his sense of humour and was looking for it everywhere. His ear was attracted by these unwonted sounds. He asked for information from a waterman. "Is that a foreign crew?" "No." "Americans?" "No." "Professionals?" "No." "Then what are they?" "A University crew, with dark blue on their blades." "Oh, rubbish!" said the stranger. "You can't take me in with a silly little joke like that."

THE ART OF DICKENS

DOES one admire the "Odyssey" chiefly (or even at all) because of the clever and consistent character-drawing it contains? Do we read it because Ulysses is so admirably depicted; an individuality and yet typically Greek, adventurous and yet cautious, a lover of the Sirens' Song and yet wise enough to stop the ears of the crew and to get himself tied to the mast, brave enough when bravery is necessary but never foolhardy? Well, I doubt very much whether we admire the "Odyssey" for any such reason; and so I should like to quarrel—quite mildly—with Mr. John Ayscough over his pleasant article called "Sotto Voce" in THE ACADEMY of two week's ago.

For Mr. Ayscough, in instituting his comparisons between Dickens, Thackeray, and Hardy, adopts in the main this matter of character-drawing as his great test and touchstone, and I think that he is unsound in his choice of a criterion; while, by the way, he does injustice to all the three great men that he names. To take the least important question first, is it just to say that the spots on a man's face were dearer to Thackeray than the man himself? Nay; let us go gently, but surely this will never pass? I have no extravagant admiration for Thackeray, but surely the performance of the task that he set himself is worthy of heartier commendation than this. The task in question seems to me by no means of the loftiest; it was simply the observation of the society about him with the keenest eyesight, the nicest accuracy, and then it was the task of combining all the mass of facts that had been gathered into some sort of a cosmos—say, into "Vanity Fair," into "The Newcomes," into "Pendennis." One admits, quite readily, that this task is by no means of the highest, that no message from the eternities ever reached Thackeray's ears, that he was never inspired to sing the inexpressive song, that neither dawn nor dusk made for him any sacrament of mystery, that the voice of the fairy birds never penetrated to his cosy and well-arranged study. But how well he did the work that he found at his hands, with what keenness, with what admirable talent, with what excellent good humour! I daresay Georgiana Farrer thought Mr. Thackeray a cynic; but Georgiana, with all respect to Mr. Ross and to Mr. Brock, who have the natural pride of discoverers, was an old fool. No; Thackeray was always good-humoured; he set his noble patient up with Spr. lavend. comp. and Spr. menth. pip., when the Dean would have put the irons in the fire to grow white-hot; and it cannot be maintained that he was a man who thought more of the pimples than of the face, more of the mincing accent than of the voice, while Dobbin, and Warrington, and Colonel Newcome remain to us. There were assuredly many better things than blemishes amongst his stock-in-trade; even Sedley, foolish old failure that he was, did not lack the dignity of repentance on his deathbed.

And, again, I think that Mr. Ayscough, while he lauds Thomas Hardy, does not really appreciate the true matter of the master's greatness. He stakes everything on character-drawing, and I will say boldly that I believe that in the greatest books and in the last resort character-drawing does not matter two pins; or, in other words, that the charm of the "Odyssey" does not depend upon the "character" of Ulysses. The "Odyssey" is a great mystery and enchantment book, it is a mirror of the world's wonder and beauty, it is a chart of fairy seas and of the shores of dreamland, and Ulysses is but the peg on which these marvels hang. And I claim for Mr. Hardy a place, though a lower place, in the hall where Homer is enthroned, and I am afraid I say "Bother!" to Mr. Ayscough's talk about the "bigness" of his characters. They are very good indeed, many of them, especially those admirable Dorset peasants; but their goodness is not the main point, and it is not the main point in the finest literature to draw people so well that the reader begins to think that they must be "real" people, and that the author is a sort of journalist with supernatural means of finding out all the "facts" about them. This would be a merit of a sort—the sort of merit that one would expect from first-rate waxworks, the merit of the Greek painter who depicted grapes so cleverly that the birds came and pecked the picture. But this is not the merit of the high art of letters, which, like all the high arts, is an art of enchantment, the passage into a region which is earth, and yet earth translated, seen in a light neither of the sun nor of the moon. If we want to go to Margate, it would be idle to take a fairy barque, and simili modo it would be but faint praise of a Gothic Cathedral to say that it was quite weather-proof. The face of a dyed saint in a stained-glass window may remind a man of his Aunt Jane, but that signifies nothing.

And it seems to me that Thomas Hardy holds so high a place in literature that his character-drawing is quite unimportant, though good and pleasant in its place. His true praise is that he has made the Great Projection, that in his crucible the dull matter of earth has assumed the glory of the great dream that has always troubled or rejoiced the heart of man. There is a certain story of a rather thankless and heartless young countryman who studied astronomy and got on in the world; also the story tells of an affectionate and rather indiscreet woman, belonging to a county family, who afterwards married the Bishop. I protest that I have said enough of these people as people—as characters; that their sayings as sayings, and their actions as actions are, in themselves, of no particular interest; that in mere logical analysis the story about them might be described as “painful” and “unpleasant,” as good material for one of our “serious” dramatists; and no worse word can I utter than that. What? Great ladies are sometimes indiscreet; a peasant “on the make” has no doubt been hard and graceless; Bishops, for all I know, have been evilly entreated and (if I may borrow an expressive phrase from Mr. Edgar Jepson), “choused.” I protest again that I take no particular interest in these people, and I protest more earnestly that I should quite despair of doing justice to that wonderful and supreme romance called “Two on a Tower.” Long ago in a book which no one has read I wrote:—

The old tower, standing in the midst of lonely, red ploughlands far from the highway, is at first only the convenient place where the young peasant studies astronomy; but as you read you feel the change coming; the tower is transmuted, glorified; every stone of it is aglow with mystic light; it is made the abode of the Lover and the Beloved; it is seen to be a symbol of Love, of an ecstasy remote, and passionate, and eternal, dwelling far from the ways of men.

Of such sort it still appears to me are the merits of Thomas Hardy, and these are surely the merits, the great enchantments, the supremest magistracy of true literature, the revelation of the inner mysteries of life. I care nothing for the “character” of that Jude who was obscure; frankly, he strikes me as a feeble and foolish though pitiable personality, and his story qua story seems to me as insignificant and tiresome in the main. But who can forget that vision of Oxford that Jude once beheld—when, gazing from the verge of a lonely field, he saw the wet roofs and towers and spires suddenly glitter and shine golden in the flaming sunset, so that for a moment the material dream of the boy was unconsciously assumed and taken up into the great dream of the world’s heart? For ever since man was man he has longed for that city of vision, for that golden and blessed place where all doles shall be healed, where all desires shall be fulfilled, where all delight shall be afforded, and the thirst of his soul shall be quenched fully at springs and fountains of quickening water. Man has called this city Syon, and Avalon, and the Glassy Isle, and the Fortunate Islands, and the Earthly Paradise, and also Mandalay; and his dreams and visions of this place and his desire for it are named art. It is this city that Jude saw for an instant at the sunset; and he who can speak of these things seems to me artist in the highest degree. He is the true “realist” who shows us realities that are eternal. To draw a major in Piccadilly who is just like a major in Piccadilly, a Dorsetshire peasant who is true to type, an old lady whom one fancies that one must have known years ago in Market Ditchwater—these are minor and unimportant, though amusing and interesting adventures.

And so one quite understands Mr. Ayscough’s heresies about Dickens:

Dickens was usually indoors, too, hanging about kitchens, and not always even knowing the difference between the kitchen and the house-keeper’s room. Nor did he much care to know. He prefers parlours behind shops, or in mean lodgings, or in debtors’ prisons. . . . Whether Dickens could draw real people or not his critics are not certain; but it is certain that he did draw chiefly caricatures, each character being chiefly differentiated by its absurdities and peculiarities. . . . Dickens never created off-hand—his people are mostly evolutions, at so many stages a month. Out of a bibulous, semi-imbecile little protoplasm evolved the amiable, almost respectable Mr. Pickwick, and out of the merely priggish Mr. Pecksniff evolved a complete villain.

Now, judged merely by the standard of the letter, this indictment may not pass. Dickens was not usually indoors; he was often on the great coach-roads, in the streets of old country towns, on the downs between Bristol and Marlborough, on the way from Dijon to Paris, on the Mississippi steamer, on the salt marshes, by highway and byway, by little villages and manufacturing towns, with Codlin, Short, and Mrs. Jarley, lingering by ancient, mouldering shrines, snowbound on the wild Yorkshire moor, floating down the dark Thames at midnight. As for the evolution of Mr. Pickwick, Dickens is in good company, as any may ascertain by looking into Rabelais or Cervantes. The “note” of the early chapters of Gargantua is a very different one from that of the last chapters of Pantagruel, and the Don Quixote of the first pages is but a shadow in comparison with the figure which gradually emerges as one goes on that great pilgrimage of errantry. And then Mr. Pecksniff was never “merely priggish.” He was never priggish at all; he was unctuous from first to last, and his essential scoundrelism is indicated within seven pages of his entrance on the scene.

Still, these be trifles. It is probable, again, that the theory of Dickens the caricaturist has been pushed much too far; that a great deal that seems strange, uncouth, impossible to us, is faithful representation enough—only the society that Dickens knew has passed away and the fashion of it, and we, who may be well-instructed as to the social life of Athens 400 B.C., or of mediæval Paris in the fourteenth century, are so ignorant of the petite bourgeoisie of eighty years ago in England that its manners and customs seem to us the odd inventions of a whimsical and fantastic writer. The social structure of the eighteenth century persisted for some years of the nineteenth, and Dr. Johnson’s visiting-list in the year 1752 gives us a glimpse of a state of things for which there is now, perhaps, no parallel. Mrs. Micawber was, no doubt, quite a possible person socially, and her “Family” can be readily envisaged by those who are familiar with the time. It is quite likely that one of her brothers kept a large grocer’s shop at Plymouth, another may have been a captain in the Navy, a third—it is quite possible—founded a famous firm in the City, while a fourth may have been a general in the Company’s service. And the opening scene of “Pickwick,” which is very bad indeed, is most likely a literal transcript, so far as the mise-en-scène and the social status of the members of the club are concerned, of an actual club that Dickens had frequented. Retired English tradesmen did once like to meet each other over a “social glass” in a tavern-parlour, and the discussion of literary and “philosophical” questions (after an odd fashion, doubtless) would be a quite usual proceeding.

But this is not the point. The true point is that Mr. Ayscough, considering Dickens, has fallen into an error similar to that of a Mr. Tilley, whose book on Rabelais was reviewed in THE ACADEMY some months ago. The reviewer, so far as I remember, showed that the vital (and fatal) error in Mr. Tilley’s book lay in the author’s regarding Gargantua, Pantagruel, Panurge, and Brother John as “characters in a novel.” In the criticism of Rabelais the result of such a point of view appeared to be the most fatal nonsense, error, and confusion; in the criticism of Dickens similar premisses lead to similar disasters. It is the horrible fallacy in each case of regarding Pantagruel and Pickwick as “people one might have met,” as possible acquaintances in some literal Touraine and literal London; it is precisely the same fallacy which has induced certain persons to regard Galahad as “a very odd man” with the most strained and unpractical ideas on certain subjects. And then there is another great example to which reference has been already made—does Mr. Ayscough regard Don Quixote as a possible person, inhibiting a material La Mancha in the early years of the seventeenth century? Surely not; but is Don Quixote then to be dismissed as a caricature? For heaven’s sake let us rid ourselves of this notion that literature is a sort of glass in which we may behold our friends, or some people like our friends, whether of South Kensington or Little Pedlington.

Dickens, then, was a symbolist. Let it be said quite frankly, without shame, that no such persons as Mr. Pickwick, Mr. Micawber, or Mr. Pecksniff ever walked this earth. They are creatures of the world of vision, of that other world which is beside us always, which transcends the sight of unpurged eyes. I think it is Mr. G. K. Chesterton that has pointed out that somewhere in the heavens there is an immortal tavern where there sits an immortal company. Pantagruel, who is ever athirst, is there enthroned, Falstaff there renews his abjuration of thin potations, and Mr. Pickwick, having cast off the dust of Goswell Street, drinks a brandy that was vinted and distilled in Sirius. Here is the true doctrine of the high mysteries—the doctrine that this doited, envenomed age can never understand. Not for the common critics of these days is there any parting of the veil: it is thick before their eyes; Mr. Pickwick can only summon to their vision the image of the Licensing Bill; they read of Falstaff, and wonder how the County Council would have dealt with such a case; and as for Pantagruel he would manifestly have been scheduled as an habitual drinker.

But Dickens will long be a refuge to those who refuse all assent to these follies, who care not twopence for all the "problems" of the "serious" drama. For Dickens is, as I have said, the true realist—the man who symbolises, by means of phenomena, eternal verities. One has never seen anybody like Mr. Pickwick, like Mr. Micawber. Precisely; and for that very reason one knows that the creator of these immortals is of the greatest. Have we ever seen any one like Galahad, like Don Quixote, like Pantagruel? Do the gargoyles of the mediæval cathedral browse in our meadows or run in our backyards? Do we receive the saints in dyed vestments with golden aureoles on the first and third Wednesdays in our comfortable villas? Are we to suppose that the nymphs and fauns went into the best Athenian society? Alas! what foolish talk is this about character-drawing—about characters who are "big," and "life-like," and the rest of it? What does it profit a painter to delineate a tree which is very like a tree, unless it is something much more—unless it is also the symbol and the revelation of some great secret of Nature? If this were not so, then the camera would be the superior of Turner, and the shorthand-writer would look down from his desk on poor blind Homer, who talks of gods and goddesses, and fairy isles, and giants with one eye in their foreheads.

The great world of Homer is not to be reborn in these days; the greater world of mediæval romance, of the Sangraal, is a far vision of holy, splendid, and glorious mysteries. We have eaten too long of the accursed fruit, we have drunk too much poisonous doctrine to be worthy of such high things as these. Let us be thankful, therefore, that in the nineteenth century, while we worked every abomination, every madness, there was a certain Charles Dickens who caught a glimpse of the enchanted land, who retold, under grotesque cockney disguises, the old tale of wonder, who showed us once more, in ugly costume enough, the mystery-play of this our mortal life.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

THE CARMELITE WOLF

THE wolf knocked at the door, and the grandmother's voice called out: "Pull the bobbin and the latch will go up." He pushed open the door, and, going straight up to where the old lady lay in bed, opened his mouth and devoured her. Then he put on her nightdress and cap, jumped into the bed, and cuddled down amongst the clothes. Presently came a tap at the door.

"Pull down the bobbin, and the latch will go up," called out the wolf in a voice like the grandmother's.

Little Red Riding Hood walked in.

And later, as we all know, Little Red Riding Hood remarked:

- "What great ears you've got, grandmamma!"
- "All the better to hear you with," said the wolf.
- "What great eyes you have, grandmamma!"
- "All the better to see you with."
- "And, oh! what great teeth you have, grandmamma!"
- "All the better to eat you with," cried the wolf.

Whereupon, of course, Little Red Riding Hood "ran screaming to the door." This is the old child's fable, which you may read in Part II. of the "Children's Encyclopædia," a publication issued from Carmelite House at sevenpence per part. It is a fable which we shall venture to apply briskly. The Carmelite Wolf devoured Grannie long ago. Now he lies in bed and invites Little Red Riding Hood to pull down the bobbin. In "a voice like grandmother's" he has told us all about this precious "Children's Encyclopædia." Says he:

We should lead the children into the paths of happiness; we should teach them that happiness lies not merely in the knowledge of how to get a living, but in the knowledge of how to live. They should find joy in the best stories, thought in the best books, beauty in the best pictures, passion in the best music, poetry in all things. They should find reverence in Nature and wonder in their own lives. They should find about them the means to brighten life and kindle thought. They should live, in a word, in the kingdom where enduring happiness is found. The "Children's Encyclopædia" has come to guide them to this kingdom, to be the companion and inspirer of childhood. It will not make them little encyclopædias; it seeks to make them gentlemen and gentlewomen, reasoning and reasonable members of the human family.

Part I. of the "Children's Encyclopædia" has duly appeared, and the bookstalls groan accordingly. And only a few days back the front page of the Daily Mail was filled with the testimonials of Royalty, the Peerage, Parliament, the Church, the Universities, and the Schools—united in "enthusiastic approval of the Children's Book." "Each one of the children of the Princess of Wales is delighted with it and glad to possess it"! This from Marlborough House. The Bishop of Winchester wrote: "I consider the children of this generation very fortunate in being supplied with it." According to the Dean of Norwich, "the engravings are admirable, the colour is light and living, the letterpress quite perfect." And in his usual bright, brief, and brotherly way Dr. Clifford ejaculates, "A capital idea, admirably worked out. How fortunate are the children of to-day!" Equally enthusiastic—on the front page of the Daily Mail—are Lord Avebury, Sir Edward Clarke, Professor Sedgwick, Sir Norman Lockyer, Sir James Crichton-Browne, Professor Dowden, the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Llandaff, Dr. Fairbairn, Mrs. Bramwell Booth, Professor Osler, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Mr. W. T. Stead, and Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton. In the face of such a chorus the boldest might well tremble. You can figure to yourself the Carmelite Wolf licking its chops and "clapping its little hands with glee," as it were, at the notion of it all. Marlborough House approves, the Bishops approve, the Lords approve, the Universities approve, Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton approves, Dr. Clifford approves. Bring in your Little Red Riding Hood "right now." Look to it that she is provided with her sevenpence, for I am an hungered and I still lack sevenpence! The good Lord Avebury, and the stout Bishop of Winchester, and the learned Professor Sedgwick, and the breezy Dr. Clifford, and the critical Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton will assist free of charge at the sacrifice. Little Red Riding Hood must be shoved up to that vulpine bedside willy-nilly. She, poor child, out of a prescience that appears to have been denied the Bishop of Winchester, the Dean of Norwich, Dr. Clifford, Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton, and the rest of them, will cry, "Oh, Grandmamma, what long ears you've got!" And the Carmelite Wolf shall make answer and say: "My child, it is because I have long ears that I have arranged with Dr. C. W. Saleeby to 'make plain' for you 'the great wonder of human life.' I am aware that Dr. Saleeby is quite unable to do it, but that is neither here nor there. It is because I have long ears, too, that I appoint Mr. Harold Begbie to 'retell' for you 'the beautiful stories of the Bible,' to go bald-headed for that wicked man the Pope, and to supply you with good counsel and little talks on serious subjects." And in the innocence of her heart little Red Riding Hood will cry: "Oh, Grandmamma, what great eyes you've got!" And the Carmelite Wolf will say: "It is because I have great eyes that you will find on page 22 of Part II.: 'Nations live and die and pass away like you and me;' and on page 45 you will read: 'The old moon laughed and sung a song;' and that on page 11 you will read further: 'When you look at inscriptions on monuments and buildings you find that the date is always followed by two capital letters. These letters are either B.C. or A.D. The first means the time Before Christ; the second of these means Anno Domini, the time After Christ. And it is because I have great eyes and long ears that you will find that the blessed word 'clever' bestars pretty well every page of my beautiful Part I.—'clever poet,' 'clever scientist,' 'clever artist,' 'clever writer,' 'clever painter,' and so on ad nauseam. And when Little Red Riding Hood cries, as she inevitably must cry, "Oh, Grandmamma, what large teeth you've got!" the Carmelite Wolf will reply, "You were made to be devoured. Hand over your sevenpence."

To have done with parable, it seems to us entirely amazing that persons of culture and parts, not to say eminence, should consider it consonant with their dignity to bestow ill-considered encomiums upon a work whose antecedents are clearly suspicious, and whose cornerstones are clearly speciousness, pretentiousness, clap-trap, and commercialism. In view of the many exacting duties of her exalted position we cannot expect her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales to vex herself with a minute examination of the books that find their way into the royal nursery. But we are unfeignedly sorry that such a piece of shoddy as Part I. of the "Children's Encyclopædia" should have "delighted each" of her Royal Highness's children. We do not discover that Marlborough House indulges in the habit of issuing useful testimonials to poets or novelists or improving writers for the adult. That an exception should be made in the particular instance before us is simply woeful. For persons like the Bishop of Winchester, the Dean of Norwich, Mr. W. T. Stead, and Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton we can conceive of no possible excuse. Either these gentlemen have read Part I. of the "Children's Encyclopædia" or they have not; if they did read it, they must know just as much about it as we know about it, and they must be aware that they had no business to recommend it. If, on the other hand, they failed of their reading, their praise is doubly regrettable. We should like to see Mr. Watts-Dunton reviewing Part I. of the "Children's Encyclopædia" over his name in the Athenæum. Meanwhile, despite the united voices of authority, we shall advise the people of England to keep the "Children's Encyclopædia" out of their houses.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Growth of Modern Nations. By HENRI DE TOURVILLE.
(Edward Arnold, 12s. 6d. net.)

IN view of the extraordinary interest in Socialism which is being manifested at the present time, the student and earnest inquirer into the problems of social evolution will do well to give close consideration to Mr. M. G. Lock's translation of the late M. de Tourville's engrossing history of the growth of the particularist form of society. The work first appeared in the Science Sociale as a series of articles, headed "Histoire de la Formation particulariste," extending over a period of six years. It would be impossible within the limits of a review to give even a summary of the matter treated, for the author goes back even beyond the authentic historical period, drawing some very pertinent conclusions from the Eddas and Sagas of Iceland and the Scandinavian traditions, while at the other end his subject is brought up to the present day. It is indeed a remarkable feat to have condensed such an immense subject into one volume of 500 pages, exclusive of the Index, for when the enormous mass of material treated is considered it is evident that we have here, in brief, an entire history of European civilisation from barbarism to modern times.

The earlier part of the work, treating of the settlement of races in Europe and the topographical forces which determined their allocation to a particular country, is, perhaps, hardly to be accepted in its entirety without further consideration. The theories propounded are backed by weighty arguments, but they still remain theories and must not be accepted as coming within the realm of acknowledged fact, more especially as the author laid especial stress on the necessity for a scientific exposition of social laws, by scientific inquiry into the forces which have produced that form of society which now subsists. As an instance of this the ingenious theory as to the character of the earlier Norwegian fishermen may be cited—a theory which depends mainly upon our acceptance of the fact that the Gulf Stream brings a constant current of warm water to the western shores of the Norwegian peninsula. With the introduction of the Frank we come to surer ground, and the origin and development of serfdom is treated in full, and M. de Tourville gives a most interesting and explicit account of the manner in which the principle came to be acknowledged—a principle, let it be remembered, that shaped the whole course of European history.

In the later portion of the work a large amount of space, as may naturally be expected, is allotted to France, but M. de Tourville's insight into the causes of social development in England and his just appreciation of the national character illustrate his scientific detachment and the scrupulous exactitude he has aimed at in the production of his work. In this connection we may quote a somewhat illuminating passage on the English people which deserves attention in view of present-day problems. It runs as follows:

What is remarkable is the way in which, from the commencement of this epoch [the fourteenth century], when rapid and far-reaching transformations take place in economic development, the English have continued to invent practical means, shifts of all sorts, in order that the land, whatever the actual system of legislation in regard to land might be, might serve above all for the education of the race. That was the essential basis of their history from the beginning, although then it was less influenced by sudden turns of fortune and by great changes in labour; and their history still continues on these lines. Without making humanitarian or philosophic theories for the better distribution of the land among all, or for the definition of the rights of property, the Anglo-Saxons have from century to century stirred their practical intelligence to find a way by which the land can really be divided in a manner most advantageous for the vigorous exercise of their powers of personal initiative.

There is food for thought here both for the Social and the Tariff Reformer.

The last chapter, dealing with the United States, shows signs of less careful consideration than the rest of the work. This may have been due to the author's failing health, as he died a few days after completing his work.

The translation is adequate upon the whole, though fault may be found with the frequent lapses into colloquialisms which are out of character in a work of this kind.

King Edward VI. An Appreciation attempted by Sir CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, K.C.B. (Smith, Elder, and Co., 9s. net.)

SIR CLEMENTS MARKHAM has written in quite his own manner an enthusiastic appreciation of Edward VI.—sometimes imaginative, sometimes rather sentimental. We cannot see any reasonable ground for his complaint that "the reign of Edward VI. in our histories is the reign of Somerset and the reign of Northumberland." It is inevitable that a child should be overshadowed in political history, as Edward VI. was, in fact, by the Protectorate, the measure of so young a Sovereign's influence being the strength or weakness of his ruling advisers. Sir Clements is distressed at the unkindness of historians, who have called the boy "precocious in a depreciatory sense." Had Edward VI. lived, no doubt the Tudor cleverness and penetration already shown in his childhood would have developed.

However, Sir Clements has given us a very interesting picture of the period and of the principal characters in the short drama. We have been a little amused at certain of his judgments. But the "hardihood" of Sir Clements's opinions and of his statements of "fact" has been already summed up in the English Historical Review, by a well-known and learned critic ("A. F. P."), who observes with quiet humour that Sir Clements's "effort is biased throughout by that grudge against the enemies of Richard III. which he pursues like a vendetta."

Suppressed Plates. By G. S. LAYARD. (A. and C. Black, 7s. 6d. net.)

IN his introduction to what is on the whole an interesting, if not quite satisfying volume, the author says—"My purpose is to gather together, correct, and amplify the floating details concerning a legitimate class of rarities and to put the collector on his guard, where necessary, against imposition," and the full title of the book is "Suppressed Plates, Wood Engravings, etc., together with other Curiosities germane thereto, being an Account of Certain Matters peculiarly alluring to the Collector." This is a mighty fine sentence, which whets the bibliographic appetite; for whether one be especially interested in Suppressed Plates or not, there is the implied promise of those "certain matters" which it is difficult to resist. Mr. Layard, as befits every sound collector, is an enthusiast, and he certainly attempts to fulfil all that he sets out to accomplish; for, besides elaborate details, reproductions, and histories of most of the more famous Suppressed Plates, from Thackeray's "Marquis of Steyne" to Henry Alken's (the younger) "John Jorrock," he gives many quaint, curious, and out-of-the-way stories of the ways of engravers, artists, and those most indispensable of all nuisances—art-dealers. He tells a tale of a firm of publishers of family Bibles who called to consult R. H. Cromek, the engraver, about an engraving representing M. Buffon, seated, contemplating various groups of animals surrounding him:

He merely wished (he said) to be informed whether by engaging my services to unclothe the naturalist and giving him a rather more sedate look, the plate could not, at a trifling expense, be made to do duty for "Daniel in the Lion's Den."

The chapter on the cancelled designs for Punch and Once a Week, principally by Charles Keene the inimitable, and Frederick Sandys, who is only now, so many years after his death, coming by his own, is probably the most valuable in the book, or, at any rate, the one which might give rise to most controversy. The frontispiece is a reproduction of Sholto Percy's (Joseph Clinton Robinson) "Death in London," which was never issued, because the book which it was to illustrate was never written. Why should not some aspiring author supply the deficiency? The subject is rich in possibilities, and, doubtless, Mr. Layard would lend the frontispiece. It is a chance not to be missed.

India Impressions. By WALTER CRANE, R.W.S. (Methuen and Co., 7s. 6d. net.)

WERE it not for a few score nimble sketches of Indian life and character, drawn with the ready knowledge of a clever black-and-white draughtsman, and a few full-page illustrations which are as good as need be, there is no earthly justification for the existence of this book. Mr. Crane made a tour of India, saw many—to him—strange sights, and noted them carefully in his pocket-book. He has a humorous pencil, and he made many bright little sketches of people, things, and scenes. Why, in the holy name of Padgett, M.P., he should wish to throw his entirely conventional impressions and experiences into print is one of those mysteries which are inexplicable. He saw nothing, absolutely nothing, that a thousand—nay, ten thousand—tourists have not seen before him, and his method of relating his travels is bald and crude. As a frame for his drawings, which are, in their way, delightful, ten pages of letterpress would have been ample. He has given us three hundred!

The Stories of the Trees. By MRS. J. MILLER MAXWELL. (David Douglas, 3s. 6d. net.)

"THE Weeping Birch is as truly native and partakes in most ways of the preferences and good qualities of its sister tree, yet may sometimes rouse in the gentle breast of that sister a passing feeling of sorrowful envy, for, with both trees in view, the admiration accorded to the Weeping Birch is much more general and enthusiastic."

We admit that this quotation is a fair sample of Mrs.

Maxwell's style of writing and manner of presenting her subject, that too many pages of her book are devoted to such writing, and that it cannot claim any literary, scientific, or historical value. But Mrs. Maxwell does not advance any such claims, and many intelligent readers who do not require any of these qualities will derive much pleasure and information from her diligent study of a charming subject. They will find apt references to books not readily accessible to them, such as Turner, Gerarde, Stone, Evelyn, and Leland; dramatic legends connected with famous trees in Scotland which have already interested the reviewer and enlarged his omniscience; and the explanation of the names and origins of many old and familiar varieties of fruits, such as the Abbot's, Bergamot, Bon Chrétien, Catherine, and Warden pear, and the Permain, Costard, Pippin, and Nonpareil apple. They will learn several wise customs founded on a careful and continuous observation of Nature. They will forbid their gardeners to "plant out" until the mulberry-tree has come into leaf, as do all old owners of mulberry-trees, who believe that their coming into leaf is a signal that the last late frost is over. They will also never plant anything under beech-trees except hollies, for nothing else will grow, though Mrs. Maxwell might have told us, in her own vein, that the beech is a gourmet and cultivates excellent truffles here in England as elsewhere. Her best chapters are those most adorned with anecdote, such as "The Sycamore," "The Pear Tree," "The Mulberry," and "The Sweet Chestnut." Why did she omit all mention of poplars and the noblest of pines, called in England the Scotch fir?

FICTION

Richard Langhorne. The Story of a Socialist. By ELLIS ASHMEAD BARTLETT. (William Blackwood and Sons, 6s.)

THIS is Mr. Ashmead Bartlett's first venture in the regions of romance, though he has gained laurels in other fields of literature—notably as a war correspondent. On the cover we see the title explained "The Story of a Socialist." Open the volume and we find "The Romance of a Socialist," which does greater justice to this charming narrative. But perhaps we have hardly yet begun to connect Socialism with romance.

The tale opens with a procession of unemployed through Piccadilly to the Park, and we are introduced to the hero as the speaker of the people. An impassioned tirade against Individualism and Capital sends the mob surging towards Park-lane. Richard Langhorne drifts away to Belgrave-square, and many of the mob too. Lady Pellinore and Cynthia, her daughter, motor up to the door of their house, the mob threaten to molest them, Langhorne intervenes and is invited into the house with them. While receiving their thanks, a warrant for his arrest is presented and he leaves again a prisoner. Two months' imprisonment confirm him a popular hero, and he is soon in Parliament, the leader of a strong Socialist party. A Socialist Peeress (who has sold her jewels for the cause) makes Langhorne known to Lord Pellinore, Harry, Lady Pellinore's son, who is playing with Socialism, and in natural sequence he visits again the house in Belgrave-square and goes to the old family house in Kent—Brinsmead. Association with the best of landowners and with their happy tenants leads Langhorne's open mind to a revision of the principles which he had adopted as unalterable, and all leads up to a great scene in the Socialist committee-room in the House of Commons and to a great speech—Richard Langhorne's renunciation of Socialism. Ruin stares him in the face, and his hand is on the trigger of his pistol when a letter reaches him from Lady Falconbridge (Harry and Cynthia's aunt, and the fairy godmother of Brinsmead) asking him to come and see her. He accepts, "forgetting his appointment with Eternity." She sends him to Canada to manage vast estates. But earlier Lady Falconbridge, in welcoming Langhorne among them, had set Cynthia the task to win him over from Socialism. She succeeded too well, for in winning him she lost her own heart, and their formal betrothal beside Lady Falconbridge's dying bed is a pretty and pathetic scene in the last chapter.

Mr. Ashmead Bartlett introduces us to attractive people and to some great characters. He inspires them with delightful thoughts, and gives them the power of expressing them. Lady Falconbridge is a true grande dame. When Harry and Cynthia begin life her counsels to both are a pattern for all time. Her death scene, which ends the book, is really fine. Richard Langhorne's rival, Henderson, is a grim exponent of militant Socialism—not pleasing, but forcible and realistic.

Richard Langhorne, self-educated, is of a noble frame of mind. As the Socialist his reasoning is clear, his speech incisive, and not more tinged with melodrama than are the utterances of most Socialists. Now that Cynthia's work is done he will doubtless do the State much service. Harry marries Dora Adams, daughter of an American railway king. His interview with Mr. Adams and his shameless desertion of Socialism as the price of Dora's hand provides material for a very amusing chapter (xxvi.).

The story is told with much humour, and is very pleasant reading.

Captain Spink. By MORLEY ROBERTS. (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.)

MR. MORLEY ROBERTS'S sea comedies are well known, and the seven that go to make up the present volume will probably be as popular as their predecessors. There is, of course, a certain sameness about them all—if there were not, Mr. Roberts's readers would probably be disappointed—his captains and his mates, whether called Spink, Middleshaw, or Parco, have a strong family likeness. They are all simple-minded, straightforward, and primitive, especially when they try to be crafty or subtle. But Mr. Roberts's humorous touch succeeds in giving them a naturalness which otherwise might be wanting, and instead of being acceptable as real persons, as they undoubtedly are, they might be wooden figures in impossible scenes. Even such fantastic, far-fetched situations as Captain Spink's interview with the representatives of the "Chief Foreign Officer," or the attack on Captain Middleshaw by all the ladies at Lima become conceivable and even probable, thanks to Mr. Roberts's simple humour.

Where all the stories are quite good and entertaining, it is not easy to say which is the best. Perhaps the two which pleased us best are "Spink and an Empire" and "His Serene Highness." The latter is similar in subject to the same author's earlier story, "The Promotion of the Admiral," but is more farcical in treatment. In the former the redoubtable Captain Spink succeeds in getting the better of the German Navy, to his own great delight and still greater profit.

A Woman from the Sea. By J. BLOUNDELLE BURTON. (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.)

THE scene of Mr. Bloundelle Burton's romance is laid partly in England and partly in France in the year 1793, when the National Convention was misruling France and alarming the rest of Europe. The period has been a favourite one with English novelists; but if the matter of the present novel is not particularly fresh, it is at least interesting and exciting and to be recommended to those—we hope there are many—who can still read a good historical novel with pleasure. The author, however, makes what seems to us an artistic mistake in letting his readers know the secret of the mystery that surrounds his hero's birth a long while before the characters do; and, again, in devoting fifty-two pages towards the end of the book to the narrative of the hero's mother, he appears to us to be committing a fault in construction. As a consequence of the former mistake, the heroine appears to the reader in no very amiable light, and in consequence of the latter the book is too long. But, in spite of these strictures, it is certainly a book to be commended.

The Master-Knot. By ALICE BIRKHEAD. (John Lane, 6s.)

IT is easy to find the source of inspiration to which "The Master-Knot" owes its being. Rostand's play, with its gay, ruffling hero Cyrano is directly responsible, not only for the character, but, in part, for the actual plot of the story. Damaris Newall, the character who, we feel, holds far more of the author's interest than the ostensible "leading lady" of the drama, Lola Graham, is a romantically bizarre combination of Cyrano and Roxane. Her gallant nonchalance and graceful effrontery is worthy of de Bergerac, but intellectually and physically she is modelled on the "fine" and précieuse Roxane. The gascon vein in which the book is written comes near to spoiling what would otherwise be very good work. Damaris, with her weird fascination, her marvellous genius, and her curiously incongruous personality, is too fanciful and extravagant a character to be convincing. The same may be said of the whole story. Much of it is admirable, so much so that incidents which would pass in a poorer work strike a false note here. For instance, the episode in which Damaris, leaning over a gate, lost in meditation, stops a runaway horse by merely stretching out a white hand as it "flashes past," and then (as though she had just brushed away a troublesome fly) is at once so lost in an "absorbing train of thought" that she does not even notice the woman she has saved coming up to thank her, is out of place in a work which is neither a Daily Mail serial or a second-rate detective story.

The Toad and the Amazon. By GEORGE TURNER. (Ward, Lock, and Co., 6s.)

THE TOAD, a rich young man of sporting tastes and of prowess as a pugilist, assumes the dress and the dialect of an East-end coster and betakes himself to Barking in search of new fields of conquest as an exponent of the noble art. Here he meets one "Slogging Sally," a magnificent amazon of great beauty, who stands up to him with the gloves. She turns out to be no other than Sylvia Drew, one of his own set, who like himself chanced to be masquerading on the same fields in search of sport. They fall in love, but their courtship is not idyllic. They pass their time in crude and irritable discussions on sexual problems, upon which they hold very strong but entirely opposite views. The Toad, beside having enlightened opinions on the subject of matrimony, had "a big, ugly, silent, temper, that was more an obsession of obstinacy than a paroxysm of wrath." This naturally leads to "paroxysms of wrath" on the part of the lady. Now appear the jealous villain and the Society of the Entomophogetes, the latter with its terrible law that any stranger finding his way into its secret conclave shall be put to death. The villain lures the Toad into this perilous position, from whence he is saved by Sylvia, who, unknown to the villain, has been initiated a member of the society, and can therefore save the life of a condemned stranger by consenting to marry him. This plot, at once grotesque and arbitrary, is treated in a semi-realistic way, which does not admit of its development as an amusing extravaganza, and yet does not succeed in making the story appear even remotely possible. The development has much the same quality of harshness as the plot itself, and the style is abrupt. A totally different manner should have been employed in order to invest so thin and angular an outline with any degree of the colour and solidity of life.

A Charming Girl. By ESME STUART. (Greening, 6s.)

THERE is a type of fiction which strongly suggests tapioca pudding. It is wholesome and easy to digest, but always dull, and can be nauseating if taken in too great a quantity. "A Charming Girl" may be placed in this category. It will be described by many as a "pretty" or a "sweet" book, and will no doubt be in great demand as a birthday present for the artless school girl. The story is a simple one. Veronica Curryer, a naughty flirt, after working havoc in the hearts of the susceptible youths of the countryside, is wicked enough to elope with an elderly admiral. Leslie Ashcroft is her antithesis, a very excellent, but, alas, plain girl, who leads a dull but virtuous life, and is obviously about to marry the lion of the tale, a hero of the South African campaign, when the story ends. The monotony of the plot is relieved by the tragic death of a private secretary, a victim of the flirt, but he is such a poor creature that he is hardly to be regretted.

A Romance of Three. By EDWARD SCOTT. (Greening, 6s.)

SOME years ago, before he devoted his attention to Shakespeare controversy, Mr. W. H. Mallock wrote a book called "The Heart of Life," which told the story of a man who was in love with two women at the same time. On this subject Mr. Mallock built a very interesting novel. The subject of the present book is the same, but the result is quite different. For we must frankly confess that long before the end of the story we have lost all interest in any of the "Three." Ethel never was very interesting, even at the beginning, and Arthur's infatuation for Miss Darrell is so inconsistent as to become tiresome. At the beginning of the story he is engaged to Ethel; he then becomes enthralled by the "pretty governess"; Ethel discovers this and gives him his congé; he immediately rushes off to his charmer, who for no valid reason also shuts the door in his face. He then returns, still in love with her, to London, and is taken back by the jealous Ethel, and marries her. But he still loves Mildred, and there is a "thrilling" scene when he meets her. In the end she dies, and Arthur's philosophy has of late become more transcendental. He often recalls the aspirations of his younger days—his dreams of a triple union in which three might dwell in perfect accord.

That Mr. George sympathises with his hero is evident. Whether his readers will share his sympathy or not is quite another question. As, however, they will have paid to read the story, the choice is with them.

The Master of Means. By HERBERT GEORGE. (Greening, 6s.)

FROM the title-page, as well as from "internal evidence," we should be inclined to presume that this is a first novel. If this be so, some allowances should be made, and criticism should be tempered with charity. One thing at least may be said for the book—even if the construction be faulty, the canvas somewhat overcrowded for the development of the not too substantial plot, and the majority of the characters inclined to be stiff in drawing, the moral and poetic justice of the conclusion are unimpeachable. Mr. George also is evidently familiar with journalism and the inner workings of Fleet Street. His journalists are far more alive than the rest of his characters, and the scenes in the offices of the London Daily Message—though perhaps a little exaggerated—are sketched with a surer and more intimate touch than those at Coursfield or in the slums. In Gustave Moenich—the Master of Means—Mr. George had a great opportunity; but instead of making him a great compelling influence and a really impressive figure, he only shows him as a peculiarly unpleasant scoundrel, with no qualifications to justify his alleged position and power. The next character in importance is "Billy" McCraw, a stereotyped, conventional Hibernian journalist, who only differs from his many compatriots in fiction in the fact that he is successful and sober. The rest are lay figures.

DRAMA

SHYLOCK AT HIS MAJESTY'S THEATRE

THERE have been occasions when a member of the audience at His Majesty's Theatre might have been likened to a traveller who had found himself in a wood so dense that he could not see it for the trees, but last Saturday night no such an impression could have been formed, for the play went forward without any apparent sacrifice having been made on behalf of the popular actor-manager. Even the last Act—the last Act of the printed play, in which Shylock makes no appearance—was retained, though there must be many who would be prepared to admit that to our modern taste everything which occurs after the disappearance of the Jew is in the nature of an anti-climax. More than one other justification for such a cutting might be urged, for the last two scenes did not begin until well after the usual closing time, and I have no doubt that if the play had not been Shakespeare's the Censor would easily have found another.

It is, of course, a foregone conclusion that whatever Shakespearean play is produced at a West-end theatre as many innovations as possible shall be introduced, but on this occasion they did not greatly interfere with one's pleasure in a play that one knows so well; some of the changes, no doubt, were necessary in order to allow of the really magnificent scenery with which the play is beautified, but others seemed only to have been made in order to differentiate this production from other historic performances and to display an antiquarian knowledge which in the case of Shakespeare's plays is apt, as Launcelot Gobbo would say, to "try confusions" with them. But before criticising it will be more graceful to say at once that Mr. Tree is to be most heartily congratulated on the production as a whole, and more especially for his own share in the acting as the impersonator of Shylock. He may feel quite sure that in the future his Shylock will be spoken of with the admiration it richly deserves, and I for one am glad to give it as my opinion that for dignity and pathos his performance is not likely to be bettered. We live in an age when the reputations of the monsters of the past have to be rehabilitated, and Shylock must emerge with something of a halo. If Mr. Tree wears his halo with a difference it is none the less there, and as he went forth from the Court of Justice a broken, disappointed man, with the gibes of Gratiano ringing in his ears, there must have been few of the audience who did not feel that these gibes were ill-placed, and marked down their maker as a singularly ill-natured cur. That this is not the Shylock of Shakespeare need hardly be said; if it were, the characters of Gratiano and Jessica and others, all of them intended to be sympathetic, become blackened at once; and then there is always the difficulty of Shylock's compulsory conversion to be got over. The modern Shylock does not lightly become a Christian, and the fine, dignified Jew of Mr. Tree, for all his spitting and knife-sharpening, would never have consented to the sacrifice he had to make. In order to carry conviction he must be a very different person—he must be Shakespeare's Jew, and not the Jew of the Lyceum or His Majesty's. At the same time, it should be borne in mind that in Shakespeare's day there were practically no Jews in England; his personal knowledge of them must have been limited almost entirely to those who, like his Shylock, had consented to Christian baptism: with few exceptions, such as Elizabeth's physician—who was disembowelled in the end—no un-Christianised Jews were allowed in England.

While on the subject of the Jews one of Mr. Tree's greatest innovations may be noted, and that is his placing the whole of the second Act, which contains the scenes round Shylock's house, in the Ghetto. It is, of course, idle to argue as to whether there was a Ghetto in Venice; but that Shakespeare had no such idea is obvious from Old Gobbo's inquiry, "Which is the way to Master Jew's?" And it is certainly curious that Bassanio and his friends should have chosen the outside of the synagogue in the Ghetto as the scene of their meetings and revelries.

With regard to the other actors, some of them were very good; especially so were Mr. Norman Page as Launcelot Gobbo and Mr. G. W. Anson as Old Gobbo. Mr. Alfred Brydone was a most notable Prince of Morocco and Mr. W. R. Creighton turned the Prince of Arragon into a delightful gallant of the Euphues type. Mr. William Haviland and Mr. Robert Atkins were most dignified as Antonio and the Duke of Venice respectively. While Mr. Basil Gill was a handsome Bassanio, and Mr. Charles Quartermaine and Mr. Leon M. Lion acted well in the respective parts of Gratiano and Tubal.

I am sorry that it is impossible to praise any of the three ladies, though Miss Auriol Lee made an adequate Jessica. Miss Alexandra Carlisle has met with very considerable success in modern parts, but it requires a great deal more than she has at her command to make a Portia. It is probably not her fault that she was allowed to dress her dark hair in some modern fashion, but one wonders what is the value of so many antiquarian details when such important lines as:

And her sunny locks
Hang on her temples like a golden fleece,
Which makes her seat of Belmont Colchos' strand,
And many Jasons come in quest of her are belied by Portia's appearance. We want a histrionic Clara Middleton to play Portia, but perhaps, after all, there is not one at the present time. Miss Carlisle would probably have played Nerissa quite prettily, which Miss Dorothy Minto did not do. There is something to be said for the contention of the older school of actors that the moderns who make such a success in the plays of Ibsen and Bernard Shaw and Pinero cannot really act. It is one thing to play Hedda or Mrs. Ebbsmith, and quite another to be the radiant lady whom Shakespeare invented. The step from musical comedy to such plays as Her Father or The O'Grindles is not very great, but there is an abyss which divides them from Portia and Beatrice.

Every one who who cares for fine acting should go to His Majesty's; but to see Shylock, not Portia.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE FRENCH PEASANT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—When "La Terre" first appeared Zola was the high priest of realism to the average French student. I remember overhearing a discussion between two of them in an atelier of painting as to the truth of his description of the French peasant in "La Terre." They were obviously admirers of Zola; but one of them objected strongly to his description of the peasant class, and at last ended his argument by exclaiming: "Well, at any rate, the peasants are not like that in my part of the country. Are they in yours?" The second man, driven upon the horns of a dilemma, hesitated, then chose, what seemed to him to him the less objectionable one, and answered "No."

That Zola took the action he did in the Dreyfus case hardly helps towards settling the question of the literal accuracy of his methods of work. To accept it in proof we should have to decide whether he intended to sit in judgment upon the people and things he describes in his books. It is quite open to argument that he did not, but that his readers read into his work an estimate of "good" and "evil," according to their own definitions and their standard of "Society." It may be that in the broadest sense he, with Spinoza, held "there is no evil;" and in that, too, we may find an answer to "H. M.'s" indictment against his capacity for "love."

As an artist he is often considered to have failed in realism because of his inveterate tendency towards "romance." Comparing him with Flaubert or Guy de Maupassant, we feel, I think with justice, there is a "romance" of the gutter as well as of the clouds.

Kropokin, from the Russian standpoint, says:

Realism in art was much discussed some time ago in connection with the first writings of Zola; but we Russians, who had had Gogol and knew realism in its best form could not fall in with the views of the French realists: we saw in Zola a tremendous amount of the same romanticism which he combated, and in his realism, such as it appeared in his writings of his first period, we saw a step backwards from the realism of Balzac.

Guyau, in "L'Art au 'Point de vue Sociologique,'" ends his discussion of "Realism" in Chapter II. thus:

Il y a et il y aura toujours du conventionnel dans l'art, qu'il faut savoir accepter:—c'est ce qui a lieu toutes les fois que l'art s'obstine à la reproduction littérale de la réalité. Il ne faut pas vouloir imiter de trop près la nature, ni toute la nature: il faut savoir faire la part du feu; et, par parenthèse, M. Zola lui-même pourrait bien s'appliquer cette vérité, lui qui a la prétention de nous représenter la vie absolument telle qu'elle est. Il aura bien dire, le propre du vrai génie est de déformer la vision des choses sans que l'on puisse dire la moment où cette déformation commence. Tout pour lui devient symbole, tout se change et se grandit. Les choses les plus humbles revêtent une personnalité, les triviales mêmes se transfigurent.

HENRI DE RÉGNIER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Nowadays in Republican France men of great names spend their energy in diverse fashions alien to the habits of their ancestors, men mighty at the chase or in battle. Many, for instance, have turned to the cult of letters, and have made their way brilliantly. Melchior de Vogué made famous by his "Jean d'Agrève," and Philippe de Ségur, the historian of the Marechal de Luxembourg, are members of the Academy, and it seems to be only a question of time for Henri de Régnier to don the green uniform of the Immortals.

Régnier was born in 1864 at Honfleur, a little town all blossoming with Gothic buildings which looks over the estuary of the Seine. In this poetic scene he passed a good part of his youth. Régnier, one of whose aunts, the Comtesse de Brigy, Lady of Honour to the Queen Anne of Austria, was a noted précieuse, devoured all books, his youthful mind captivated with their paintings of life and men. When his family desired him to act he passed the examination of the Affaires Étrangères, after which he was left free to write as he liked.

Like many novelists of the day, he started with verse, and vers libres. Then he began, timidly at first, with tales still uncertain in form, which were followed by full-grown novels. But what marks him apart from his contemporaries, who incline with their maturity to become prose-writers pure and simple, is that he has returned faithfully to his first love.

Unlike a certain section of modern French novelists, over-occupied with social questions, Régnier does not claim to make useful literature. He writes for the joy of writing. Slightly disdainful of the present, which he regards with a fine indulgence more effective than satire, he does not proclaim that "Democracy is the tyranny of mediocrity," but simply contents himself by returning to the past, which is no longer deceiving, since it depends on us, the enchanted past which is really only asleep. He has tried to revive those memoirs, those diaries of witty women who, having frequented the Court and the world, note in piquant and malicious letters their observations on ideas, sentiments, manners. Almost all his novels ("Le Bon Plaisir," "La Canne de Jaspé," etc.) pass in the eighteenth century, and when he approaches our own days he does not yield up that sense of the art of living of which Talleyrand speaks.

Perhaps those who follow Renan's formula, that the novel should be an ethical treatise, will not care to make the acquaintance of these agreeable and diverting characters who confess that "un peu de crapule se pardonne en ce temps-ci." Not that they pass in thought or action beyond the limits of an amiable morality. Or will the author of "Le Trèfle noir" be reproached with introducing characters who hardly touch the central plot? Admitted, but only with the claim that they are so entertaining that one would not wish to do without them. Unquestionably "Le Mariage de Minuit" is that of his novels attaining the highest sustained level. From it I quote this delicate passage as an example of Régnier's tenderness of style and sentiment:

Ils s'assirent au rebord du fossé, le dos à l'herbe, et restèrent ainsi longtemps immobiles sans parler. Un bruit de pas les fit tressaillir. Quelqu'un marchait sur la route. L'homme passa près d'eux. C'était un ouvrier en bourgeron de toile, son paquet à l'épaule, au bout d'un bâton. Sa figure apparut en pleine lumière, tannée et saine. Il passa outre, et une fois passé tourna la tête, puis s'éloigna. . . . Philippe et Françoise se sourirent, puis leurs visages devinrent graves. . . . Qu'avaient-ils été pour ce passant inconnu?

Ce qu'ils étaient vraiment l'un pour l'autre ; un homme et une femme, car que leur importait qu'on les attendit là-bas dans ce vaste château impérial debout avec ses hautes fenêtres éclairées, ses meubles massifs, ses aigles, ses couronnes, ses abeilles, qu'importaient les valets du vestibule et les chevaux des écuries et la fortune et l'argent, pourvu que ce chemin fût solitaire, que cette lune fût brillante, que cette nuit fût silencieuse ? Ils n'étaient plus que deux êtres qui s'aimaient. L'amour leur battait au cœur. . . . Ils se prirent doucement sans que leurs lèvres unies se quittassent. La main de Philippe toucha la fleur d'argent de la ceinture de Françoise en disjoignant les pétales agrafes qui se heurtèrent avec un petit bruit argentin au bout du ruban souple. La lune de minuit atteignit le haut du ciel vide, et quand elle éclaira leurs visages ils se regardèrent de si près qu'ils ne se voyait plus, parce que leurs bouches se touchaient.

This lofty artist has revealed himself as a fine critic in pages devoted to Michelet, Kipling, Vigny, Oscar Wilde, and as a poet he must be considered among the foremost of living singers. Much of his earlier work is in vers libres. "Scène au Crépuscule" is ravishing :

En allant vers la ville où l'on chante aux terrasses
Sous les arbres en fleurs comme des bouquets de fiancées,
En allant vers la ville où le pavé des places
Vibre au soir rose et bleu d'un silence de danses lassées,
Nous avons rencontré les filles de la plaine
Qui s'en venaient à perdre haleine,
Et nous avons passé.

With "La Cité des Eaux," a monument raised to the glory of Versailles, the melancholy and incomparable, Régnier abandoned without hope of return the symbolist school and approached to the more classic forms of André de Chenier and Leconte de Lisle.

He is really a creator of images and a musician of rhythm. His technique is admirable, and he would be great among the great had he more emotional capacity. But Régnier has no faith. By that I simply mean the faculty of believing in a directing principle of energy rewarding all effort. The end of all art is essentially an affirmation singing out above all evil and despair a perpetual Hosanna to the Being which lives eternally. Régnier, who is a philosophic nihilist, would say that all effort is useless, and art merely a game to while away the too heavy hours. That is why one would never read his poetry to calm one's heart in moments of anguish. His verses are magnificent exercises of the jeux divins ; he possesses superb gifts of lyricism and language, the faculty of hearing the symphony of life around him ; but he is the slave of a metaphysical impotence with which is to be reproached the age rather than the poet. Faith is lacking. And Henri de Régnier will go down to posterity as an elegant stylist, a gatherer of rare rhythms, an exquisite dilettante.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "SEA"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am obliged to my friend Dr. Skeat for commenting (p. 643) on my letter about the word "Sea," published in THE ACADEMY (p. 626). We cannot see or know the origin of all the oldest words ; but we are free to guess at it, in the light of the phenomena of nature, as they meet the reason of mankind. How very ancient is humanity, and how few are the languages which can boast of ancient documentary evidence ! Huljan does not resemble celare so much as saius does saihwan. In favour of mare meaning "shining" one may cite mar-mor, mor-ning, and, perhaps, mar-tyr, a person who enlightens by his testimony. An anonymous correspondent advises me to read an Appendix to the "Short History of Indian Literature," by E. Horowitz. In the Polynesian languages, which are thought to contain some old Asiatic elements, there is a word marama for the moon. I gathered from Liddell and Scott that in the optic words, to which Dr. Skeat refers, the root oc or ok was older than op, and that okeanos must be a very ancient word. It may have been the name of a demon like Neptune, and possibly referred to the western strait of the Midland Sea, considered as the eye of the great unknown "whale-road" out beyond. It must be remembered that οφθαλμός itself was used in the sense of a "spring of water" in Byzantine Greek, for the study of which my lamented friend, Mrs. Bywater, has left a magnificent foundation, "Is not the eye itself a fount of salt water ?" The "root" seg, and the Germanic "types" saiwiz, or saigwiz, are mere matters of pedantic conjecture, without any documentary evidence. We have still to seek for the origin both of the verb see and of the noun sea. Is not saiwala, the Gothic for soul, seele, derived from saihwan ? Does it not mean the seer ? Is not the soul, more than the eye, that which sees ? Written words are but dead letters, except for those who know what things, thoughts, and sounds they represent. I do not think many readers of THE ACADEMY will follow Mr. Mayhew in his attempt to stifle (page 648) free thought and enquiry about comparative philology, which is so necessary a study if all the citizens of the world are to understand one another and live like a happy family. He is not acquainted with me, and, therefore, quite incompetent to judge how much I know of Gothic or Anglo-Saxon, which I have enjoyed now and then, among other things, for nearly thirty years. I would recommend all who wish to improve their minds to study the eleventh edition of Stamm-Heyne's "Ulfilas," published at Paderborn in 1908. How sad it is that only a part of the Gothic Bible has reached us. Ought not the great Bishop Ulfilas to be honoured by a church in London, or, at the least, a public statue, with quotations from King Alfred and the Preface to the Jacobean Bible on its pedestal ?

GOLF

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Professor Skeat, in his "Concise Dictionary," derives golf from Du. kolf, a club used to strike balls with. The "New English Dictionary" points out the phonetic and historical difficulties involved, but no better etymology has been suggested. Unfortunately, none of the early records of the word are descriptive, though the game is mentioned as early as 1457. That the Scotch game was identical with the Dutch game from which it took its name is improbable, but the following extract shows that the implements used were very similar :

Pila clavaria, quae clava plumbata expellitur, durioris spissioreque tomento infarcta. Al. Ballen die man mit Kolben schlegt. B. Schlachbal, koluebal : hanc crediderim esse, quae trigonalis Martiali, nisi fallor, dicitur, praeduram firmoque stipatam pilo. H. Pelota de los ciudadanos.

This is from the Nomenclator octilinguis of Hermann Germberg (1602), based on the earlier Nomenclator of H. Junius († 1575). The clava plumbata is not a bad description of a modern driver, while the ball represents pretty closely the old Scotch feather-ball with a cheaper stuffing (Tomentum, "flockes ; lockes clipped of white wooll," Cooper, 1573). The Spanish gloss is curious, and suggests that the ball was expensive, for a true, though apparently inferior, "feather-ball" seems to have been used by rustics :

Pila paganica. Mart. laxior, et vel lanea, vel pluma mollive pilo farcta, paganis, hoc est pagorum incolis usitata. Al. Dorffballen. B. Een lackenen oft sachten bal, pappart Flandris. H. Pelota de los aldeanos. (Ibid.)

SOME OF OUR NURSERY RHYMES

SIR,—The following is an attempt to show the hidden, often cryptic, interest lying in some of our common nursery rhymes, of which each successive modern corruption is the severing of another link with the past. "A. D." in THE ACADEMY, some months back, gave a hint of this, and expressed a wish to see something done in the sense of elucidating the rhymes. Though these lines are, of course, but an imperfect exponent of what lapse of time has dimmed, yet they may possibly form an (unworthy) contribution towards gaining his end.

Beginning, then, at haphazard, I select Old King Cole, that Celt of old days. His name, we know, should read Coel, and means "lot," in the sense of the Latin "sors." Pressing details is notoriously unsafe, but is not "three," the number of his fiddlers, mystic ? At any rate, his name appears among the Old British Kings. To him, too, perhaps alludes Ansonius, when hymning Sylvius, the good old sovereign (Sylvius, perchance in error, from sylva, "coed," instead of "coel," which would be Latin "sors," as we have seen).

After Kings comes, longo sed proximo intervallo, the rhymed thief. In Pat-a-cake, "mark it with T" seems to show the prize robber "taking the cake," the Aristophanic παραμυθός or meed of victory. Autolycus was no sneak-thief, but a mighty man of his hands—brigand, bandit, Borderer.

"Taffy was a thief" of this kidney. His "piece of beef" was a head of cattle, and his equally carnivorous enemy, a mere Saxon, Dane, or Pict, sings small comparatively in his autobiography. He has picked the bones, but stopped short of cracking them. The "cow" in "Hi diddle diddle" is explicable astrologically as the Bull Taurus, while "the little dog" is exactly "Canicula." "The cat-and-the-fiddle" hint of the music of the spheres sung in the Merchant of Venice, treated at large by Kepler, and handed down to all posterity by Pythagoras. The nursery must needs vibrate with the vibrations of the planets, resound with sounds that in the heavens vary with planetary rates of motion. A close study of the Phænomena, done into English by Robert Brown in 1885, will, perhaps, yet reveal Aratus's equivalent for "dish and spoon."

"The frog" who "would a-wooing go" refers to those frogs the French. "Qu'en disent les grenouilles?" was Modern Gaul's heraldic legend, and a Versailles Court cant word in 1791. (Lulelia has nothing in common with lutum, mud, that haunt of tadpoles, as some have vainly set forth. The Imperial Apostate Julian, who lived there, writes it Louketia.) Gammon and spinach are the green, or harvest, frog's legs, gamingly served up to the literary nursing—a Barmecide feast. "Rowley," or Roland, is namesake of Boiardo's hero, and Heigh ho! is amatory.

"The House that Jack Built" is suspiciously like unto the Hebrew parable, not of two talents—a respectable sum—but of a halfpenny, to wit, two zuzim:

This is Yahveh, Who vanquished death, which killed the butcher, who slew the ox, which drank the water, which quenched the fire, which burned the stick, which beat the dog, which worried the cat, which killed the kid, which my father bought for two zuzim.

More mythology seems represented by the old woman who swept the cobwebs from the sky—saving her sex, an Auster detergens. The Rev. G. W. Cox would see in her the Lady Moon routing the clouds' gossamer film.

Similarly, Hephæstos, or Satan, "running from Heaven," may be portrayed under the thin disguise of Old Daddy Long Legs. Uniform with his length of (lame or "game") leg is the Devil's spoon:

Therefor behoveth him a ful long spoon
That schall ete with a feend, quoeth Dan Chaucer (The S. T., 10916). "He wouldn't say his prayers"—i.e., he rebelled, from curst pride, whence his rapid descent "downstairs." Him his victor, ῥῆπε ποδὸς τεταγμένον, as was most justly due.

Mother Hubbard dates at least from the Border feuds, what time the lady of the house served up spurs for the last course, prefiguring a raid—booted and spurred—on England, to replenish the empty larder withal. Lord Oxford's classical sermon on this text is not to be taken absolutely as Gospel.

METRICAL EXPERIMENTS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am sorry that I was not able to comment last week on "T. S. O.'s" bold essays in metre, in your issue of March 28th. Since "T. S. O." is good enough to accept my method of expression, I confess that his verses do remind me a little of "Lost Mr. Blake." I offer a suggestion quite tentatively, without feeling at all sure of its value, that he should try the effect of internal rhyme or assonance. His care and taste will enable him to do so without losing the unity of the line. I do not find his essays without the poetry which he disclaims for them.

RE THE "OLDHAM" BEQUEST OF "STRAD" INSTRUMENTS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Twelve months ago considerable publicity was given in the Press generally to the subject of the "Oldham Bequest," consisting of a priceless collection of art treasures in the shape of Stradivari instruments left "to the British Nation" by the late C. J. Oldham, Esq., F.R.C.S.

There are many devoted fiddle-lovers, in England and elsewhere, who are promising themselves the artistic treat and practical education in the Luthiers' art they hope to receive by an inspection of the bequest at the British Museum, there being at present, so far as is known, not one solitary example of this master's work to be seen in any museum throughout the United Kingdom.

I am, therefore, desired by my Council, as voicing the wish of the members of our Society, to ask you to be so good as to now give equal publicity to the fact that the bequest was declined by the Trustees of the British Museum in May last, the public not being informed, and further that the bequest was privately sold the following month, the proceeds being distributed to the residuary legatees.

Naturally, my Council does not desire me to comment on the action of those concerned, as it is possible that satisfactory explanations may ultimately be forthcoming. The fact remains, however, that the news will prove a great disappointment to a very large proportion of the fiddle-loving world, amateurs and others alike. I trust you will give publicity to this matter in the public interest.

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer AND PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot call some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY

Every Friday. Twopence.

EDITED BY PERCY L. PARKER.

PRICE THREEPENCE

The Chelsea Historical Pageant

will be held, by the kind permission of FIELD-MARSHAL SIR GEORGE WHITE, G.C.B., O.M., V.C., Governor, and the Commissioners of the Royal Hospital, in Old Ranelagh Gardens, adjoining the Hospital, and five minutes' walk from Sloane Square, on the following dates, commencing at 4 o'clock:—

Thursday, June 25

Friday, June 26

Saturday, June 27

Monday, June 29

Wednesday, July 1

No effort has been spared to make this, the first London Pageant, in every sense worthy of the occasion; beautiful in colour, in movement, in music, form, and setting; interesting dramatically from first to last; and thoroughly representative of Chelsea, which holds a place second to none of the historic quarters of London in the richness of her records and the number of great folk who have been successively associated with her past.

Plans of the covered Grand Stand may be seen, and seats can be booked on and after April 21st, at the Pageant Room, Town Hall, King's Road, Chelsea (entrance from Manor Gardens); hours 10 to 5; Saturday, 10 to 1. Also from the following agents:—

Messrs. Keith Prowse and Co.; Ashton and Mitchell; The District Messenger Co., Ltd.; Alfred Hays; Lacon and Oller; Leader and Co.; Cecil Roy; Webster and Girling; Webster and Waddington; The Army and Navy Stores; Ross and Reid; Thomas Cook and Son; The American Express Co.; and other principal agents.

The prices of seats are £2 2s., £1 1s., 15s., 10s. 6d., 5s. All seats are under cover, numbered and reserved. Early application is essential in order to secure the best positions.

A booklet containing full particulars of the Pageant, with lists of Committees, Guarantors, and Subscribers, and illustrated by fifteen reproductions of interesting old Chelsea pictures and portraits, can be obtained at the Pageant Room, and of agents and booksellers, price 2d. (by post 3½d.), and on application to the Press Representative: SYDNEY GLOVER, 1 Clifford's Inn, Fleet St., E.C.

MAROTZ

BY JOHN AYSCOUGH

A Tale of Sicily and Southern Italy

MAROTZ is a story apart from the ordinary run of novels. It grips the reader with a sense of its truthfulness. The quiet of contemplative life in a Sicilian convent is contrasted with the more passionate lives of the Southern peoples. The minor characters are drawn with much loving sympathy, and several of them are worthy of a place in the remembrance of cultured readers. Marotz herself is a magnificent creation.

THE WORLD THAT NEVER WAS

"The World that Never Was" is a children's book of an entirely novel kind. It is specially written for children, but the interest and humour of it appeal almost as strongly to adult as to younger readers. They will read of Magog's magic snuff-box, which kept growing till it was too big for Olive to carry, and when they reach the part where the Black Kangaroo snatches it, leaps, and vanishes, with the faithful policeman, P.C. 14, clinging round its neck—knowing what is to happen if Olive fails to get it back again, they won't shut the book till they know whether she does. It is the newest, quaintest children's book that has appeared since "Alice in Wonderland."

LIFE AND LETTERS

MR. BRYCE, the British Ambassador at Washington, has evidently been acquiring wisdom and enlightenment since his stay in the United States. Some time ago we had occasion to point out to him that his views on the subject of contemporary poetry were in need of "overhauling," and it is with pleasure that we are able to record the fact that he is advancing by leaps and bounds. He has lately been asking an American audience why it is that men of genius and the highest culture are no longer on the side of "Liberalism." We are not sure that we should altogether endorse his explanation of the phenomenon, but we can at any rate say that for Mr. Bryce to have arrived at the state of mind in which he is able to ask himself such a question is a thing very much to his credit. The beneficent effect of a sojourn in the United States of America in the case of those who are infected with an excess of Democratic acid (so to speak) can hardly be overestimated. The cleverest people in the world sometimes stand in need of that form of instruction which is usually reserved for the most simple: the object-lesson. If only our prominent popular demagogues and our brilliantly clever "philosophical Radicals" could be allowed to spend, each in turn, a year in a country where the government "of the people by the people and for the people" has been allowed to work itself out to its logical conclusion, as it has in the United States, what an effect would be produced. The effect would be so violent that they would probably be in danger of rushing to an extreme position on the other side, and, in that case, they might be invited to spend another year in Russia, where they might, with equal advantage, study the ripe fruits of government "of the people by the official for the official." At the end of it all they would be in a position to revise their opinions as to the beneficent results of the French Revolution, and to go into the question of whether Macaulay was a "historian" or something altogether different which is known by a much less flattering name.

In the January number of the Church Quarterly Review appears a just and wise examination of the question whether a Royal Commission is necessary with a view to reforming the University of Oxford. It is written by one of the small number of University authorities whose influence is likely to be felt outside their University—Dr. Spooner, the Warden of New College. We do not call their numbers small by way of reproach, for many officials unknown outside their University or College have done more useful work within those spheres than colleagues well-known to the world have done elsewhere. The qualities required are different, frequently even incompatible, and at any rate rarely combined. Dr. Spooner's broad contention is that from past experience a Commission may be expected not only to do no good but to do the positive harm which that expedient has done more than once before, and that a Commission would not touch the authorities in whose hands the power for increased service to Society lies—namely, those independent and far wealthier corporations the Colleges.

We have space for little more than quotations of the admirable maxims propounded by Dr. Spooner, and can only refer our readers to the study of his able paper. It is well and clearly written, and will prove anything but dull reading. Dr. Spooner writes:

The interposition of the Government, and so of political partizanship, in educational affairs which would be the inevitable accompaniment to the appointment of a Commission has not been so satisfactory either in the case of other departments of English education or in that of the Universities of Scotland and Ireland as to make any but fanatics anxious to see it extended to the internal affairs of the older English Universities. The State has ever proved more of a stepmother than of a real mother to learning and education.

These are precisely the sentiments expressed by the gentler language of the schools, which we have been shouting during the past year in the strident tones required in order to be heard in the Babel of the daily and weekly Press. We do not know whether Dr. Spooner means this Government presided over by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman or Mr. Asquith—we think not—or any Government whatever, we mean the latter.

We cannot quite sympathise even with Dr. Spooner's more moderate thunders against "the large number of idle and luxurious undergraduates by which the University and its teachers are, it is contended, encumbered and overwhelmed." (The italics are ours.) We have before protested at the naughty vandalism of these babies. But surely a few dogs' tails, even of the best breeds, should be, in the eyes of the Politician and the Social Reformer, a low price to pay for bringing Alcibiades under Socratic influence. It is as much the duty of the Universities and their teachers to control erratic flames of temperament as to blow up feeble sparks of knowledge with the bellows of the lecture and examination. We doubt whether the main body of weak Exhibitioners eventually do better service to the State and society than the ill-behaved boys, who are such a scandal to Dr. Paget and even to Dr. Gore.

As regards the purely scholastic end of a University, we can again fully sympathise with Dr. Spooner when he states that:

A University exists primarily not to foster or enforce a certain standard of education in bodies external to itself, but to impart the highest kind of instruction and training in different branches of knowledge to all those who wish to avail themselves of its services."

(The italics are again ours.) This is the liberal view of a University. Again, we have expressed it many times. Attempts are continually being made by what is called, broadly, the Liberal Party in politics, practically the Radical, or Socialistic, or Nonconformist section of it, to cut the University coat out of the working-man's cloth; to make use of the revenues and the very names of universities to found final grade board schools; in fact, to abolish the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin. It is for this reason that we have so often, and even violently, deplored the growing practice of highly-trained and able writers connected with the Universities of devoting their talents exclusively to turning out crowds of superficial upper-grade text-books, and neglecting serious work on their particular subjects. They seem to us to repudiate the very mother that bore them; their education might as well have stopped at the Training College.

Though we are generally in favour of retaining rather than of abolishing forms which have been long established, on the ground that they give colour to life, we are inclined to think that "kissing the book" as a preventive of perjury might as well be abolished. It is a nasty custom, and possibly unwholesome, and it would be difficult to say what effect, if any at all, it has on the witness whose veracity it is supposed to stimulate. The New Testament has now become so common a volume, through injudicious hawking, that it commands no more respect than the railway-guides and hotel advertisements among which it is disseminated with pious intent. The particular copies tendered to witnesses are also usually not only of the commonest, but of the most unclean. We have also often wondered whether any text at all is contained within their covers. A great poet used to relate that when as a sceptical school-boy he was taken too much to church by a devout mother, he had Théophile Gautier's "Mademoiselle de Maupin" bound as a Church Service, in which he read with edifying devotion. We wonder what the nasty little volumes tendered by Commissioners of Oaths contain. Perhaps ready-reckoners, provided with the idea that they are for use on the Day of Judgment. That is a fine idea, which might have good effect. We present it to the Law. As to kissing, we wonder whether the volumes are ever kissed. Although we have often made statements upon oath without committing perjury or refusing to "kiss the book," we have never been able to stomach the actual kiss; a stage salute has always proved sufficient.

The other day, a man giving evidence in a case before magistrates kissed the Testament and proceeded to answer questions seemingly quite truly, when the eye of the counsel who was examining him suddenly fell on features so incompatible with a due regard for the text that he felt bound to inquire whether the witness was by any chance a Jew. He owned to the fact, but excused himself by explaining that he was an English Jew, and did not "follow religion much." On further inquiry it transpired that he did not know what the Pentateuch was. However, he was put through the ceremony of kissing that compilation. It is a question whether a "Testament," having a suggestion of a will about it, and consequently of valuables, would not have had more effect on the mind of this ingenuous Jew than a "Pentateuch," which would rather suggest a hall of entertainment or a residential space.

We also wonder whether the formality prevents the conscientious witness from concealing facts when a higher duty, unrecognised by English law, compels him to do so. We hope and think not. We remember hearing a just and eminent Judge, who still adorns the Bench with general esteem, trying a case of wife-murder committed under great provocation, in which not only the children but the remoter relatives and neighbours of the murderer committed "perjury" up to the eyes in order to save the murderer, without incurring even a remonstrance from any one. The poor murderer was hanged, deeply penitent, justly we think. It was a case when human justice corresponded best with Divine mercy by severity. But we have had special confidence in that Judge ever since, because he appeared to us to recognise that to those half-barbarous witnesses true equity lay for them in legal perjury. The Court volume of the Gospels got worn that day, by a right, illegal usage.

A correspondent writes:—I see by a paragraph in the Westminster Gazette that an immense advance has been made since the early days of State elementary education. At first, it seems, the list of compulsory subjects was restricted absolutely to Reading, Writing, and Arithmetic; now, drawing, observation lessons, Nature-study, music, hygiene, and physical training are all of obligation:

To a great extent (says the Westminster) we owe this development to the enlightened policy of the Progressist thinkers amongst us.

I am sure we ought to be very grateful to the Progressists, but why does not the writer of the paragraph include the New Pronunciation of the English Language in his list? I live opposite to a school where music is carefully and constantly taught; the children have acquired the difficult art of dropping a semitone per minute. But the accent employed is even more interesting than the tone-system. Here is a favourite school-song:

Flahrs, luvly flahrs, in a garden yeh my, see,
The rowses there with their reuby lip,
Penks the 'unny by loves teh sip,
Teulips, teulips, gy as a butterfly's wing,
Merrygolds rich as the crahn of a king,
Rich as the crahn of a king.
But none seh fair teh me,
None seh fair teh me,
As these wild wood flahrs,
Sweet wild flahrs.

It should be noted that the present orthography of the English language being clumsy and antiquated, the true pronunciation is very imperfectly given. We must wait, I suppose, for the production of a Progressist Alphabet before we can denote with any accuracy the very interesting vowel modifications which may be heard during the singing of "Flahrs."

We have already indicated in these columns our lack of belief in the Licensing Bill. Still, we cannot help admiring thoroughgoing enthusiasm, whatever the cause in which it is displayed, and it is a pleasure to note the fiery zeal that Mr. Winston Churchill brings to the support of the Bill.

All social reform (he says in his manifesto to the electors of North-West Manchester), all commercial efficiency, wait on its success. The health of English manhood, the happiness of English homes, the virtue and ascendancy of our race and age are involved in this tremendous effort.

The trumpet gives forth no uncertain sound, and this is as it should be. One respects Mr. Churchill, and one wishes him good luck in his electoral adventure. He is a zealot, even a fanatic, in the cause of teetotalism, but he must obviously suffer many discomforts and inconveniences for the sake of his belief.

For we are quite sure that with such a thoroughgoing advocate it is not a matter of words merely. There are said to be proprietors of Liberal papers who suffer no strong drink to appear on their dinner-tables, but are by no means averse from whiskey-and-soda in the smoking-room. Such men are, no doubt, good Liberals, but not such good Liberals as they might be. But Mr. Winston Churchill is of the stuff of which martyrs are made. The appearance of the champagne is, one feels, the signal for him to quit the tables of the greatest, and he must be quite debarred from membership of those gilded drinking-shops which are called clubs. This must be both unpleasant and inconvenient; but if all reform, commercial efficiency, health, happiness, virtue, and the unfading crown promised in the Scriptures to the Upper Dog are involved in the matter of Drink, we feel assured that Mr. Winston Churchill cannot hesitate. Yet, on consideration, why, holding these very strong views, should he support the Licensing Bill? There is not the faintest jot or tittle of evidence to show that it will lessen by one farthing the drink bill of a single drunkard in England; it may inflict some pecuniary loss on certain people connected with the brewing industry; it can do no good to any human being. Sadly, then, we must retract; we must confess with regret that Mr. Winston Churchill bears considerably more resemblance to a politician than to a martyr.

A recent number of the Architectural Review deprecates adverse criticism of the assessors' final selection of a design for the new New London County Hall as "unsportsman-like" on the part of the unsuccessful competitors. That may or not be so. But are they the only people who object? Is it not possible that others, not competitors, and therefore not open to suspicion of envy, may feel equally strong objections against Mr. Knott's design on its own merits, or demerits? It must have been chosen for its internal convenience; for, as regards its external elevation, with a monotonous façade corrugated by the stale device of rustication, and having an imposing flight of steps leading down into the mud, it is scarcely calculated to redeem the ugliness of its surroundings.

We are glad to print in our correspondence Mr. Hankin's chivalrous championship of a stuffed lion—i.e., the play produced by the Stage Society on Sunday, April 5th. But we cannot admit that one of the functions of the Stage Society is the production of stupid plays by stupid beginners, though we share his hope that the author has learnt something. "Obvious sincerity and conviction" are not sufficient passports to the Temple of Drama, or they should not be so regarded; otherwise we should have to include a great many silly plays which Mr. Hankin himself would scarcely admit within the pale. We think that the case against Mr. Redford has been damaged by pushing forward an insignificant and tedious piece of evidence. A work that chronicles the sayings and doings and seductions of half-witted people, unaccompanied by any dramatic point of view, has less artistic significance than a cinematograph. There is a difference between the nakedness of the Rokeby Venus and that of a peep-show. We prefer The Broken Melody to The Breaking Point.

At first the alabaster's selfish round
Held all thy fragrance in its prison hard,
Its cold, ungenerous continent, that bound,
Close in itself, the wedded fumes of nard
And cassia and sweet stactē and ripe myrrh :
As in a mine the gold is rich in vain
Or in its cave the jewel cannot blaze.

She brake the box : lo ! all the odours stir
And flood the house with sweetness, like a main
That breaks its dykes and drowns the lowland ways.

So my rich love, lock'd in my heart for thee,
Did yield no perfume to the world beside :
But, breaks my heart, and all that's sweet in me,
My incense to thee, scatters far and wide.

JOHN AYS COUGH.

CROCUSES

Here on the grassy banks in gala dress—
The tinted robes of fragrant-breathing spring,
In yellow, gold, and purple blossoming,
They woo the nipping air in loveliness !
The spiral grass enfolds them to caress
These new-born harbingers of love, that bring
A glow of joy beyond imagining !
A thrilling hope in winter's saddened stress !

The pallid sunrays cannot smite them yet,
Until the rustling rain-drops fall to blight
Their pensive beauty and bedim their light,
Amid the clamour of the winds that fret,
Amid the chills that wander to beset
The tenuous blooms in April's transient flight.

THE EVER UNFORTUNATE

The Royal House of Stuart ; from its Origin to the Accession of the House of Hanover. By SAMUEL COWAN, J.P.
2 Vols. (Greening and Co., 42s. net.)

SUCH a subject as the history of the illustrious but ill-starred Stewart dynasty deserved something better than an industrious compilation like this of Mr. Cowan's. Except for the portraits, which are well-chosen and excellently reproduced, we find it difficult to say anything in commendation of this work. It is compiled rather than written, is by no means invariably accurate, and is quite uninspired. 'Tis true, 'tis pity ; and pity 'tis 'tis true.

There is, perhaps, some excuse for the annalistic form of the narrative in the extreme scantiness of material available to a writer on the earlier Stewarts. Yet surely the career of the first James of Scotland should have afforded something approaching inspiration to any writer with a grain of imagination and a not unpractised pen. Mr. Cowan, who is known as a sturdy champion of Mary Queen of Scots, might have been thought to possess some of the former quality ; his experience in writing should certainly have saved him from mere baldness and crudity of expression. We suppose that a certain allowance of Scotticisms—such as, "homologate," "conform" (adj.), should be allowed to a Scotsman ; but we really must protest, in the name of the English language, against such vulgarisms as the constant omission of the preposition to after "write," "wrote," and the clumsy schoolboy locution, "landing at Kent," "at Lorraine." Our long-lost friend "genteel" also makes a more strange than welcome reappearance, and the odious and all too common "got married" is much in evidence. The roul of an army is with this writer always "route," and if the Regent Moray was, indeed, Queen Mary's "uterine" brother, as Mr. Cowan says, we have always misconceived the meaning of the word.

We cannot profess any competence to discuss the obscure question of the origin of the Stewarts, and the material for the early history of the House is, as the author frequently complains, very fragmentary. The Stewarts became a Royal House through the marriage of Walter, sixth High Steward of Scotland, to the Lady Marjory Bruce. Mr. Cowan tells us that their son, King Robert II., was sometimes called "King Blear Eye," from an accident at his birth ; but he makes no comment upon the inconsistency of this with the name "Queen Bleary's Cross," given to a stone pillar which formerly marked the traditional spot of the accident to his mother. He makes Walter, the Steward, die in 1327 in one place and in 1326 in another. Why Edward III.'s conduct in compelling the Scotch King David to pay the cost of his maintenance was "tyrannical," because he was married to Edward's sister, is not quite clear ; and we learn on the next page that his captivity "was not evidently very oppressive."

Mr. Cowan is not infrequently obscure, and constantly repetitive. In a passage about James III. and his rebellious son (I., 269) it is almost impossible to discover which is meant by "the King ;" and two pages later the statement that at the Battle of Sauchie "the first division of the rebels was led by Lord Hailes" is followed, without explanation, by a sentence including "Hailes" as among the Royalists who were slain. As for repetition, it is a constant habit. One example is the fatal combat of the clans on the North Inch, Perth. After a full relation (p. 146), in which, however, the name of only one clan is given, and there is no reference to Scott's "Fair Maid," we get (p. 162) a passage beginning, "It was during this reign that the clan fight took place at Perth," &c.

The assertion that "no proper attempt was made to effect an amicable settlement" before Flodden seems hardly consistent with the preceding narrative ; and a sentence (p. 312) concerning advice given to James IV. on the fatal field is grammatically faulty. An unsophisticated reader would be puzzled as to whether James V. ultimately married Marie de Bourbon or Magdalen de Valois, and might be equally at a loss as to the identity of the "Lord Methven" whom, he is informed, Queen Margaret desired to divorce. We learn, however, on a later page that Margaret (some of whose interesting letters to her brother Henry VIII. were printed in extenso):

had the great misfortune of having a violent, unscrupulous, and unfaithful husband in the Earl of Angus, and an intemperate, albeit drunken husband in Lord Methven.

The Battle of Shrewsbury is variously stated to have been fought in 1403 and 1407, and Richard III. is made to succeed his brother Edward IV. We have grave doubts as to the historical accuracy of certain other statements in the first volume, especially those inspired by the author's bias against Moray, the villain of the piece. It is certainly not "very probable" that the only person concerned in his death was Queen Elizabeth. Nor do we believe the assertion to be tenable that Norfolk "fell in love" with Mary Queen of Scots. Trajan's motto (p. 475) seems to have been misprinted; and French is usually erratically accented.

The present reviewer is far from sharing the popular view as to the inaccessibility of the Scot to a sense of humour. But Mr. Cowan is hardly a shining proof of its falsity. He writes concerning Janet Lady Glamis, that she was tried "for the inexcusable crime of poisoning her husband;" and why, if "he was rather an enemy than otherwise to the Douglas faction" (her own family), it can be said to "complicate the matter" is scarcely apparent. In Vol. II. we are informed that Naseby "was an unfortunate battle for the King," and that "the King was in trouble after this battle." We learn also that "Parliament and Army were not altogether in sympathy," and that Queen Mary II. of England "stationed constables at the corners of the streets who were to capture puddings and pies on the way to bakers' ovens," by way of getting the Sabbath observed. But perhaps the most signal instance of the author's simplicity (shall we call it?) is a note on Stair's wife, the connection of whom with a celebrated character of Sir Walter's is not, by-the-bye, hinted at:

Stair's wife was nicknamed the Witch of Endor. It was said she had cast spells on those whom she disliked, and that she had once been seen in the likeness of a cat, seated on the cloth of State by the side of the Lord High Commissioner. This is a pure fable.

A later passage concerning the popular legend as to the upright coffin at Kirkliston is only less naïf; and there are others—Cromwell's pact with the Devil before Worcester, for instance.

Mr. Cowan's historical competence may be gauged by his indiscriminating citations of historians such as Hume, and his entire neglect of modern authorities like Dr. Gardiner. He follows Macaulay almost blindly, and is naturally quite unfair to James I. and James II., though it is true he shows some appreciation of the Chevalier de St. George, and even in one place says a word for Claverhouse. But what shall we say of a historian who considers the Massacre of Glencoe "the most outstanding Scottish event" in William III.'s reign, and does not even mention the Darien affair, which so nearly wrecked the Union? That the English people did not love Elizabeth would be an assertion hard to defend; and that "Laud and his party were plotting the restoration of Popery" is as far as possible from the truth. That the Infanta was "much attached" to Prince Charles is a statement on a level with that connecting Buckingham's assassination with his general unpopularity. Why does Mr. Cowan call the Grand Remonstrance "the famous remembrance," and the Occasional Conformity Act "the Toleration Act for the Protection of Episcopacy"? Why does he term Monmouth "heroic" and write of Shaftesbury being "elected" President of the Council? He frequently contrasts Episcopacy with Protestantism, and appears to be under the impression that English clergymen always preach in black gowns (II., 462).

Among minor inaccuracies we have Henrietta Maria landing in Burlington Bay (II., 97), a Secretary of State named Morrin (221), and, apparently (278), a confusion between James II. and his grandfather, for the former was certainly not deficient in personal courage, whatever other faults he may have had.

Mr. Cowan indulges in no less than three discussions upon the conduct of his countrymen in surrendering Charles I. to the English Army—all of them futile. We fancy that he exaggerates Queen Anne's share in the Union, on which he discourses sensibly, and he writes as though William of Orange had been the first who ever entertained an idea of such a thing. Some interesting documents and letters are interspersed in the narrative, though their relevance to the subject may often be questioned; but Mr. Cowan never seems to have formulated in his mind a clear conception or scheme of his work, so that these things seem to tumble in haphazard. The execution of Baillie of Jerviswoode was doubtless an iniquitous proceeding, and one which created much stir in Scotland, but to call it "the last event of moment in the life of Charles II." is surely a somewhat curious use of language. The reconciliation of the whilom Merry Monarch to Roman Catholicism might, one would say, take precedence of it. We can hardly include Mr. Samuel Cowan, J.P., in the ranks of historians.

A REAL TRANSLATION

The Tragedies of Sophocles. Translated by DEAN PLUMPTRE. (Routledge, 1s.)

DEAN PLUMPTRE'S translation of Sophocles has many more competitors to-day than when he first gave it to the world. But it may still claim to hold its own as one of the most satisfying of them all. Sophocles is perhaps the most difficult of the three tragedians to render happily into English, for his work bears, more obviously than in the case either of Æschylus or of Euripides, the stamp of a high and beautiful personality. We think that a true lover of Sophocles would find it a hard task to be entirely just to Euripides, and we are certain that he will regard Æschylus as the forerunner of a greater man. "Æschylus does right, but does not know why he does it," but Sophocles strives to do right, because he knows what right is. Euripides very rarely rose to any such level, and while it is indeed hard to believe that the same man can have produced the wretched screed which goes by the name of the "Electra" of Euripides, and also such a play as the "Medea," or, in a lesser degree, the "Hippolytos," in reading Sophocles we are tortured by no such unevenness of value. It is not merely that the tone of Sophocles' plays is lofty throughout; it is their deep and wholesome conviction, their sublimity of faith, which lifts them above the moral level of all other Greek poetry—and, indeed, above all Greek philosophy. Plato cannot offer, for all his rainbow imagination, a higher hope than that which Sophocles can feel and convey in the farewell speech of Antigone, or in the deep humanity of the closing scene of the "Aias."

Resignation and power, intense religious feeling and human sympathy as intense, an exquisite sense of dramatic atmosphere, are the great glories of Sophocles, and above all, for him death is not the end. The life beyond, though it be seen but through a glass darkly, is not the murky world of gibbering shades that Odysseus saw and that Achilles dreaded. Nor is it an aimless "paradise" of emotionless happiness, but a consummation of hopes, a sweeping away of doubts and injustice, a reunion of friends, a completion rather than an end of life; in short, the future promised of the Mysteries, the gift of the incarnate Divinity:

κεῖνοι βροτῶν, οἱ ταῦτα δερχόμενοι τέλη μύλω' ἐς Ἄιδου· τοῖσδε γὰρ μόνον ἐκεῖ ζῆν ἔστι, τοῖς ἑλλοίοις πάντ' ἐκεῖ κακὰ.

Dean Plumptre was singularly happy in his rendering of those passages which bring out this dignity and hope in death. True, it would be hard to miss the spirit of a play like the "Antigone." Antigone glories in her deed; scarcely more than a shadow of regret falls across her mind for the life she is leaving; there is a future for her beyond the gates of the living tomb. And it is she and not Kreon, who triumphs; the sentiment she inspires is not so much pity as a joyful admiration and understanding. And even in the splendid lyric passage, the most famous of all dramatic lyrics—ἔπος δολικὰν μάχην—the prevailing note, below the poignant human tragedy, is but a prelude to the still more magnificent outburst at the very gates of the grave. The contrast is sharp, but not inharmonious, and Dean Plumptre's translation well performs the task of reproduction:

Yes! O ye men of this my fatherland,
Ye see me on my way,
Life's last long journey, gazing on the sun,
His last rays watching, now and nevermore;
Alone he leads me, who has room for all,
Hades, the lord of death,
To Acheron's dark shore,
With neither part nor lot in marriage rites,
No marriage hymn resounding in my ears,
But Acheron shall claim me as his bride.

O tomb, my bridal chamber, vaulted home,
Guarded right well for ever, where I go
To join mine own, of whom, of all that die
As most in number Persephassa owns;
And I, of all the last and lowest, wend
My way below, life's little span unfilled;
And yet I go, and feed myself with hopes
That I shall meet them.

In his translation of the "Aias," the height of tragic despair is reached in the rendering of the chorus—ὡ σκότος ἐμὸν φῶς:

O dark that art my light,
O gloom to me most bright,
Take me, take me as your habitant,
Take me, for neither to the race of gods,
Nor yet of men enduring but a day
Can I, as worthy, look
For any help in need,
But she, the child of Zeus,
Goddess of mightiest power,
Mocks at me unto death.
Where from her presence 'scape,
Where wandering shall I dwell?
Ah! O my friends, if my life,
Like the life of these brutes, is brought low
And our chase is the hunting of fools,
Would that the host wielding its two-handed spear
Might smite me down at a stroke.

O ye paths of the wave!
O ye caves of the sea!
O thou grove on the shore!
Long time, long time have ye kept me,
Where Troia stretches her coasts;
But never, yea, never again,
Shall ye receive me alive;
This let the wise understand.
O ye waters that flow
Hard by, as the stream runneth on,
Scamandros, by Argives beloved,
Never again shall ye see
This man who speaks to you now,
Like whom . . . (though the vaunt be great Yet will I speak it out)
In all the army that from Hellas came,
Troia found no one else;
And now I lie in this dishonoured plight.

The excuse for so long a quotation must be that by no other means is it possible to convey any adequate idea of the power and fidelity of rendering with which Dean Plumptre endowed the lyric passages of his translation. Indeed, it is doubtful whether any other translator has ever conveyed with such force the peculiar charm of Greek dramatic lyrics. A prose translation cannot pretend to do so: a rhyming translation introduces an element so utterly foreign to Greek tragedy as to destroy at the outset all sense of reality. A still greater skill might have preserved strophic-antistrophic syllabic correspondence, but apart from the lack of that correspondence, it is hard to see that the rendering fails in any way to present the values of the original. The translator succeeds in making the work of Sophocles known to many who have no Greek: but more than this, he interprets for them the very spirit of the work: and it is to be hoped that this reprint may carry further still the knowledge of that spirit, at once the strongest, the tenderest, and the purest expression of religious conviction in the unspoiled days of Greece.

THE GREAT ARCHBISHOP

Life of William Laud. By the Rev. W. L. MACKINTOSH, M.A. (Masters and Co., Ltd., 3s. 6d.)

FEW characters in history have been the subject of so much wilful misunderstanding as Archbishop Laud. Macaulay, writing in the true spirit of Whig intolerance, declared that he entertained for the great Royalist Prelate "a more unmitigated contempt than for any other character in our history." On another occasion he dismisses him as a "ridiculous bigot," and this verdict has been subsequently adopted by scores of writers whose acquaintance with the subject has in all probability been limited to a cursory reading of Macaulay's famous essay. It has been reserved for a small group of less partial and better qualified historians in our own time to rescue from obloquy the memory of a saintly man and a wise administrator.

Mr. Mackintosh's biography leaves little to be desired. Writing from the avowed standpoint of an Anglo-Catholic, he nevertheless contrives to render full justice to his opponents. If we have one complaint to make, it is that Mr. Mackintosh has thought it necessary at times to adopt a more or less apologetic attitude on questions where we should have imagined no apology was needed.

It is impossible to write of Laud without taking some account of the religious condition of England at the time in which he lived. Laud was pre-eminently a religious reformer. On his accession to the Metropolitan See he found the Church of England in a divided state, and he set himself, with characteristic zeal and determination, to evolve order out of chaos, to "build up the walls of Jerusalem." He was by instinct a traditionalist, and in the Anglican Communion he found something that responded to the deepest needs of his nature. He loved her stately ritual, her well-ordered services. It was the Church round which had centred all that was best and most truly lovable in the English character. For Puritanism, with its separatist tendencies, he had neither pity nor toleration. The Ecclesia Anglicana was to him the historic Catholic Church of this country. Episcopacy was not merely a useful form of Church government, admirably adapted to the ecclesiastical requirements of the times, as many of the seventeenth-century divines appear to have taught; it was of the esse of a true Church. The Puritan conventicle had become a centre of unrestrained lawlessness. False doctrine, heresy, and schism were rampant. The stone altars had been removed from the churches, to be defiled by the village dogs. The Holy Table was frequently placed in the middle of the church, and the members of the congregation placed their hats upon it. Laud ruled that it should be transferred to the east end of the church, and reverently railed round. "The altar," he said boldly to his judges at his trial, "is the greatest place of God's residence upon earth—greater than the pulpit; for there it is, Hoc est Corpus Meum, this is My Body; but in the other it is at most but Hoc est Verbum Meum, this is My word; and a greater reverence is due to the Body than to the Word of the Lord." The Archbishop's action was the signal for a storm of malignant misrepresentation and abuse. Public opinion, carefully directed by a gang of unscrupulous fanatics, was to prove too strong for the reformer, and it became apparent that Laud's murder was only a question of time and opportunity.

Of the so-called trial it is difficult to write calmly and dispassionately. Deprived of counsel, and with mountains of manufactured evidence produced against him, the aged Prelate was yet able to establish his innocence, and the baffled and infuriated Commons had to resort to the unworthy device of a Bill of Attainder. His only crime had been that he had proved too faithful a son of the Church for whose sake he was prepared to lay down his life.

What clamours and slanders I have endured for labouring to keep a uniformity in the external service of God, according to the doctrine and discipline of this Church, all men know and I have abundantly felt.

These are among his last words, and in them may be found the key to the whole of his ecclesiastical policy.

The extent to which the English Church has benefited by the example and martyrdom of Laud it is impossible to surmise. He has been accused of superstition, and certain isolated and detached passages from his diary have been adduced in support of the charge. We need not labour the point. But his munificent bequests to the University of Oxford, his patronage of learning and the arts, his friendship with Chillingworth and Hales, afford abundant proof that he was free from the least suspicion of intellectual intolerance. His collection of Oriental manuscripts was unequalled at that time in any part of the world. In the words of one of the ablest and most sympathetic of his recent biographers :

He had . . . many of the characteristics of the great Prelates of the Renaissance, with just that change which its ideas underwent on English soil. He was a great builder and a patron of art, a scholar, and a politician, a priest with a love of comely order and the seemingly dignities of public worship. He delighted to read and to control the literature of the day; he would accept dedications and encourage struggling writers. There was a certain formality about it all, viewed from without, a sort of sober stateliness of pose such as the Italian painters give to their church ceremonials and the backgrounds of their cardinals. But with Laud there was a more than English impatience at any ceremonial that was meaningless, and there was behind all the deep piety that let no touch of paganism from scholarship or art enter into the scheme of his life.

We are grateful to Mr. Mackintosh for his frank and fearless presentation of the great Archbishop who, in the expressive words of Canon Mozley, "saved the English Church."

PORTABLE PROPERTY

Precious Stones. By W. GOODCHILD, M.B., Ch.B. With a Chapter on Artificial Stones by ROBERT DYKES. (Constable and Co., 6s.)

THIS is a simple and business-like book about precious stones. It is not a strictly exact manual upon a mineralogical subject, and for the most part the author's excursions into chemistry and optics can be followed by readers with no technical training; but, on the other hand, it is not the compost of quotations from Pliny, Anselmus Boëtius de Boot, and Dumas père which, with the addition of a few reflections on the Urim and Thummim and the detailing of a few superstitions about the therapeutic properties of certain crystals, makes up more than one work on this subject. There is no reference in the index to a Duke of Brunswick or a Duke of Burgundy, to Cagliostro or Cleopatra, to the Great Cham or the works of Habdarrahmanus, but Dr. Goodchild contrives to be thoroughly interesting without the assistance of stories of intrigue and crime or of romantic legends. The ground which he covers has been extensively gone over in the well-known treatises of Mr. Edwin Streeter and Mr. Harry Emmanuel, but this latest work on precious stones is on a higher scientific plane, and deals with the mineral flowers—a popular phrase which is opposed to every line in Dr. Goodchild's book—more closely as a branch of mineralogy and less distinctly as a matter of æsthetic luxury. The author's point of view has probably been that the study of precious stones—what they are, where they come from, and why they are precious—is one of public concern. For generations upon generations, as far back as any historical records are forthcoming, men and women have been buying and selling and stealing and forging the seven or eight combinations of silicon, aluminium, carbon, and water which make up our diadems and carcanets, and the same game goes on as merrily as ever nowadays. But we have to-day many more people who wear gems, for some sort of jewellery is within the powers of acquisition of even the ten-pound householder; and we have also many more gems, for new sources of their production are being discovered regularly, and new substances—the spodumene compounds, for example—are found to possess the requisite decorative virtues; while the waste of cut stones is necessarily slow, because one of the essential qualities of the stone that is worth cutting is its durability. Hence with more people wanting gems, more people able to purchase them, and more of them to be purchased, the knowledge of their value and of the reasons upon which that value depends becomes more necessary to the world at large. Precious stones are no longer used as funds by kings, but, in the words of Mr. Wemmick, they remain a very convenient form of portable property, and many another man besides Mr. Jagger's confidential clerk has said to himself "My guiding star always is—Get Hold of Portable Property."

Dr. Goodchild's opening chapters, dealing with the modes of origin of precious stones and their physical properties, introduce the subject in an orderly manner. He follows a classification put forward by the late J. G. Goodchild, his father, in connection with certain Scottish minerals, and divides the sources of gems into two great classes—the epigene minerals and the hypogene minerals. The epigene minerals—those formed by downward filtration under low temperature—include all deposits on the land, in fresh water, in closed bodies of water, or at the bottom of the sea; all those minerals produced by alteration of pre-existing minerals in situ—a good example of such being the substance known as serpentine, the beautiful rocky material of which vases and plaques are made with excellent effect; and all those minerals where the constituents have been dissolved within the lithosphere and subsequently redeposited at lower levels—to which class belong the true agates, the opal, and the turquoise. Among the hypogene minerals, which are mostly of hydrothermal origin, and are usually connected with some manifestation of elevatory or volcanic movement, are ranged the coveted crystals more properly known as precious stones—namely, the diamond, the corundum crystals (namely, the ruby, the sapphire, the Oriental amethyst, and the Oriental topaz), spinel and chrysoberyl, the emerald, the aquamarine, and the garnet—to mention only the stones with which we are all familiar. Having explained this method of classification, Dr. Goodchild proceeds to give a brief but sufficient account of the physical qualities of these crystals, and here his explanation of the phenomena to be observed when light acts on a gem is quite comprehensible, and therefore quite useful. Those physical properties of a gem which are dependent upon light are the ones which have always given it value more than any other; the Indian native placed the diamond on the forehead or chest of his idol because it glittered and flashed with the colours of the rainbow; and the paramount reason why diamonds are interesting to us at the present day is the same—we prize them because of the character of their response to light; their scarcity and their durability are additional, but only secondary, causes of our good opinion of crystalline carbon. What actually happens to a ray of light when it falls at a certain angle upon the plane surface of a diamond is not in the least difficult for any one who knows a little physics to understand, but we are not all as yet taught elementary physics in our schooldays, so that many of us will be grateful to Dr. Goodchild for his lucid little exposition of the optics of diamonds, inasmuch as we see that all our best precious stones are cut in deference to optical rules upon the general plan adopted for the cutting of diamonds into brilliants. There is no need to plunge here into a disquisition on refraction, dispersion, and polarisation, particularly as such physical phenomena could not be described and explained in a better or briefer manner than that employed by the author; but we recommend the reader to master Dr. Goodchild on these matters before proceeding to the detailed description of the various gems, as he will then understand why the square, flat emerald may be thin, and yet be a most effective and therefore valuable stone, why it may be an economical process to cut down a crystal of twenty-five carats into a brilliant of ten carats, and why the prices asked in the Rue de la Paix for *cabocho*n stones are very usually extortionate. It may be said that no man requires to be his own jeweller any more than he requires to be his own doctor or lawyer, and that the man who obtains a smattering of technical learning on such a subject as precious stones merely exposes himself to the temptation to pit his very rudimentary knowledge against the practical and intimate equipment of the dealers. The same can be urged against the pursuit by the amateur of anything whatsoever. Of course there will always be persons who esteem the little lore which is their own higher than any possessed by others; they cannot be helped, and it is of no consequence whether they are cheated or not. It is not suggested that on the information contained in this book any man would be well advised to buy parures at Christie's, nor would he find that arguments derived from reading it would have much effect in Bond Street if he wanted to depreciate an intended purchase; but a general comprehension of the principles which guide the buyer and seller in valuing precious stones can be learned from Dr. Goodchild's book (with perhaps a little supplementary reading), and the chances of such information being useful are increasing with the increasing dissemination of gems—good, bad, and indifferent, and chiefly indifferent—among the public. Executors, for example, ought not to be blindly dependent upon the statements of official valuers with regard to jewellery, for away from great centres these experts give some very astonishing opinions. The division, again, in family conclave of a casket of jewels often leads to grave but quite undesigned injustice; quartz is allotted as cat's-eye, and sapphire as diamond, or, to put the error in the other way, a ruby necklace passes to a fortunate lady under the designation of "grandmother's topazes;" in this mode what is designed to be an amicable arrangement can come to be the source of a feud. There are veritable uses in an acquaintance with the characteristics of precious stones, and the advantages to be obtained from reading Dr. Goodchild's book, technical manual rather than literary performance though it be, are additional to the merit of achieving learning for learning's sake.

There are different ways in which a book entitled "Precious Stones" may commend itself to the notice of readers. It may be a treatise on a branch of mineralogy; it may approach the subject from the point of view of the jeweller and salesman; it may deal with the numberless historical episodes and sociological phenomena which centre round jewels and to which such constant reference is found in literature, alike in our greatest poems and in our feeblest novels; and it may take the shape of a blend of all of these. Many books in many languages belong to this last class and exhibit a medley of curious statements concerning the mystical meaning of certain jewels, their supernatural origin and supernatural powers as talismans, and their healing influences. Sometimes all this wears a literary and erudite air, but, as a matter of fact, it is not a hard task to collect quotations of every conceivable kind having precious stones as their theme, and the inclination of a writer who is making up a book towards the use of such handy padding can be comprehended. The occurrence of allusions to gems in all ethnological records and in all the traditions of folk-lore have made it certain that every literature of every people will contain material for collation. Princes and rulers in the earliest days of history put their money into jewels, and kept the working of mines in their own hands as the simplest way of amassing capital and heaping up revenue. Naturally they encouraged such notions as that some jewels could only be obtained by the perilous slaughter of a reptile in whose head or liver the gem was secreted, or that some mines were guarded by dragons whose tutelary activity meant death for the intruder. It was natural, again, that the barbaric possessor of jewels should like to spread the idea that attempts to assassinate him would be fruitless, because of the talismanic power of his ring or his brooch; and that robbery of his property would also be poor business for the thief, owing to the convenient way in which the stones would change colour or crack in a criminal clutch. Stories of this kind abound, but they have found no place in Dr. Goodchild's scheme. Nor does he levy any tax upon poets, and this is hardly to be regretted, for, truth to say, the use of jewels in poetic similes is too often stale and unhappy. The lips of girls are not like rubies, the sea is not like a sapphire, the mead is not like an emerald. The thing above all things in a gem is not its colour; the thing which distinguishes the topaz from marmalade, the garnet from a holly-berry, and the moonstone from a tear-drop, is the hard, unchanging nature of the stones. It is not for its colour alone that a gem is valued, but because that colour is fast; and similes that lay no stress on the permanent character of a gem are faulty, conventional, and only made tolerable by the persistent usage of the best craftsmen. When St. John pictured the foundations and walls of the Heavenly Jerusalem "garnished with all manner of precious stones," he wrote a passage of unerring splendour; he was imaging for us the eternal home of the Eternal God, of which permanency and brilliancy should be the striking features. But when the seventeenth-century song-writer dwells upon caresses bestowed by lips of coral framing teeth of pearl we feel that he is describing a £570 American denture, and not anything that a sane man would desire to be kissed by.

MR. SWINBURNE'S TRAGEDY

THE apportioning of praise or dispraise for poets is a large office and full of pitfalls, though, as everybody knows, it is usually undertaken with a light and easy heart. When poetry is reviewed or "noticed" the issues at stake would appear to be of the simplest, inasmuch as, broadly, they are supposed to involve little more than the emolument of the reviewer and the complacence or chagrin of the reviewed. In point of fact, however, it is not only vital to the poet, good or bad, that he should be competently appraised, but it is vital also to considerable numbers of other persons who, considering them in the bulk, may not believe that they know anything about poetry at all. It has been observed of the people of England that, despite their alleged indifference to the arts, they will buy and read good poetry in quantity. The great and abiding instance in point, of course, is Shakespeare, after whom come Milton, Cowper, Wordsworth, Keats, Shelley, Browning, and Tennyson. All of these have become familiar on the lips as household words. The reading and enjoyment of them is not confined to any special class of persons, literary or otherwise. They are for all men, from their youth up, and we question whether there is a man, woman, or speaking child in England to-day who has not in some sort been touched by them, and is not in some sort acquainted with their work, even if it be to the extent only of a loose end of rhyme, or a phrase or line, or as who should say "quotation" which has passed into the currency of everyday speech. And in accounting for this phenomenon, it seems to us, the philosophers are too apt to overlook, or at any rate to under-estimate, that force which we call criticism. Certain it is that no man makes fame with his own trumpet. He may write like an angel and perish, unless he have those around him who will keep on saying the approving word which is the open sesame to the public understanding. And we must remember also that so powerful is this approving word, that it has been known to waft fools into popularity, which, of course, is most sad. We have indulged in the foregoing slight homily after several readings of Mr. Swinburne's new tragic playlet, The Duke of Gandia, which comes to us from Messrs. Chatto and Windus in very neat form and on very good paper. If it were possible for us to dismiss from our minds the received facts about Mr. Swinburne The Duke of Gandia would move us so to do. But it is neither possible nor desirable that we should forget what manner of poet Mr. Swinburne is and what manner of riches he has brought to the poetic treasury of his country. With this remembrance before us our duty by The Duke of Gandia becomes the more difficult. We shall venture the opinion, however, that the criticism of the period will have all its work cut out to secure for The Duke of Gandia any sort of recognition as an important work of itself. Practically we may best describe it as one of the pieces of a master which does not happen to be a masterpiece :

CÆSAR.

Now, mother though thou love my brother more Am I not more thy son than he ?

VANNOZZA.

Not more.

CÆSAR.

Have I more Spaniard in me—less of thee ?
Did our Most Holiest father thrill thy womb
With more Italian passion than brought forth Me ?

VANNOZZA.

Child, thine elder never was as thou—Spake never thus.

CÆSAR.

I doubt it not. But I,
Mother, am not mine elder. He desires
And he enjoys the life God gives him—God,
The Pope our father, and thy sacred self,
Mother beloved and hallowed. I desire
More.

VANNOZZA.

Thou wast ever sleepless as the wind—
A child anhungered for thy time to be Man. See thy purple about thee. Art thou not Cardinal ?

CÆSAR.

Ay ; my father's eminence
Set so the stamp on mine. I will not die
Cardinal.

Reading these lines—and they are the first of the play—one has difficulty in supposing that one is reading the real Mr. Swinburne. In any case, one argues, we have here quite barebone Swinburne, and a surprising jerkiness of manner which should be deplored and rebuked even in lesser poets. This jerk to which we refer occurs continually right through the poem, with the result that one is compelled to exercise no little patience in reading, and really never reads with pleasure. The trouble is caused, of course, by the juvenile trick of placing the cæsura of certain lines after the first or second syllable :

God alone

Knows.

Cardinal ? Canst thou dream I had rather be Duke ?

Hold loveliest of all living things to love
This.

Thrust not out thy thorns at heaven,
Rose.

Deride not God,

Lucrezia.

Thou my Cardinal,
Canst think not to be scourged and crucified.
Ha ?

Dost thou sleep
Here in His special keeping—here—to-night, Brother ?

I never called thee yet

Fool.

And so on and so forth. It is really too childish. Milton may have done it on occasion, but Milton certainly did not do it thirty-seven times in a matter of a few hundred lines. We shall, no doubt, see all sorts of defences put up, simply on the ground that Mr. Swinburne is Mr. Swinburne, and has his own knowledge of what blank verse should be. On the other hand, it is sure that blank verse should not annoy and irritate ; and this is exactly what the blank verse of The Duke of Gandia does. Now, if a man chooses to paint a miniature and takes the precaution to bespatter it with gratuitous lamp black, he can scarcely expect one to consider the merits of the proper paint. But because we are dealing with Mr.

Swinburne we will look a little deeper than the mechanic surface. When we do this, however, it is to suffer similar disappointments. The work moves one only to feelings of disgust for every character which appears in it. There is nobody to pity, nobody to love, nobody to admire, and not even anybody from whom a civilised being may take a fearful warning. Whether a poet is within his right to concoct a tragic episode which exhibits these grave defects it is not for us to assert. The man who figures on the Tea-tax posters would probably say, "It don't seem right to me ;" though we shall hazard no such pronouncement. And as The Duke of Gandia is riddled with a mechanical fault, and can serve no imaginable moral or spiritual purpose, we might have hoped that it would contain at least a passage or a line for the memory. There is no such passage and no such line. Therefore, to return to our homily, we shall trust that the criticism of the time will refrain from the further pointing out of beauties in The Duke of Gandia which do not exist. The natural desire to be courteous to a poet of Mr. Swinburne's achievement and eminence goes without saying. But that desire should not be allowed to override the critical judgment, and it certainly should not be cultivated to the excess of praising Mr. Swinburne for his sheer faults.

"MODERNISM"

THERE are many paths, many ways ; and it is usually an ungracious and a foolish person who does nothing but proclaim in strident accents the fatality and futility of every track save that which he himself is following. But, when every allowance of charity and reason has been made, it remains that one road is always to be disallowed, and that is the way on which those stand who proclaim that the goal does not exist—that there is not, indeed, in any real and efficient sense, any way at all. There have always been people of this sect ; it is conceivable that in the wilderness there were scientific and rational Jews, broad, liberal-minded men, who perceived that the journey of the tribes was a vivid Oriental allegory ; that, while the desert was real and true enough, the talk about the land flowing with milk and honey was a mere flourish, a pious fraud, justified, perhaps, by the literalism and simplicity of the days of bondage, but without any true fulfilment in the nature of things. "Here," these enlightened ones might have said, "is the only Promised Land which we or any one else will ever see. In the natural order we shall never get out of the wilderness, for the very good reason that there is nothing but wilderness in the universe ; the Land of Canaan is a poetic dream. Still, if we journey faithfully, if we are constant in the performance of humanitarian and philanthropic work, if we help our fallen brother, if we carry the burden of the weary, if we cherish kindly sentiments about everybody—then the desert shall blossom like the rose, and we shall achieve not the mythical splendours and delights of an imaginary Promised Land, but the very real reward that always attends unselfishness." And, in the same way, there may be many allowable and indeed admirable divergencies in the region of the arts ; a man may love Homer with such a fervent and consuming devotion that he has no corner left in his heart or soul or mind for the cultus of Sophocles ; or, again, one may be so rapt into the mystery world of Malory that "Pickwick" may seem vile, unclean, profane, a vulgar tale of mean streets and mean people, in which the Holy Vessel has become a brandy-bottle. Very allowable are both these loves and these hatreds—one would never be angry with a man who said that he loved the "Arabian Nights" too well to tolerate the naturalism of "Tom Jones"—but here, again, there is a path that is condemned, which is marked with a "No Thoroughfare," which bristles with man-traps and spring-guns ; and this is the path which denies the very existence of art of any kind ; which looks on all literature, painting, music, architecture, as an odd remnant from the pre-scientific days, from the time when primitive man, beset by all kinds of illusory terrors, illusory loves, groundless desires and apprehensions, devoted himself to performing a vast conjuring trick, of the which trick we call some portions Religion and others Art. So, according to this school, Aphrodite is hocus-pocus, the Parthenon is hocus-pocus, Chartres Cathedral is hocus-pocus; Homer, the New Testament, and the Queste of the Sangraal are all hocus-pocus. This is called the scientific standpoint, and it owes its name, no doubt, to its utter lack of all scientia, properly so called. One is sorry to have to say that "What we Want," an open letter to Pius X. from a group of priests, translated by the Rev. A. Leslie Lilley (Murray), belongs very distinctly to the "scientific" school, to the way which is No Thoroughfare, which means waste of time, waste of temper, weary feet, heated brains, and a wood of thorns at the end of the journey. To take an example. These Italian priests—who, I suppose, would call themselves Modernists—speak as follows:

When we have . . . to explain the relations between God the Father, Jesus, and humanity, while we recognise all the beauty of the doctrine built up by Scholasticism, and agree in its religious content, we yet cannot have recourse to the ontological terms, "person," "essence," "nature," "hypostases," "processions." As the modern habit of mind does not attach to these any meaning which corresponds with reality, it is returning to exactly the same moral and intellectual conditions as those of the first Christians, or of the humble and simple-minded Christians of our country districts who know nothing of these rational categories. . . . So, again, to explain the Eucharistic Mystery, we cannot, for similar reasons, adopt the theory of Transubstantiation unless no one is to understand.

Now, at first sight, and on reading the first words of the passage that I have quoted, it might be imagined that these Modernists were the most faithful Catholics in the world, devout believers in the Christian faith as it is expounded in Holy Writ, by the Fathers, and in the scholastic philosophy. Their sole anxiety would seem to be as to the terms they are to use in teaching the faith; their only protest is against the compulsory employment of the technical language of a highly systematised theology in their discourses to simple and unlettered folk. One can confess with all one's heart that if this be the basis of Modernism, then Modernism is the most reasonable thing in the world, and one would be sorry to understand that the Roman Catholic clergy were forbidden to use any modern equivalent word or words for such terms as "hypostasis" and "circumcession." But is this all the content of Modernism? What about the passage on the Eucharist? Here it is no longer a case of preferring a clear word before an obscure; the priests simply say: "We cannot adopt the theory of Transubstantiation," and in place of this "theory" they give an explanation of the great Mystery of Faith which, one imagines, would have pleased Zwingli, which would scarcely have satisfied Calvin, which Luther would most certainly have anathematised. This is surely not agreeing with the religious content of Scholasticism; it is not agreeing with the religious content of Christianity, unless the faith was hidden from the faithful till the arrival of the Swiss "Reformer;" and when on another page we find these Modernist priests expressing their sympathy for Mr. Tyrrell, we are forced to conclude that their assent to the propositions of Scholastic Christianity is a mere passing politeness, not meant to be understood literally. For, to take the question of the Eucharist, Mr. Tyrrell's doctrine is as follows:

Dogma apart, and taken at its lowest, the Eucharist remains for you the sacrament of communion and incorporation with that mystical "Christ crucified" [i.e., the Christ regarded as the "central and super-eminent figure round whose Cross are gathered the Christs of all ages, races, religions, and degrees"], an act by which you offer yourself to be received into that Divine company or spiritual organism, to be made a sharer of its faith, its hope, and its love, to give your own body and blood "for many for the remission of sins."

Now this doctrine may be amiable and charming and liberal and broad-minded; but it is not Christianity in any common sense of the word; and so, it seems to me, we are enlightened as to what these Italian priests really do want. They want that which "Dr." Clifford, Canon Hensley Henson, and "Dr." Campbell want—that is, a Christianity which is robbed of all its essential character; a system which is no longer a magical and mystical religion, but a scheme of universal philanthropy seen against a background of vague Deism. I do not think I am unfair; there is, of course, a certain sense in which a eunuch is a man. I need not say that I recognise that the Italian priests would require a very different "set" from that in favour with our English heretics. "Dr." Clifford would deny the faith in the midst of a "Liberal" demonstration (regarded as the supreme act of worship); Canon Hensley Henson would make the Resurrection of Christ contingent on a vote of the House of Commons; "Dr." Campbell would declare the Holy Eucharist to be an intelligent anticipation of a vegetarian and non-alcoholic Communist breakfast chez Mr. Eustace Miles; the Italians, doubtless, would still sing Mass in honour of nothing in particular and of noble sentiments in general; but the result in each case is the same. I am not at all surprised to find that Modernism has been defined as "the heresy which contains all the heresies and errors of the past;" indeed, one could find no better definition than this; no better phrase to summarise that impulse in men which continually surges up, declaring in very various idioms that there is no world of vision and wonder, that there is but earth and humanity, and that we have got to make the best of both. This is, indeed, the heresy of all heresies, masquerading sometimes under the most curious disguises, putting on now and again the vestments of the "occult" sciences, but always constant to the one idea, that man is the master and measure of all things. "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil;" as in the Garden, so in the modern world, in the world of Modernism. I speak with apology; for I, an Anglican, have no right to intervene in the internal matters of the Holy Roman Catholic and Apostolic Church; still, there are points which truly concern "common" Christianity, in which the old-fashioned Wesleyans, if such there be any longer, are deeply interested; and, whether the Roman Church be pleased or displeased, it seems to me fitting that one voice at least should be raised against this Atheism in a chasuble, against this shabby and squalid attempt to show that the Faith of the Saints is a synonym for the doctrine of the "man in the street." Ah! we desire to live in charity, to believe the best of all men; but how can we reconcile these things? Our Modernists profess the warmest attachment to the Gospel; they say that they, and they alone, are the successors of the first Christians; and yet they stumble against this or that dogma because it cannot be understood. Have they read the texts:

The Jews then murmured at Him, because He said, I am the bread which came down from heaven. And they said, Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? how is it then that He saith, I came down from heaven?

The Jews therefore strove amongst themselves, saying, How can this Man give us His flesh to eat?

Many, therefore, of His disciples when they heard this, said, This is a hard saying; who can bear it?

From that time many of His disciples went back, and walked no more with Him.

And so, say the Modernist priests, we cannot adopt the theory of Transubstantiation "unless no one is to understand." And so, I am sorry to confess, say hundreds, perhaps thousands, of Anglican priests, who confess the truth in their hearts, who deny it in their acts, who prophesy smooth things in Zion, who talk of the Catholic Faith as if it were a musical comedy—something which must be presented in popular style if it is to catch on. There is the cleric who shudders from the herse at Tenebrae: his Bishop tells him it is not a lawful ornament of the Book of Common Prayer; and the same cleric has "lantern services," with sacred songs by Ira D. Sankey: a magic lantern and a white sheet, and the doggerel of an American heretic being, doubtless, lawful according to the Book of Common Prayer. Let us not be bold to exult over our Roman brothers; with us, as with them, there is a school which declares that everything is lawful which outrages the Catholic Faith. The school is a strong one, it seems, in both Churches, but, at least, it should appear under its own colours. Let it appeal, if it will, to the judgment of the profane vulgar ; but, in face of those words of St. John the Divine, let these philanthropists no longer pretend to be Christians of any shape or fashion. Their part is with the disciples who went back and walked no longer with Him, not with the faithful who believed in order that they might understand.

Nay ; let it be understood once for all, the Catholic Faith is not a Christy Minstrel or music-hall performance which has to commend itself to the suffrages of the majority. It may be quite true that they who live to please must please to live, but a Catholic priest is not by any means to be reckoned in this company. The Catholic religion is, or should be, the everlasting witness of heaven above on earth below ; the continual reminder of the futility, and vanity, and absurdity of most of our mortal aims. It is the stalest of old tales this ; it is the oldest of old texts, and yet it must be re-enunciated again and again, for it is very evident that it is not yet of common knowledge. There are, I suppose, many definitions of Christianity, but I believe that the definition which really prevails, which is of authority in the very best circles of the Anglican Church, is this—How to belong to the Athenæum Club, decently, respectably, splendidly. No doubt there are many divisions and sub-divisions in a treatise which has not yet been issued. For example, there must be a heading—Worldly Prosperity. On the one hand, it is shown that betting, unless on the largest scale, with persons of acknowledged social position, is highly disreputable, irreligious, and a national scourge ; while operations on the Stock Exchange, prudently conducted, on the best information, with fortunate results, are the backbone of English commercial life, and a credit to our common Christianity. Though at the same time failure in this path may be very disgraceful. Example : The Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral accepted Eucharistic plate from Mr. Hooley when he was successful, and returned it when he became the object of popular denunciation. And so forth, and so forth ; and I am reminded of an advertisement that I once saw in Shepherd's Bush : "Funerals conducted with Decency, Solemnity, and Respectability." And, again, there is another curious instance : A pious woman has opened in Western London a chapel of rest and meditation, which she has caused to be adorned with paintings, illustrating the passage from things temporal to things eternal. To this place enter the Bishop of London, who immediately observes that it would be a capital spot for meetings. For meetings ! Cannot one see it all ? Here, in this quiet place of rest, where men may stay and think for a moment how vain is all their work, how vain is vanity, and all in vain ; how behind the ugly fog of business, and Imperialism, and Liberalism, and Conservatism, and Churchwardenism, there are still the everlasting splendours ; that even in modern "civilised" London the Quest of the Sangraal is not impossible ; that behind the songs of the "Merry Duchess of Guttenberg" resounds the inexpressive chant of the angels. Here, says the Pastor of the People of London, is the place for public meetings. Here, beneath the glowing walls, let us discuss the Mission to Borrioboola Gha ; let us consider how we shall insist on trousers and chemises, and the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as part of the faith once delivered to the saints, while we decide that we must not press the petitions :

By the mystery of Thy holy Incarnation ; by Thy holy Nativity and Circumcision ; by Thy Baptism, Fasting, and Temptation ; by Thine Agony and Bloody Sweat ; by Thy Cross and Passion ; by Thy precious Death and Burial ; by Thy glorious Resurrection and Ascension ; and by the coming of the Holy Ghost.

Lest, of course, the simple natives do not understand. Here, beneath the symbols of the eternal, let "Mr. Chairman" take his stand ; let the Bishop of Blank Negation rise to "a point of order ;" let the blessed words "Hear, hear," "No, no," resound ; let there be re-enacted under decent, Church-like disguises, the meeting of the United Metropolitan Improved Hot Muffin and Crumpet Baking and Punctual Delivery Company, with a capital of five millions, in five hundred thousand shares of ten pounds each. Here let the mystery of iniquity of brewing beer be denounced, here be demonstrated the saving truth that the wine of Cana was non-alcoholic, here be advanced the claims of the great-grand-nephews of the clergy, here be finally proclaimed to the world the Great Gospel of Anglo-Saxondom—that the prosperous shall inherit the earth. Where is the prophecy of Isaiah :—And in those days, saith the Lord, there shall be a Chair upon the earth, and a Vice-Chair amongst the nations. And they of the uttermost parts of the earth shall say "Hear, hear," and many Resolutions shall be passed in My Name, saith the Lord of Hosts. Where is the passage from Isaiah showing that the City of London and the House of Commons shall be as it were as fountains of water, and as the shadow of a great rock in a dry and thirsty land ? When the Lord turned again the captivity of the Stock Exchange : then were we like unto them that dream.

It should be enough for good Catholics to demonstrate the utter wickedness of all this "modern spirit ;" it should be enough for thinkers of mediocre intelligence to demonstrate the silliness of it all—as though one should say, argon has been discovered ; the Peckham Protestants Protest against the Literal Resurrection, so we must give up the Mass ; but it is perhaps necessary to show that this modern scheme, besides being foolish and false, is also futile. It really does not pay ; and against that sentence Modernism surely cannot appeal. Three hundred years ago or more the Blessed Reformers discovered that Englishmen were dolefully ignorant of the Christian Faith, because the services were in Latin ; the said services were accordingly translated into English. See the result : of all creatures on earth the English Churchman is most ignorant of his religion ; the Common Prayer-book is a puzzle to him ; auricular confession is to him a Popish innovation, fasting on Fridays a superstition ; the disciples of the medicine-man can give a more intelligent account of the mysteries than he. So this squalid, and stupid, and ungodly scheme has failed in the one aim which it attempted, and the result of "popularising" the Catholic Faith has been to drive half the population outside the pale of the Church. And from the point of view of literature—Has any one pondered the Prayers on Special Occasions, composed and issued by the late Archbishop Tait ? And our music ? Is it necessary to argue the question as to the superiority of plainsong over the efforts of Smart and Goss ? And our hymns ? Here is the one side :

Ecce panis Angelorum,
Factus cibis viatorum :
Vere panis filiorum,
Non mittendus canibus.
In figuris præsignatur,
Cum Isaac immolatur :
Agnus Paschæ deputatur :
Datur Manna patribus.
Bone Pastor, panis vere,
Jesu nostri miserere :
Tu nos pascere, nos tuere :
Tu nos bona fac videre
In terra viventium.
Tu, qui cuncta scis et vales :
Qui nos pascis hic mortales :
Tuos ibi commensales,
Cohæredes et sodales
Fac sanctorum civium. Amen. Alleluia.

And the other :

Jesu, gentlest Saviour,
Thou art in us now ;
Fill us full of goodness
Till our hearts o'erflow.
Multiply our graces,
Chiefly love and fear,
And, dear Lord, the chiefest,
Grace to persevere.

And now our Fathers in God are attempting the cure. Having discovered that half England is Anabaptist, or Independent, or Wesleyan, they are going to draw the strayed sheep back into the fold by showing that the English Church is more Anabaptist than the Anabaptists, more Independent than the Independents, more Wesleyan than the Wesleyans ; it being also provided that "our beloved Church" affords more snug lying for "reverent Agnostics" than any other community. In a word, we proffer all the comforts of home, and everything as nice as mother makes it; so daily do we blaspheme and deny the Holy Catholic Church, the Cloud of Witnesses, the Assembly of the Firstborn, and the Lord that bought us. The tactics of the quack-medicine vendor, the intelligence of Earlswood, the religion of the Prince of this World (who has another name)—to these ends has come Britain, once the abode of the saints. Our Bishops may not be passionately certain as to the Resurrection; but, at all events, they forbid us to sing the hymns of the fourth century—pending, no doubt, an enabling Act of Parliament and the latest results of scientific investigation.

I am sorry that space does not allow me to deal with "The Spiritual Return of Christ Within the Church," by Richard de Bary (Murray), or with "The Golden Sayings of Brother Giles" (Fisher Unwin), both of which books may be earnestly recommended as antidotes to the fooleries that we have been considering.

STAGE CHILDREN: AN IMPRESSION AND A MORAL

I DO not know that at any time Hastings is a very lively place. The houses have acquired a habit of being vacant, and even the front, with its bath-chairs, its band-stands that are silent on Sundays, and its seats upon which one may not smoke, is more suggestive of Puritans and invalids than of pleasure. If Time should suddenly drop a week from the due order of days it is easy to imagine that those bath-chairs, those unfragrant shelters, those much-labelled houses would startle the dreaming tourists with vacant faces of dead men. But when in late March the day has squandered its gold, and the earth is saddened with the gentle greyness of the dusk, when, moreover, the cheerful sea has deserted the shore, creeping far out to leave dull acres of untrodden sand, waste and bitter with salt, a man might surely be forgiven if he cried aloud against the extreme cruelty of Nature, the timid injustice of man.

Being of Anglo-Saxon blood, I did not give definite expression to the melancholy which the quenched seascape had invoked. I contented myself with leaning on the rail, and sneering at the art of the cripple who had made mathematically exact scratchings of Windsor Castle and the Eddystone Lighthouse on the sand. There was something almost humorously impertinent about that twisted figure with one foot bowing and hopping for pennies in front of a terrible back-cloth of dreamy grey. How could a man forget the horrors of infinite space, and scratch nothings on the blank face of the earth for coppers? His one foot was bare so that his Silver-like activities might not spoil his pictures, and when he was not hopping he shivered miserably. As I saw him at the moment he stood very well for humanity—sordid, grotesque, greedy of mean things, twisted and bruised by the pitiless hand of Nature.

And then in a flash there happened one of those miracles which rebuke us when we lack faith. Through the shadows which were not grey but purple there burst a swarm of children running on light feet across the sands. They chased each other hither and thither, stooped to gather shells and seaweed, and inspected the works of the cripple with outspoken admiration. Regarding my mournful and terrible world in detail, they found it beautiful with pink shells and tangled seaweed and the gallant efforts of men. So far from being terrified or humiliated by the sombre wastes of sand and sky, they made of the one a playing-ground, and woke the other with echoes of their shrill laughter. Perhaps they found that the sea was rather larger than the Serpentine, perhaps they thought that the sands were not so well lit as Kingsway; but, after all, they were making holiday, and at such a time things are different. They laughed at space.

For these were London children, and all the resources of civilisation had not been able to deprive them of that sense of proportion which we lose with age. The stars are small and of little importance, and even the sun is not much larger than a brandy-ball. But a golden pebble by the seashore is a treasure that a child may hold in its hand, and it is certain that never a grown-up one of us can own anything so surely. We may search our memories for sunsets and tresses of dead girls, but who would not give all their faded fragrance for one pink shell and the power to appreciate it? So it was that I had found the world wide and ugly and terrible, lacking the Aladdin's lamp of imagination, which had shown the children that it was a place of treasure, with darkness to make the search exciting. They flitted about the beach like eager moths.

Yet on these children civilisation had worked with her utmost cunning, with her most recent resource. For they were little actors and actresses from Drury Lane, touring in a pantomime of their own; wise enough in the world's ways to play grown-up characters with uncommon skill, and bred in the unreality of the footlights and the falsehood of grease-paints. Nevertheless, coming fresh from the elaborate make-belief of the theatre and the intoxicating applause, they ran down to the sea to find the diamonds and pearls that alone are real. If this is not wisdom I know not where wisdom lies, and, watching them, I could have laughed aloud at the thought of the critics who have told me that the life of the stage makes children unnatural. There are many wise and just people who do not like to see children acting, forgetting perhaps that mimicry is the keynote of all child's play, and that nothing but this instinct leads babies to walk upright and to speak with their tongues. Whether they are on the stage or not, children are always borrowing the words and emotions of other people, and it is a part of the charm of childhood that through this mask of tricks and phrases the real child peeps always into the eyes and hearts of the elect.

And this is why I know nothing more delightful than the spectacle of a score of children playing at life on the stage. They may have been taught how to speak and how to stand, and what to do with their hands; they may know how to take a prompt, and realise the importance of dressing the stage; every trick and mannerism of the grown-up actor or actress may be theirs; yet, through their playing there will sound the voice of childhood, imaginative, adventurous, insistent, and every performance will supply them with materials for a new game. So it was with these children, whose sudden coming had strewn the melancholy beach with pearls. I had seen them in the dimness of a ballet-room under Drury Lane Theatre; now, with a coin, I bought the right to see them on a stage built with cynical impertinence in the midst of the intolerant sea. The play indeed was the same, and the players, but the game was different. The little breaks and falterings which the author had not designed, the only half-suppressed laughings which were not in the prompt-copy, bore no relationship, one might suppose, to the moral adventures of Mother Goose. But far across the hills the spring was breaking the buds on the lilac, and far along the shore the sea was casting its jewels, and even there in the theatre I could see the children standing on tip-toe to pick lilac, and stooping on the sands to gather pearls. They did not see that they were in a place of lank ropes and unsmoothed boards soiled with the dust of forgotten pageants and rendered hideous by the glare of electric lights; and they were right. For in their eyes there shone only that place of adventure which delights the feet of the faithful, whether they tread the sands, or the stage, or the rough cobbles of Drury Lane. To the truly imaginative a theatre is a place of uncommon possibilities; our actors and actresses, and even our limelight-men, are not imaginative, and so, I suppose, they find it ugly. The game is with the children.

And truly they play it for what it is worth, and they are wise enough to know that it is worth all things, alike on the boards of the theatre and on the wider, but hardly less artificial, stage of civilised life. We, who are older, tremble between our desire for applause and our unconquerable dread of the angers of the critical gods and the gaping pit, and it is for this reason that every bitter-wise adult knows himself to be little better than a super, a unit of a half-intelligent chorus, who may hope at best to echo with partial accuracy the songs and careless laughters of the divine players. There is something pathetic in the business; for we, too, were once stars, and thought, finely enough, to hold the heavens for ever with our dreams. But now we are glad if the limelight shines by accident for a moment on our faces, or if the stage-manager gives us but one individual line. We feel, for all the sad fragrance of our old programmes and newspaper-cuttings, that it is a privilege to play a part in the pageant at all. The game is with the children; but if we are wise, there is still somewhere at the back of the stage a place where each one of us can breathe the atmosphere of enchantment and dream the old dreams. No Arcadia is ever wholly lost.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

THE SPIRIT OF MAN

CERTAIN people are always to be met who hold to the opinion that success has come rather when they are happy than when paunch or pocket is full to the load-line of tranquillity, and "Queer" is the distinguishing and honourable adjective diligently applied to them by practical persons whose pleasures take shapes more or less rotund, hues more or less florid. Finest prosperity is that of the queer people when in quiet, infrequent hours they are given for a sign some white, wonderful bloom of thought to be bound thriftily with the pale posy of dreams which they have plucked on their lonely way. At such times common things of earth, most ordinary events of life, link themselves as a bridge of boats across a stream, whereon they may venture a little excursion to the misty banks of a new country; the hand that imprisons secrets incommunicable relaxes. Indefatigably the crowd still plays the game, takes hazardous kicks at the goal, or scores laborious centuries, and the few watch; but, thus observant, standing aloof, yet not scornful, they perceive the wide spaces of mystery and silence, shadow and gleam, which encircle that hoarse, restless throng, and are fain to consider them of immeasurably higher significance than the quest of the cacophonists.

The popular idea that mystery appertains solely to antiquated and ghost-like things—ruined castles, Burmese pagodas, shrivelled fakirs, Greek temples—is a supposition most misleading. If on a wet night, mounting an omnibus that passes a certain big junction, you survey the splendid sweep of shining rails, the abacus of tri-coloured signal-lamps, the gyrating steam, shot with fierce cones of light from engine-fires, the small, sombre figures moving down there in the murk, can you resist a thrill of vague curiosity, a sense as of an unseen note of interrogation behind it all? It simply means, retorts the materialist, proud of his pathetic hard-headedness, that you can buy a pink or yellow ticket, board a train, and journey where you will. That is doubtless a useful fact, but it in no way satisfies that persistent question-mark.

Trees are familiar enough; walk through the fields and reflect wherein the beauty of a tree consists. We say this column or fresco or that building is beautiful; but let one plaster scroll slip out of position, one flower be the wrong colour, one cornice lower than its complementary, and the work of art becomes an unsightly horror. Yet not a single line of a tree is accurately balanced by another. Taken as a whole, it comprises an assembly of exquisite curves and pleasing angles—unsymmetrical, but contenting the eye of the beholder as nothing else does. We, in our imitations and limitations, are driven to the laws of perspective and geometry in order to construct our town-halls, our patterned wall-papers, our tolerable ornaments; the tree, knowing naught of sculpture or Athenian contours, just grows. Its leaves might have been square, oblong, circular; instead, they assume an endless variety of inconsequent serrations; how rigid and sad are the twisted iron copies on our towering lodge-gates! Its branches might have issued at severe right angles; but we find the slim, almost feminine stateliness of the poplar, the languid arch of the willow, the chubby pollard, the stalwart, masculine dignity of the oak. This is an objective mystery; there is another, when, hushed in summer calm, the trees wait and sigh through the livelong day, or when, wrenched by lusty gales, the shrill leaves cry, the branches writhe and wrestle, the great trunks groan. What are they trying to express? "A bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter."

Sometimes, at long intervals, we realise how things inexplicable and imponderable invest every moment, waking or sleeping. In the street, perhaps, a minute comes when you are suddenly stricken with a feeling of incompetence, uncertainty; the noise of traffic merges to a roar—it might well be the lapse of water headlong into a hollow pool, an incomprehensible, eerie sound. Things seem unreal; or is it that their reality has so intensified that they emanate a strange, oppressive intelligence? You draw a long breath, and glance round. What sea of hallucination floods the city? What means this sublime farewell in the sky, the silent conflagration of sunset?

Falls from afar the blood of God, like rain Immortal agony! Eternal pain!

Whence comes the quick longing to bend over the white, weeping face of this tiny unknown child looking up at you? Why is that old man with bleared, hopeless countenance and mis-shapen, filthy hands, wearily offering a box of matches to an interminable procession? Why is this other man shouting monotonously from the footboard of a 'bus, and a third, weatherbeaten, grey, inured, gazing patiently ahead into the welter that booms through the ravine of dusky buildings? Why are you here, critical and conscious? A woman's eyes meet and cling to yours for a rich moment in the crowd. You are afraid to look round at her lest others misunderstand; she also is afraid, and so you both pass on with the little life you lived in that moment, and never meet again. If you had spoken, would she have laughed, or frowned and turned away, or—tremendous thought—would she have understood? What divine ambassador has been at your side, touching your shoulder and bidding you behold that "Magic Shadow-show"? If you could seize the mood, prolong it, might not some still, small voice, some exalted word, come from that obscure chamber of the dwelling whose doors seem for ever fast? "Who knoweth the spirit of man, that goeth upward?"

These things do not happen, say the pleasant, bluff, two-dimensional people, busily trudging across their Flatland (so busily that they have no time to waste in dreams, albeit a few minutes can be spared to mock the dreamer); and if they did, would be unimportant. True; perhaps not, to them; but they do happen, and have to be arraigned when we cast the accounts of the hours at close of day. There are more adventures of the soul than of the body. Let two men voyage on the same boat to some city in the southern hemisphere, both equipped with the conventional number of senses, identical accuracy of eyesight, similar keenness of hearing. From the deck of the liner they scan the splendour of the constellations so intricately set upon the purple dome. "A fine night," remarks one; and that is all. Does he comprehend what he is doing? The other knows that from a fresh view-point he is looking off—neither up nor down, but off—the planet of his birth into the sleet of stars that drives through eternity, among which his home is but an imperceptible speck—yet a speck which carries salt sea-winds strong as wine, clouds and mountains and rain, and hope, joy, love, sorrow, and all other things that make up the life of a man—and death. He knows that as this earth "spins like a fretful midge" morning and noon and night are but words on men's tongues, and that all without is darkness unfathomable. He hears the soft seethe and fall of the curling wave at the ship's bows, and remembers that every particle of water in that lovely, luminous apex which divides and spreads back toward the

Is it any wonder that men are to be found who style themselves Pantheists?—that we still do, in one form or another, worship the ancient Pan? We see the god in the flower, in the hill, in the snow, in the star; vaguely we adore in the wind fragrant from the heathery moor, or solemn as the whispers of a Cathedral organ, among the dark aisles of the firs. Loving the "sinless summer carol" of the lark, we seek also the reason for his passionate song. Taking our microscopes, we discern a world's commotion in a water-drop. Devising a rule whereby to measure the universe, we search the parallax of a distant sun only to discover that our mighty base-line of a hundred and eighty millions of miles is insufficient to displace the image, and with ringing brains we turn away. Annihilating the past, we watch our earth robing herself through the fire and flood of remote ages; peering forward to when time's hand shall eagerly clutch his final minute, on that unnerving brink we front the derision of silence. Then, perchance, we surrender to the mystery, and weave our fantasies, and dream our dreams, imagining, it may be, that the magnificent lights in heaven are but lamps held by patient angels in that terrible outer gloom to illumine the coming of some royal onrushing world which we have never seen, chords of whose spherulic music are yet trembling along black infinities of space; lamps which, their purpose accomplished, shall be swiftly dashed down, to burn for a few æons and flicker out in a stifled flare, dead. The mystery overwhelms us. We feel the beating of invisible wings, and hope; glimpsing, we imagine, the winsome face of truth, it is besmirched and transfigured in ghastly masquerade, and our hope, like a poor little sparrow, lies fluttering to death in the dirt. In a dolour of defeated thought we are more than ever aware of an intensely real longing to pierce the veil. What great symphony is it of which we catch here and there a low, agitated harmony, a fugitive echo?

Was the preacher right when, after his reiterated pleasures and pains, he concluded, "all that cometh is vanity"? Philosophy is cold. Science, erecting her giant superstructures of theory on hillocks of knowledge, huge factories of unstable hypotheses to explain her foundations, fails. Love, who "looked forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners," now stoops to plant her immortelles in the mould covering the form loved best and needed most, knowing only that the veil has thickened—the veil that once, strong with lover's laughter, she had thought to thrust aside.

Yet we smile, and see "as through a glass, darkly," and seek for the dawn. Some of us, perhaps, may find it, but it is bright with tears.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Spirit of Parliament. By DUNCAN SCHWANN, M.P. (Alston Rivers, Ltd., 3s. 6d. net.)

It is impossible for the average Englishman to remain entirely unaffected by such an institution as Parliament. "The august mother of Parliaments" belongs to the pompous phraseology of an older time, and there are those to-day who speak, glibly enough, of the "gasworks." But whatever may be your attitude with regard to the national legislative assembly—whether it be one of admiration or one of distrust and possibly dislike—you cannot at least ignore it. To every thoughtful Englishman the House of Commons stands as a perpetual challenge. In spite of Press and platform, it remains enveloped in mystery. An occasional visit to the Strangers' Gallery will hardly afford much enlightenment to the student of practical politics anxious to study at first hand the legislative processes of his country. We know that, in a room so small that it fails to hold the six hundred and seventy members who have been chosen by the country to sit in it, ten thousand laws have been talked into being, and we know little else.

It is for this reason that Mr. Duncan Schwann's volume is a valuable addition to our political literature. For Mr. Schwann has taken pity on our ignorance. He has afforded us some interesting glimpses into the working of the Parliamentary machine. He has brought the gods a little nearer to earth.

Mr. Schwann writes with an enthusiasm which, if not infectious, is certainly admirable. The point of view is incontrovertibly that of the new Member, of one who has hardly had time to surrender illusions, or to acquire that surface cynicism which is so valuable an asset in Parliamentary life. He views politics through the magnifying-glasses of inexperience, and he finds it possible to write of the House of Commons as "the Custom House at which all ideas, political or social, progressive or reactionary, fantastic or practical, pay toll":

Gathered together within its confines (he adds) are the sharpest wits in the land: bold thinkers and reformers, men with brains of quick-silver, whose neighbourhood is electric to their duller fellows.

One is not accustomed to regard St. Stephen's as the meeting-place of the wit and wisdom of the nation, and we have ourselves known Members of Parliament whom Charity herself would hardly care to describe as either witty or wise. But then Mr. Schwann is a new, or at least a comparatively new, Member!

The abolition of the party system is a subject which has been engaging the attention of our political writers for a considerable time past, and quite recently a prominent London weekly advocated the adoption of a centre-party which should embrace all that is progressive in Toryism and all that is reactionary in Liberalism—a combination from the thought of which, we should have imagined, the mind of man would shrink with an instinctive horror. Mr. Schwann, however, asserts that we are free from any such baleful possibility. His reasons are worth stating:

The first influence to which I ascribe the probable continuance of our two-party Government is the shape of the House of Commons, its construction in an oblong, and not the semi-circular form common to nearly all foreign Chambers. For from this detail spring important consequences. It creates a real physical division between the Government's supporters and those of the Opposition, so that all men can see the gulf placed between their rival policies. The floor of the House is, indeed, a Rubicon, involving real and practical severance from former ties and friends for a politician who crosses it. It does not, like a circular assembly, in which a continuous half-circle of seats rises tier on tier before the President's desk, allow a gentle sliding into new associations by the simple process of moving one's place nearer to the Left or the Right.

Limitations of space make it impossible for the reviewer to follow Mr. Schwann into the numerous ramifications of his subject. The book, however, may be confidently recommended as an entertaining guide to the uninitiated. And it remains to be said that Mr. Schwann is not only a charming writer, but an astute politician. For he has dedicated this volume "to the 5,545 electors of the Hyde Division of Cheshire." It may be safely assumed that when the next General Election comes the 5,545 electors of the Hyde Division of Cheshire will not have forgotten this subtlet of compliments.

The Oceanic Languages: their Grammatical Structure, Vocabulary, and Origin. By D. MACDONALD, D.D. (Henry Frowde.)

FOR the production of this volume our thanks are due in the first place to the liberality of the Australian Government. The work has obviously involved immense research, laborious industry, and a high standard of erudition. Its author, moreover, has used in the course of his researches the celebrated work of Sidney Ray and Codrington, who are acknowledged to be the highest linguistic authorities in their respective fields. The only other really valuable facts in the book occur in the Introduction (containing a solid and most welcome contribution to our knowledge of the people of Efate) and the chapters on the grammar, phonology, and vocabulary of Efatese as a New Hebridean dialect. Of less value is the fact that the vocabulary is greatly enlarged by the inclusion of a number of parallel forms taken from the various languages of the Malayan family, not unfrequently identified with Semitic parallels; we regret that we must add an emphatic note of warning as to the futility of argumentative methods such as those on which the author's theory of Semitic connection is based. This theory has been allowed unnecessarily to intrude itself into all parts of the volume and considerably detracts from the worth of what might have been an uniformly valuable and useful pioneering work. A great number of the parallels with Semitic given in the Vocabulary are of the unscientific, popular, guess-work type, unhappily but too familiar to serious students, while other words are still more obviously unconnected in origin. Specimens of this (we trust obsolescent) method of etymology are:

EFATE.		ARABIC.
raru (boat, ship)	=	markab (a boat or ship)
bulut-i (to plaster)	=	"afara (to cover)
buka (to swell)	=	nafah'a (to inflate)
goko-i (to scrape)	=	hakka (to grind by rubbing, hack, cut, pierce)
uose	=	mikday (an oar)
lagi (wind)	=	nasama (blow gently)
bue (to pour on)	=	naba' (to pour)

For a statement specifically and in set terms asserting an etymological connection between these words and their soi-disant Semitic parallels, see Introduction, p. x. Perhaps the most astounding part of the proof of Semitic connection is that derived from triliteralism, the existence of which in the Oceanic languages is said to be "an irresistible inference," though we fear that, in view of the nature of the argument, there will be few authorities on either of these linguistic families, or on the races that speak them, who would not "resist" it. The methods by which the Arabic Ba'ala or Baal, the name of the god, is identified with uola or nanola, the chief idol of the Efatese (see Vocab. sub uola), are typical of the weaknesses of this side of the book. The spelling, generally speaking, is not uniformly good, and in analysing words the author in some cases takes affixes as forming part of the root, and in others takes part of the root as an affix. Examples of the former occur on p. 36 (Malay lipat, lapis, contradicted, however, on p. 21; also Malay malipal on p. 37), and examples of the latter on p. 87 (Malay baki, bagi, and kapada).

The author's explanations of the Malay numerals (dalapan and sambilan) and the statement that "they are not compound words" (p. 7) are based, like many other statements in support of the theoretical part of the book, upon mere assumptions at variance with known facts.

The Romance of George Villiers, First Duke of Buckingham, and some Men and Women of the Stuart Court. By PHILIP GIBBS. (London: Methuen, 15s. net.)

THE history of the first Duke of Buckingham is so picturesque and grandiose, and altogether amazing, that it would take a very dull historian to make it other than interesting. Mr. Gibbs is by no means dull. He is quick to see the points, and he writes lucidly and at times forcibly. He has studied his authorities with care. Sometime we had an impression—but it may have been only an impression—that he did not quite live in the seventeenth century while he wrote. A slight indication of unfamiliarity is on page 228, where he evidently thinks that the word "crazy," quoted from a letter, had its modern sense, instead of meaning simply ill, or as we might say "shaky." He does not escape the tendency of biographers to be over-kind to their subjects, and George Villiers appears in his pages as a much finer fellow than he was. For what really does his story come to? His original promotion by James I., solely on account of his good looks, was a gross scandal. Placed in power, he made one huge mistake after another, and was a veritable scourge to his Sovereigns and his country. He had personal courage, and was, for that period, a tolerably faithful friend and generous enemy, but there his virtues end, and his vices were many. In detail Mr. Gibbs admits all this, but the general picture is somehow fairer than the original. That, however, is the fault of nearly all biographers, and it does not go very far in this case.

The Court of James I. was, perhaps, the most vicious in our history, and something, not all, of its blackness comes into the earlier part of this book. There is the ghastly story of the Somersets—Somerset's scandalous rise to fortune, his wife's infamy, the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury—all the lust and violence and superstition—it is truly terrible to read of. Against it is a blaze of colour—gay masques, splendid apparel, lavishness run riot. And gentler human sympathies come into this, as into all other human histories. Even James, odious as he was, claims a sort of pity as we read his pathetic letters to his "sweete boys" in Spain—Steenie and Baby Charles. Buckingham's fond and faithful wife, Kate, whom he loved and deceived so often, is a sadly interesting figure:

Now I will no more write (she writes to him) to hope you do not go, but must betake myself to my prayers for your safe and prosperous journey, which I will not fail to do, and for quick return, but never whilst I live will I trust you again.

One would have liked to hear more about her and her quiet life in the country, while her disastrous lord ruffled it abroad. The friendship between Charles and Villiers—whom, like his father, he always wrote to as "Steenie"—was loyal and steadfast, and is a pleasant element in both their stories. But Fenton's dagger was probably a good thing for the King, as it certainly was for the country.

FICTION

The Daughler. By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY. (Constable, 6s.)

WE have looked forward with pleasurable anticipation to a new work by the author of "Conflict," and we have not been disappointed. "The Daughler" is well worth reading, both because of the excellent way in which the plot is manipulated and the strength and fidelity of the character-drawing. The theme is an interesting one, inasmuch as it deals with one of the problems of the day, and faces it in a very bold and unconventional manner. Whether Miss Smedley's solution is a good or even a practicable one is an open question, but good workmanship, combined with a rare knowledge of human nature, enables her to present her theory in a very plausible guise. That a girl, however young and quixotic she may be, would deliberately sacrifice herself by marrying a man whom she has never even seen (and whom she believes to be below her in class and education) for the sake of £10,000, to be dedicated to the use of the "Neo-Suffragist" Society, is improbable to the last degree; but the girl herself is so human, and her subsequent adventures so entirely what they would be under the circumstances, that the reader is drawn, in spite of himself, into taking a serious view of the matter.

A Melton Monologue. By DIANA CROSSWAYS. (Alston Rivers, 3s. 6d.)

As the title suggests, hunting is the prevailing topic in this book. "Lady Diana Crossways" and her husband, "Freddie," in a laudable attempt to retrieve the fallen fortunes of their house, let their country place to a city millionaire and take a small hunting-box at Melton. Here, in her spare moments, "Lady Di" records her impressions of her new surroundings and neighbours in a diary, portions of which form the present book. The result of her efforts is a very pleasant mixture of sport and gossip, with here and there a touch of shrewd self-analysis. The entire sketch is very slight. There is a "sentimental episode," but it is treated with a light hand; Lady Di returning to the now unencumbered estates with her rather grumpy Freddie and an apparently unscathed heart. The writer is at her best when describing and criticising her friends and enemies, and at her worst when transcribing their conversations. The dialogue is rather heavy and stilted, the result, perhaps, of a desire to be epigrammatic. This is the more noticeable as the rest of the diary is particularly unaffected in style.

The Half-Smart Set. By FLORENCE WARDEN. (John Milne, 6s.)

MISS WARDEN has wisely omitted the long list of works which usually stand under her name on the fly-leaf of her novels, and has been content to announce herself on this occasion simply as the author of "The House on the Marsh," the work on which her reputation as a writer rests. She is also to be congratulated on the fact that the present volume is far worthier of her pen than any of the many detective stories that have preceded it. The rather vulgar failings of a middle-class would-be fast set are placed before us with a certain kindly satire. The contrast between the "half-smart" and a very narrow-minded, Puritanical little circle in a manufacturing town is also cleverly described. There is something to be said for both sides, and the author gives us a temperate and unbiassed view of these two most dissimilar branches of society.

The Duke's Motto. By JUSTIN H. MCCARTHY. (Methuen, 6s.)

THERE is a distinction of style about "The Duke's Motto" that entitles it to be described as the best romance Mr. McCarthy has written. He possesses the all-important temperament—half Irish and half French—that is necessary when writing of French romance with convincing boldness. The book deals principally with the career of Henri de Lagardere, soldier of fortune and, of course, invincible swordsman. He is introduced to the reader in a provincial inn, where nine bullies are awaiting instructions to murder Louis de Nevers, the husband of Gabrielle de Caylus, and friend of his betrayer, Louis de Gonzague. The latter is the hirer of the nine swordsmen, but Lagardere unexpectedly fights for the Duke, and, when the nobleman is murdered, saves his baby daughter, and disappears to wreak vengeance on the murderers of the man who invented "the famous thrust of Nevers." Louis de Gonzague provides plenty of sword-exercise for the ex-captain of the King's Guard, but the paid assassins are unlucky, and seventeen years after the death of the Duke Lagardere returns disguised to Paris to restore Gabrielle, the daughter of Nevers, to her mother and expose the treachery of the scoundrel who had by that time become the nominal husband of the widowed duchess. It would be unfair to Mr. McCarthy to give his plot in too much detail, though the story is so well told that even those who know it will not be less interested in the manner of telling it. The exciting incidents, plots and counterplots, duels, battles, murders, and very sudden deaths are described with a facility and expression that leave the reader incapable of thinking of anything other than the book. All the usual tributes from the Critic's Dictionary of Hackneyed Phrases will be applied to "The Duke's Motto," and the craft is so ancient that it is difficult to say something new. Mr. McCarthy, however, can safely allow his reputation to stand or fall by his latest novel. For any writer to select a very old story—and one, moreover, that has done duty on many stages—shows a daring that is only justified by complete success. That the author of "The Duke's Motto" has accomplished this is proof positive and final of his literary skill.

Not Proven. By ALICE and CLAUDE ASKEW. (Ward Lock and Co., 6s.)

OF all the trials endured by a reviewer of modern fiction—and they are neither few nor trivial—none is surely so hard to bear as seeing on the cover of a novel the name of an author whose work has won his admiration, to find, on reading, evident deterioration.

This, we are sorry to say, is the case in the present instance. The authors of "The Shulamite" have written a murder story of the most "shilling shocker" order, where puppets and lay-figures commit murder, steal wills, blackmail, etc., and, finally, the good but uninteresting figures marry, while the wicked and equally uninteresting either die or reform.

This class of work is all very well for many writers, who have learnt the trick, and know no others, but it will not do for authors who have given such proof of greatness as "The Shulamite." Of those who have given evidence that they can achieve much, much will be expected, and let this be the justification for severe criticism.

The Paxton Plot. By C. GUISE MITFORD. (John Long, 6s.)

IN this book Mr. Mitford presents himself as a serious rival to Mr. Le Queux and Mr. Allen Upward, for he writes of international politics and conspiracies. With one exception, the story is on very much the same lines as many others published during a single year. There is, of course, a Free-lance, brave as a lion, and resourceful as a hare; an arch-conspirator, with his chorus of satellites, is naturally his quarry, and on the latter's side there is (equally of course) a beautiful woman whom the Free-lance loves at first sight, and continues to love beyond the end of the story. But in this there occurs the exception to the usual rule of such stories as the present, for, instead of making his book end with wedding-bells, Mr. Mitford has been bold enough to make his heroine unworthy of his hero. Whether his readers will thank him for his originality is, we are afraid, a debatable question. The lovely woman in a story of secret diplomacy may be one of two things. She may be, on the one hand, the unhappy tool or prisoner of the arch-villain, and, in consequence, be the victim of calumny, or she may be herself the arch-villain, and her enchantments and wiles simply weapons of her villainy. But, if she be the former, she must be pure and unspotted in reality. Lovers of melodrama have no taste for subtleties of characterisation, and the villain's paramour should not be the object of the hero's love, especially if she be pictured sympathetically. There is also another point which, we are afraid, will not help the book to success. The climax and final curtain is the knighthood of the hero. Now, however enviable in its original endowment may have been the accolade of the Sovereign, it has unfortunately of late—we speak with all reverence—become so often the reward of successful tradesmen who have subscribed heavily to party funds that it has lost to no small extent its former unique honour. Consequently Mr. Mitford's reward to his hero runs no little risk of ridicule.

DRAMA

"HANNELE" AT THE SCALA THEATRE

"THE Play Actors," who produced this beautiful play by Gerhart Hauptmann last Sunday evening, are very much to be congratulated on their daring. For Hannele is one of those plays which appear at first sight to be more suited for private reading than for public performance; indeed, the difficulties to be surmounted in a stage representation are so many and obvious that many managers, fired by a desire to produce a thing so strange and haunting as this play, have, no doubt, given it up as a work beyond their powers. All the more honour, then, to this young society who, now they have led the way, will, it is to be hoped, induce others to produce it from time to time; in the same way as Every Man and other similar poetic dramas are from time to time revived.

Hannele is described by its author as a dream-poem, and it is so unlike anything I have ever before seen that I hesitate to describe it as a play which begins in the manner of Gorki and continues somewhat in the style of Hans Christian Andersen. At any rate, the scene is a village pauper refuge where are to be found four very undesirable persons—two men and two women. Suddenly the schoolmaster appears carrying the dying Hannele: she is a little girl of fourteen whom he has helped to rescue from drowning in a pond into which she has thrown herself for fear of her reputed father. She is visited by the parish overseer and the doctor, and tended by a Sister of Mercy. The child is half-delirious and sees all kinds of visions: first her father appears and frightens her, then her dead mother comes and leaves her a flower, and then gradually she sees a vision of her own death as a child might see it; a child with a very simple belief in her Saviour, whose idea of death had been got from simple pictures, whose idea of goodness was her schoolmaster and her mother, and whose idea of evil was her drunken father; who mixed this all up with her everyday life, with the out-casts she had just seen, the school friends and the villagers, and who added to it a longing for pretty clothes and a horrible fear of the great "sin against the Holy Spirit." The whole vision is beautified as only a poet like Hauptmann could beautify it, and if the sentiment is too Teutonic and too Protestant to satisfy fully all tastes, no one can deny its sincerity and its reverence. As in the vision of Dante his hates, his admirations, and his love have their place, so in this little village girl's death-dream her father and her mother get mixed up with her simple thoughts of the great black angel of death, and when Christ at last appears it is in the form of the schoolmaster, who gradually throws off his earthly habit and becomes transfigured as he leads the angel-dressed child up the golden steps into heaven.

Criticism of such a play seems to me to be out of place. To many it must appeal most strongly, and others may find a difficulty in following it. Certainly its representation on the stage is surrounded with the greatest difficulties, and I should have thought it would have been better if there had been a statement on the programme that, with the exception of the Sister who was in the room for a few moments at the beginning of the second part, every one else after the interval was merely a part of the vision. The real actors and actresses, especially when they had appeared as real people earlier in the play, looked so very real later on, even when they were bathed in coloured limelight. However, in any event, this performance was more than creditable to its producers and all who took part in it; and when it has to be taken into account that there was this one and only performance praise cannot be too warmly bestowed on all concerned. For this reason I feel that the acting all round was of a high order of merit, and I wish I had space to mention all the ladies and gentlemen in the caste. Miss Winifred Mayo as Hannele was a most pathetic and winning figure; she brought out well the childish fears and faith of the strange little girl so filled with little vanities and genuine goodness. Mr. H. R. Hignett, too, can scarcely be too highly praised for his acting as Gottwald, the schoolmaster, both when a real person and, perhaps, still more so as he gradually changed into a likeness of Christ that we have seen so often in the familiar pictures of children's books. Miss Marie Linden was admirable as the Sister of Mercy, and the same must be said of Miss Edyth Olive in the similar dream-part, though I do not quite see why the two parts could not have been taken by the same actress. I admired also very much "the Great Black Angel," whose name did not appear in the programme. It was an entertainment which will live long in the memory, and I sincerely hope it will be repeated again in the near future.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE NATIONAL LIBERAL CLUB

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—THE ACADEMY is always interesting, but it may fairly be said that this week's issue contains an economic discovery of enormous value to the world. I know not whether to assign the credit to you or to Mr. Crosland; perhaps to you, seeing that you have given it the publicity of a Literary Note in your Literary Review.

The facts, you will remember, were these:

The National Liberal Club made a profit last year of £8,703 on its sale of provisions, wines, spirits, beers, cigars, and cards. The stock in hand at the end of the year was £10,048, of which amount £9,701 represented wines, spirits, beers, and mineral waters. It may therefore be assumed, said you (and Mr. Crosland), that nine-tenths of its profits came from that source.

The discovery may be put in words thus: "The profits on the sale of any article are proportional to the value of the stock in hand at the end of the year." Let us examine this for a moment.

(a) A hawker sells fresh violets and collar-studs upon the Embankment. The violets, which he gets every day from Covent Garden, are in great demand; but nobody buys his collar-studs. At the end of a month he takes stock, and finds that, while he has no violets left, he has only succeeded in getting rid of one collar-stud; so that he still has nearly two shillings' worth of studs in hand. Being a reader of THE ACADEMY, he realises that the month's profit of £2 comes entirely from the sale of that collar-stud. Consequently he resolves to give up the flowers in future.

(b) A restaurant-keeper sells soda-and-milk at 6d. a glass, and makes a handsome profit. A fondness on the part of his customers for fresh milk prevents him from keeping large supplies of this in hand; his custom being to have so many gallons sent to him from his farm every morning. He takes stock one day, and finds that he has 253 bottles of soda-water. Being an admirer of Mr. Crosland, he resolves in future only to sell soda-water, hoping in this way to increase his profits.

And so forth. Somehow, it doesn't seem to work in practice, does it? It is just possible (is it not?) that the fact that more than nine-tenths of the stock in hand is liquor is due to that other fact that wines and spirits "keep" better than bread and meat. There would not be much milk "in hand" at the end of the year, would there? But there would be a good deal of cayenne-pepper. And yet I doubt if the National Liberal Club makes much of a profit on pepper.

Why, Sir, in your desire to score a point against the other party, do you argue in this way? Above all, why do you "challenge Mr. Blackie to repeat his statement in face of these figures"?

M.

P.S.—I notice that the £9,701 worth of stock includes the value of "mineral waters." Why do you lump these together with alcoholic drinks in order to "contradict quite flatly and categorically" Mr. Blackie's statement that "less alcoholic drink is consumed per head per member than in any similar club"?

["M's" merchant in violets and collar-studs is picturesque; but it amounts to little or nothing. One has a right to suppose that a person possessing at the end of successive years £10,000 worth of collar-studs is engaged in the collar-stud business. If you find £10,000 worth of cheese in a warehouse, it is lunacy to imagine that the owner of the warehouse makes his living out of dolls'-eyes or cheap clocks. However, THE ACADEMY is concerned with nothing but the truth. If "M." or Mr. Blackie can, for the honour of the National Liberal Club, demonstrate that the Club makes no profit on drink, but derives its income from the sale of cheap lunches, we shall be pleased to publish the facts and leave Mr. Crosland to take care of himself. With regard to grouping mineral waters with stronger drink, surely "M." does not wish us to imagine that the members of the National Liberal Club drink soda-water neat!—ED.]

THE STAGE SOCIETY AND THE BREAKING POINT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The extreme sternness of your note on the Stage Society's production of The Breaking Point in last week's ACADEMY impels me to take up the cudgels on its behalf:

The Committee of Management (I read) made a very great mistake in producing the play, thereby laying itself open to the charge of having done so purely because it was prohibited by Mr. Redford. It is impossible to suggest any other reason for its production, and it would be interesting to learn what merits that able body found in it. I am not on the Managing Committee, and have, of course, no official claim to write on their behalf, but as a member of the society who witnessed the play I am quite prepared to defend their decision. I imagine the merits which induced them to produce it were the obvious sincerity and conviction with which it was written. The Breaking Point is not a very adroit piece of work. It has many technical defects. But it is a courageous attempt to treat a serious situation honestly and truthfully, to draw life and people as they are (or as the author believes them to be) without sentimentalising or extenuating in order to propitiate the box-office. Had The Breaking Point been the work of an experienced dramatist it might have been a question whether the handling of the subject, the drawing of the characters, the management of the dialogue were sufficiently skilful to justify its production. But as the work of a beginner, as a first play, it seems to me (and, I suppose, seemed to the committee) to possess sufficient merit and show sufficient promise to be worth staging. For it cannot be too often repeated that the only way in which a dramatist can really learn his trade is by having his work produced. He can learn something, of course, by seeing other people's plays and reading other people's plays. But it is from the rehearsals of his own work and the performance of his own work that he learns most. One of the functions of the Stage Society is to provide a training-ground for beginners. I hope and believe that Mr. Garnett has learnt much from the production of The Breaking Point, that it has shown him what are its good points and what its bad. If this is so, the committee, it seems to me, were amply justified in producing his first play.

I also think the fact that Mr. Redford had refused to license it, if it did weigh with them, was rightly taken into consideration by the committee. When I reviewed the play in your columns on its publication I insisted most strongly that there was nothing whatever in it to justify the Censor's action in refusing a licence for its performance. There might be two opinions as to whether it was good or bad. There could not be two opinions as to its absolute propriety. One or two of the dramatic critics have said that they thought the Censor quite right to prohibit it because it was so dull; but that, of course, is only their conception of humour. Mr. Redford has no right to prohibit plays save on the definite grounds that they are immoral or indecent or blasphemous, or likely to provoke a breach of the peace. No one can pretend that The Breaking Point comes under any of these heads. It is a perfectly innocuous play of rather old-fashioned morality than otherwise, and the Censor exceeded his duty in prohibiting it. It is interesting to note that the Press, after the production, though on the whole unfavourable to the play, took this view with practical unanimity. The Times is the only exception I have discovered among the morning and evening papers. The Censor, having made a grave error of this kind, my own view is that the Stage Society were right to take the only practical method of demonstrating the fact—namely, to produce it. If the drama is to be under an irresponsible despotism in this country, let that despotism at least be intelligently exercised. I hope Mr. Garnett will now formally appeal to the Lord Chamberlain to have Mr. Redford's decision as to The Breaking Point reversed.

ST. JOHN HANKIN.

[We reply to Mr. Hankin in another part of the paper.—ED.]

THE STIBBERT ART COLLECTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Prima facie to the average Englishman your correspondent "William Mercer" was fully justified in denouncing the action of the British Government in refusing the charge of the Stibbert collection in Florence; but to one acquainted with the practices of the Italian Government in such matters the refusal was sound policy. The £32,000 left for maintaining the institution would be dealt with roughly as follows:—First, about £3,200 would be deducted as legacy and other imposts, bringing the amount to £28,800. Then, under the laws of transferring property, which are very elastic, about 6 per cent. would be charged for transference to the trustees, reducing the sum to £26,000. The law costs (there are 260 lawyers in the Chamber of Deputies, and most of them have to be fed), stamps, and other expenses would bring the sum to £25,000. This would be invested in securities (public bonds) which pay the highest rate of income-tax (Richezza Mobile)—namely, 4s. in the pound—so that the income (reckoned at 4½ per cent.) of £1,125 would be brought down to £900. Of this sum £250 or so would be set apart for maintenance of the building, keeping it in repair, and so on (some one who is of use to the authorities probably having the contract, and spending about £50 on the work), and the balance of £650 would be available as salaries. Of all salaries paid a further 2s. 1d. in the pound would go to the Government as income-tax from the recipients; but, as a matter of fact, precious little would be paid in salaries. After all this you will understand that it is not surprising that nothing has been done so far in connection with the Stibbert collection; in fact, it will astonish those who know the little ways of the Italian Government if any of the £32,000 is ever paid out at all, and the expenses of management will most likely be taken out of admission fees. The British Government, no doubt, knew perfectly well that if they took over the collection the only practical purpose they would serve would be to act as a milch-cow to the Italian authorities. As a rule, foreign residents in Italy do not know of these things, because they escape direct taxation, there being no tax on incomes derived outside the country.

While on this subject it may be interesting to note that a charitable institution in Italy has to pay over 40 per cent. of its income directly or indirectly in taxes. Supposing the income were £1,000, £150 would have to be paid as income-tax, leaving £850, of which about £300 would represent salaries and £500 supplies. The salaries would be taxed 2s. 1d. in the pound, and the extra cost of the supplies through customs and octroi duties would be 45 per cent.—£225, a total taxation of over £400.

EXPERIENCE.

LETTERS OF MONSIEUR DE BRÉMONT TO THE DUCHESS OF ANGOULÊME

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I should be much obliged if you or any of your readers could inform me whence the subjoined letters, set out in parallel columns, were respectively derived, and if either of them is genuine (for it is obvious one at least must be a forgery).

JOHN B. WAINWRIGHT.

Letter of Monsieur Bremond to the Duchess of Angoulême as printed in Ad. Lanne's "Louis XVII." 2nd edition. (Paris: Dujarric et Cie, 50 Rue des Saints-Pères [? 1906]) at pp. 552-4.

"Madame,

"Serviteur de votre auguste père, j'ai reconnu dans le prétendant, Charles - Guillaume Nauendorff, l'orphelin du Temple, votre auguste frère, le duc de Normandie, et je suis devenu son serviteur.

"Connaissant tous les moyens par lesquels Votre Altesse Royale a pu être trompée, et voulant remplir mon devoir envers l'orphelin du Temple, je me suis adressé à un de vos plus estimable serviteurs; je lui ai fait connaître tous les motifs qui devaient porter Votre Altesse Royale à faire un dernier examen de l'identité du duc de Normandie, son auguste frère, avec M. Nauendorff. J'ai proposé une assemblée de famille pour faire avec vous cet examen.

"Je déclare en la présence de Dieu à Votre Altesse Royale que le feu roi-martyr, mon auguste maître . . . ne voulut délibérer sur trois propositions qui lui étaient soumises pour l'acceptation de la Constitution en 1791, qu'après avoir fait la tentative de se réconcilier avec le roi George III. M. le Comte de Mercy Argenteau, Ambassadeur d'Autriche auprès de lui, fut le porteur de sa lettre autographe au roi d'Angleterre; et dans cette lettre il lui exprimait le regret le plus vif de s'être égaré au point d'avoir soutenu des rebelles contre leur roi légitime. Il lui demandait son amitié et l'emploi de toute sa puissance pour le protéger, en n'autorisant aucun acte de son gouvernement qui pût contribuer à troubler la sécurité de sa personne et celle de sa famille.

"Un traité secret s'ensuivit, par lequel le roi George III. donnait sa parole royale, non seulement de ne permettre à son gouvernement aucun acte contre la sécurité de Louis XVI. et la tranquillité de la France, mais employer toute son influence à rétablir le calme dans son royaume, et dans le cas où Louis XVI. viendrait à mourir, de prendre sous sa protection royale son épouse et ses enfants. Cet acte, Madame, vous le trouverez Letter from the same to the same as printed in Jean de Bonnefon's "Le Baron de Richemont" (Paris: Louis Michaud, 168 Bd. St. Germain [? 1908]) at pp. 184-5.

"Madame,

"Serviteur du roi martyr, votre auguste père, j'ai reconnu l'orphelin, votre auguste frère, le duc de Normandie, et je suis devenu son serviteur.

"Connaissant tous les moyens par lesquels V.A.R. a pu être trompée, et voulant remplir mon devoir de préserver l'orphelin du Temple des malheurs qui sont sur le point de s'accomplir, je me dois de vous dire que l'Autriche possède la preuve authentique de l'enlèvement du royal orphelin de la prison du Temple.

dans les archives de l'Autriche, comme dans celles de l'Angleterre, et vous jugerez que la lettre de George III. à S.A.R. Monseigneur le duc d'Angoulême, pour l'investir de la tutelle de l'orphelin du Temple, en 1794, et le cas de son mort arrivant, de le reconnaître pour roi légitime, est un jugement solennel contre LL. AA. RR. le comte de Provence et le comte d'Artois, malheureusement placés au nombre des conjurés contre Louis XVI.

"Les martyrs, vos augustes parents, en étaient tellement convaincus qu'ils les redoutèrent l'un et l'autre plus que les jacobins. Vous trouverez d'ailleurs dans les archives de l'Autriche, de l'Angleterre, de la Russie et de la Prusse, les déclarations faites à toutes ces cours, par le baron de Breteuil, ambassadeur secret et extraordinaire du roi, pour placer l'armée des princes à l'arrière-garde de leurs armées, sans jamais leur permettre d'entrer sur le territoire français.

"Enfin, Madame, je remplir le devoir que Dieu m'impose envers vous, en vous déclarant qu'à ma connaissance, la cour d'Autriche a la preuve authentique de l'enlèvement de l'orphelin du Temple. Je sais encore, d'une manière positive, que ceux qui ont eu le bonheur de le délivrer, l'ont conduit à Rome où il a été paternellement accueilli par le Saint Père Pie VI., dont il a un document écrit en latin, dans lequel il parle de lui et signe Pius Sextus. Il n'existe donc personne qui puisse vous donner des informations véridiques et contraires à ce que j'ai l'honneur de vous faire savoir. Mon honorable ami, feu M. de Montciel (ancien ministre de l'intérieur sous Louis XVI.), dont la copie du testament politique vous sera remise, a souvent gémé devant moi des illusions de Votre Altesse Royale. Plusieurs fois, il était sur le point d'aller vous demander une audience particulière, pour vous faire connaître l'existence de votre auguste frère. Cet honorable ami est mort dans mes bras de douleur de la catastrophe de 1830, en regrettant de n'avoir pu remplir son devoir en vous enlevant la cataracte dont on avait couvert vos yeux.

"Je crois que plusieurs de vos serviteurs, trompés eux-mêmes par le prince qu'ils avaient le malheur de servir, ont pu vous faire partager leurs erreurs; mais pour vous mettre en mesure de juger, j'ajoute le fait suivant; un d'entre eux, M. de Blacas, a reçu des mains de M. de Montciel, le trésor de la couronne, qu'il avait sauvé des mains des factieux pour le consacrer à l'autorité du roi légitime.

"Ce trésor, value réelle, était de trois cents millions. Il fut converti en neuf millions de ventes placés dans les fonds étrangers, de préférence aux fonds français. J'ai su, en 1820, de mon ami M. d'André, qu'à sa connaissance il n'existait plus que sept millions de rentes

"Mon ami, le marquis de Monciel et moi, avons souvent gémé de l'erreur dans laquelle on entretenait V.A.R.

"Mon devoir, non seulement envers vous, mais envers Dieu auquel je dois compte des mes actions, m'oblige d'ajouter que le trésor de la Couronne qui vous fut remis alors qu'on ignorait l'existence du duc de Normandie, ne vous appartient pas, il doit être rendu à l'héritier légitime du trône, il ne vous est pas permis de vous en servir contre lui.

"Ce trésor, value réelle, était de trois cents millions. Il fut converti en neuf millions de rentes placés dans les fonds étrangers, de préférence aux fonds français. J'ai su de mon ami M. d'André, qu'à sa connaissance il n'existait plus que sept millions de rentes du du trésor. Depuis cette époque, il n'y a pas en lien sans doute de le diminuer. Ce trésor, Madame, appartient au roi légitime, et ce roi légitime, que vous embrasserez un jour avec bonheur, c'est votre auguste frère, duc de Normandie. Mais d'après la vérité que je vous déclare devant Dieu, il ne vous est plus permis de vous en servir contre lui.

"Que vos conseillers, Madame, ne se fassent pas illusion; ce sont eux qui sont responsables devant Dieu et devant leur roi légitime de l'emploi que vous en ferez.

"Mon devoir est rempli, Madame. Pour récompense de mes services envers le roi-martyr et envers sa famille, je n'ai jamais voulu accepter que le portrait de son Altesse Royale Monsieur, qu'il me donna en 1820. A l'âge de 78 ans, où je suis parvenu, je n'ai plus rien à recevoir de personne sur la terre; mais je dois me préparer à paraître devant Dieu qui du moins ne me fera pas la reproche de vous avoir caché la vérité.

"Je suis avec respect . . .

"BREMONT."

trésor.

"Que vos conseillers, Madame, ne se fassent pas illusion; ils sont responsable devant Dieu de l'emploi que vous ferez de cette fortune.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "SEA"

SIR,—I am sorry—for his own sake—to see Mr. Dodgson's reply to me on this subject (p. 672). Of course he is free to guess as much as he pleases; but that is no reason why he should misinterpret forms and make statements which are almost too absurd to be considered.

He first of all asked me a question about a Gothic verb, and as I replied, exposing his mistake, he has assumed that it is impossible for him to err, reiterates his already refuted assumption, and bolsters it up by making several more mistakes. It is quite unnecessary to continue an argument under such conditions; I can only put the unwary on their guard. Genuine students of Teutonic philology will have had more than enough of him by this time.

When he says that "huljan does not resemble celare so much as saius does saihwān," that is quite enough. It shows that he merely looks at the matter superficially, and is entirely misled by appearances. The student knows better. The former pair of words is demonstrably connected with each other; the latter cannot be connected at all. As the proof is a neat little exercise in comparative philology, I proceed to give it.

The Gothic huljan, to hide, corresponds with the Latin celare, to hide, in everything but the prime vowel. For every Gothic initial h is equivalent to a Latin initial c; both words contain l; and the Gothic suffix -jan is due to the Indo-Germanic suffix -ya-, which comes out in Latin, regularly, as -are. All that is left is to connect the Gothic short u with the Latin long e. These vowel-sounds are connected by the regular rules of gradation, as exhibited by the Anglo-Saxon root-verb—viz., helan, to hide, past tense hæl, past tense plural hælon (with long e), and pp. holen. This formula enables us to reconstruct the corresponding Gothic verb, which must necessarily have been hailan, past tense hal, past tense plural helum (with long e), pp. hulans. This gives us all we want; for the past-tense-plural-stem—viz., hel- (with long e) corresponds to the Latin cel- in celare (also with long e), and the pp. hul-ans shows the same gradation as the Gothic causal verb hul-jan. Q.E.D.

Secondly, I have already explained that the Gothic ai is somewhat of a trap, as it has two distinct values, easily distinguished by every student of Germanic philology. The short value occurs in saihwān, to see, where ai is equivalent to the Latin short e, or to the Greek epsilon, as is abundantly clear from the way in which Wulfila transliterates Greek words; whilst the long value occurs in saius, sea, and in saiwala, soul, and is equivalent to the Greek diphthong oi; in fact, the Gk. oida, I know, is the same word as the Gothic wait and the English wot. And it so happens that the Greek epsilon and the Greek oi belong to different systems of gradation, and cannot be connected or brought together by any vowel-change whatever. Besides which, the Gothic saihwān possesses an hw, answering to Latin qu and Gk. ph, whilst saiws contains a simple w, Lat. v, Gk. digamma. Hence to connect saihwān with saiws involves the connection of the Latin qu with Latin v, much as if we were asked to admit a connection between quis and vis, which is simply absurd. Any one who can follow these explanations will see the absurdity.

As to the Latin oculus, I have said that the root was oq, and neither oc nor ok, as Mr. Dodgson perversely has it. The Greek root-form was op; and the long grade was ōp (with long o), as in the common derivative πρόσ-ωπ-ον. It was, therefore, not wk- at all; and the word ocean has nothing to do with it.

It is impossible, for want of space, to explain all the errors in this last unfortunate performance. I can only enumerate them, and repudiate all belief in them. The chief are as follows: 1. Mor-ning has nothing to do with the Latin marc. 2. Nor with mar-mor. 3. Nor with mar-tyr. 4. Ocean cannot be allied to op-tics. 5. Sea cannot be allied to see. 6. Soul cannot be allied to see. For all I know, the soul may be able to see, but certainly the Goth was unaware of it.

The point is shortly this: that when our friend claims to possess Stamm's "Ulfilas," and to have studied Gothic for thirty years, we see at once that he has nevertheless wholly failed to understand the phonology of the language.

Phonology and philology are things apart from translation. For every hundred men who understand the latter only there is seldom more than one who understands both. The wise man refrains from exhibiting his defects, and Mr. Dodgson would do well when giving his guesses to refrain from giving reasons.

AN AWKWARD BLUNDER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In this week's Illustrated London News Mr. Andrew Lang severely reprimands a writer for misquoting two well-known lines by Tennyson, and then, unfortunately, himself proceeds to misquote them.

This is Mr. Lang's version:

There is more faith in honest doubt,
Believe me, than in half the creeds.

What Tennyson really wrote was, of course:

There lives more faith, &c.

It is interesting to note how this little alteration by Mr. Lang suffices to convert Tennyson's poetry into prose.

In the same article Mr. Lang also alters Carlyle's

Into eternity,
At night, will return—to

Into eternity
It will return.

I prefer Carlyle's version.

PURE ENGLISH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The purity of the English in the prose articles of THE ACADEMY, which is attained by no other literary paper, is marred on page 665 of the current number, in Mr. Machen's article, when he writes:

"I think it is Mr. G. K. Chesterton that has pointed out that somewhere . . ."

Surely the sentence demands "who has pointed out."

H. P. H.

[Mr. Machen writes: H. P. H. is referred to the A. V. of the New Testament, passim.]

"OLD AND NEW JAPAN"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My attention has been called to a review of my recent book, "Old and New Japan," which appeared in your pages. I shall be greatly obliged to you if you will give space for a word of explanation. In the prefatory note, which was by a most unfortunate circumstance, caused by illness and the necessity of rushing the book through the press, overlooked until it was impossible to include it in the present edition, occurs the following paragraph:—

In a book of the kind, dealing rather with the history and social customs of a people than being a record of travel, many authorities have of necessity had to be consulted, and in a measure drawn upon. They are too numerous to mention in exact detail; but the author gratefully acknowledges the source of much valuable information (as well as much personal instruction) to the following:—Basil Hall Chamberlain, the author of "Translation of Kojiki," "Hand-book of Colloquial Japanese," etc.; Lafcadio Hearn, author of a number of valuable works; Arthur May Knapp, the anonymous author of an excellent sketch of the Religions of Japan; and to Miss Alice M. Bacon, author of "Japanese Girls and Women," for some interesting details of the more intimate phases of the Japanese woman's family life.

This will, I hope, serve to remove your reviewer's very reasonable criticism regarding an omission.

C. HOLLAND.

THE JOURNEY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I be permitted to express my great admiration for the beautiful poem which appears in the current number of THE ACADEMY? In its exquisite simplicity it reminds one of the faultless profile of some ancient Greek cameo.

"ROWLAND THIRLMERE."

PULPIT ADVERTISEMENTS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your issue of April 4th, "Life and Letters," I read: "We can remember no case in which really fine work has been publicly praised from the pulpit or from other exalted quarters." I have been more fortunate. Quite recently Bishop Gore commended in this way at Birmingham Law's "Serious Call." Early in the "eighties" an eloquent Canon exclaimed in St. Paul's Cathedral (shortly after the publication of the book), "Have you read 'John Inglesant'?" This led one of his hearers at least to get and read what most will allow to be "really fine work." But, per contra, another eloquent Canon in the same Cathedral, whose sermons are widely published and read, referred with eulogy to the "Buonaparte of Battersea Bridge." (That is near enough to the real title of one of the periodical "Broadgrins" of a notorious living literary contortionist.) Might not the Cathedral authorities forbid to occupiers of the historic pulpit all exploiting of living writers by name, good, bad, or indifferent? The advertisement will soon besilver the chancel-floor. In a rural parish I have been successful in keeping the advertisement out of the graveyard by erasing or forbidding the stonemason's name on the tombs. But as things are going, popular preachers with short purses and elastic consciences may be got at to puff some nostrum for body or soul in the pulpit. Sacred things will get bespattered by the yellow mire from the marishes round the base of the Mont Carmel de nos jours. Let the clergy, at least, combine to keep puffery, quackery, and all American methods out of the Temple.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A Conference on Capital Punishment, to be held in Caxton Hall on Thursday afternoon, June 18th next, is being arranged by the Roinilly Society, with the co-operation of the Humanitarian League, the Howard Association, the Medico-Legal Society, the Society for the Abolition of Capital Punishment, the Penal Reform League, &c., and prominent speakers have promised to take part. Applications for tickets may be made to the Hon. Secretary, Mr. C. Phillipson, 1, Mitre Court Buildings, Temple.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The service arranged in Westminster Abbey for members of the University of London on Presentation Day last year met with so marked a response that it was resolved, at a general meeting of London students held on November 25th, to request the Dean of Westminster to arrange a service again this year.

We should be much obliged if you would kindly allow us through your columns to make it known that the Dean has consented that a service for members of the University of London should be held in the Abbey on Presentation Day, Wednesday, May 6th, at 6 p.m. With the consent of the Dean, the Bishop of Birmingham has accepted the invitation to preach the sermon.

The service will be open to all persons officially connected with the University of London as teachers or otherwise, to all graduates and undergraduates, and all regular students of schools of the University. All graduates of the University and all graduates of other Universities officially connected with the University of London are requested to wear full academic dress. It is hoped that undergraduates also will wear academic dress.

Tickets admitting to the reserved space in the Abbey will be sent to all persons eligible who apply for them to Mr. L. S. Kempthorne, University of London, University College, Gower Street, W.C., enclosing a stamped addressed envelope. Applicants should state whether they are graduates or undergraduates. Application for tickets should be made as soon as possible, and not later than April 29th. Seats cannot be reserved for friends of members, but they will be admitted to such space as may be available in the north transept at 5.55 p.m. by the north door. It is particularly requested that applications for tickets should on no account be addressed to the Dean or to any other official of the Abbey.

THE DIARY AND JOURNAL OF

DAVID BRAINERD, Pioneer Missionary to the North American Indians. Two Vols. 5s.

"Mr. Smellie is well advised to add to his 'Books for the Heart' these two volumes. They are classics in their kind. The 'Journal,' giving a minute account of one of the most desperate missions ever undertaken, cannot be too often reprinted."—British Weekly.

THE CHRISTIAN'S GREAT

INTEREST. By WILLIAM GUTHRIE. Second Impression of this Edition.

"William Guthrie was one of God's nobility of the stern times that brought out the noblest qualities of such men as Samuel Rutherford. . . . The clear notes of the old Gospel ring out from every page. It is a treatise that contains the testing, searching fire, and the soothing balm of Gilead. No Christian could read it without gaining strength for service and for conflict."—Baptist.

THE RELIGIOUS AFFECTIONS.

By JONATHAN EDWARDS. Second Impression of this Edition.

"A most acceptable and unique series is greatly enriched by this famous work from the pen of America's finest philosopher and divine."—Literary World.

THE CONFESSIONS OF ST.

AUGUSTINE. Fourth Impression of this Edition.

"So long as men hunger after righteousness, the spell of the book will never be broken. As a spiritual autobiography it ranks with the world's classics, for its touches the deepest problems of experience and destiny."—Speaker.

GRACE ABOUNDING TO THE CHIEF OF SINNERS. By JOHN BUNYAN. Third Impression of this Edition.

"The very title is rich in the music of eternal hope. The book ranks with the great religious classics, and, as the editor of this choice new edition says, 'its pages are lustrous with the light of genius, and with the better and more heavenly light of grace.'—Speaker.

THE JOURNAL OF JOHN

WOOLMAN. With an Appreciation by JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER. Third Impression of this Edition.

"It is always good to be with Woolman. His famous 'Journal' is emphatically one of the 'books for the heart,' and is most appropriately included in this beautiful little series."—Methodist Recorder.

THE HEIDELBERG CATECHISM.

A Revised Translation.

"A beautifully printed little book. . . . It makes a memorable product of early Protestantism readily accessible to English readers in a clear and accurate form, and is prefaced by an admirably-written essay on 'The Catechisms of the Reformation.'—Christian World.

THE SUPREMACY OF MAN.

By JOHN PULSFORD, D.D.

"A second of Dr. Pulsford's characteristic volumes. It is really a prose epic on the creation, restoration, and ascent of man through Christ, the Reigning Head and final Example. Those who remember John Pulsford and his fragrant speech will find here a bouquet of his richest thoughts."—Critical Rev.

QUIET HOURS. By JOHN PULSFORD, D.D. Second Series.

"We question whether there is in our language a finer exposition of the Apostle Peter's doctrine of 'Precious Faith' in its origin and progress than we find here."—Baptist Magazine.

"These volumes may be had printed on Thin Paper (size 6½ x 4½ x ½ in.). Prices: Leather, gilt edges, 2s. 6d. net; cloth, gilt tops, 1s. 6d. net."

It contains a new feature, which should be useful to many people—namely, a list of the Contents of the April Reviews and Magazines.

It also contains an article in which Mrs. Clayton Glyn, the author of "The Visits of Elizabeth," gives her impressions of America.

Finally, the April BOOK MONTHLY has all the book news and many beautiful illustrations.

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer AND PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908 :—

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper. Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

The Chelsea Historical Pageant

will be held, by the kind permission of FIELD-MARSHAL SIR GEORGE WHITE, G.C.B., O.M., V.C., Governor, and the Commissioners of the Royal Hospital, in Old Ranelagh Gardens, adjoining the Hospital, and five minutes' walk from Sloane Square, on the following dates, commencing at 4 o'clock :—

Thursday, June 25
Friday, June 26

Saturday, June 27
Monday, June 29

Wednesday, July 1

No effort has been spared to make this, the first London Pageant, in every sense worthy of the occasion; beautiful in colour, in movement, in music, form, and setting; interesting dramatically from first to last; and thoroughly representative of Chelsea, which holds a place second to none of the historic quarters of London in the richness of her records and the number of great folk who have been successively associated with her past.

Plans of the covered Grand Stand may be seen, and seats can be booked on and after April 21st, at the Pageant Room, Town Hall, King's Road, Chelsea (entrance from Manor Gardens); hours 10 to 5; Saturday, 10 to 1. Also from the following agents :—

Messrs. Keith, Prowse and Co.; Ashton and Mitchell; The District Messenger Co., Ltd.; Alfred Hays; Lacom and Ollier; Leader and Co.; Cecil Roy; Webster and Girling; Webster and Waddington; The Army and Navy Stores; Ross and Reid; Thomas Cook and Son; The American Express Co.; and other principal agents.

The prices of seats are £2 2s., £1 1s., 15s., 10s. 6d., 5s. All seats are under cover, numbered and reserved. Early application is essential in order to secure the best positions.

A booklet containing full particulars of the Pageant, with lists of Committees, Guarantors, and Subscribers, and illustrated by fifteen reproductions of interesting old Chelsea pictures and portraits, can be obtained at the Pageant Room, and of agents and booksellers, price 2d. (by post, 3½d.), and on application to the Press Representative: SYDNEY GLOVER, 1, Clifford's Inn, Fleet St., E.C.

MAROTZ

BY JOHN AYSCOUGH

A Tale of Sicily and Southern Italy

MAROTZ is a story apart from the ordinary run of novels. It grips the reader with a sense of its truthfulness. The quiet of contemplative life in a Sicilian convent is contrasted with the more passionate lives of the Southern peoples. The minor characters are drawn with much loving sympathy, and several of them are worthy of a place in the remembrance of cultured readers. Marotz herself is a magnificent creation.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE Shakespeare Festival at Stratford-on-Avon has been marred by one of those little ebullitions of temper which seem to recur there every year. It is Miss Marie Corelli who as a rule introduces the note of discord. And when it is Miss Corelli nobody pays any attention. This year, however, it is a more important person—the Vicar of Stratford and Archdeacon-designate of Coventry. Owing to his action, Mr. F. R. Benson was unable to produce, as he had promised, the seldom-acted play of Cymbeline. Mr. Benson gracefully changed his programme, and gave way to the opinion of one whose services to Shakespeare's town are admitted to have been great and worthy of his high office. But matters did not end there. Dr. Arbuthnot seemed determined to mark the last few months of his vicariate of Stratford by a quarrel of some kind, and the announcement that Miss Horniman's Manchester Company would play Measure for Measure was the signal for another protest on his part. What has been the result? In the words of a native of the town, "All the boys and girls have been buying Cymbeline and Measure for Measure to hunt out the improper bits;" and the large wisdom of Shakespeare is replaced by a prurient curiosity. When the performance of Measure for Measure came, it was a matter of course that any one who went to the theatre with the expectation of being "tickled" went away—not so much disappointed as ashamed, and stirred to the depths by this tremendous picture of a saint walking unsoiled through the mire of the world. The play was wisely and skilfully handled; and, produced in the Elizabethan style by Mr. William Poel and finely acted by Mr. Poel as Angelo, exquisitely by Miss Sarah Allgood (the Irish Theatre actress) as Isabella, and soundly by Mr. James Hearn as the Duke, was as interesting and impressive a display as we have seen.

We must confess to a feeling of some apprehension. Though bye-elections are raging all over England, though the moment is decidedly a critical one—in spite of all there is hardly anything about Dissenting preachers in the daily papers. Now there is something strange about this; and the violent contrast between this silence, or almost silence, and the clamour of a few months ago deserves a paragraph at all events, and we are not sure whether we should not invite the views of our readers on this extraordinary state of things, for, but a short while since, the Dissenting preacher was, one might say, all over the daily press. One read of him doing the most amusing things: dressing up in complete steel to illustrate a well-known text—this is, surely, ritualism by the way—instituting the order of female vergers to attract the young men to meeting, putting on a popular siffleuse to whistle the intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" before the sermon, objecting to the heathen names of the days of the week—performing, in fact, a whole host of feats which eclipse all those recorded of Amadis of Gaul when, changing his name to Beltenebros, he did penance on the Peña Pobre. And now scarce a word of him; one may read one's paper sedulously without encountering "Dr." Clifford's name; even Mr. Campbell is out of the bill, and the New Theology, for all one hears of it, sleeps with the errors of Marcion and the vagarious doctrines of the Basilidians.

Now it is possible, no doubt, to take an optimistic view of these facts; it may be that the Preacher Folk and the newspapers which advertised them have come to the conclusion that they have a little sickened the world of late; it may be that the sage counsellors of the Liberal Party have pointed out that, while many people gladly call themselves Liberals, and vote accordingly, they do so on the understanding that Liberalism is not to be regarded as an appendage of Protestant Dissent, as a machine for registering the decrees of the "Free Church Council." We hope this may be the true explanation of the circumstances; but in the present calm there seems to us something ominous, some touch of the terror that lies upon the waters in eastern seas when the waves glide like oil and the winds fall to a dead calm. The mariner knows when he sees those smooth waters that a typhoon will be upon him, and so we, suspicious of the occultation of "Dr." Clifford, fear that "a great effort on behalf of our common Christianity" is soon to be made. Our "common Christianity," it should be said, includes many of the ethical precepts of the New Testament, Teetotalism, and a feeling of sympathy for the Thieves and Atheists who are now governing France. Such is the meteor flag of modern Dissent, and we are afraid that it will yet terrific burn. In the meantime we commend to those who would like to see the said flag burn, in the passive sense of the word, a little handbook by Mr. J. L. Walton, called "Down with the Church: a Conspiracy Unmasked" (George Allen). One is sorry to be reminded by Mr. Walton that the fabrication and utterance of outrageous lies against the English clergy formed part of the last "Free Church" campaign. We are sorry, we repeat, to think of this; and yet: well, Charles Dickens was about as remote from "Clericalism" as a man could well be, and it is painfully apparent from his novels that he had not formed a very favourable opinion of the Dissenting Preacher. Stiggins is, of course, an exaggeration, but he is not precisely the exaggeration of a saint.

It would be idle, and, indeed, a kind of insult to the memory of the late Prime Minister, for us to pretend, in the presence of his death, that we regard him as a great statesman, either in office or opposition: but we may note with propriety a peculiar quality of his personal character. There are very few statesmen who have loomed so long and so largely in the field of politics, who have attracted so many personal friends from all quarters and have enjoyed the good personal disposition of so many opponents. The excellence of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's disposition is so well recognised, that his political opponents have been able to make the most violent and pointed attacks upon him, on account of his policy, even to the extent of denying his political capacity, without the slightest feeling of personal animus, and without incurring even the charge of being actuated by such a motive. It has seemed incredible that a person so plainly well-intentioned could excite personal feeling against him—and, indeed, none has ever existed. We doubt whether the same could be said so truthfully of any other public man of our period. It is a great personal tribute to Sir Henry, and marks a characteristic marvellous to foreigners, of which Englishmen have reason to be proud—the capacity for diametric political opposition without the least personal animosity. Sir Henry was imbued with the sincere belief that political and social amelioration lies in the Liberal party, and it must be remembered to his credit that after many years of fruitless opposition that party has actually assumed an appearance of united life under his leadership. It was probably his personal character which could alone have effected such a union, and has hitherto maintained its appearance. His services to his party are undoubted and immense, and since he regarded it as involving the welfare of his country, they must be estimated as generous and self-sacrificing services, for he continued to offer them through domestic sorrow, sickness, and advancing age until within a few days of his death.

A correspondent writes : I usually avoid like poison the reported utterances of Canon Hensley Henson ; but my eye was attracted in the Times of Easter Monday to his Easter sermon by a couple of lines of poetry—and I am one of those who are unable ever to let poetry go by unread. What did I find ? Canon Henson professed to be quoting Wordsworth's "Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood ;" and this was his notion of the wording of two famous lines :

But trailing clouds of glory do we come
From Heaven, which is our home.

I am no theologian, and the theological significance of the mistake may seem to me greater than it is. I read through the report of the sermon to see if my suspicion was just, and found myself unable to decide, since the discourse was merely the usual combination of hypothesis, vagueness, and elaborate prevarication. But, quite apart from the question whether the Origenian heresy is permitted in the pulpits of the Church of England, and whether Canon Henson either knows or cares whether it is or not, what can be said of a mind so unscholarly, so slipshod, so dead to the exact word and meaning of his authorities as to profess to quote, in public and on an occasion of the greatest solemnity, a couple of well-known lines—and to quote them wrong ?

The remarks of one correspondent on the teaching of singing provided by the State in elementary public schools which we printed in our last issue have drawn the following from another : "I have lived long, both in London and the country, within earshot of a primary school. The London school has been bodily removed, so it cannot now be identified. The country school still flourishes. The same observations have been forced upon me in both cases. I speak here of the country school. During singing-time a volume of annotated roaring proceeds from the building. Since the boys are none of them older than about fourteen, these sounds seem to be emitted from their stomachs. They have no tone whatever. They are a stentorian whisper, like the singing of a porter who has lost his voice, or the song of a nutmeg bird heard through an exceedingly powerful microphone. I am aware that in some parts of the country singing-voices are generally very harsh, so that it is difficult to obtain choirboys ; in this particular district the voices are peculiarly dulcet. The village, which is a large one, has for the last forty years possessed a remarkably good choir in the parish church, drawn almost exclusively from the roarsers in the primary school. Nor is good singing confined to the Established Church, for such strains as 'Let the bright Seraphim' cleave the air about several Nonconformist churches on Bank Holiday Sundays and other high festivals. I am also aware that many country schools are so poor that they have to put up with inferior masters. The school in question is well endowed, and has always commanded the services of excellent masters. It is consequently the State which provides the week-day roaring, and merely permits the religious authorities, both established and free, to cultivate 'sweet singing' for Sunday. It is not surprising that a zealous patron of Education, The Morning Post, has to chronicle the prevalence of 'School Board Pharyngitis' and '[roarers] nodules.' I may mention that the boys I allude to show their musical capabilities by roaring, neither out of tune, flat, nor sharp. If your correspondent of last week will offer a prize for the loudest sharp whispering produced by a County Council school I shall be pleased to do the same for the encouragement of flat whispering. As for dialect, I like it, and I would not on any account discourage the London boy from respecting his farver and muvver, nor the country boy from preserving the Latin derivation of Charrulls."

Besides a learned collection of the annals of the Bishops of Glasgow by Bishop Dowden, mainly interesting to Glasgow antiquaries, though by no means unimportant to Scottish historians, the Scottish Historical Review for April contains a contemporary letter from one Mr. John Stafford, attorney, of Macclesfield, concerning the occupation of that town by Highlanders in the 'Forty-five. There is also a vivid little note on a Roxburghshire mansion and its contents in 1729. It is interesting from the light it throws on domestic life in a household of moderate competence at that period. In the inventory of the library, which was quite a small one, we find many books of which the titles are familiar to inhabitants and visitors to old houses of a like stamp all over this island, such as Gerarde's "Herbal" (the most valuable of the lot), Bradley on "Husbandry," "The Gardiners' Dictionary," perhaps Miller's four enormous volumes, Rapin's "History of England," Clarendon's "History," Nat. Lee's plays, Prior's poems, Ovid's "Metamorphoses," certainly the excellent Sandys's "The Compleat Horseman," and "L'Histoire de Don Quichote," in six volumes. We are sure they were small, and ornamented with frontispieces. Probably they were Le Sage's translation, or Motteux's, if the date be not too early. We appreciate the immortality of Cervantes now only alas ! as we get older. We wonder whether literary boys and girls appreciated it in 1729, or only pretended to.

The molif of Balzac's "Comédie humaine," as he states in his too little remembered Avant-propos, was to express the poetry of the human heart as expressed not by "les sèches et rebutantes nomenclatures de faits appelées histoires," but by the history of manners. It is the manners of the period in their most intimate and consequently most natural form that such old unhistoric houses as this in Roxburghshire enshrine. The study of household ways throws light on the views and objects of those who made history proper. There is still a vast amount of evidence of what the manners were lingering in the shape of household implements and furniture, and in specimens of household arts. It is a pity that these should not be collected and stored in some single museum—one would be quite sufficient—so that the surroundings of our grandfathers, grandmothers, and our great and great-great grandparents perhaps might be reconstructed for us, in one of their general more domestic haunts—say Bath or Weymouth, or Tunbridge Wells. We advocate the preservation not of fine pieces of furniture, they are already sufficiently treasured, but of those objects of la vie intime which are destroyed when the old homes are dispersed, or are only treasured by faithful retainers.

The hideous outrage recently committed during the Pope's Easter Mass appears to us insufficiently explained by the excuses of its perpetrators. In the first place, the action of the Austro-Hungarian representative of the Vatican seems to call for stringent examination. If he knew that these persons were Jews, he had no right to obtain for them a privilege coveted by but denied to all but a few out of the vast world of Catholics ; if he knew so little about them as not to know that they were Jews, he had no business to be their guarantee with his Holiness. And the perpetrators of the outrage themselves ? Can it seriously be believed that Professor Feilbogen and the women with him, after following with the greedy, inquisitive eyes of the tourist all the details of the entertainment—the nummerci, as they doubtless called it—were genuinely convinced that the kissing of the Pope's hand was the object of those who went up to the altar-rail?

There were two hundred worshippers present; it is not likely that the three Jews were among the first to approach the altar; still less that they were not watching—and possibly through opera-glasses—the details of what was being done. Even if it were not so, is it to be believed that a Professor—no matter of what—could be possessed of such inconceivable ignorance of all the literature and thought of the last nineteen hundred years as not to know what the Mass is and what Communion? We are not accusing these Jews of deliberate sacrilege: they cannot be acquitted of the charge of something infinitely worse than carelessness. And the conduct of the person who procured them admittance is nothing short of disgraceful.

NAMELESS GRIEF

POOR little childish breast, troubled and heaving,
With some dim sorrow grieving;
It is not well that you should reckon of trouble,
For whom the Earth's a bubble
And God your sky.
O the sad ecstasy
Of your insurgent sobbing,
As it were throbbing
Of very-misery!
And yet 'tis only
Some brief, unreasonable, lonely
Touch of a nameless sorrow that takes you,
And to such heaving trouble wakes you.

Yet to us too there comes,
Even as there stirs the far alarm of drums
Upon a City's ear,
Sense insuppressible of perpetual sadness,
Of the World's madness,
Of distant alien trouble;
Then verily our Earth's a bubble
And Hell our sky;
Then verily the fool's old filth
In idle spilt;
The hot and hasty zealotry
Of ravaging evil;
Then, verily,
The roar of the emancipated Devil
Loosened amid our worship, love, and faith,
And on our sickly streets and happy meadows
Casting smoky shadows
Of utter Death,
Seem all the fruit of some fell harlotry,
And purchase of the Soul's apostasy!
Yea, when there comes
(Even as to a quiet City the far alarm of drums)
Sense of iniquity daily less remote,
There rise within our throat
Such breaking sobs,
Such bitter, insuppressible throbs
Of grief unnamed, sorrow no longer mild,
As in your heaving breast, sad Child,
Wake tears and anguished protestations wild!

DR. VERRALL'S EUMENIDES

The Eumenides of Aeschylus. With an Introduction, Commentary, and Translation by A. W. VERRALL, Litt.D. (Macmillan, 10s. net.)

THIS very fascinating book completes Dr. Verrall's edition of the "Oresteia" of Aeschylus. All scholars are familiar with his brilliant but drastic treatment of the "Agamemnon" and the "Choephoroi"; indeed, many schoolboys and undergraduates must have read his "Agamemnon," which has reached a second edition. Probably the present work will achieve a like success; and we hope it may. For, though we are unable to accept many of his emendations and explanations, we hold that there is no one, whether teacher or learner, who will not find much instruction, suggestion, and stimulation in Dr. Verrall's "Eumenides," no one who will not see in it the outcome of finished scholarship and a singularly refined, acute, and poetic spirit, wholly devoted to the sympathetic elucidation and embellishment of an ancient master loved "little short of idolatry," as Shakespeare was by Ben Jonson.

We meet in the book before us all the literary finish and poetic insight which we expect from the brilliant Cambridge scholar, and in his dealing with the text he is not so subversive as ere now he has been. He still thinks none the better of a word for being found in Liddell and Scott, and is disposed to stretch the canons of grammar in obedience to the canons of taste. On this subject we shall have something to say anon, but only to illustrate our general criticism. A more careful critical estimate belongs to magazines which are professedly scholastic.

His introduction is, as might be expected, eminently readable. He finds the exposition of the story and structure of the play comparatively simple, while the underlying conceptions, the inquiry into the sources of the drama, present problems well-nigh insoluble. Aeschylus took an extremely ancient story for the unfolding of thoughts which were new and his own. Dr. Verrall is not satisfied with Müller's account of the political and moral import of the play—the support (by the ascription of a Divine origin) of the Court of the Areopagus, recently threatened by the Democratical Party and Ephialtes, coupled with the establishment of the religion of the Erinyes, which was the religion of Conscience. Nor was it inspired by the treaty with Argos, or a desire to protest against parricide. The deed of Orestes had every excuse, even the sanction of the command of Delphi; yet the instinct of the matricide himself revolts against it, and the persecuting Erinyes confirm the accusing voice of conscience:

Confronted constantly with cases of conduct upon which we can give no sentence with absolute satisfaction, upon what can we repose, or how do we know that there is any right at all? Zeus, it is answered in the opening of the "Agamemnon," vv. 170 foll., is the only means by which the burden can be put off; that is to say, in later but not essentially different phrase, it must be by an act of faith in God. In the same spirit, but more joyously and triumphantly, the "Eumenides" solves the case of Orestes, or, to speak more properly, declares it to be solved in the sight of Eternal Justice by conducting us to a final scene of reconciliation, in which, under the sanction of Zeus, all the parties to the Divine dispute, the pursuing no less than the protecting deities, are shown to be absolutely content.

The jury instituted by Athena, who presides over the trial, with the Erinyes as prosecutors and Apollo as counsel for Orestes, are equally divided. The casting vote of Athena absolves Orestes. The Erinyes at first repudiate this verdict, but are finally persuaded by Athena to acquiesce, and even to accept a home in her city and the guardianship of the newly-instituted Court of the Areopagus in Athens, on which, in the grand concluding scene, the Erinyes invoke every blessing. Thus the claims of religion and patriotism are satisfied:

What is important, and solely important, from a religious and speculative point of view is the acquiescence of the opposing gods—the conversion of the Erinyes.

Dr. Verrall rejects the view that the play turns on theories of kinship, or an estimate of the relative claims of father and mother. It turns on an antithesis of principles. The issue is : Is justice absolute or not ? Are there acts which nothing can excuse ? The Erinyes hold that there are such acts, and this the defence denies. From this point of view it is very important to define exactly the functions of the Avenging Goddesses. An error in the text of v. 424—which, however, Dr. Verrall regards as sound—has very unduly widened their jurisdiction by making it their function to drive out from house and home into exile and wandering all homicides. The Greek word is βροτοκτονούντας. We have always looked on the emendation of this word by the late Professor Davies as not only brilliant but certain. He read αὐτοκτονούντας, which the copyist of the Medicean codex, who was more than usually unintelligent and ignorant, would have taken to mean "suicides," which is plainly absurd. Accordingly, he would have corrected the word to the reading found in the MS. But αὐτοκτόνος means not only "suicide" but "slayer of one's kin," and this exactly describes the function of the Erinyes. Compare v. 212, where the Erinyes disclaim jurisdiction even over a wife who slays her husband because he is not a kinsman—not of her own blood. See also v. 607, where Orestes asks them why they did not persecute Clytemnestra for her murder of Agamemnon, and their answer is :

She was not of one blood with the man she slew.

In four places only has Dr. Verrall changed the letters of the MS. upon his own conjecture : vv. 224, 390, 448, 913. Before briefly considering these and kindred questions it will be necessary to give some account of the codex Mediceus. It is written in small, round letters, litterae minusculae without capitals. The text from which it was transcribed may have been written either in litterae uncialae, small and capital mixed, or in litterae quadratae, all square and angular, which we call capitals, with no spaces between the words. The copier of M had been told not to write the words continuously, but to separate them. He seems to have interpreted this direction as meaning that he should leave some intervals. So he broke up the text into such combinations of letters as should present an agreeable variety, without any consideration of words or meaning. Modern editors are sometimes charged with exaggerating the stupidity of copyists, especially when the MS. reading is utterly at variance with their own conjectures. But the view can boast a fair antiquity. A marginal note by a scholiast on Anth. Pal. 5, 262, says :

There is nothing omitted ; only the scribe was a fool.

This may be said with great truth of the copyist of M. To return to Dr. Verrall's emendations :

V. 224. The reading M is :

δίκας δ' ἐπάλλας τῶν δ' ἐποπτεύει θεά

This was corrected in the sixteenth century to δὲ Παλλάς, which has been read ever since. Dr. Verrall reads δ' ἐπάλλας "the other way about." This is ingenious, but it is not easy to understand his objection to the mention of Pallas.

390. Here he is extraordinarily ingenious. In the line :

ἀνηλιφ λάμπα δυσοδοπαίπαλα,

the letter μ spoils the meaning in λάμπα, "mirk," and a consonant after δυσ- is required by the metre. Dr. Verrall's theory is that μ was omitted by mistake, was preserved in the margin, and was ultimately inserted in the wrong word. But is δυσμοδοπαίπαλα—"a twilight, rugged way"—a possible composition of δυσμή, ὁδός, and παιπάλη? He compares θεοσκυθρωπός (Chio. 734). But this is a far more natural compound. Besides, it is a conjecture.

448. Dr. Verrall's view is very probably right. But one does not care for restorations which depend on an assumed stage direction.

913. Here, too, we have a curious compound in ἀπένθετον, "grafted from," and a strange expression in :

δικαίων τῶνδ' ἀπένθετον γένος, the sort which from these, the righteous, hath taken graft.

Much happier, in our judgment, is his treatment of v. 595 :

λέγω· ξιφουλκῶ χειρὶ· πρὸς, δέρην τεμῶν, with my bare sword, I answer; and further, by cutting her throat.

In a celebrated line, 286, he reverts to the MS. reading—καθαίρει, "does away with," rejecting Stanley's καθαίρει, "purifies." It is in this direction that Dr. Verrall is most daring, in the defence of long since corrected errors of the copyist. Thus he reads πλήστους, "full," for Πλειστοῦ in v. 27. δία, "drops" (neut. plur. of δῖον, "a drop), rejecting the universally-accepted emendation λιβα, and in other passages gives a place to words and meanings which have not found favour with editors or lexicographers.

Of the admirable dignity and beauty of the translation it would be impossible to speak too highly. It is a prose poem throughout. We might take a specimen at random ; that which we have lit on is from the sublime "binding hymn" of the Erinyes, 322 ff. Our readers can judge whether it is not sublime in the English as well as in the Greek :

Mother, who barest me, O Mother Night, to punish them that see and that see not, hear ! For the whelp of Leto would disprivege me, by taking from me yon cowering creature, my victim, made mine own by his mother's blood.

But over the sacrifice this is the song we sing ; wild it maketh, wood [i.e. mad] it maketh, this hymn of the Erinyes, sense-destroying, life-withering music, harsh and untunable.

This power the spindle of fate did thoroughly assure to us, that, if any mortal be companioned by wanton [rather unnatural] crime, with such we should walk until he pass beneath the ground—and death itself is for him no mighty deliverance.

But over the sacrifice, &c.

From our beginning was this office confirmed to us. The Deathless Ones may not lay finger thereon, nor is any of them co-parcener to divide with us. In the white robes was I given no part or share or portion, because of their dwelling-places I would have naught.

Whensoever the subversive spirit of domestic hate destroys a life that should be dear, then after the destroyer, hey ! we follow, and, whatsoever his strength, by the fresh blood on him we wear him down.

It is zeal that brings us here, zeal to relieve another of these cares ; and the Gods' part it is, to confirm the immunity we pray, refusing to question it. For Zeus hath rejected from his converse, with merited loathing, this blood-bedabbled sort.

Whensoever the subversive, &c.

DOLEFUL SHADES

West Ham: the Report of the Outer London Inquiry Committee. By EDWARD G. HOWARTH and MONA WILSON. (Dent, 6s. net.)

IN some old book we remember reading, If Jack Sheppard had not immortalised Seven Dials, Seven Dials would have immortalised itself. We may say the same of West Ham. If its guardians had not immortalised it for corruption and bribery, the sale of offices, and all the shady practices of democracy once supposed the monopoly of the unreformed Parliament or municipal borough, it would have immortalised itself as the doleful shades of poverty and the region of insalubrious trades. West Ham presents the appearance of the rubbish-heap of the civilisation of commercialism. It is the happy hunting-ground of social inquirers who make elaborate statements of the problems of poverty, apparently undisheartened by the fact that for all their inquiries there is no solution of them. The inquirers, like the residents, must feel that all abandon hope who enter the Malebolge of West Ham. You find there all the highest rates of mortality and all the lowest rates of wages, of decency, and of comfort. Casual employment is the rule of industry, and there swarms an overcrowded population penned up in an area where the open spaces are rarer than in any other district of the Metropolis. The rates are high because the rating of the houses is low, and landlords must build such property or they will have no tenants. Instead of additional houses bringing in to the borough additional means, it would be a saving to buy the waste places to prevent them being built on, as the education-rate would mean a loss of fifty shillings for every house on which it would be assessed. The West Hamites are prolific, and most of the children are to be educated at the public expense. And besides, casual wanderers, with their casual families, are always trooping into West Ham, where they settle, attracted by the casual labour by which the greater part of its industries are maintained. The people seem to be those who are not wanted elsewhere, just as the industries planted there are what the common law would call nuisances if they were projected in any other neighbourhood. It seems to be the rule, too, that once you seek work in West Ham you get steadily poorer with the irregular employment, and you drift from one to another of its delectable trades for the rest of your life, except when you become installed on its list of regular paupers.

There they are, near two hundred and seventy thousand of them, who a century ago were not seven thousand. And these are the days, too, when, for the unskilled labour such as floods West Ham, the conditions are every day becoming harder. Shipbuilding and its allied trades have left for the North; the unskilled are always being supplanted by machinery; and even the skilled are scarcely less exposed to the same risk. The struggle with poverty has been the historic note of West Ham since 1819, when the population had reached about ten thousand, and, as a Committee to Inquire into the Administration of the Poor Law said, "the nearer approach to the parish of commercial institutions in which labouring men are employed (such as are the new docks and the variety of occupations contingent upon the wants of shipping) is a great cause of the influx of the poorer classes to reside in the parish of West Ham." After all, one sees that this Report, in which one can learn all there is to be known of West Ham, is, in all its ramifications, essentially a treatment of one problem only—the problem of poverty. It is a temptation to think that the key to it is the redundancy of the classes who look to unskilled labour for their support. They ought, theoretically, to have always an eye on the relation between their numbers and their chances of employment. As no other class has ever learned this art, it would be unfair to expect the denizens of West Ham to have the skill. And besides, as West Ham is a standing lake for the drainage of other over-populated districts to flow into, what profit would they have of their providence if it were not imitated elsewhere? So that West Ham is a satirical comment on an axiom of political economy which no less a person than our new Premier quoted with complacency the other day. The labour displaced by such a measure as the Licensing Bill would become absorbed in other employments, Mr. Asquith said. What happens is that it is not absorbed thus, but accumulates into morasses such as that of West Ham. The particular morass there is explored and mapped out with all its slimy horrors in this book; but how is it and similar ones to be drained?

THE HEREDITARY WAY

Memoirs of a Surrey Labourer. By GEORGE BOURNE. (Duckworth, 6s.)

THIS is a delightfully simple and unpretentious book. There have been not a few "studies" made during recent years of the rustic mind and environment, which we have come to regard a little doubtfully. It is, we think, a most difficult thing to do what the author of this volume has done, in setting down, without fancifulness or preciousness of epithet, the ways and sayings of an ancient Surrey labourer, Frederick Bettesworth. We missed reading an earlier book concerning this worthy, but we are heartily glad that we have not missed the present volume.

Some readers, no doubt, will be offended by his taste for beer. I hope there will be some to give him credit for the months and years in which, with these few exceptions, he controlled the appetite. Remember, he had no religious convictions, nor did the peasant traditions by which he lived afford him much guidance. Alone, of his inborn instinct for being a decent man, he strove through all his life, not to be rich, but to live upright and unashamed. Fumbling, tiresome, garrulous, unprofitable, lean and grim and dirty in outward appearance, the grey old life was full of fight for its idea of being a man; full of fight and patience and stubborn resolve not to give in to anything which it had learnt to regard as weakness. I remember looking down, after I had upbraided a failure, at the old limbs bending over the soil in such humility, and I could hardly bear the thought that very likely they were tired and aching. This enfeebled body—dead now and mouldering in the churchyard—was alive in those days and felt pain. Do but think of that, and then think of the patient, resolute spirit in it, which almost never indulged its weaknesses, but had its self-respect, its half-savage instincts towards righteousness, its smothered tastes, its untold affections, and its tenderness. That was the old man, gaunt-limbed, but good-tempered, partially blind and fumbling, but experienced, whom we have to imagine now indomitably facing yet another year of his life, and a prospect in which there is little for him to hope for. Nay, there was much for him to dread, had he known.

Bettesworth would be termed, expressively, an "odd-job man." The frequent recollections of his varied past, in the Crimea, and subsequently "odd-jobbing" in two or three counties, are so many lights upon a character which is, we hope, still in some degree representative, though the publisher avers that it is becoming rare. Such men, living by the soil, are to be regarded as the bones of the nation. They have not the suppleness of stunted cockneydom, the restlessness, assertiveness, excitability, impudence, which seem to be the inevitable and early flower of, say, London street-life. Peasants still are to be found who respect the Church and acknowledge contentedly their "betters;" in the villages you still may find men satisfied to live in the manner of earlier generations, as beneath an ancient embodied benediction. And though there may exist an occasional suspiciousness (Bettesworth exemplifies it) on the part of the earth's labourers, of those of another class, there is, on the other hand, a far keener suspicion—nay, resentment—of ill-considered novelties, which is to us immensely refreshing; as when, as we have lately heard, there came to a certain humble hamlet in the West a band of the elect who would teach the lost how to live. The lost, abandoned to the meagre mercy to which they and their forefathers alike had been born, living in a village of which hardly a wall was built later than the fourteenth century, looked on (we can well imagine them) with a certain mute amazement not very remote from contempt at the efforts of the elect, who maintained themselves in enlightened independence of Church and social intercourse. Well, the elect finally squabbled and disbanded, and the villagers, not much the worse for the irruption of "modernity," chuckled profanely as men will who:

Rubbed through yesterday
In their hereditary way;
And will rub through, if they can,
To-morrow on the self-same plan—provided, of course, no new social salvation is proffered to their churlish wits, lost in mediæval simpleness and obscurity.

It is Bettesworth who has led us into this digression, for we think he would have found voice for the resentment of which we have spoken. His talk, as recorded by Mr. George Bourne, has no strange brilliancies; he is not a rustic Rousseau, or Nietzsche, or Ruskin. Simple, sound sense he commonly utters, slipping not unpleasantly into the garrulity of age, and apparently consoling himself therewith. But the passage we have quoted will indicate something more than the peasant's good sense; it will indicate the reality of the universal sadness, the general and enduring sorrow. Bettesworth clung to life, to independence, and with honourable affection to that part of him—unspeakably dirty, stricken, irresponsible—which bore his wife's name. His own decline and fall, his endurance and suspiciousness, his gratitude and resentful rudeness, are told here in detail, but without superciliousness or maudlin pity. It is simply the end of a courageous life lived independently, and laid down without the sad degradation of prolonged uselessness. Of such men we hope the stock will not wholly fail, to keep the body hard and whole and strong; and we hope they will not lack a chronicler so capable and sensible as the author of these "Memoirs."

REVOLTING ETHICS

The Ethics of Revolt. By GREVILLE MACDONALD, D.D., Hon. Fellow of King's College, London. (Duckworth, 5s. net.)

A GENTLEMAN who writes with a slow, tentative, self-listening style, such as a cow uses when she walks timidly over a hollow plank floor, should be very certain that he has some worthy message to deliver before he exposes himself to the cold malignity of print. Dr. Greville Macdonald writes with a style that must bring out all the worst passions of his pupils (if he has any), and incline them so far to revolt, that they are not unlikely to pelt him at his desk and justify it afterwards. Here are one or two specimens of his manner :

The evolution of species may seem no more than a process of victorious self-seeking and cruelty, a justification of bloodshed and craft; yet man has been evolved with something of purpose, something of humanity in his life, either because of, or in spite of, this very process of his creation. Human history is perhaps a no less terrible record of the tyranny of the strong over the many whom it forces into an increasing inefficiency, yet do we present a saner vindication of the law that can be understood from burrowing in the dregs of our failures.

So he clodhops confusedly on through 299 dreary pages. Sometimes a wave of excitement quickens the pace, as when the author comes in view of those whom he delights to honour, those whose very existence is to be justified by this laboured work, "the army of revolutionaries, cranks, and uncomfortables." At the sight of this very disordered army the style becomes almost delirious :

The inclusive name of this great section of society is Nonconformity—a word that in itself stinks in the nostrils of Respectability—that hound who goes about sniffing for what he imagines offensive, because too sweet for his narrow understanding! Yet why so offensive? The hound, if he thinks for a moment—an absurd supposition, perhaps—must see how each advantage that has ever accrued to him in the increasing comfort of kennel or the dutifulness of his masters is no other than the result of nonconformity

(this time without a capital). It seems fairly obvious that a man who cannot straighten his style and disentangle his similes better than this, for it is a second or third attempt at authorship, needs to be justified by some over-mastering message : and if this were to be seen and felt any criticism of style becomes mere impertinence. Consequently we turn with eagerness to the real message of the book. Alas! it is just as unprofitable as the style. It is a glorification, which the author thinks to be the same as the justification, of the contentious, rebellious, self-assertive, vulgar individualist spirit. If the style incites the pupil to pelt the lecturer, the matter excuses him for doing so. In as far as the author proves his point, he excuses his audience for replying with a shower of figs, and there is nothing in the civil and ecclesiastical rebellions which the author lauds, which might not be re-enacted in little in his own class-room. But is it true that :

All great things have been won and given by those who would not conform?

The word not-conform may be beaten into thin foil, but it will not cover all the invention, discovery, victory, and benevolence of all our benefactors. It is juggling with words to call Wellington, Tennyson, Dr. Johnson, Jeremy Taylor, Hegel, Mr. Holman Hunt, Shakespeare, James Watt, or Mr. Kipling by such a far-fetched name as that of Nonconformist. Although every man who transcends his generation has an element of opposition about him, yet to dwell upon the negative side of his work and to dub him with terms that are meant thus to describe it, is to miss the secret and essence of all that makes him great. The love, zeal, and sympathy are greater things than this, and they are all cogently conformist things; and it is by these and not by his denial and contention that he is useful and noble. A foolish individualism, which puts the wisest and most uninstructed minds upon a dead level in the quest for truth, an absolutism which "transcends the possibility of knowledge" and affords untrained students a "reason" for laying down the law upon ethical problems, these seem a very paltry stock-in-trade wherewith to review and restate problems which, to put it gently, are not exactly fresh to the reading public; while even the public which does not read, but which canes, hangs, and demolishes, has long ago made up its mind upon "the old claim that the interest of the individual must ever be subordinate to the welfare of the species." This old claim is ratified and confirmed by every act of governance—by taxation, education, the Navy, Baptism, vaccination, King's College London, notices to keep to the right on footpaths, and to notify smallpox. If to endorse this claim is to "prove harmful," Dr. Macdonald must either destroy all the society which protects and shelters him, or else he must emigrate to Kerguelen Island, now vacated by the last whaler, and there develop his individuality and revolting ethic, to the top of his bent, feeding upon the rhizomes of the utricularia montana and making soup of the lawless amoeba whom he loves. Bon voyage!

CATHERINE OF BRAGANÇA

Catherine of Bragança, Infanta of Portugal and Queen-Consort of England. By ILLIAS CAMPBELL DAVIDSON. With Portraits and Illustrations. (Murray, 15s.)

CATHERINE'S contemporaries detested her for her creed and piety, for her uselessness as a political tool, for her bitter misfortune of childlessness, and they have left her portrait to posterity painted in malignant colours.

So says truly the Preface to the first life of our Portuguese Queen; but a careful study and comparison of the authorities has enabled Miss Davidson to show her as she really was—just, merciful, humble, with the virtues of womanliness, truth, and chastity—in fine, with noble qualities which neither the age nor the Court of Charles II. could appreciate or even understand. Insulted and neglected by the husband to whom she had given her whole heart, she not only remained loyal, but continued to love him; and, though her character had been assailed and her head had narrowly escaped the block at the time of the Popish plot, she yet preserved a kindly feeling for this country to the end. Indeed, this book confirms the truth of her dying declaration that :

When she was in England she had been falsely accused of an endeavour to bring in Popery, but that she never desired any more favour for those of her own religion than was permitted by her marriage articles; that she had never been a promoter of the French influence in England; on the contrary, she was grieved to think that the French fashion in her brother's Court would do England ill offices in Portugal.

For years her life was almost a martyrdom, for she found herself outraged day by day in her affection as a wife and her dignity as a woman. Charles, not content with flaunting his mistresses and bastards before her, honoured them with titles of nobility, and loaded them with presents of jewels and money, when she was hardly able to make both ends meet, because, in some years, she received only a tithe of her allowance, and the courtier, finding her offices useless as a road to preferment, crowded round her rivals, the Duchesses of Cleveland and Portsmouth, and left Catherine alone—a Queen without a Court. They cared not that, while the King's mistresses took French pay and by their influence on Charles bound England a slave to France, Catherine had brought their country, besides valuable trading privileges, the possession of Tangier, a key of the Mediterranean, and Bombay, the importance of which was even then so well recognised that the Portuguese were as loth to part with it as the English were glad to obtain it. The example of her life, too long obscured by envy and lying report, and the foundation of our Indian Empire, laid by her, should entitle Catherine to the respect and gratitude of Englishmen to-day; and if it be said that she clung to the Anglo-Portuguese alliance principally because she and her family considered it a pledge of their country's independence, to which she had sacrificed her person and her happiness, generosity compels us to remember that we have been the chief gainers by it.

Miss Davidson seems unaware of this ; but had she referred to Portuguese historians she would see how one-sided the alliance has often been in its results, and would find that if the Treaty of 1661 contributed to the fall of the Portuguese Empire in the East, the Methuen Treaty killed Portuguese manufactures and prolonged that English supremacy which had begun with the Treaty of 1654. It has often been contended, though we think unjustly, that the Braganzas have in the past sacrificed the interests of Portugal to save themselves, but there can be no doubt whatever that while the alliance worked fairly during the Middle Ages, when Portugal and England were of about equal strength, yet from the sixteenth century downwards the balance inclined so far against the smaller nation that both in politics and trade it was almost reduced to the position of an English dependency.

Though taking and desiring to take no part in the public affairs of her adopted country, Catherine was not without influence on social life. If she did not actually introduce Italian opera into England, which seems likely enough in the daughter of the musical John IV., the first of these was certainly performed in her presence, and the habit of tea-drinking, which the Portuguese had brought from the East, first became popular owing to her love of it. Clarendon, a better man than most, considered Catherine obstinate, because only a few months after her marriage she refused Charles's request that she would receive the notorious Mrs. Palmer among her ladies ; but we should rather be inclined to blame her for ultimately yielding did we not know that she had to choose between accepting that humiliation and losing even the friendship of the man she adored. At most she was tactless in the way she handled her husband ; but what else could be expected from a woman, at once pure-minded and inexperienced, who had not been out of her palace ten times before she left Portugal to wed a royal profligate and live among men and women even more unscrupulous than he ? Some called her a fright, an unpardonable sin in those days, but her portraits in this book give that statement the lie. She had somewhat prominent teeth, but this defect was compensated for by her eyes, which Charles found "excellent fine," by her luxuriant hair, and by hands and feet which even the most malicious of her rivals had to admit were shapely and small. Altogether, Catherine stands out a sympathetic figure from the background of Court life, which is described with skill and knowledge, and our only regret in closing this tasteful volume is that it should contain so many misspellings of Portuguese words.

THE ENGLISH SPY

"LOOKING BACKWARDS" might have been an apt sub-title for the very interesting series of reprints which Messrs. Methuen are issuing of the "Plain and Coloured Books" of the last century. Our ancestors of two or three generations ago were intensely interested in themselves, and at no period in the history of the British race did their self-admiration reach a higher pitch. They had some excuse for this. The great struggle with France had come to an end, Napoleon was safely stowed away in St. Helena, Great Britain had won at Trafalgar and Waterloo the naval and military supremacy of the Old World ; she was mistress of all she surveyed in both politics and commerce. Patriotism had reached a height which it had rarely known before, and has, perhaps, never known since. National vanity had taken on a pose of coxcombry. Britons were excessively touchy, and while they resented with a virulence which is incredible in these days the mildest foreign criticism, they rejoiced coarsely and noisily in the contemplation of what they considered to be their most virile and characteristic qualities ; and they liked the picture to be highly coloured. They were quite willing to poke fun at themselves in their own way, but the caricature had to be kept within certain well-prescribed limits.

The badly-mounted fox-hunter, the incapable "Sonntags-Jaeger" (such as Winkle) were legitimate butts of ridicule, but not the fox-hunter per se. The ruddiness, the corpulence, the vulgarity, the bestiality of John Bull could be exaggerated at will without giving offence, but it would not do to hint that he was not the greatest creature on earth. His eccentricity was wilful, his grotesqueness of his own making—a kind of defiance of the world, a set-off against French grimaces and kickshaws, a waving of the bluff national flag, itself like an immense slice of underdone roast-beef, with its streaks of blue and red and white—prime beef, however. Most of Rowlandson's and Robert Cruickshank's colouring is suggestive of the shambles. John Bull was quite proud of the coarse gesture with which he expressed his contempt of the non-British universe. To an equal degree was his fury roused if any witty or merely observant foreigner presumed to hint that beneath the skin of the little top-booted, flat-hatted, purple-jowled, pot-bellied, boxing blackleg, in the guise of whom John Bull best liked to be depicted, was an ill-bred bore, lick-spittle, and booby, whose pretence to set the tone to European manners was an insult upon the human race.

There were, of course, notable exceptions to the rule. John Bull, like the Golden Calf of an earlier dispensation, did not enjoy undivided worship in the place where he had been set up. There were dissidents. The most John Bullish period of the last century, which was its first quarter, gave birth to, or witnessed, the most fruitful labours of delicate and essentially English intelligences such as those of Shelley, Charles Lamb, Hazlitt, Tennyson, and Coleridge—to mention four picked at haphazard ; and the seeds of a new era had already been sown. But for the time being John Bull's star was in the ascendant. He was rampant and roaring ; he swaggered and reeled along the high roads of civilisation, rudely pushing aside all whom he met ; there was no watchful policeman, in the form of an independent Press, to tell him that he was obstructing the pathway. The police had not been invented in any form, and the night "Charleys" were but the habitual butts and laughing-stocks and souffres-douleur of your true rollicking rake of a John Bull. Woe to the unhappy wight who dared to raise his voice and say that John Bull was a blackguard, or even that he was an ass. Instantly he was roared down, and threatened with all sorts of personal ill-usage. It is difficult to believe, in the cold light of the twentieth century, that such a courteous and even sympathetic description of British manners as that which was published in the year of Waterloo by the learned French translator of Sir Walter Scott, under the title of "Quinze Jours à Londres," should have caused the violent outcry that it did. The author gave full credit to the Londoners for many excellent qualities. He admired the parks and the pavements of London. The Insurance Companies, which were a novelty at that time, struck him as a fertile production of the practical British brain, worthy of imitation in his own country. But he could not stomach the coffee brewed in London, and he disliked the vegetables cooked in water, and though he found the women beautiful, he thought that as the men did not pay enough court to them, so they were lacking in spontaneous charm and witty conversation. If the author of "Quinze Jours à Londres," subsequently developed into "Six Mois à Londres," had allowed his identity to be revealed, there is little doubt that he would have been slaughtered. The outcry was for his blood. A really tragic fate had befallen his predecessor, Sorbières, whose adventure forms the subject of an interesting account by M. Jusserand in "English Essays from a French Pen." Sorbières had much to say in praise of the London of Charles II., which he visited in 1663. He admired its public buildings, with some exceptions, but thought less of English cooking ; while of the Chancellor, Lord Clarendon, he had the audacity to state that :

My Lord Hidde . . . is ignorant of the belles lettres.

It was this personal appreciation of the Duke of York's father-in-law which roused the most violent animosity. Louis XIV., who at that time was anxious to maintain an entente cordiale with England, banished Sorbières, and ordered his book to be suppressed, while Sprat, who replied to it in "Observations on Monsieur de Sorbières' Voyage into England"—which contains this monumental phrase: "But the worst is still behind: my Lord Chancellor is utterly ignorant of the belles lettres!"—was made Dean of Westminster and Bishop of Rochester. It required the personal intervention of the good-natured Charles II. to secure the forgiveness of Sorbières by the French Government.

Hardly less anger was called forth by the publication, at approximately the same time as "The English Spy," of Prince von Pückler-Muskau's travels in England, one of the most charming and brilliantly written books in the German language. The Prince, who must have been a delightful fellow, and very different, indeed, from the modern German Junker, was keenly appreciative of the things he saw and of the people he met—the original Rothschild among others—and his criticism seems to have been perfectly just. In fact, it is "The English Spy," with its illustrations by Robert Cruikshank, which more than confirms the mild strictures and gentle ridicule of the German Prince and of the author of "Quinze Jours à Londres":

A "gentleman" is neither a man of noble birth (writes Prince von Pückler-Muskau) nor a man of noble sentiments (weder ein Edelmann noch ein edler Mann), but in strictness, a man of independent means, and perfect knowledge of the usages of society. . . . A really poor man who is not in a position to contract debts can on no terms be a "gentleman." On the contrary, a rich scamp, who has had what is called a good education, so long as he preserves his "character" (reputation) dexterously, passes for "a perfect gentleman." In the exclusive society of London there are yet finer "nuances." A man, for instance, who were to manifest any timidity or courtesy towards women, instead of treating them in a familiar, confident, and non-chalant manner, would awaken the suspicion that he was "no gentleman." But should the luckless man ask twice for soup at dinner, or appear in evening dress at a breakfast which begins at three in the afternoon and ends at midnight, he may be a prince and a millionaire, but he is "no gentleman."

It was this type of "gentleman" that Bernard Blackmantle has described to us with infinite gusto, and that the Cruikshanks loved to draw. Both Bernard Blackmantle and Robert Cruikshank have the defects of their qualities; they fitted one another to a nicety, and the former is a literary, while the latter is an artistic, scarecrow.

"Thank God that we are not as those publicans are," though it has called forth during many centuries undeserved opprobrium on the Pharisee who uttered it, was in reality one of the most admirable cries that ever issued from the heart of man, and is at the basis of all true spirit of progress. Thank God, we may say with the Pharisee of old, that England is no longer, even in the most limited degree, what Bernard Blackmantle and Robert Cruikshank have described it as being, and as no doubt it was—for, if they had not been so blinded by rage, the English critics of "Quinze Jours à Londres" and of Prince von Pückler-Muskau's travels would have recognised that the portrait which John Bull painted of himself was infinitely more hideous than anything which his bitterest enemies could have conceived. The real progress made since "The English Spy" was published as a truthful relation of the English manners of the time is apparent on every page of what is really a most entertaining and instructive book. Nothing, perhaps, is more characteristic than the account which the author gives of Eton, which is evidently derived from personal experience. The Hon. Lillyman Lionise spends his evenings (after absence is called) at home, in solitary dissipation over his box of liquors, or in making others uncomfortable by his rudeness and overbearing dictation.

What a contrast to Horatio Heartley!

At the lower end of the room, observe a serene-looking head, displaying all the quiet character of a youthful portrait by the divine Raphael joined to the inspiring sensibility which flashes from the almost breathing countenance and penetrating brilliancy of eye that distinguishes a guide. This is my bosom friend, my more than brother, my mentor and my guide. Horatio is an orphan, the son of a general officer, whose crimson stream of life was dried up by an Eastern sun while he was yet a lisping orphan.

Bernard Blackmantle's portrait of himself as an Etonian is too long to quote, but it is a gem of the purest water. In spite of these "insanities," B. B. was not without talent—witness his tale of the old Portsmouth tars, which has a tender, Lamb-like flavour. One closes "The English Spy," however, with the conviction that the English of those days—and it is not so long a cry, after all, from 1825—must have been a dreadful nuisance to themselves and to most other people who came in contact with them, and we may thank our stars that that old England is dead for ever, together with the art of the Cruikshanks which illustrated it, and that the ideal English gentleman of to-day is something different from the noisy, sentimental blackguard whom less than a century ago John Bull delighted to honour and the Cruikshanks to depict in flaming colour.

THE ARUNDEL CLUB

It is a great pity that the Arundel Club does not manage to publish its interesting set of photogravures at any time other than Christmas, when the general rush of books causes this important annual portfolio to be overlooked. It was only recently that we were able to inspect with any pleasure the fourth year's issue of 1907.

For those who are not members it is as well to explain that the Arundel Club has no connection, except in name, with the now defunct Arundel Society whose excellent chromo lithographs did so much to popularise Italian and Flemish primitive art in England. The Arundel Club was founded in 1904, by Sir Martin Conway, for the reproduction of unpublished pictures in private collections, inaccessible to students or the general public. It is needless to emphasise what a particularly interesting field of research the efforts of the Club should be destined to cover, and as the membership increases the number of reproductions obtainable for one guinea (there are now twenty) will increase in proportion to the financial resources of the Club. The Committee is an unusually strong one, and includes, besides the classic names of Professor Sidney Colvin, Mr. Claude Phillips, and Mr. Lionel Cust, those of Mr. Charles Ricketts, Mr. G. F. Warner, and Sir Walter Armstrong. Learning, taste, and expertise are thus well represented; Mr. Sargent's name strikes the requisite note of modernity; Lord Balcarras represents the late Government; while the presence of Sir Martin Conway would seem to indicate that landscape will not be neglected in a Committee adorned by so distinguished a mountain-climber. The Committee is further to be felicitated on the absence of trustees of our National collections. For some extraordinary reason the present trustees are the last people whom any one in their senses would consult collectively on a subject connected with art or literature. Their functions seem to consist in hampering the work of the under-paid officials and keepers, whom they regard as mere pawns useful for checkmating each other; or beasts of burden convenient for bearing the public odium which attaches to their errors of commission and omission.

The most sensational items of the Arundel Portfolio of 1907 are two early pictures by Velasquez which, though described by Mrs. Jameson, are mentioned in Bereuete's great book as being lost. They were unearthed, however, by Mr. Herbert Cook, that Nimrod of Old Masters who obtained exclusive leave for their reproduction by the Arundel Club. One of them represents the "Immaculate Conception." It may be noted that Velasquez in no way idealises his subject, even when he is handling an entirely spiritual motive, which might have given scope to the imagination. Presumably it satisfied, however, the inquisitorial inspection of his future father-in-law, Pacheco, and there is none of the nauseating sentimentalism characterising Murillo's presentations of the same theme. The Blessed Virgin is a simple little Spanish peasant to whom no intolerable honour has come beyond that of becoming a model in the master's studio at Seville. She appears standing on the traditional moon, which, however, is transparent, not opaque, and beneath her feet is a landscape of a perfect naturalistic kind, into which are adroitly introduced the pious periphrases from the Litany of Loretto—such as the Vas Spirituale in the shape of a little fountain and the Domus Aurea in the form of a debased classical temple; and Mrs. Jameson speaks of other accessories which do not appear in the reproduction. It is very much to be hoped that this astonishing picture, which illustrates the greatness as well as the limitations of Velasquez, may be seen at some forthcoming exhibition of Old Masters; and let us also hope that it does not fall into the maw of Mr. Pierpont Morgan. It might serve for a frontispiece to a disquisition on misunderstandings about the Immaculate Conception. The vast majority of Protestants still believe that the Catholic doctrine of Mary's exemption from sin implies belief in a sort of Incarnation with which they invariably confuse it; but, as so few of them really believe in the Incarnation even, this is not very surprising. To readers of THE ACADEMY we need hardly point out that the Catholic Church does not claim for Mary a miraculous generation, but immunity from the stain of original sin. Oddly enough, it was in England that the Feast was first celebrated in Western Europe, and its introduction was ascribed to St. Anselm. Though long a pious belief in the Greek and Latin Churches, and discussed with some keenness at Trent, it was not promulgated as a dogma until December 8th, 1854—two hundred years after Velasquez—although Paul V. instituted the office in 1615.

The other picture discovered by Mr. Cook is much more commonplace, and represents St. John in Patmos. Here are traces of that affectation which mars all the pietistic art of Spain, but from which Velasquez is nobly free in his superb "Crucifixion" and in the "Immaculate Conception" we have just been discussing. The "St. John" has, however, a very valuable lesson for incompetent young painters who forget that even Mr. Sargent once painted "tight" and learned to finish his pictures long before he employed that wonderful shorthand which is the admiration of connoisseurs and the snare of the student.

To Mr. Herbert Cook himself belongs the exquisite little Portuguese work (No. 19) of the late fifteenth century representing the mystic marriage of St. Catharine. This ought to throw some light on the obscure subject of Portuguese art, of which, beyond its indebtedness to the Flemings, we have no exact knowledge, though the next few years may elucidate how much of it was due to native genius and how much to inspiration imported from outside. It is not unlikely that (like the hybrid Indo-Persian miniatures executed at Delhi in the reign of Akbar) some of the Portuguese pictures are entirely native, though inspired by foreign masters, and that others are by Flemish, Italian, or French craftsmen working under local influences. That a native talent existed somewhere it would be rash to deny; Velasquez, it must be remembered, was of Portuguese origin.

A superb photogravure of Lord Huntingfield's delightful "Van Haecht" (No. 20) is particularly welcome, because the half-tone block in Mr. Weale's recent book is not very satisfactory. This picture records an historical visit paid by the Archduke Albert and the Infanta Isabella to Cornelius van der Geest, whose portrait by Van Dyke is in the National Gallery. It was shown at the Old Master Exhibition of 1907, and again at Bruges later in the year. Apart from the way in which a seventeenth-century interior is treated, it has a documentary interest, owing to the pictures represented on the wall of the merchant's house. There are many well-known masterpieces which can be identified; and one of them is a very famous lost Van Eyck. The delicacy and precision of this picture are marvellously rendered in the photogravure.

We cannot, however, see the use of giving the portrait of Canon Van der Paele (also reproduced in Mr. Weale's book), as the picture is not in a private collection, but at Hampton Court, a resort much too accessible to the public. Moreover, there is considerable doubt concerning its authenticity; many excellent judges think it is only a copy from Van Eyck; the reproduction in Mr. Weale's book suffices. Then we venture to protest against the inclusion of a not very first-rate example of the never very first-rate Bonifazio. Pictures chosen for this unique publication should have either æsthetic significance, historical significance, or antiquarian significance. A painting that does not possess any of these qualities may be an agreeable drawing-room curiosity, but has no place in a serious publication of the kind. Bonifazio was once, like Gaul, divided into three parts, and since his unification hardly requires further apotheosis.

It is, however, impossible that twenty photogravures should satisfy every taste; and a wide catholicity has been wisely exercised. For the unlearned who simply like beautiful pictures nothing could surpass the "Miss Montague" by Gainsborough in the possession of Messrs. Agnew, and for mere painting nothing could equal the Hogarth of Mr. Cartwright. Every one will derive special pleasure from the portraits of the Earl and Countess of Arundel, by Van Somer, most appropriately reproduced in the portfolio. In the background of the Earl's pictures are seen the famous Arundel marbles in a characteristic perspective. Every one should encourage the Arundel Club by becoming a member; and apparently any one can become a member; blackballing is unknown.

THE LIMITS OF VERSE-LENGTH

It is not uninteresting to ask what determines the length of verse-lines. Oliver Wendell Holmes thought it was lung-power—that Spenser must have habitually breathed more slowly than Prior, "Anacreon" more quickly than Homer. His own limit he set at ten syllables; a line of twelve he found too much for one breath, too little for two. But lines of ten syllables usually contain caesural pauses, where it is natural to take breath. Did Pope's lungs permit him to utter only four or five syllables at once? Expert reciters, on the other hand, can easily repeat two or more lines of blank verse on one breath. There may be something in Holmes's idea, but it clearly cannot be taken as a fixed rule; at the most it may suggest a possible reason why too long lines are undesirable.

That the actual limit has to do with form seems certain. For amorphous lines, in a sort of "tumbling verse," can be prolonged indefinitely. A couplet in Zachary Boyd's version of the Bible is said to run somewhat as follows (I quote from memory), and the second line obviously admits of unlimited expansion:

Now was not Pharaoh a very great rascal,
Who would not let the Children of Israel, with their flocks and their herds, their wives and their little ones—[etc. etc., ad lib.—]go into the wilderness to keep the Lord's Paschal!

Such a line manifestly has no limits. Some "lines" of Walt Whitman's, again, extend, or might extend, over a page. Without thought of such extreme cases, it will still be conceded that any rude popular rhyme can be swelled out almost at pleasure. It is the self-conscious artist alone who feels that he has limits.

Our poets themselves, however, are not always consistent. They print as one line what we feel to be two, and less often as two what we feel to be one. Mrs. Browning makes a single line of:

To the belfry, one by one, went the ringers from the sun,
And Poe of:

Once upon a midnight dreary, as I pondered weak and weary.
Scott gives us as four lines:

Come as the winds come, when Forests are rended:
Come as the waves come, when Navies are stranded.

Into how many lines should we divide :

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew, the furrow followed free ?

It may stand as one, as two, or as three. How many are there in this :

Bertram finished the last pages, while along the silence ever
Still in hot and heavy splashes fell the tears on every leaf ?

Rhyme cannot alone decide the matter, as some of the above instances show ; yet, except to bring out the rhyming jingle, there seems no reason why a line-ending should be shown at "ever" and not at "pages."

Rhyme is, of course, a very potent means of indicating the end of a line. But it is also used otherwise, by way of such "internal" echoes as Robert Browning affected when he wrote :

The dull turned bright as I caught your white
On my bosom and still more grotesquely in :

Let the mere star-fish in his vault
Crawl in a wash of weed, indeed,
Rose-jacynth to the finger-tips.

A parodist of his, burlesquing this tendency, perpetrated the line :

I have gained and attained, and remained unstained.

Midway rhymes, at any rate, are constantly employed by our chief poets, with no purpose of line-division, and often with delightful effect, as when Mr. Swinburne writes :

England, queen of the waves, whose green inviolate girdle enrings thee round.

We must, therefore, look elsewhere than to rhyme for what really causes a line to end.

The fact that English poets habitually use comparatively short measures is certainly significant. Counting by beats, which are less accurately termed "stresses" (the metrical beat need not always come on a stressed syllable), we find three, four, and five by far the commonest number. The last is, of course, the number in our ordinary "heroic couplet" and "blank verse." Longfellow's "Evangeline" has six, corresponding in this to ancient "hexameter," the heroic metre of old Greece. Mr. Swinburne has lately accustomed us to lines of seven and eight beats (the latter is exemplified by the line last quoted) ; while Tennyson, in two pieces lately mentioned in these pages, ventured on nine beats. Three metrical experiments, printed here on March 28th,* essayed extension to ten and eleven. It must not be supposed that there is any difficulty in writing much longer lines, so far as grammar and sense are concerned. The question is merely at what stage such lines cease to impress as single entities. Here, for example, is one of those lines doubled in length, by crude enough methods, yet without introducing any grammatical pause :

With an arrowy rush and a thunderous roar from the storm-shattered crest of the eminent mountain around and adown to the slumbering valley the masterful hurricane dreadfully leaps in delirious frenzy of virulent wrath.

That is a "twenty-stress" line, unhelped by internal rhyme or assonance ; but would any one call it a real single line ? Does it not impress simply as a congeries of shorter lines—of five four-stress unrhyming lines, perhaps—which for a freak have been printed as one ? Is there any more real unity in it than in the following, which everyone will say are cases of four lines printed as one ?

Come not back again to labour, come not back again to suffer, where the famine and the fever wear the body, waste the brain ;
Soon my task will be completed, soon your footsteps I shall follow to the islands of the blessed, where we two shall meet again.

The natural limit seems to vary with race and speech-habit. Persian and Arabian poetry, I understand, habitually admit lines much longer than ours. The late Professor York Powell, in a letter, sent half a dozen lines which he said were "like some Arabic gasideh." I quote the first two :

* In No. II. of these, "tremble and shriek" should have been "tremble and shrink," and the next line had a superfluous comma after "destruction." Otherwise the printing was admirably correct.

I stand on the dune with the Old Fort on my left hand bronze-brown, red-fleck'd, like some monster shell of the deep ;
And away to the right, Andreselles, scarlet-roof'd, in a magic violet haze, on the reef at the edge of the steep.

However these lines may impress Oriental scholars, to an English ear they are not verse ; they are an exotic mixture of prose and verse, not without a certain charm, but one wholly strange, foreign, unreal to us. The same writer, by the bye, produced a monosyllabic sonnet, opening thus :

He: Guess Who—Do !
She: Tess ?
He: Bess.
She: You Too !
He: Yes.*

And Herrick wrote one of his "Hesperides" in dissyllabic lines :

Thus I Pass by
And die,
As one Unknown
And gone.

But such eccentricities serve only to show how unnatural to us is either a very short or a very long line.

The real limit, seemingly, is our power of co-ordination. Any line which cannot be comfortably grasped as a whole, either when heard or when presented to the eye, fails to give pleasure, and is shunned by the poet accordingly. It is partly matter of habit and training. Six-beat lines were thought dangerously long less than a century ago ; to Eighteenth Century readers an eight-beat line would have sounded monstrous. What our poets may have yet in store for us cannot be foretold, but it seems unlikely that our present metres can be considerably prolonged without other modification. As it is, most eight-beat lines tend to break into two halves ; with ten or twelve the tendency would be still greater. For this reason, probably, Tennyson selected nine rather than ten for his experiment, and it cannot be said that his lines show no tendency to separate. Those "To Virgil," indeed, are usually printed as containing two unequal portions. Skilful use of rhyme and alliteration may help the reader through a long line, but there is the danger that these may emphasise rather than neutralise division. The practice of poets must decide the issue. Riper students of verse may suggest considerations overlooked by me ; but, in the long run, it is practice alone which at once educates and decides. Solvi ur ambulando. If our poets find that still longer lines will "go," they will write them, and then we may be able to see how and why they "go ;" till then, prediction is probably, as usual, futile.

DIGNITY AND PICTURES

Who has not heard the story of Old Crome's advice to his son about to paint ? "John, my boy, if your subject is only a pigsty, dignify it." No further words are needed to show the Norwich master's opinion on the relative importance of subject and treatment ; but it would be interesting, and, no doubt, instructive, to learn the veteran's views as to the way in which dignity can be imparted to a painting. Happily, perhaps, for themselves, painters have rarely a passion to define in words the qualities which give distinction to a work of art. That is the business of the critic, whose task it is neatly to dissect those qualities and exhibit them separately for the few who care to profit by his labours. It is an ungrateful task, and I do not wonder that many abandon the science for dithyrambic vapourings more popular with the crowd. But analysis has a fascination of its own, and even an unsuccessful experiment is not wholly useless if it stirs others to more fruitful effort.

* "Frederick York Powell." By Oliver Elton (1906). Vol. II., pp. 390, 394.

Without presuming to have obtained any nice qualitative results, after a rough quantitative investigation which must leave many elements undetected, it occurs to me that the characteristic which we call dignity in a painting is chiefly due to two causes—the composition or arrangement of the masses and the surface quality of the paint. The first is a comparatively simple matter, good composition being a geometrical question of balance, of mass against mass, of line against line, of light against shade. But a fine quality of paint is as evasive as a fine quality of silk or velvet. Custom teaches us to distinguish between the good and the inferior, but though we may be in a position to recognise the best workmanship we are not necessarily clear in our minds as to the manner in which this excellence has been brought about.

With pictures the question is further complicated by the existence of two excellences. For there are two sorts of painting, as of soup—thick and thin—and both have merits proper to themselves. There is the fine liquid quality of a Whistler, a Manet, a Vermeer; there is the fine fatty quality of a Rubens, a Monticelli, or a Crome. The second appeals to generous spirits and seems the easier of attainment. The first is won only by the few, with the many it degenerates into a sordid economy, producing results like the bread-and-scrape of the parsimonious school-marm. Perhaps the secret is that beneath the thicker painting it is easier to cover up errors, though wise painters assure us that in either style excellence is the result of sureness and purity. Each touch of paint must come to stay, as the phrase runs; it cannot be corrected or altered without impairing its final virtue. But we are approaching culinary matters, which I hear are beyond the critic's province. We are to judge of results only, and need not bother about the details of its preparation if the flavour of the dish be good. And as the good cook will serve us soup thick or thin of equal excellence, so the chef in pigment should paint with facility in either style.

The question of dignity was raised in my mind by Crome's Old Barns at Messrs. Shepherd's current Exhibition. The question of quality is answered by his Coast Scene, also at 27, King-street. It was rarely that old Crome attempted a sea-piece—only two other marines by him are known—and in Messrs. Shepherd's picture, which some say was inspired by Turner, which to my thinking shows also strongly the influence of Cotman, we have an admirable example of the blended qualities, the thin painting of the water, the creamy texture of the foam. Another example of dignity and quality in paint is the splendid Tivoli of Thomas Barker, of Bath, majestic in its classic composition, appealing in the luscious glow of its noble colour. There is good quality of paint, too, in Constable's finished study in oils for his picture, A Dell in Helmingham Park. But it has not the dignity of the Barker, because the rhythm and balance of the composition is less exquisite. It is not in the same class with the Barker—an undoubted masterpiece—and yet many will pay more attention to the other because it is by Constable, because the picture for which it is a study twenty years ago brought £2,400 at Christie's. For this is our solid, sensible way of looking at pictures in England.

Let me hasten to exonerate Messrs. Shepherd in this particular. No dealers in London pay less respect to persons and more attention to merit wherever found. They have made their exhibitions famous by reason of their patient resuscitation of forgotten merit. Each year they bring to light some British painter whose name has unworthily been forgotten. And while speaking of classical landscapes, I should not forget to mention A Grecian City by Henry Dawson (1811-1878), their latest discovery and rescue. And this year they have disinterred from Ireland a Girl at a Window, by Richard Rothwell (an able contemporary of Lawrence), and a number of well-painted, Ostade-like interiors by one Alfred Provis. They have also found a Portrait of a Boy, by Raeburn, deeply interesting, because of a spirituality rarely attained by the Scottish master. Yet, in my heart, I believe Messrs. Shepherd are prouder of their Provists. You see, everybody knows about Raeburn, but who before ever heard of Alfred Provis?

I have ventured to suggest by a comparison of the Constable with the Barker that composition is an essential element of dignity. I might compare the originals of Whistler's Mother and Carlyle with the vile reproductions in colour now flaunted in the market-place to show how great a dignity is lost with the change of surface. But I would not press the point, knowing that colour is not, in truth, an essential. Obviously there is dignity in black and white, and many happy examples may be found among the designs of Mr. Louis Davis, now on exhibition at Mr. Van Wisselingh's gallery. Having no salons in London where such work can be exhibited, we are apt to be despondent about decorative art, and because we see it not we fear it does not exist. Mr. Davis's beautiful designs for private chapels and noble halls reassure us. The State, it is true, does little or nothing, but the statesmen who adorn our Upper House do much, and it is consoling to think that their private generosity and good taste gives to men of talent those opportunities for distinction which officialdom cannot, or will not, afford.

One last word and I have done, for there is a picture at the Royal Society of British Artists which eloquently illustrates the dignity of paint. Messrs. Shepherd do valiant service for the neglected dead, but there are no rescuers in Bond Street for the neglected living. For years Mr. Fred F. Foottet has used the science of the luminists to portray the poetry of the romanticists, achieving results which no living painter, with the possible exception of M. Le Sidaner, has approached or equalled. Mr. Foottet is in many respects the most personal and original landscape-painter we possess. He has his limitations, but so had Whistler; and, like Whistler, Mr. Foottet knows all about them and how to achieve exquisiteness within their bounds. He has a fondness for virginal schemes of colour and I can think of no painter who has drawn such tender strains from notes of blue and white. He has also a fondness for bridges, and his Richmond: Twilight is really one of a series which deserves a place with the haystacks and Cathedrals of Monet. But alone it is a masterpiece of lyric painting—a lament in colour of that loveliness which is poignant and fleeting, the moving symbol of all earthly joys.

FRANK RUTTER.

"SPITCH-COCKED"

It is strange that this queer term in cookery has never been properly explained from its true source. There is a good account of its use in Palmer's "Folk-Etymology," where it is stated, on the authority of Kettner, "Book of the Table," p. 119, that a spatch-cock fowl is one spread on a skewer after having been split open at the back, just as a broiled eel done on a skewer is called a spitch-cocked eel. Dr. Palmer explains it as a corruption of "spit-stuck," for which form, luckily, there is no authority.

The oldest quotation given in books is from the old play of Northward Hoe (1607), Act I., scene 1: "Will you have some cray-fish and a spitch-cock?" Here spitch-cock is short for "spitch-cocked eel," as will be seen from the etymology. I find the pp. spitch-cocked used in a metaphorical sense (showing that it was already well-known) in a curious passage in T. Cartwright's play The Ordinary (1651), printed in Hazlitt's edition of "Dodsley's Old Plays," Vol. XII., p. 239. The reason why the etymology has not been discovered is because the word is really of High German origin, and probably reached us through Holland. As most of our words in the Elizabethan period that are borrowed from Teutonic are almost invariably from Dutch or Low German sources, it was natural that our etymologists should omit to seek further. It is pretty clear that Dr. Palmer's conjectural "spit-stuck" was made for the purpose of accounting for the sch; and he is quite right as to the first five letters, only the s belongs to the t, and the first syllable is really spits, a form which actually occurs in one of the quotations which he gives, though he gives it under the heading spatch-cock as being the "popular" form. We find, accordingly, the correct form in T. Brown's Works, II., 221. "The first course consisted of a huge platterful of scorpions spits-cocked." This form is perfectly correct, and is explicable as it stands.

For the true prefix is the Middle High German spiz, "a spit," with the z pronounced as ts, as usual. With this prefix was formed the remarkable derivative spiz-brato, which is still in use in German in the form spies braten, meat roasted on the spit. This settles at once both the form and the sense of the former element. And now that we know we have to deal with German, it becomes clear that cock is precisely the German kochen, to cook, and the whole word is solved. It simply means "spit-cooked," or cooked on a spit; whilst it is at the same time obvious that the remarkable form spitch could never have been evolved from any language but High German. Our spelling with -cock is due to the Dutch kokken, to cook. If we look around for corroborative evidence, it is not difficult to find. The term was certainly first applied to the cooking of eels, even as in the piece of advice in the "Ingoldsby Legends," that it is best to have them "spitch-cooked or stewed—they're too oily when fried." Sewel's "English-Dutch Dictionary" (1749) says that a spitch-cock is "een groote aal of paaling," a great eel or a paaling; and he explains the Dutch paaling as a "spitch-cock eel, eel of the biggest and fattest sort." Calisch's modern "Dutch Dictionary" boldly substitutes the Dutch spil for the German spies, and gives us: "Spil-aal, a spitch-eel," thus greatly strengthening the evidence as to the sense of spitch.

Of course popular etymology never guessed the true source of the word. Hence it was at last turned into spatch-cocked—i.e., dispatch-cocked (formerly correctly spelt with di-, not de-); and hence Grose's "Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue" has the entry: "Spatch-cock, abbreviation of a dispatch-cock, an Irish dish upon any sudden occasion." The latter element remained unchanged, and, no doubt, many thought that the reference was to an actual cock or fowl, which is, indeed, much more convenient than an eel for use "upon any sudden occasion."

Step by step, says George Herbert, the ladder is ascended. One by one words are at last explained. Fortunately, a true etymology will last for ever.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Portugal. By H. MORSE STEPHENS. With Five New Portraits, and an Additional Chapter by MARTIN HUME. (Fisher Unwin, 5s.)

SOME years ago Mr. Morse Stephens compiled a history of Portugal which appeared in the "Story of the Nations" series, and this has now been reissued in a red cover in place of the original green, with an additional chapter on the reign of King Carlos by Major Hume. When he lived among us, Mr. Stephens had the reputation of knowing a good deal about the period of the French Revolution, and Major Hume, by numerous works, has established his position as an authority on Spain, but, judging by the book before us, neither the one nor the other has gone very deeply into the affairs of Portugal, and a good history of that country has still to be written. It is not usual to criticise a reprint, but of the additional chapter we must observe that its tone and phrasing smack too much of a controversial pamphlet, and the style is sometimes distinctly "journallese." The author does not seem to have set himself to study the events of the years 1891 to 1908 with sufficient care and detail, or to have penetrated the causes of that "corruption" of which he talks so much. It is generally recognised that "the future of Portugal lies in Africa," yet he tells us hardly anything of the great work done during the last reign in Angola and Mozambique, by which Portuguese dominion over those large and rich territories has been rendered effective; and he omits altogether the victorious campaign against the Vatuas and Mousinho's daring exploit, the capture of Gungunhama, which amazed foreign military critics who, remembering our Zulu War, never imagined that the Portuguese, with a much smaller force, could achieve such successes. Moreover, he falls into some very avoidable blunders, as, for instance, when he remarks that monasticism is forbidden in Portugal, and, again, when he says that Senhor Franco belonged to the Progressistas, whereas the very name of the Dictator's party should have proved that he was a Regenerator. But the chief fault we have to find with the chapter is its lack of important facts, except such as relate to party politics, and the rather superficial criticism with which these are too often appreciated. We gladly admit, however, that Major Hume gives a fair account of the strife of parties, their struggle with both King and Dictator, and the origins of the tragedy of February 1st, which came as a shock to Europe, though some of us who were in Lisbon at the time feared a catastrophe. The late reign witnessed a series of measures designed to increase the Royal power, their authors being the Monarch and some of his advisers, who had learnt, as they thought, from the historian Oliveira Martins that the King alone could save the nation, and they justified their creed by pointing to the maladministration of the "rotativist" parties, but how far patriotic, how far merely selfish motives inspired them it is difficult to determine. There can be no doubt, however, that Senhor Franco, who largely acted on their views, received very general support in his early days, and if he had shown patience and tact it seems quite likely that, with Dom Carlos at his back, he might have succeeded in the task he set himself of regenerating the country. Unfortunately, he entirely lacked those qualities; and while he weakened the position of the two historic parties, his actions so irritated public opinion against the King, who assumed responsibility for them, that he seriously compromised the safety of the monarchy. Major Hume is right in holding that the question of finance has been the origin of most of the troubles in Portugal, and though the country grows richer year by year, and is economically sound, the deficit on the budget continues; but he errs in ascribing this to corruption and jobbery, for it is mainly due to the heavy charges which have been incurred for colonial development and wars, the building of railways at home, and other necessary outlays. He might have gone on to say that one of the causes of the conspiracy which led to the King's death was a money question, for the dictatorial decree adding to the Civil List still further increased hostility to Dom Carlos and his Minister, and, when followed by exiles and imprisonments, so distorted the moral vision of the populace that they were able to view the crime with indifference. We regret that Major Hume should have given support to the notion that Portugal has "an utterly corrupt officialism dominating every branch of the public service." Our acquaintance with Portuguese officials of all classes convinces us that so sweeping a charge is baseless and cruel, and only calculated to do ill offices to England in Portugal.

Knaves or Fools? By C. E. WHEELER, M.D. (John Hogg, 2s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a neat, unpretentious little book, which merits careful attention. The case is stated of a number of men who are working quite without recognition—who are, indeed, placed in the dilemma suggested by the title. All names which minorities carry are apt to have a curious savour of odium about them, or a savour of sanctity, both of which are obscuring to the intelligence. The case which Dr. Wheeler states is that of Homœopathy. It is made strong by the absence of partisanship and the moderation with which he writes. He is an homœopath, but he has no sentimental attachment to homœopathy. His position is clear and sound. He says:—Here is a treatment of disease by drugs which is reasoned and has an infinite scope for development. Why is this treatment ignored, as though it were the foolish propaganda of faddists? He writes not in the interests of homœopathy primarily, but in the interests of science and of mankind, and so he lifts the book above the troubled region of the personal. It is a book which should be answered officially in the same spirit as that in which it is written. Officially—the word requires some explanation. It would seem incredible that the medical profession should be in the position which is apt to characterise the sects of a religion: that a part of the medical profession should be, as it were, established—that is to say, recognised by the State—and that a part should be looked upon as dissenters. That such sentiment should be allowed to creep into scientific matters is deplorable, and that it has crept into the medical profession is a melancholy fact.

Dr. Wheeler shows with admirable restraint and keen insight into human nature how this position arose and has developed since Samuel Hahnemann first enunciated the new truth—Similia similibus curentur:

From the beginning it must be recognised that the man who propounds a new idea which, if adopted, will revolutionise the practise of any art, will never obtain justice with the present organisation of society. Friends too enthusiastic and enemies too prejudiced will together combine to destroy any chance of dispassionate investigation, and both sides will go into the fight waving banners on which will be inscribed their devotion to truth, their passion for humanity, and their freedom from self-interest.

Now that more than a hundred years have elapsed since Hahnemann's discovery, it is time, Dr. Wheeler suggests, that the truth he enunciated should be investigated, and his book serves to indicate what lines this investigation should take. In the first chapter he discusses the present situation, how though the law of Britain recognises homœopaths as the full equals of the compact majority, yet all the weight of authority is against them; records of cases cured by homœopathy are not received by the professional journals; for years "The Medical Directory" refused to print any record of hospital appointments or contributions to medical literature that bore the impress of Homœopathy, and when homœopaths were thus forced to start their own institutions they were forced to bear the stigma of creating a division in the medical profession. In the second chapter he deals with Hahnemann and his times, and shows that Hahnemann cannot justly be considered the dreamer or quack he is lightly supposed to be, but rather that he was a great man who worked laboriously, and whose work has been of the utmost value to science. In the third chapter, which to the lay mind is of exceptional interest, he shows the trend of modern medicine, pointing out the growth of surgical treatment and the cloud of obscurity that hangs still over drug treatment and the action of drugs; he shows that in many cases the "profession" make use of homœopathic treatment without any recognition of the axiom Similia similibus curentur, which is the only idea that has ever been evolved to systematise the use of drugs. Then in the fourth chapter he inquires more closely into the predicament imposed upon homœopaths that they are either knaves or fools. He draws attention to the results which have been obtained and to the ever-increasing number of followers who give up all prospect of official advantage and of the numerous posts which become closed to them, because they feel that they are better equipped to fight disease by homœopathic methods than by the established means. And in the last chapter, which is finely written, Dr. Wheeler discusses the future and its possibilities. He desires no "reconciliation" or sentimental reunion. He desires that this dictum Similia similibus curentur should be openly investigated, and that there should be one great army to oppose the spread of disease. In a matter so important as the health of the nation little rivalries should not be allowed to exist.

Dr. Wheeler makes his case good. We have rarely seen the case of a minority argued so sanely and so well. We recommend the book to all who are interested not only in the health of their bodies (what intelligent man is not?), but in the cause of justice.

Harvard Studies in Classical Philology. Vol. XVIII., 1907. (Harvard University Press and Longmans, Green, and Co., 6s.)

AMERICAN scholarship and Harvard scholarship are two different things. For the foundation that owes its existence to Harvard of Emmanuel has always retained something of the spirit of exactitude which belongs to the mother University, and is not marked by the loose sentimentalism which is so painfully characteristic of much of the literary output of other American centres of learning. The Harvard Studies have earned a well-deserved place among the valuable contributions to classical learning which come from the world's Universities. And the present volume does not fail to maintain the standard that we have learned to expect. Thus we may respect, even while we dissent from, the conclusions of Mr. J. W. White concerning logæedic metre in Greek comedy. The opinions of Hephaestion are certainly deserving of more consideration than they have received at the hands of modern German metrists; and Mr. White's basis of argument practically amounts to a statement of the credibility of the ancient writers upon metre. This we should be the last to deny; and we should be the first to rejoice at the sweeping away of the vast number of modern distinctions without differences into which the cola of an Aristophanic chorus have been torn. But we are not so sure as Mr. White appears to be that the antispast is unassailable. To be sure the Phalæcian has good enough authority; but it is not essential to regard it as antispastic in base. As a matter of fact the logæedic metre as a whole is a thing of mystery, and one has only to compare the various scansion and theories of scansion applied to Pindar, for example, to realise that, while Mr. White does undoubtedly service to scholarship by this careful paper, he cannot claim finality for his conclusions. When he proceeds to apply a system of temporal notation to his choruses, we leave him to his task with all sympathy and good wishes for a happy issue out of all his afflictions.

Frankly, we do not like Mr. Bryant's paper on "Boyhood in Athens." It is careful and full to a degree, but is marred by a too close consideration of the darkest blot on Hellenic civilisation. And, moreover, there is a great deal of padding—quite unconsciously introduced, no doubt, for the writer has certainly intended to keep close to his subject. But in a collection of papers of this kind, that which one seeks is rather the new than the old newly phrased; and we have no use under such circumstances for imaginary word-pictures, however charming in themselves, of the Athenian boy drinking in tales of far countries from that Phœnician sailor-man of whom we have grown so heartily tired, knowing him to be no more than a stock lay figure borrowed from the Odyssey and made to do duty long after his time.

The paper by Mr. Ernest Cary on the MS. Tradition of the Acharnenses is a valuable piece of work, very thoroughly carried out. A well-planned stemma gives the results of Mr. Cary's consideration of the relation between the MSS., all of which he has collated from photographic facsimiles. R., of course, stands by itself. But the author places Suidas one step nearer the archetype, and we are not surprised to find that he has some difficulty in placing Γ in very clearly recognisable relationship to the remaining MSS. He appears to consider it a slightly later "cousin" of A, five places removed from the archetype, and closely connected with B in its second and third hands. And he adheres, though with a purely negative assent, to Zacher's dating of the archetype.

Even if we do not agree wholly with his conclusions, his collection of data will be of the utmost value to students both of Aristophanic MS. tradition and of the text itself, who have not the opportunity of collating the MSS. for themselves—and these, it is certain, are in a vast majority.

The remaining papers are not out of place in such good company, and we regard this volume of the Studies as of equal value with its predecessors, and an earnest of good work to come in the future.

Familiar Faces. By HARRY GRAHAM. (Edward Arnold, 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. HARRY GRAHAM's latest volume is a disappointment. Hitherto he has contrived to wear the motley with a certain distinction, but for once the jingling of the jester's bells sounds a little harsh and out of tune. For one thing, the pun is so archaic a form of wit, and one, moreover, that has been so wantonly abused, that it has been relegated by all discriminating humorists to the limbo of complete forgetfulness. Mr. Graham puns impenitently, recklessly. He discloses himself in this book as a specialist in the obvious. He does not even mind appropriating the least successful puns of other people :

If you only will astound the world or shock it,
If you'll stir or even interest the town,
Soaring rapturously skyward like a (C)rocket,
Never mind if like a Stick(it) you come down—is not a very happy variant on a not very happy fancy of Mr. Zangwill's. And, though Mr. Graham must be credited, now as always, with an amazing facility in the manipulation of difficult verse-forms, the persistence of the broken rhyme in these verses is apt to become more than a little tiring.

There is an iconoclastic note in some of Mr. Graham's poems, for which readers of "Verse and Worse" and "Misrepresentative Men" will be prepared. For the most part, however, our knight-errant appears to be engaged in the superfluous task of tilting at windmills. Vegetarians, music-hall comedians, and retired Army officers are such small game that they are hardly worth the hunting, and the barbs of Mr. Graham's satire are rendered pointless by the crude absurdity of Mr. George Morrow's illustrations. The author, by the way, credits Mr. Morrow with a parting word of disinterested advice :

(N.B.—This book, says Mr. Morrow, Is one to buy and NOT to borrow !)

This book of verse, we say instead, is one that may be left unread.

James Francis Edward, the Old Chevalier. By MARTIN HAILE. (London : Dent and Co., 16s. net.)

THE book on James III. by Mr. Andrew Lang and Miss Shield was reviewed so recently in these columns that we can hardly afford the space to go over the subject again. It is unfortunate for both books that they should clash, and we can but say that their respective authors must be content to divide the prize. The earlier book is found, on the whole, the more vivid and attractive reading ; but Mr. Haile's is a piece of very thorough-going and conscientious work, perhaps fuller in detail than the other. His judgments are substantially the same ; in fact, there is hardly room, given knowledge and a fair wind, for differences. The hopefulness of the cause at the beginning, and its patriotic mismanagement to the end, must be common ground. So must be the treachery of some, and the folly of some, the devotion of many, of James's adherents. And so must be the character of James himself, so cruelly libelled in "Esmond," his dutifulness, his patience, his uprightness. The story has waited so long for its proper telling that it is less surprising than unlucky that it should be told in duplicate at the same moment.

A Book of Birds. By W. P. PYCRAFT. (S. Appleton, 6s.)

THE birdnesting urchin of the last generation, if he wanted a manual, was usually given Professor Thomas Rymer Jones's "Natural History," Bewick being kept for his grandmama. The boy of the present day can find fuller information imparted less severely and in a more handy form : but it is easy to exaggerate the triumphs of Mr. Pycraft. With all the glories of colour to help him, he is not so far ahead as some would have us believe. He depicts five humming-birds, for instance, with pen and portrait, against his predecessor's four by illustration and five by letterpress. He says nothing about the nests, which Professor Jones describes and illustrates, but he is more exact in the matter of distribution, which his rival limits by Bolivia and South Mexico. To come nearer home, Mr. Pycraft tells us interesting things about the cuckoo—how the cock submits to be mobbed while the hen puts the egg in the nest with her claws. He does not describe, as the earlier writer does most graphically, the ejection process served upon the infant robins. Neither of the writers touch the colour question, although Mr. Pycraft knows that the speckles of the cuckoo are deliberately intended to suggest to the victims that he is a hawk. Neither author tells us why the ouzel cock has a tawny yellow bill, nor why rooks should be black and starlings glossy. The introduction of Mr. Pycraft is his real glory. He lays the foundation of a solid ornithological study to the boy who will really master that introduction ; but even those who will no, the majority can learn much about the birds whom they will harry in the Easter holidays. At the reconstructed Archæopteryx most scientific persons will hurl what Lowell calls "the contumelious stone."

FICTION

While Rose of Weary Leaf. By VIOLET HUNT. (Heinemann, 6s.)

MISS VIOLET HUNT has written an exceedingly clever novel which is sure to attract a large measure of the reading public's attention. Also one may reasonably expect that the story will excite comment and provoke discussion. The cleverness of the book is, indeed, so manifest that it may inspire a regret in the minds of some readers that Miss Hunt had not informed her subject with a finer or sterner quality. There is a marked energy shown in the writing, considerable ingenuity, and in places almost subtlety, in the characterisation ; but somehow the author fails to quicken our sympathies or to stir our emotions. Amy Steevens, the heroine of the story, illustrates this deficiency in the author's powers more than all the other characters put together. Amy is Miss Hunt's masterpiece. In many details she is sketched with a quite brilliant fidelity to nature. She is a volatile character, as quick-witted as a cockney street-urchin, courageous in her many struggles with life, shrewd, peculiarly adroit in her management of persons whose intelligence have not been stung out of lethargy by poverty and want, ready in speech and action, and generally filled with the commonest common sense—before she fell in love with Mr. Dand. Nevertheless, with all her many attributes of individuality and fascination, Amy remains even to the last chapter nothing more than a splendidly interesting companion. We are always interested in her, but we never feel for her. She amuses us with her stratagems, fascinates us with her adventures, and, finally, draws from us a tacit acknowledgment that she has been a very unhappy creature, whose circumstances in life have been ordered by the spirit of tragedy. This ultimate admission is forced from the reader by the bare recital of her story ; but it is impossible to shed tears over Amy or to feel the tragedy that we know exists.

As with Amy so with every other character in this remarkable book. They all interest us by their sayings and doings, amuse and tantalise us, but fail to touch the pulses of emotion. They are a barbarous set of people, even to Mr. Dand, the middle-aged country gentleman, and peculiarly vulgar in their habits of thought. Dand, in this latter respect, is the greatest offender of all. This person marries twice, and to both wives, Amy Steevens, at different periods in her career, acts as a paid companion. The girl ends by becoming Dand's mistress and dies in giving birth to his child. Dand commits suicide, as, in some early chapter, does a certain Sir Mervyn Dymond, who is, perhaps, the only unconvincing character in the novel. As will be seen, the book has more than its share of violent climaxes, but the entire scheme of the story is unfolded with so plausible an appearance of truth, sustained everywhere by the force and freshness of the writing, that the reader does not pause to doubt or even question anything. We accept Amy Steevens as a person who lived and died, even though Miss Hunt has not allowed us to mourn for her.

The Fly on the Wheel. By KATHERINE CECIL THURSTON. (William Blackwood and Sons, 6s.)

THE extraordinary success of Mrs. Thurston as a novelist presents one of the strangest of problems to the student of contemporary fiction. Her style is undistinguished, save for an occasional opulence of epithet which suggests Miss Marie Corelli at her worst, and her matter is unimportant. Her frequent lapses into the cheapest form of pseudo-philosophy bore and irritate the reader. She will tell you that life is full of strange surprises or that sorrow is hard to bear with the air of one communicating some wholly new and original discovery. Deliberately discarding the methods of the romanticists, she professes to give you pictures of contemporary life and manners which are conspicuous for their grotesqueness and patent absurdity. Yet her books sell by the thousand, and "The Fly on the Wheel" has already become a popular success.

"The Fly on the Wheel" is another of Mrs. Thurston's Irish stories, the scene being laid in Waterford. The meaning of the title may be explained in a sentence—the wheel is society, and the fly Isabel Costello. Isabel is of foreign extraction, and, in consequence, of a very fiery nature. In Waterford she meets Stephen Carey, who, being a "strong" man, and very much of a brute into the bargain, carries her heart by storm from the first moment. Carey's heart, too, is touched, or, rather, as he is candidly reminded, his animal passions are aroused, and the end of a somewhat tedious flirtation is that the two lovers go off on a midnight escapade in a motor-car. Carey, being a married man with a family, is severely admonished the following morning by the parish priest, who has received tidings of the adventure. Convinced of the impropriety of his behaviour, Carey determines to relinquish Isabel, with the result that that intractable young female pays a sudden visit to his house and poisons herself. She had determined to do the unconventional thing, and she did it. The end is neither convincing nor artistically necessary, though we fully realise the difficulties that beset the author with regard to the disposal of her troublesome heroine. But to close a book which assumes to be a study of middle-class life in an Irish town with a scene which reeks of the stalest melodrama is an unworthy artifice. Only once, indeed, throughout the narrative does Mrs. Thurston rise superior to her style or her subject. The interview between Carey and Father James comes within measurable distance of great drama. The remainder of the book is too palpably absurd to call for serious criticism.

Dan Riach, Socialist. By the Author of "Miss Molly." (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

To read this story is rather like being carried, in a slow vehicle, through country, conscientiously cultivated indeed, but presenting little of special interest, and all the more disappointing, perhaps, in that it occasionally affords, at turns in the road, glimpses of a more promising landscape which we are not allowed to traverse. We start, to retain the metaphor a moment longer, at the summit of a long hill, and the retrospect is by no means void of attraction. Sir Austin Wyatt, a baronet of five-and-thirty, and the owner of some glassworks in the Midlands, has just had his eyes opened after years of hard work to the meaning and possibilities of love, but at the same time he finds himself face to face with a formidable strike which is more than likely to ruin him, and is doubly dangerous in view of a certain phase in his development. Brought up by his grandfather, a hard, cynical, money-worshipping old man who had wrung a fortune from the works, he had early grown to detest his treatment of his men, and, coming while at Oxford under the influence of Dan Riach, a hard-hitting Socialist with something leonine about him, had eventually thrown in his lot with him, united himself—uncanonically, but with Dan's entire approval—to his niece Isabel, a pretty, colourless girl, and had become his staunchest disciple upon socialistic platforms. Two years of the association, however, had sufficed to convince him not only that Isabel and he had nothing in common, but also that Dan's views were as false as those of his grandfather. He had parted (on her own initiative) with Isabel, renounced his discipleship, and settled down upon his grandfather's death to an enlightened, and for a time entirely successful, rule over his little kingdom. But now twelve years have passed, a labour crisis is imminent, and he finds himself ranged against a formidable and unscrupulous combination headed by his old teacher who has nursed a bitter resentment against him, and is athirst to ruin him "in the interests of the community." The fight which follows has at least the merit of being intricate and many-sided, complicated as it is by Wyatt's conception of his duty towards Isabel, whose story his opponents are determined to noise abroad, and to whom he renews an offer of marriage made years before in a letter returned to him unopened. But unfortunately the spectators' interest is allowed to fall away from one after another of the combatants. First from Riach, who refuses proof positive of his enemy's chivalry, and scarcely convinces us of his own common honesty. And secondly, from Sir Austin himself, in view of his really insatiable stupidity. The author labours with almost painful conscientiousness, in face of an undistinguished style and terribly heavy dialogue, to present him as "owning religion in her rags as well as in her silver slippers," but after all, we fear that the comment of his sincere friend and well-wisher, Lady Henry Ferard—"Oh, isn't Austin a fool? and worse, an unamusing one?"—has more than a modicum of truth in it. Surely no ordinary intelligence could well have failed to glimpse peace of mind with honour to boot in Isabel's obvious inclination towards the truculent foreman. We dislike this playing at blind man's buff with the characters. But Lady Henry at least peeps shrewdly beneath her handkerchief; there is a nice placid duke, and an amusing duchess; while as for Theresa, who, with her "White Garden," stands for youth and love and purity—well, we are delighted to "take her as meant."

Morag the Seal. By J. W. BRODIE INNES. (Rebman, 6s.)

A GREAT many would-be readers of this book will be discouraged by the very conventional opening. The barrister-detective who is always engaged in catching trains to solve mysteries is a very old acquaintance, and Mr. Brodie Innes treats us to all the usual incidents that accompany the amateur sleuth-hound on his travels. By degrees, however, the story improves, and half-way through the book the reader's attention is held by the easy flow of language and the exciting narrative. "Morag the Seal" is the story of a struggle to keep a Scottish estate, the villain being Sir John Bradley, and the heroine Morag, called the Seal, the rightful owner of the property. Considerable mystery is introduced by the author, and the dream-vagaries of his principal character add somewhat unnecessarily, it should be said, to the story. All comes right in the end, and Morag obtains possession of the estates, marries the barrister-detective, and, presumably, lives happy ever after.

A Prophet's Reward. By E. H. STRAIN. (Blackwood, 6s.)

MR. STRAIN's book opens with a curious little apologue consisting of a dialogue between the wizard Michael Scott and Satan, in which the Arch-Enemy complains that "thae discoveries—thae charities and inventions," and all the plans and projects for the good of humanity, have rendered the world no place for a self-respecting Devil. He demands that, if mankind is to reap the benefit of all these schemes, at least the originators shall be handed over to him. The wizard points out that Satan can have no hold over men who "eschew personal profit and work purely for the general good," a fact which the Fiend does not deny, though his knowledge of human nature tells him that the number of those who escape his toils will be small. Though the Devil does not appear again in the story, we find him busily at work in the persons of various administrators of the law in Scotland, and it is with real satisfaction that we see him cheated of at least one victim. The tale is put into the mouth of an elderly Scotch Colonel, who, after a compulsory sojourn of thirty-two years in France, owing to his Jacobite tendencies, returns to his native land, only to be drawn back into political controversy. The Colonel is one of the finest characters in a very good book. Not only is Mr. Strain's power of characterisation unusual, but he has the art of making whatever he writes about interesting, and we were genuinely sorry to find ourselves at the last chapter.

The Romance of a Queen. By WEATHERBY CHESNEY. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)

It is difficult to separate fact from fiction in "The Romance of a Queen." A great deal is no doubt due to the author's imagination, though the story of the massacre of the Royal couple and the description of the main incidents in Queen Draga's career are historically correct. The author's sympathy evidently lies with the unfortunate Queen, who, in his hands, becomes a noble and much maligned character, whose only fault was ambition, and who sacrificed her reputation and eventually her life for the sake of the young King and his mother. In any case, the facts are dramatic enough to form excellent material for a novel. The petty intrigues of the Servian Court, the life of the picturesque and lawless population of Belgrade, and the romantic and adventurous career of the Queen herself, cannot fail to make a readable and eventful story.

The Weaning. By JAMES BLYTH. (Werner Laurie, 6s.)

To those who like a pleasant, well-written tale, told with a certain shrewdness and quiet humour, we strongly recommend "The Weaning." The story is that of a sentimental episode between a very callow youth and a somewhat abandoned little flirt. The youth is jilted, ruthlessly, to find, after a short period of very violent despair, that not only is his heart still intact, but that his fickle affections are already inclining in another direction. This time the lady is worthy of his affection, which develops into real love, and the "weaning" is complete. The characters, who are every-day people leading ordinary, uneventful lives, are described with a sympathy and kindness which show not a little insight into human nature. The chapter in which two merry old gentlemen chuckle together over the love-sick poetical effusions of their respective children is as delightful as the poems are themselves. For the mad motorist Mr. Blyth has no pity. His treatment of the "road-hog" as he calls him, is drastic in the extreme, though it would be difficult to deny that the most unpleasant picture he gives us is in any way exaggerated. Very disarming also is his frank admission that "from the seat of a fast car nothing is more delightful than the pastime," and he gives us a description of a motor run which speaks for itself.

The Burning Cresset. By HOWARD PEASE. (Constable, 6s.)

THE last book of Mr. Pease's historical trilogy suffers from the fact that the reader knows what end is inevitable, for the author takes no liberties with history. "The Burning Cresset" is a story of "the last rising of the North" in 1715, ending with the execution of the Earl of Derwentwater, to whose memory the book is dedicated. Mr. Pease is evidently of the Sir Walter Scott school of historical romancers, but, in fairness to him, it must be admitted that he displays considerable originality, although his indebtedness to "the Wizard of the North" is obvious. The sketches of the more ordinary folk of the period are convincing, and he has endowed his characters with more life than is usually bestowed upon their creations by the modern novelist. Lord Derwentwater's adventures in search of a throne for the Stuarts are excitingly told, and the many escapades of the ill-fated nobleman and his family are recounted with a skill that are quite above the average. This is all that can be said for the book. Mr. Pease writes of history with too much facility, and he can scarcely hope to give us a successful historical story at his present rate of production.

Prose Idyls of the West Riding. By LADY CATHERINE GASKELL. (Smith Elder, 6s.)

THIS book has disappointed us. It is evident that Lady Catherine Gaskell knows more than a little of Yorkshire characters and ways, and has, moreover, a proper sense of the value of a story; but beyond this we find ourselves unable to say much in praise of the present volume. "Prose Idyls" is, we suppose, a sufficiently vague title, but the book might more fitly be called "Novelettes of the West Riding." Pure, irresponsible sentiment is dominant in almost every one. Now a purely sentimental novel may be all very well, but when there are thirteen short stories, all written from a merely sentimental point of view, it is probable that the reader will get very tired. The worst of the sentimental writer is that he gives you the sentiment without the impulse, the tears without the sorrow. There are tears in "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," but there is a world of mute sorrow revealed and hinted, of which the obvious sadness of the book is the merest shadow. The wise writer will restrain as far as possible the obviousness of the sentiments of love and grief, and seek to express them obliquely, or, better, will let the reader discover for himself, in the mere circumstances and atmosphere of the story, the impulsive emotion. We are sorry Lady Catherine Gaskell has not considered this, for, with her knowledge of the West Riding, her ability to write simply and clearly, and her apparent sense of the secret activities of life, love, sorrow, she might have made a book really worthy of the attractive title of this one.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE NATIONAL LIBERAL CLUB

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your issue of last week I find under the above heading a letter containing delicate references to certain statements which have appeared in a book of mine. I am not concerned to defend those statements against the onslaught of a National Liberal who is modest enough to hide his identity behind a single initial. But in the interests of reason it may be as well for me to point out that Mr. Blackie's assertion to the effect that less alcoholic drink is consumed per head per member in the National Liberal Club than in any similar club may very well be correct. It is common knowledge that Nonconformity, teetotalism, and Liberalism walk hand-in-hand. Consequently, it seems probable that the membership of the National Liberal Club will include a more than average percentage of teetotalers. Assuming this much, the consumption of alcoholic drink per head per member may work out rather prettily. The challenge to Mr. Blackie to repeat his statement in face of the figures quoted in my book, however, is not my challenge any more than the figures are mine or the immediate conclusions drawn from those figures are mine. But just as I can see reason in Mr. Blackie's statement so do I see reason in the conclusions of the member of Parliament whose figures and conclusions are in question. If "M." is quite sure that the bulk of the income of the National Liberal Club is not derived from profit on the sale of alcoholic beverages, why does he not say so flatly and categorically and have done with it? Can "M." make it plain to us that if the club were to refrain from participation in the liquor-traffic it could keep open its doors for a single year without increasing the terms of subscription or the prices of the "bread, meat, and cayenne pepper" devoured by its members? If "M." can clear up this issue we shall all be highly pleased.

Now let us look for a moment at the wicked figures. At the end of a certain year the club's stock of wines, spirits, beers, and mineral waters was valued at £9,701. In order to accommodate "M." we will suppose that the National Liberal teetotalers are of such a thirsty disposition that it is necessary to keep £700 worth of mineral waters for their delectation. This generous allowance for twopenny bottles of soda-water leaves us face to face with £9,000 worth of wines, spirits, and beers. Clearly, therefore, we may be sure of one of two things—that is to say, either the National Liberal Club keeps £9,000 worth of alcoholic liquors in its cellars for the mere pleasure of possessing them, or the National Liberal Club is in effect a wine, spirit, and beer merchant in a large way of business. Of course, it may be possible that the Club derives its income from the sale of violets, collar-studs, bread and meat, milk, cayenne pepper, and kindred commodities. "M." knows more about it than we do. But in the absence of figures to the contrary we shall go on believing that a concern which finds it necessary to maintain such vast reserves of sack is much more interested in the sack business than in the sale of bread and meat. The fact that a publican's customers lunch in his saloon-bar does not make the publican any less a publican. And any good restaurateur will tell you that it is on wines and spirits, and not on food, that he makes the bulk of his profit. Finally, I should like to mention that I have more than once described the National Liberal Club as a pot-house. Its character has not changed since the introduction of Mr. Asquith's beautiful Bill.

THE GENIUS OF DICKENS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It was with a thrill of satisfaction one read Mr. Machen's estimate, or appreciation, of Dickens in the present issue. Vindication is not the word, and is as little applicable to Dickens as to Shakespeare. Dickens needs no vindication, and is already emerging from the false estimate which obtained during the latter years of the nineteenth century and the early years of this. It became a fashion to condemn the melodramatic Dickens of "Little Nell" on the one hand, and the caricaturist on the other, till one grew sick of the parrot cry. I remember a controversy about him in the smoking-room of a seaside hotel, when a man of some note in literature, who was sound in every other article of literary faith, maintained with the rest of the parrots that Dickens always exaggerated. Naturally I resented a finicking following of mere fashion in such a man, and said in my haste that he never exaggerated. It is true that many of his characters are queer fellows, but then, I said, we are all queer fellows to everybody but ourselves, and Dickens only painted human nature with Hogarthian realism. We do not realise as fads the habits which are normal to ourselves, but which are peculiar and even laughable to others who have worse fads of their own. I had sometimes wondered if the habitual persistence in those peculiarities which distinguish Sam Weller, Sairey Gamp, Mr. Pumblechook, Dick Swiveller, Richard Carstone, Mr. Turveydrop, and the others was not a little exaggerated, until I discovered their exact duplicates in real life. Those others whom I have not yet duplicated Mr. Machen accounts for in the petite bourgeoisie of eighty years ago that Dickens knew. That Dickens was a symbolist, "who caught a glimpse of the enchanted land" with Rabelais and Cervantes, I can readily assent to, and I have always asserted that the nearest man to Shakespeare since Shakespeare, as a creator of living men and women, was Dickens. Possibly, coming centuries will rank him as the prose Shakespeare of the nineteenth.

THE CHELSEA PAGEANT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Those who saw in last year's pageants the martyrdom of St. Edmund and the royal pilgrims re-visiting his shrine, the ghosts of Verulamium haunting its scanty ruins, the charge of mailed cavaliers over the meadows of St. Albans, and the tottering sovereignty of Charles I. after his arrival with minstrels in his State barge at the Christ Church fields, may wonder what Chelsea can offer to compare with these effects. For at Oxford, St. Albans, and Bury St. Edmunds alike there were broad landscapes over which Kings and Queens, knights and ladies could be seen approaching from the distance, masses of far-away foliage wherein banners and armour could shimmer and disappear in some arena's time-worn, historic stones, and at Oxford a pretty stream. So also there was at Romsey, which one ought not to forget, for its Pageant was charmingly designed, though spoilt by rain. But Chelsea has none of these advantages. The impossibility of obtaining an extensive and romantic amphitheatre is, in fact, one of the greatest of the difficulties that beset the promoters of spectacular folk-plays in the capital. The committee of the London Pageant hopes to solve the problem next year through an Act of Parliament permitting the use of one of the parks; but, short of this, it is not easy to see where space is to be found for the 20,000 performers. Chelsea is not so ambitious, but, having decided on a Pageant, is determined to make it a brilliant success, even though the grounds of the Royal Hospital—the most favourable site available—are limited in area, and are entirely enclosed by trees and shrubberies, which, happily, screen the surrounding buildings. After all, art thrives on its limitations, and by skilfully adapting the means to the end Chelsea will be able to hold a celebration that promises to be no less fascinating and adequate than the others, though different in character. Of course there cannot be so many performers—some 1,200 or 1,300 will probably be near the limit—but Mr. H. J. Irvine, who has undertaken the production, intends to make up for the magnificence of display which is unattainable by an intimate charm of presentation peculiarly favoured by the conditions. The folk-play will be more emphasised than in the larger amphitheatres, where variations of voice are lost, and simple declamation has to be relied on. Near the centre of the lawn is a group of trees which will force the speakers to the front, so that they will easily be heard throughout the stand. Hence a new possibility is opened up, and Mr. Irvine avails himself of it by introducing delicate touches of character-drawing and sympathetic incidents that hitherto have been outside the scope of pageantry. The new experiment is justified, even rendered imperatively necessary, by the circumstances, and fortunately there is appropriate material for comedy and pathos ready to hand in the history of Sir Thomas More, the most impressive and memorable of Chelsea's historical figures. The character of More is one that might well stir the ambition of the best of our actors, for it combined qualities that in their full manifestation are rarely found together. Wit, gaiety, and piety may occasionally be combined, but when we join them with the wisdom and scholarship, the courage and statesmanship of More, and further add the imagination that created his "Utopia," and the kindliness of his domestic life, the resulting individuality becomes altogether exceptional. The greatness and downfall of More, his familiar intercourse with Henry VIII., whose friendship he did not enjoy without misgiving, the intimate home scenes in which Margaret Roper and Holbein have a part, and finally the Chancellor's farewell and departure to the Tower, form a little drama, delicately handled by Mr. Laurence Binyon, with an interest all its own, to diversify the more gorgeous scenes that come properly under the head of pageantry. One of these, the magnificent funeral procession of Anne of Cleves, is the more interesting because all the details are carefully reproduced from a precise contemporary description. So far as is humanly possible, therefore, this solemn display will be an exact repetition of what actually occurred.

There will be further opportunities for tender touches in presenting Princess Elizabeth and Lady Jane Grey. In reference to one incident in the early years of Elizabeth—the unexplained attempt of Admiral Seymour to win her favour—a certain amount of dramatic latitude will be permitted, for the affair remains a puzzle to historians, who are unable to agree about it, and, therefore, offers scope for imaginative treatment. But where history is clear it is Mr. Irvine's principle to adhere to it closely. He cannot ensure absolute accuracy in the representation of the crossing of the Thames by the Roman legions, for this is only recorded as a bald fact, but no pains have been spared by Mr. Heslewood, who is designing the costumes, to show the Roman soldiers, Druids, and uncouth Britons in their habit as they lived, and a great deal of archaeological investigation has been given to this, the opening scene, as well as to the Synod of Offa and the ceremony of anointing the heir to the kingdom in the Second Episode. "May Day in Chelsea Fields," which were formerly a holiday ground for the people of London, will form a diversified spectacle, with old dances and games, and will be of special interest for the display of unfamiliar costume. The period—that of Henry VII.—has not been illustrated in pageantry nor on the stage, and is marked by extravagance in the headgear and robes of the men in contrast with much simplicity in the women's attire. This is surely the most surprising of the many strange freaks of fashion which pageantry has revealed. Any one who is curious about such matters—and one cannot deny their fascination—should find an opportunity to visit the Pageant Room at the Chelsea Town Hall, where there is gathered a variegated show of garments such as has never been seen in London, and all are as historically accurate as patient research can make them. They are increasing at a great rate, for working parties of Chelsea ladies are industriously turning them out, and fresh volunteers for the task are not lacking. In fact, the pageant fever in Chelsea is approaching an acute stage, and the general zeal that is being directed to the furtherance of the enterprise merits the reward of success. There was a good deal of competition for the different parts, and these have now been allotted, one of the most interesting being that of Nell Gwynne, undertaken by Miss Kate Rorke. Nell is closely associated with Chelsea's history, for the story goes that she persuaded Charles II. to found the Royal Hospital for Veteran Soldiers and Sailors—a kindly act that, in the view of Chelsea folk, and probably also of others, compensates in no small measure for lapses in other directions. She will be one of the heroines of the Pageant, and the Hospital that owes its existence to her will be a chief beneficiary from the proceeds of the performance. Earl Cadogan, Archdeacon Bevan, and Sir George White (the Governor of the Hospital) and Lady White are among those taking a leading part in the preparations, and it was through their influence that the grounds of the institution were rendered available. The site is appropriate, since it is that of the old Ranelagh Gardens, and one of the scenes will revive this favourite place of entertainment, introducing some notable eighteenth-century figures who must have trodden the very ground. The influence of the ground on which history is revived is felt rather than consciously recognised, but it never fails to convey a pervading sentiment to those spectators of pageantry who, as at Chelsea, can associate the figures of the past with the places in which they reappear. Addison, Swift, Steele, Horace Walpole, Tobias Smollett, and Dr. Johnson himself will revisit the scene to assist in the celebration of Chelsea's story. This is so closely woven with that of the City that the festival has far more than a local interest, and, in addition to Londoners, it will certainly attract Anglo-Saxons from distant places who wish to renew the ties that bind them to the home of their race. With all the harmonious colour-effects arranged by Mr. Heslewood, the music of Mr. Bucalossi, and the many ancient dances that will enliven the folk-tale, it should form a delightful and instructive diversion for the summer afternoons from June 25th to July 1st.

IRONY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Every day the necessity for the adoption by our literary men of a point d'ironie becomes more apparent. The regular ACADEMY reader, of course, seeing the review of "Adam Cast Forth" remembered Mr. Ross's recent delightful article upon the fair Georgiana's poems, and smiled.

Mr. Ross needs no point d'ironie—his style is sufficient. But the joke at the back of your review of Mr. Doughty's book, if I may say so, is not quite dürchsichtig; and I maintain that a casual reader, knowing the reputation of THE ACADEMY for seriousness, may easily have been seduced into parting with 4s. 6d. for this volume, which, as a joke, is both too long and tedious. It is comprehensible, of course, that one of our ha'penny daily papers should compare Mr. Doughty with Milton, to the latter's disadvantage, in all seriousness; this is ha'penny reviewing, of which no one, I suppose, takes much heed; one can even believe that the Times might fall into a similar style, though the reviewer there very pertinently asks, "Why does Mr. Doughty leave out so many words and put the rest in such a strange order?" (The answer to this conundrum is that Mr. Doughty is a realist, and that as at the time of the Fall neither English, German, nor Esperanto was spoken, Adam and Adama speak a language that is neither English, German, nor Esperanto.)

One knows that THE ACADEMY is no more deceived by this fustian stuff than is Mr. William Watson, who protests strongly in the current Fortnightly; and so, Sir, in the interests of the casual reader, may I beg you to adopt some sign at the foot of your facetious articles, in order that, when he comes across a ha'penny review of the same book, couched in similar terms, he may smile and say, in the "master's" language:

"Thou not canst O Reviewer pull all my leg!"?

THE STIBBERT ART COLLECTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I tremble after reading the letter of "Experience" in to-day's ACADEMY, lest my late warning, instead of being too cadaverous in hue, may not prove too roseate for the real issue of the Stibbert Art Bequest now pending.

"Experience" writes:

That it will astonish those who know the little ways of the Italian Government if any of the £32,000 is ever paid out at all, and the expenses of management will most likely be taken out of admission-fees!

But (as he goes on to say) the British Government know perfectly well that, if they took over the Collection, the only practical purpose it would serve would be to act as a milch cow to the Italian authorities.

He adds: "As a rule, foreign residents in Italy do not know of these things," etc.; all the same they gradually lose belief in the traditional idle tales of friendship current at home.

Thus "Experience" lays his gloomy anticipations before our eyes, counting me inclusively as an "average (?) Englishman," unacquainted with the practices of the Italian Government in such matters. Assuredly he has made an unfortunate selection!

Without trespassing on your space just now, and unwilling to drag any red herring across the downward grade of a legacy involving such a vast amount of money and artistic treasure, I will whisper in the ear of "Experience" that I trust few Englishmen have suffered more than I have at the hands of both the recalcitrant Governments, who now, again, have been playing fast and loose for two full years with interests they are unfitted to control. My bitter experience of them has lasted thirty-six years, and is likely to continue and leave its baleful traces long after me.

I will conclude by drawing your readers' notice to the Florence Herald of the 9th and 15th inst., referring to my letter in THE ACADEMY of the 4th, and expressing satisfaction at "the grievances of the English residents in Florence" having found an advocate in England.

OMAR KHAYAM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A few weeks ago I read in THE ACADEMY of February 8th, under the heading "Life and Letters," some very telling remarks on that "spinner of platitudes" Omar Khayam, and soon after received the "Gulzâr i ma'rifat" in Persian and its translation in French—"La Roseraie du Savoir." This "Rosegarden of Knowledge" is an anthology of 470 mystical quatrains by Persian poets, selected, translated, and annotated by a Persian gentleman, who is M.D. of Paris and has settled in France with the assumed name of "Husain Azâd"—i.e., Husain the Free—after practising for many years in his native country. In the Introduction to the translation "Husain Azâd" informs his readers that the idea of compiling the anthology originated some years ago, after an interview at Isfahan with a British officer of the Indian Army. This officer spoke of Khayam with enthusiasm, and told how greatly that poet was admired in England:

I very much appreciated his remarks, and, feeling like the man from Tabriz before whom some one praised the apples of his native town while it produces all kinds of excellent fruits, said that Khayam was no doubt a poet of great value, but Persia had given birth to many other great poets, some equalling, and some even excelling, Khayam. An expression of doubt appeared on the face of the officer; but when I added, just as an example, that many educated Persians preferred the quatrains of Abu Saïd to those of Khayam, the expression of doubt gave way to one of intense surprise. The arrival of a visitor put an end to our conversation, but the few words which had been spoken left an impression on my mind and the anthology was taken in hand.

In a footnote he adds that:

Dût cet aveu m'attirer la réprobation unanime des membres du Khéyyâm-Club de Londres, je donnerais volontiers, et je gagnerais au marché, pour cinquante quatrains d'Abou-Saïd tout le bagage poétique de l'algébriste de Nichâpour!

My experience of Khayam during forty years' residence in Persia has been that I have heard him quoted only once, and that was after FitzGerald's version, and by the officer mentioned by "Husain Azâd." In a prospectus accompanying the book an extract from a letter by the veteran Orientalist Barbier de Meynard appears with the following:

Je vous sais gré aussi de la franchise de votre appréciation sur Oumer Khayam dont la vogue irréflectie est due au snobisme anglican.

The work, two dainty little volumes, was published in 1906 by E. Guilmo, Paris; nearly every quatrain is accompanied by a verse or passage from a French or English writer, which the translator considered parallel or similar in idea or expression.

THE FRENCH PEASANT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—If not too late for the fair, I forgot a most important fact in favour of my argument. In the first volume of "La Vie Littéraire," to which I referred, Anatole France makes merry over the fact that, like the sons of Noah, Zola's offspring, certain Naturalist novelists, when "La Terre" appeared, published a signed protest against the growing "exacerbation de la note ordurière" in his work. The fact is—and I thank your liberality in not excising my allusion to astrology—that Zola, like Swift, was afflicted by a strong coprologic mania, or delight in filth for its own sake, and for the same reasons (which every educated man will appreciate when astrology is again recognised as a true science, as it was by the greatest recorded intellects until quite recent times). On the day of Swift's birth the moon, or sensitive perception, was in conjunction with Mars, the sensual planet, in his fall in Libra; and Mercury, the mental ruler, in Capricorn, was in square to both—i.e., both the mental rulers heavily afflicted. At Zola's birth the moon, Mercury, and Mars were all in conjunction in Libra and in square to Saturn in Capricorn. Those interested in the subject of character as influenced by planetary positions at birth will find some very interesting examples of great men, sane and insane, given in a very interesting essay, "The Soul and the Stars," contributed, under the nom de plume "A. G. Trent," by the late Dr. Garnett to the University Magazine for March, 1880, which has been several times reprinted.

Swedenborg—whose bones, after more than a hundred years' rest, have recently been removed from London—said that the angels see us only as we stand in the light of heaven, according to our goodness. Zola and some modern French novelists have reversed the above, and seem to see human nature only in its infernal aspects, avec un accent particulier de mépris et de haine, to quote a very just criticism by Zola of Degas' point of view. In Burne-Jones's Life, Vol. II, p. 164, I find the following suggestive passage:

I have been reading "Rob Roy" and it is perfect, perfect, PERFECT. And I read two or three French tales, but they destroyed me, body and soul. How masterly they are no words are good enough to tell, but I hated them.

Zola dismissed Scott's novels with contempt as "literature for schools," but listen to Walt Whitman, the last word of democratic sentiment, as quoted in the Century Magazine, November, 1905:

How much I am indebted to Scott no one can tell, I couldn't tell it myself, but it has permeated me through and through. If you could reduce the "leaves" to their elements, you would see Scott unmistakably active at the roots . . . then there's "The Heart of Midlothian," which I have read a dozen times and more.

Lowell, just before his death, was found by a friend reading "Rob Roy" for perhaps the twentieth time, with huge delight, but who could read Madame Bovary often? I am sure that I could not; and the same applies to De Maupassant's little masterpieces of pessimism; but this latter, being a great artist and a powerful observer of life, as Tolstoi has pointed out in his fine study, was struggling towards a perception of the moral law, when insanity, the Nemesis of inordinate sensuality (a lack of love again!), cut short his untimely thread.

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer AND PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908 :—

Dear Sir.—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

The Pongo Papers

AND

Duke of Berwick

By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS.

With Illustrations by DAVID WHITELAW. 2s. 6d. net.

This book consists of a Series of Verses satiring the methods of modern scientific controversialists. Included in the volume is the "Duke of Berwick," an extremely amusing nonsense rhyme. All lovers of skilful and witty light verse should get "The Pongo Papers."

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Lord Alfred Douglas's entertaining whim of associating inappropriate ethical qualities with various undistinguished members of the brute creation reappears in 'The Pongo Papers.' . . . It is all in the best style of 'nonsense-verse,' which consists largely in conveying the minimum of useful information with the maximum of craftsmanship."—Observer.

"Lord Alfred Douglas has done a remarkable thing in this slender book of verses, half nonsense and half satire as he explains in his preface, for he has added another member to the list of legendary persons whose type and habit of mind may usefully be quoted on occasions. . . . It is excellent fooling, and will be enjoyed by all who are amused by comic rhyme and a satire on scientific controversy. . . . We have only one complaint against this excellent little book—there is not enough of it."—Daily Telegraph.

"It is not everybody, as the author admits, who can enjoy nonsense rhymes, but there are very many we feel sure who will appreciate the humour and satire which abounds in the pages of Lord Alfred Douglas' little volume of verses entitled 'The Pongo Papers.' They make some very amusing reading, and the book is cleverly illustrated by David Whitelaw."—Yorkshire Post.

"'The Duke of Berwick' is delightfully witty and satirical. . . . No one will deny that the finish and execution of Lord Alfred Douglas's work is extraordinary."—Country Life.

"Lord Alfred Douglas writes a clever preface for a clever little book. . . . he exhibits the very difficult art of being utterly foolish. . . . We are very grateful to him. . . . There is real laughter in 'The Pongo Papers.'"—Tribune.

"In his new book just published by Messrs. Greening, Lord Alfred Douglas has made admirable play with the methods of scientific controversialists. 'The Pongo Papers' are pure satire."—Yorkshire Evening Post.

"'The Pongo Papers' constitute capital 'nonsense'. . . . The volume provides readers with an hour's light literature and is amusingly illustrated by Mr. David Whitelaw."—Sunday Sun.

"'The Pongo Papers' are very cleverly-done nonsense verses with a satirical strain. 'The Duke of Berwick' is to our mind the best as well as the longest of them, but all are remarkably good and neat."—Sportsman.

"Lord Alfred Douglas in 'The Pongo Papers' and 'The Duke of Berwick' by his very amusing verses proves that as a writer of verses pure and simple we have in him a successor to the author of 'Alice in Wonderland.' The illustrations by David Whitelaw are capital."—Madame.

"The poems are written with light and humorous touch throughout, and Mr. David Whitelaw has added some clever drawings."—Outlook.

"'The Pongo Papers' have a distinguished originality, and are framed in the metre that the author handles with marked ease and fluency. Along with these witty and diverting sketches appears another elegant trifle, 'The Duke of Berwick.'"—Perthshire Advertiser.

"'The Duke of Berwick' is the kind of poetry we should like to read when we are sick or sorrowful, for it is pure art unstained by any trace of human emotion or of that sickly business called living. . . . 'The Pongo Papers' are a brilliant satire. . . . This is a book which everyone must read."—Vanity Fair.

"That it takes a clever man to write nonsense is a truism. At any rate 'The Pongo Papers' and 'The Duke of Berwick,' by Lord Alfred Douglas, are conspicuously clever and in some parts even brilliant."—Publisher and Bookseller.

"By far the best verses in 'The Pongo Papers,' by Lord Alfred Douglas, are those on the Lobster. The one good ground for elaboration such as this in nonsense-verse is technical success, and this these have in a high degree, while they are also much more amusing than most of the accepted examples."—Morning Leader.

"'The Pongo Papers,' by Lord Alfred Douglas, contain some of the wittiest verse that has been written in our time. The satire is rapier-like in its thrusts. The solemn methods of modern 'scientific' thinkers come in for some delicious railery. 'The Duke of Berwick' is full of drollery, and will bear reading more than once. It is difficult to estimate the amount of delicate art and literary culture that have gone to the writing of these astonishingly clever nonsense-verses."—Publishers' Circular.

"The rhymes are vastly amusing, and are most delightfully written; the author has brought to the writing of them, as anybody who remembers 'The City of the Soul' would expect, all the knowledge of versification and charm of diction which only a real poet can possess. Lord Alfred Douglas, when an undergraduate, made a great reputation for his rhymes about animals. These rhymes have been imitated on every side, but he still remains the animal 'laureate' in spite of the multitude of his followers."—Court Journal.

"'The Pongo Papers' consist of most amusing nonsense-verses very cleverly done."—Irish Times.

"Et à présent, quiconque connaît assez l'anglais pour apprécier les finesses des 'nonsense rhymes' devra lire 'The Pongo Papers' and 'The Duke of Berwick' par Lord Alfred Douglas. Nous sommes loin du volume de Poems, que publia jadis le 'Mercure,' et, à ceux qui lui feraient le reproche de se complaire à ces distractions apparemment peu dignes d'un altier poète, Lord Alfred Douglas rétorque: 'Du fait que j'aurais écrit de magnifiques tragédies, me serait-il interdit de m'essayer dans la comédie.' Et il assure que les 'nonsense rhymes' sont pour le moins aussi difficiles à bien composer que le plus noble des poèmes épiques. En tous cas, ils ont le mérite d'être infiniment plus amusants."—Mercure de France.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE principle of THE ACADEMY being to give a hearing to all sides, we have this week given the publicity of our columns to an article in which Mr. Christopher St. John makes a serious assault upon the general verdict which has been passed on Miss Maud Allan as a dancer. We should like to point out that we do not by any means necessarily identify ourselves with the position that Mr. St. John takes up. The management of the Palace Theatre have not favoured us with an opportunity to make an authoritative pronouncement on the subject—in other words we have been unable ourselves to witness Miss Maud Allan's performance. The article which we published on March 21st giving enthusiastic praise to Miss Allan was an unsolicited contribution, and we published it on the strength of our respect for the judgment and critical ability of its author, a constant and valued contributor to this journal. But, when all is said, it remains an outside contribution, and, in the absence of facilities for witnessing the performance, we are not in a position either to repudiate it or to endorse its conclusions.

We are sure that our readers will be distressed to hear that a paper called the Evening Sun disapproves of THE ACADEMY; and their regret will be doubled when they know that the paper in question is published in the chivalrous city of New York. The Sun opens its article in that agreeable vein of pleasant personality for which the New York Press has always been famous; and, it may be remarked by the way, refutes, in one particular at all events, the charge of exaggeration brought against Charles Dickens. It is evident that the "New York Sewer," the "New York Stabber," the "New York Private Listener," the "New York Peeper," the "New York Plunderer," the "New York Keyhole Reporter," and the "New York Rowdy Journal," have not been left without a legitimate successor. Well; the personal element having been duly attended to, the Evening Sun proceeds to criticism. It declares that the Editor of THE ACADEMY:

Writes like a sophomore, thinks like a sophomore, and has gathered about him a little group of sophomoric essayists, the chief of them a peculiarly immature and fatuous young person called [let us say, Blank], the very type of the "well-educated" vulgarian.

And the Sun ends its "editorial" by deriding the claims of Mr. Upton Sinclair to accuracy of any sort. Indeed, if one is fond of tuberculous cow and canned rat for dinner, it must be tiresome to have these simple tastes interfered with.

While we are on the subject of New York journalism it is interesting to note that Mr. Jerome, the Public Prosecutor, has just been speaking on this very topic. He is reported to have said:

We are supposed to live under a democratic form of government; but let me tell you that the democratic form of government will not work as long as we have government of newspapers by newspapers and for newspapers. That is the kind of government we have in this city. The first blow against such government must be struck by you men of decency and integrity who can make the business offices of these newspapers feel the weight of your disapproval. We who know can tell you that the editorial and news policies of nearly all of the great journals in this city are dictated entirely by their respective business offices. Why, if you want to learn the real policy of any of these papers, let me direct you to the manager's office of any or all of the three or four big department stores in this city, who are the heaviest advertisers. It is there that newspaper policy is moulded; it is that influence which leads editors to falsify news, colour editorials, suppress items, or play up sensational incidents. These advertisers are absolutely masters of some of the newspapers, and through them of the people, who colour their opinions through the reading of these journals.

The Evening Sun should deal sharply with Mr. Jerome, who seems to imagine that newspaper proprietors in the great city are in the business "for their health." Mr. Jerome is evidently an excessively "sophomoric" person.

An attractive collection of Mr. Max Beerbohm's caricatures was opened in Messrs. Carfax's rooms on Wednesday, the 29th. Though no particular wave of Mr. Max Beerbohm's genius has advanced so far as one or two last year, the tide is a higher one in some respects. The collection, as a whole, shows a continued advance in technique. In this sense we notice a new departure in No. 26, "Mid-Term Tea at Mr. Oscar Brownings." No. 47 also, "Mark Twain," is in the later style, and is a truly admirable specimen of it, though its dramatic qualities are slight. No. 12, the Archbishop of Canterbury, is an admirable arrangement in colour, but rather a portrait than a caricature. "Homage à John," No. 39, contains in the crowd of admiring students one of Mr. Beerbohm's best examples of composition; the figure also has considerable grace as well as satire. The generality of artists and remoter connections of literature whom we observed regarding the caricature seemed unaware of Mr. John's existence. The British public, even when instructed, is slow of comprehension. However, we overheard a fellow-caricaturist of Mr. Beerbohm's, who works in a totally different style, criticising his work in a highly able and appreciative manner, which did credit to his taste and insight.

We are glad to observe that Mr. Beerbohm lays less stress than usual on the body of his fireside acquaintances, who are neither types nor specimens, and quite uninteresting outside his study, but there are still too many of them. Such subjects of Mr. Beerbohm's domestic satire would interest the general observer more if used as types, when their physiognomy lends itself to his pencil. Some perhaps may figure in the crowd admiring Mr. John or besieging Mr. Sargent's door—here they are more in place than in specified compositions in which they can of their nature mean nothing to any but a few intimates. Collected they make excellent whitebait, isolated, but a poor substitute for sprats. Mr. Beerbohm's art demands less insipid material. Surely he and Messrs. Carfax have already sufficiently complimented Mr. J. M. Barrie before now, though the audience in No. 15 is perhaps worth another reminder of that writer, but others of a similar class reappear with wearisome insistence. Mr. Beerbohm is not an advertisement agent, and he should enlarge his scope. We cannot praise the caricature of an admirable subject for, of course, a totally different reason. Mr. Beerbohm has operated upon his stepbrother so often that his work has become perfunctory, and Mr. Tree should now be left to other astrographers.

The Westminster Gazette surpassed itself in its issue of April 25th. Referring to the announcement at Manchester of the figures of the election when Mr. Winston Churchill was defeated by a substantial majority, it says :

There was a good deal of cheering, but one felt that to the greater part of those present the result was a shock and a disappointment.

For sheer fatuity it would surely be difficult to beat that remark. The result of the election was no surprise to us, and as another nail in the coffin of the education policy of the Government it was, of course, most welcome to us. We had anticipated a majority of at least a thousand for Mr. Joynson-Hicks, but we arrived at this estimate by crediting in anticipation the Socialist candidate with at least 800 votes, most of which would, of course, have been taken from Mr. Churchill. Not the least satisfactory feature of the election is the indication which it supplies that the dismal and puerile fallacies of Socialism are further than ever from imposing on the working-men of this country. The candidature of Mr. Irving at Manchester was a monumental fiasco, and the boastful anticipations of Socialists before the event are indicative of the completeness of their failure to understand or estimate the mind of their fellow-countrymen. They have in short, by these vain boastings, covered themselves with ridicule.

Apart from the satisfaction at the result of the election which we feel as supporters of the Church and haters of the tyranny and dishonesty of political Nonconformists, we are also unable to refrain from rejoicing at the failure in England of the American methods of electioneering which Mr. Churchill has introduced into this contest. His efforts to capture the alien Semitic votes of the Manchester Ghetto by pledging himself to do his utmost to nullify the provisions of the Immigration Bill strike us as being particularly contemptible. We have a great respect for Mr. Churchill's brilliant abilities, and we should be the last to suggest that because he has politically changed his mind he is necessarily insincere; but such methods of fighting a contest are utterly unworthy of him, and for this one thing alone (his truckling to the scum of the Jewish population in Manchester) he thoroughly deserved to lose his seat, and, moreover, forfeited the claim to sympathy which would otherwise be due to a good fighter.

Concerning singing, our representative is disappointed with the enunciation of Latin at Westminster Cathedral. The Italian pronunciation and the liturgical services themselves are no doubt unfamiliar to many visitors, and render the words difficult to catch; but this is not the case with our representative, who reports that the words can only be heard in the nave by strict attention, even when followed with a book. It is the men, including the ecclesiastics, who are the chief offenders. They clip the consonants in true English fashion, and are not always certain of the Italian values of the vowels. They do not make sufficient use of their lips. In recitation, which forms so large a part of the Holy Week Offices, this is particularly noticeable. There is also a tendency to "register." The Holy Week Offices are a very great strain on any choir; but, since one of the main objects of the gigantic Cathedral is understood to be the production of the choir offices in all their beauty, we trust that these defects may be remedied. Though the music at Westminster Cathedral is, in our estimation, probably the finest and purest ecclesiastical music to be heard in London, we cannot say that it is so well rendered on the points we have mentioned as the inferior music of St. Paul's and the Brompton Oratory.

As regards the building, Westminster Cathedral grows in beauty both within and without. Of course, its position on the edge of a narrow pavement is a terrible blot. We are not purists, in favour of the isolation of great edifices, but the crossing of the road—nay, almost on the great door-step—must probably remain a permanent dissight, even if the unsightly buildings could be removed between the Cathedral and Victoria Street, and after those on two sides of the square have fallen into their apparently speedy decay. We may admit that these were but a temporary expedient for raising the wind, we trust it will soon demolish them. It is understood that Archbishop Bourne has an immense advantage over the late Cardinal Vaughan in the fact that taste in the Arts is not particularly claimed for him. Now that the restraining influence of Bentley is unhappily removed, we trust that the tendency to Birminghamism in the interior decorations will be severely checked. There is great necessity for caution, or Bentley's magnificent work will be ruined. Especially we trust that the authorities will gravely consider the design for the tympanum over the great door on the exterior. The design is meagre and vulgar, with all the defects of barren imitation into which the worst artists of the Birmingham school have fallen. There is no reason why the feeblest feature of Bentley's fine design should be further emphasised by the prominent addition of this frivolous trimming. The tympanum had better remain bare until something better can be found to decorate it.

The "Office Window" columns of the Daily Chronicle are always pleasant reading, and of late they have been better than ever. On St. George's Day the "Window" very properly celebrates great memories, and remarks that Shakespeare, dying on that day, had "a travelling companion to the world of the immortals in the person of Miguel de Cervantes, who breathed his last simultaneously at Madrid." Does this statement take into account the difference between the old and new styles? The "Window" goes on to state that, "apart from Pistol, there is little or no trace in Shakespeare of the influence of Don Quixote; and we invite our readers to solve the very interesting literary and historical problem which is involved in this phrase. The first part of the Don Quixote appeared at the beginning of the year 1605; the Merry Wives of Windsor, the last play in which Pistol appears, was written late in 1599 or early in 1600. The puzzle is to explain how a book written in 1600 could have been influenced by a book which did not appear till 1605. And then again the excellent "Window" continues:—"Though Beaumont and Fletcher's Knight of the Burning Pestle was clearly modelled on the Knight of Salamanca." Was Beaumont concerned in the Knight of the Burning Pestle? And what is the authority for regarding Salamanca as a synonym of La Mancha? Is this a case of varying forms of one word, such as Brecon, Brecknock, Brycheiniog? For a correct solution of all these difficulties we are prepared to award a handsome prize—the admirable translation of the Don Quixote, by John Ormsby, published in four neat volumes.

And we have another prize to offer. On the day following its pronouncements on Shakespeare and Cervantes the "Office Window" told the following tale:

In the eighteenth century some Scots were travelling in Russia, and, bent on doing in Russia as the Russians did, repaired on the Sabbath Day to worship in one of their churches. But what was their surprise, their mortification, when their ears were struck by the accents of the priest who came round swinging the censor under their noses—"If it disna dae ye ony guid it winna dae ye any hairm!" This priest turned out to be a Lowland pedlar, who . . . had somehow managed to enter the Greek Church, and, being ignorant of Latin, had mumbled his part in good "braid Scots," which was equally unintelligible to the people.

Now this story presents some serious difficulties. If the "Window" will transport itself to Bayswater it will find that in the Greek Church properly so called, not Latin but Greek is the language of the Divine Liturgy. Indeed, this seems only natural. And then again in the Russian portion of the Orthodox Eastern Church the ecclesiastical language is Old Slavonic—bearing, we believe, much the same relation to modern Russian as "Prayer-book English" does to the colloquial English of the present day. The question, then, is: Explain the use of the word "Latin" in this tale. The nature of the prize to be awarded is receiving our careful consideration.

TO A DANCER

To London, weary with the weight of things,
 Customs, conventions,—clothes of limbs and soul,
 She brought the freedom of a thousand springs,
 Beauty entire and whole.

And 'mid the painted scenes, the tawdry glare,
 The crowding faces, stupid, hard, and crass,
 There came a sudden freshness in the air,
 The scent of morning grass.

She flitted light, sprung from the dawning hours ;
 She moved in rhyme to cosmic harmonies ;
 Her hands threw out the sweetness of new flowers ;
 Swift rains, and April skies.

Her bare feet in their delicate rise and fall,
 Her changing body thrilling with the birth
 Of Spring incarnate—in a music-hall,
 A place of alien earth.

Strange paradox. Yet here in tired air,
 Amid stale antics, fun grown old and sad,
 Nightly is born the Spring, divinely fair
 And innocently glad.

Bare body and bare soul together wrought
 Into pure motion and with music rife—
 Ah dancer, take this garland of my thought,
 You—whose great art is life.

MABEL DEARMER.

EVENING FACES

Put no trust in evening faces,
 Twilight countenances sweet,
 Honey'd looks and laughing graces,
 Flutt'ring hands and eyes discreet ;
 Dimpled gowns and foamy laces
 Over vague, delightful feet.

Slip your gowns on jewell'd grasses,
 Bathe in pools where twilight flows :—
 Frolic girls 'mid liliated passes,
 Suck the moonfire from the rose :
 Soft as shadows seen in glasses
 Speed away ere morning glows.

Morning breaks o'er silent places,
 Forests stir and mountains yawn,
 Light this warning bleakly traces,
 Over valley, meadow, lawn :—
 " Put no trust in evening faces, Meet your bride beneath the dawn."

THOMAS RYMER AND OTHERS

Critical Essays of the Seventeenth Century. Edited by J. E. SPINGARN. (Oxford : Clarendon Press, Vols. I. and II., 5s. each.)

THE Clarendon Press—not half so enterprising a body as the Cambridge University Press—has yet one or two very good things on its list : those pleasurable English classics, for instance, in square volumes with white bindings. And the series of critical essays of which Mr. Spingarn's two volumes (there is a third to come) form part is quite one of its best. The series began with Mr. Gregory Smith's "Elizabethan Critical Essays ;" then comes Mr. Spingarn, who is to take us all through the seventeenth century, while Mr. W. P. Ker has already edited the greatest critic of that century—Dryden—by himself, and Mr. Shawcross's edition of Coleridge's "Biographia Literaria" and æsthetical essays has carried us over a wide gap into the nineteenth century. That gap, we hope, will be filled, though we can find no mention of the eighteenth century in the prospectus, and whoever undertakes the task will have his work cut out to select from the enormous mass of excellent critical material begun in the days of Anne and carried on until the new school of thought came into being about the time of the French Revolution.

We are not certain that Mr. Spingarn's and Mr. Ker's volumes are not the most valuable of all. The work of criticism was just as vital in the days of Coleridge, but its path was much smoother. It was, to a great extent, a question of this or that—the old or the new, the Augustan or the Romantic ; and mighty men as were Coleridge and Hazlitt—and, within his very strait limitations, Leigh Hunt too—the result was really a foregone conclusion. A century had tried to shut its eyes, and its eyes had to be opened. Elizabethan criticism, too, has really very little to tell us in the twentieth century. Who but professed students of the history of literature cares really for Gabriel Harvey and his classicisms, and Meres and Puttenham, and the rest ? We read the "Apologie for Poetrie," because Sidney was Sidney, and because his book is the bravest, loftiest, and most beautiful of all the claims for the poet and for letters that have been written by poets and men of letters. The others—save where they touch our personal interest by their remarks on some poet whose work we love—are really matter for handbooks and histories. It is not so with the seventeenth century. It was not here the story of the battle between one school and another, of which the younger and fresher was bound to win ; nor is it the story of naïve and tentative efforts in a new field. It is, in the main, the vital struggle for the very existence of any criticism at all.

That, of course, is scarcely true of the period covered by Mr. Spingarn's first volume—1605-1650. What happened during that period was the pathetic spectacle of the ageing of a once vigorous body. The double process of dissolution and ossification was at work—both going on simultaneously as they go on in the body of an ageing man whose joints get stiff and his veins grow hard, while other organs are slackening to dissolution. So in this period. We have the classicalism of Ben Jonson, the deadly naturalism of Hobbes, both mortal signs of stiffening, the loss of generous life, free movement, and rapid flow of blood ; on the other hand, we have the dissolution indicated even by Beaumont and Fletcher, by Middleton and Ford, where the movement is loose rather than free, and the flow of blood is fitful and uncertain, not full and steady. Then came the Rebellion, and the forces of hell let loose. One huge and lonely Colossus—John Milton—stands with one foot on the old and the other on the new. Everything else is submerged. Mr. Spingarn, who knows his period backwards, has rescued from among the débris of the flood the work that went on in Paris in those black years. But what he has rescued only proves the extent of the damage done. The intolerable "Gondibert," which D'Avenant began in Paris and continued in prison—D'Avenant's Preface to "Gondibert" and Hobbes's opinion on D'Avenant's Preface to "Gondibert"—it all amounts to pitifully little. To us of to-day it all seems desperately far from having any significance, or any relation to literature as we understand it, or to life as men have always lived it.

Then the King came back to his own and then began one of the strangest periods in history and literature that the world has seen. Here, again, there was a double process at work. On the one side were the men who had been tossed about in exile and poverty and danger abroad, and were glad to come home and settle down—to make up for lost time; and the nation which had stayed at home to suffer inconceivable things and was only too glad to welcome established order—peace at any price, no matter how it galled here and there. And on the other hand there was that very spirit of restlessness which an unsettled state of things engenders in men against their own wills—the restlessness of the man who has explored strange lands or fought battles and can never after shake off the desire for change, novelty, adventure. And so between them these tendencies produced strange results in the literature of the time. There is an extreme instance in Thomas Rymer, whose "Tragedies of the Last Age" and "Short View of Tragedy" are printed in part by Mr. Spingarn. Here we see the first tendency most strongly at work. The established order—moral, political, social—is Rymer's ideal. Shakespeare and Beaumont and Fletcher wrote nonsense, in his opinion. Their characters did not behave in the least as people really behave. Let us hear him on Othello:

Tempests themselves, high Seas, and howling Winds,
The guttered Rocks, and congregated Sands,
Traytors ensteep'd to clog the guiltless Keel,
As having sense of Beauty, do omit
Their common Natures, letting go safely by The divine Desdemona.

Is this the language of the Exchange or the Ensuring-Office? Once in a man's life he might be content at Bedlam to hear such a rapture. In a play one should speak like a man of business; his speech must be politikos, which the French render Agissante, the Italians, Negotiosa and Operativa, but by this gentleman's talk one may well guess he has nothing to do.

Or, again:

Jago had some pretence to be discontent with Othello and Cassio. And what passed hitherto was the operations of revenge. Desdemona had never done him harm, always kind to him and to his wife, was his country-woman, a dame of quality; for him to abet her murder shows nothing of a soldier, nothing of a man, nothing of Nature in it. The Ordinary of New-gate never had the like monster to pass under his examination. . . . But the Poet must do every thing by contraries, to surprise the audience still with something horrible and prodigious beyond any human imagination. At this rate he must out-do the devil to be a Poet in the rank with Shakespeare.

Illuminating criticism, is it not? Leading one surely and gently to the immortal Rymerism:

Poetical decency will not suffer death to be dealt to each other by such persons whom the laws of duel allow not to enter the lists together.

But it is not fair to laugh at Rymer too thoughtlessly. He is the spirit of his time, a time that knew how to value a settlement of any kind, and naturally disposed to make too much of what established order it had.

The other side of the picture has no prominent figure, such as that of Rymer. It is seen, however, not only in the religion of the time, in which all kinds of false starts, extravagant bursts, and untempered enthusiasm went side by side with the rejuvenation of the State Church, but also in its literature, which is, as every one knows, packed with license, both moral and artistic, and includes a vast variety of efforts in a hundred directions, the restless wanderings and fitful undertakings of people who did not really know what to set their hands to. The time came when whatever was valuable in all these irregular elements was absorbed into the rich and splendid literature of the age of Anne.

A word of praise must be added for Mr. Spingarn's learned and interesting and useful notes. He has selected his material with judgment and illustrated it with knowledge and care, and his book has a high value.

SOMETHING ACCOMPLISHED

Ancient Britain and the Invasions of Julius Cæsar. By T. RICE HOLMES. (Clarendon Press, 21s. net.)

DR. RICE HOLMES, in his Preface, claims the indulgence due to an author who, except on holidays, can only find leisure for writing or research after he has fulfilled the duties of an exacting profession, and who, in order to gain time, has worked steadily through his vacations for nearly thirty years, but we do not feel that he need have claimed even this. Perhaps an old pupil of his may be allowed to recall the thoroughness with which he fulfilled the duties that unthinking youth makes arduous, and to add that the same thoroughness is as evident in this absorbing book as in the everyday work which has made for Dr. Holmes so many friends, whose very names he has probably forgotten. "Cæsar's Conquest of Gaul" was a book to be reckoned with. The book before us now is one to be reckoned from. In more than one respect it will be the starting-point for future investigators. Perhaps it is not altogether strange that the study of British archæology should have lagged behind that of Greece and Rome. For the fascination of a world-art and a world-empire were not there to lure the right men on to research. The only reward of the British archæologist is truth—or a glimmering of it—and that reward has been vouchsafed to Dr. Holmes in no insignificant degree. From time to time we are arrested by the forcible manner in which the conclusion emerges from the argument, even before the author has had time to state it for himself.

Systematic and connected pre-history of Britain, from the age of drift man onward to the dawn of history, has not been attempted in this fashion before. Isolated fragments of the vast period have been dug out of the past, and rough-hewn to fit a dozen theories. The problem of "when and whence" has been hotly disputed; imagination has been let loose upon Goidels, Brythons, and Picts; "languages" have been evolved—dare we say it?—from the inner consciousness of distinguished disputants; skulls have been measured in as many different ways and with as many different results as there were measurers. Dr. Holmes knows all this, notes it, discusses it; but he does not make either the mistake of supposing that finality is attainable in the matter of geological processes and climatic change in the present state of our knowledge, or that of disregarding the common and practical argument from ascertainable data, in favour of a prejudiced point of view. From this it must not be inferred that Dr. Holmes has set down a boneless record of other men's controversies; on the contrary, he has definite opinions, which begin with the first appearance of definite data, and which he states quite fearlessly, and not without some scorn for those whose opinions are less constant.

The time is past, for the most part, when armchair archæology held the field. But only too often, even now, and even in British archæology itself, the tendency is obviously towards the formulation of theories without a first-hand knowledge of the data. The English student of the dawn of Babylonian civilisation at least has some excuse if his ignorance of Mesopotamian topography leads him out of the plain road into the thickets, but it is hard to find an excuse for one who, for example, bases upon incorrect suppositions as to the topography of Salisbury Plain theories as to the origin, purpose, and date of Stonehenge; nor can he claim thoroughness as a quality of his work who discusses the place of Cæsar's landing without learning first the probabilities as to the set of tide and current round the coasts of Kent and Sussex at a certain time in 55 B.C. Yet these things have been done, not once, but often, with the very natural result that one hypothesis so evolved was as good as another, and no better. If avoidance of anything approaching want of thoroughness can give a greater value to British archaeological research—as most assuredly it can—then Dr. Holmes's theories are better founded and better presented than those of many of his most distinguished fellow-workers.

The author begins at the very beginning with palæolithic man. We are not sorry to note that he will have but little to do with an "eolithic" age. Even if the "eoliths" have a real existence—and we doubt it much—the evidence afforded by them is so uncertain, and the line between the natural and the artificial shaping of the flints, if indeed it exists, is so utterly beyond definition that they may well be dismissed from the discussion. It is quite impossible to say at what stage in the geological building of these islands man made his appearance, but we may safely postulate that he did not suddenly leap into existence as a tool-using animal from the first. Of far more practical interest is the question of continuity as between the palæolithic and the neolithic races of Britain; and here, again, we are glad to be in accord with Dr. Holmes in his advocacy, guarded though it be, of continuity. He is wise, too, as we think, in avoiding the pitfall of geological chronology. Far more effectively than by a guesswork tangle of "periods" and "ages," he sets before us a scheme of the vast changes which have taken place in the configuration of the land, by a word-picture which brings home a sense of huge spaces of time, and affords a fit setting for the marvellously slow progress of man in the initial stages of his march towards civilisation.

Neolithic Britain is a very different matter from Britain in the Old Stone age, both as regards the nature of the remains and the amount of evidence which can be deduced from them; and it is with the consideration of the neolithic age that the living interest of a manifest continuity first appears:

Whoever they (the first neolithic invaders of Britain) may have been, whatever the date of their arrival, it was an era since which the history of this country has been continuous. Their descendants are with us still; they or later comers brought with them the seeds of cereals and plants which are cultivated still, and animals, the descendants of which still stock our farms; they practised handicrafts and arts from which the industries of modern Britain have been in part evolved. . . . But we cannot fix even approximately the period at which these people began to arrive. All that can be said is that it was many centuries before the Bronze Age, which probably began in this country about eighteen hundred years before the Christian era.

There can be little doubt that the neolithic people of Britain were of the "Mediterranean" stock. And in view of the growing weight of that hypothesis which derives the highest of all "Mediterranean" civilisations from an African source, it is interesting to note that some philologists find contamination from a Hamitic source in modern Celtic dialects. In this connection the negroid characteristics increasing with the increase in age of each of the series of the skeletons of the Grotte des Enfants, is illuminating. But against this evidence we have to place the remarkable extinction of the art impulse which characterised the men of the caves of Dordogne and to a less extent their contemporaries in Britain, an extinction of which there is no trace in the eastern Mediterranean. Still, the differences between the British and Continental neolithic developments are so marked as to leave ample room for such discrepancies between different sections of the same race. The balance is everywhere in favour of Continental man; and even in the matter of superstition—magic, religion, call it what you will—it seems as though British man had lagged behind his contemporaries of Europe. The widespread neolithic practice of trepanning, whether as a surgical operation to relieve epilepsy, or, in the case of the skulls of the dead, for the purpose of obtaining a prophylactic against similar disease, is practically unrepresented in Britain. Yet, on the other hand, the discommunity of origin between Europe and Britain which might be argued from this circumstance is to a certain extent discounted by the presence of the practice of couvade, which even now survives in various forms in these islands.

The comparative antiquity of inhumation and incineration is left an open question by Dr. Holmes. And certainly, on the available evidence, it would be difficult to argue that at any time in the neolithic age the two practices were held distinct as expressive either of racial or religious difference. The evidence for cannibalism is rightly regarded as flimsy, and it may be well to remark that the denudation of a skeleton before burial is no evidence at all that the flesh was eaten. Human sacrifice is here accepted as a "universal practice," but we have never thought that the evidence was sufficient to justify so wide a generalisation.

The sacrifice of animals at interments is a point which offers greater material for speculation. But the goose of Salisbury Plain may just as well have been a family pet as the dog of Eynford. Cæsar's unfortunate remark about the Britons and geese has let loose a flood of unprofitable speculation. But that totemism of a sort may have existed in Britain it would be foolish to deny. And it is safest to admit with Dr. Holmes that:

We must be content, if we can but catch something of the spirit of neolithic religion, to remain in blank ignorance of its details.

Coming to the Bronze Age, we come also to Stonehenge. And here Mr. Holmes first takes a definite line of his own. Both in the body of the work and in the Appendix he tears to shreds Sir Norman Lockyer's astronomical theory, and, while admitting that some stone-circles in Britain may have their origin in a form of sun-worship, is emphatic in his denial of such an origin for Stonehenge. On the whole, he is inclined to regard it as a great sepulchral monument, associated with religious observance after its first erection, but governed by no subtle rules of orientation in the first instance:

It may be that those who set up the circle thought differently from the believers who thronged it in later times—the cult of ancestors, the worship of the sun, the adoration of the Celtic deity who was the counterpart of Zeus, may have called successive generations of pilgrims to the holy place. . . . Time-honoured when the Roman first landed on our shore, Stonehenge was standing in all its glory when the Greek explorer came who first made known our island to the civilised world.

The voyage of Pytheas naturally raises the point of the identity of Ictis and of the Cassiterides; Dr. Holmes identifies the Cassiterides with Britain, and holds that the secrecy of the Phœnicians concerning the position of the tin islands led the geographers off the scent, and that it did not occur to them to identify these mysterious tin islands in the western sea with Britain, which was already known to them in part. Ictis, he thinks, is St. Michael's Mount, and his argument against the Ictis-Vectis identification is based on sound common sense.

But the central interest of the book, to our thinking, lies in Dr. Holmes's arguments for the landing of Cæsar, first between the castles of Walmer and Deal, and the second time north of Deal. We cannot examine these arguments at length. We can do no more than advise every one to whom patient research, careful weighing of evidence, and sound judgment on this point are of interest and value to read every word that Dr. Holmes has to say upon the subject, for every word is worth reading. His own summary is confident, even didactic. But we think he is justified of his child. He says:

I began this inquiry early in 1900 with a mind absolutely unbiassed, resolved to do one of two things—either to solve the problem or, if that could not be done, to show, once for all, that it was insoluble. The reader knows that I have not neglected any means of ascertaining the truth; and I have provided him with the means of controlling every statement that I have made. I have set down fully and fairly the arguments of those from whom I differ, and I have kept back nothing. I have called attention to everything that might appear to tell against the conclusion to which the evidence inevitably led. I need not say anything by way of recapitulation, for no man who has read this article attentively can be lacking either in patience or in intelligence; and I am sure that the reader is by this time convinced of these things—that it has been demonstrated that Caesar did not land at Pevensey or anywhere in Sussex; that it has been demonstrated that he did not land at Hythe or anywhere in Romney Marsh; and that it has been demonstrated that he did land both in 55 and 54 B.C. in East Kent—in the former year between Walmer Castle and Deal Castle, in the latter north of Deal Castle. That some will still for a time dispute these conclusions is likely enough; but not those whose judgments count. For them the problem is solved.

And for us also, whether or no we can claim that our judgment counts; and we welcome the solution and praise the dogged perseverance and meticulous appreciation of the value of detail which have achieved it.

"Epoch-making" is a big epithet to apply to any work. Fortunately, it is not in England a stock phrase to the same extent as in Germany. We can, therefore, apply it to Dr. Holmes's book, in the belief that it will express the high opinion that we hold of his work. The mass of material that he has accumulated is not thrown before us in chaotic heaps; it is arranged, docketed, labelled, with an almost terrifying precision; it all leads to something; and it is abundantly plain that the author has not rushed into his work, but that the building of it did not begin till the scaffolding was complete. Thus this work is not only epoch-making, but it is a book as well—an epoch-making book.

HYDE PARK

Hyde Park: its History and Romance. By MRS. ALEC TWEEDIE. (Eveleigh Nash, 15s. net.)

How Life's opportunities slip away from one, to be sure! It may interest Mrs. Alec Tweedie to hear that the present writer long had it in mind to write a history of Hyde Park, and, having finished a book on another and adjacent part of London, was ruminating with some approach to execution when her work was announced. What a lesson, dear friends, to be up and doing betimes! For in Hyde Park Mrs. Tweedie is triumphantly encamped, and any attempt to dislodge her would be quite futile. In the circumstances it may interest her to hear also that, in my opinion, her study of an extraordinarily interesting and attractive subject is thoroughly complete, and from first to last most delightfully done.

This book should surely make Londoners appreciate Hyde Park more than they usually appreciate their precious possessions, especially those who live near it and can ride or walk in it daily. Virgin forest, monkish domain, Royal hunting-ground, the scene of famous, ghastly executions, of famous, fierce encounters, of great assemblies, the meeting-place for centuries of English society—is there any "open space" in the world which has such a history and such suggestions of romance as this? Surely not. Londoners must certainly insist that nothing is ever done to Hyde Park which might conflict artistically with its record. The great thing about it, after all, is that here in the midst of a huge, over-populated city is a large space of land which has never been built over, soil going back in virginity to ancient Britain. It must be kept wild, so far as possible; since it cannot still be virgin forest, it must remain, as it is now, essentially a great bare field. A little gardening about the edges is all very well; no one admires more than I the flower-beds along the east side, which, I believe, we owe to the taste of Sir Schomberg McDonnell; but that is enough, the central space must be left bare. Regular lines of little ornamental trees, such as you see in the Bois de Boulogne, won't do at all. I confess I look with grave misgiving on the tea-house which Mr. Harcourt is building near the Serpentine. The Park, by the way, narrowly escaped an excessive share of the evils which the Puritans brought upon England, for the rascally Parliament in 1652 positively sold it for building to private speculators. Fortunately these ruffians thought they could make more out of it by keeping it as a pleasure ground and charging a stiff price for admission, a price which the citizens paid under protest, and which was of course promptly abolished when the patriotic Charles came home. It was part of the Crown lands—which was the Parliament's excuse for selling it—but Charles never dreamed of treating it as his property, partly from good nature, and partly perhaps because he knew that if he had he would probably have been "sent on his travels" again. James was so sent for much less serious reasons.

It would be impossible here to give more than an outline of the interest of the book, and that really ought not to be necessary. Detailed and vivid history of the Park begins with Henry VIII., who hunted regularly there, and rode with Anne Boleyn, and once, leaping with his pole, fell into a ditch. The Ring and Charles II. marks another epoch, the beginning of its character as a fashionable haunt. Then there were the gibbetings at Tyburn, on which Mrs. Tweedie has a long and ghastly and weirdly interesting chapter. William III. made Rotten Row, and Queen Charlotte the Serpentine, as we know. The duels in the Park give Mrs. Tweedie another vivid chapter, mostly terrible, sometimes farcical. The eccentric Lord Peter-sham, driving in a brown coach, with brown horses, brown liveries, brown clothes, brown everything, because he was in love with Mrs. Browne, is a figure which stands out from a more picturesque age than ours. Mrs. Tweedie is very thorough, as I said, and has been to a host of authorities. I am glad to note one or two small slips. The Tybourne River did not flow through Half Moon Street into Piccadilly, but further west, by the side of the St. James's Club, and the Ring was hardly the precursor of modern racing, for Newmarket saw racing in James I.'s day. She is right, I suppose, to bring the notabilities who have used the Park up to date, but some of the contemporary ones seem a little out of perspective. I don't feel quite sure that future ages will care to know that Mr. Solomon J. Solomon and Mr. Allan Aynesworth are in the habit of riding there. But it is a wholly delightful book, and what with the immense interest of its subject, the pleasant writing, and the number of well-chosen pictures, should have a really great success.

COLERIDGE AND THE CRITICISM OF POETRY

Coleridge's Literary Criticism. With an Introduction by J. W. MACKAIL. (Frowde, 2s. 6d. net.)

"Lo here, a little volume, but great book!" It would be hard to name a modern book containing more sound, vital criticism than is held between the covers of this selection. Professor Mackail mentions, a little superfluously, the difficulty of choice and arrangement; obviously, the difficulty is great, but the task was well worth attempting. Coleridge's criticism is scattered here and there—dross with the gold, smoke smothering the flame; and the disengagement of what we must needs remember from what we would fain pass by has, surely, been a pious, a votive labour. We cannot pretend to enjoy the whole of the "Biographia Literaria;" we cannot pretend that every paragraph of "Table Talk" is inspired or inspiring; we cannot pretend that every sentence of the "Lectures on Shakespeare" is valuable or even clear. So often is their author prolix, cloudy, wearisome, vagrant! But choosing from these and the "Literary Remains," Professor Mackail has succeeded in forming a fairly coherent body of criticism; and we confess the coherence, the continuity, which make a book when we had expected a miscellany, have a little surprised us. The mere necessity of turning to this place and that, among a confusion of notes, in order to ascertain Coleridge's judgments, has perhaps given us an undue sense of fragmentariness; but the present little volume serves somewhat to correct an impression which we believe to be by no means singular.

For another thing we must thank Professor Mackail. He has provided a brief, pregnant introduction, clear and admirably phrased. He speaks aptly of some of Coleridge's casual utterances (what a lifetime of reflection is behind many of them!) as "sayings which have become, as one might say, part of the thing they criticise." He has, in short, done well what it has long been desirable to do, and has thereby paid tribute which every true lover of Coleridge will admit to be worthy and honourable. We could only wish that room could have been found for more of those casual utterances—so often luminous and profound—upon ideas and books and men, and then the book would have been a kind of golden treasury of criticism.

Coleridge remains the supreme instance in English letters of the interfusion of critical with creative genius; though to say this is to observe for the moment—but only for the moment—a distinction which is plainly false.

What he says about poetry cannot lose its value or its interest, for it tells us not indeed what poetry is, but what poetry meant to the author of the "Ancient Mariner" and "Christabel."

Undoubtedly his poetic achievement lends authority to his critical dicta. We pay the more heed to the "Lectures on Shakespeare" because of "Christabel," but we do not confirm our love of the "Ancient Mariner" by recollection of the "Biographia Literaria." In our memory the critic is almost lost in the poet; the poet is never overshadowed by the critic. The observation is familiar to tediousness, yet still significant, that the most vital criticism has come from the poets. We recall the glowing pages of Shelley, Wordsworth's profound meditations, the casual notes of Keats, Tennyson, Rossetti; FitzGerald's memorable obiter dicta; Arnold's ironic and earnest persuasions; Patmore's glittering essays; Swinburne's fervid asseverations. These away, how (comparatively) meagre and petty were the records of English criticism! But to none of them do we owe more than we owe to Coleridge; and to none, alas! have we rendered so churlish and complaining a thanks as has been muttered over his grave. It has been the fashion to lament the waste of his powers, to ascribe to an infirmity of purpose (which we are all competent to reprehend) the failure of the poetic flood, and to lament as we might a crime:

That this most famous Stream in Bogs and Sands
Should perish; and to evil and to good
Be lost for ever.

He is the text of Long Ears' pious disquisitions upon the instability of human endeavour and the waste of human powers. Every ass has brayed at this singer, forgetting the reverence due to a genius as far beyond his comprehension as it is above the indignity of his praise. From Coleridge's own time to ours there have not been wanting men who, unworthy to unloose the latchet of his shoes, have been hasty to disparage his unique legacies by regret that they were not greater. What impertinent nonsense it is! Coleridge's influence on English poetry has not been so direct as that of Keats; but, with Wordsworth's, it stirred the idle waters with a new impulse of beauty. On English criticism his power has been more individual and positive. His criticism of Shakespeare is not final (none could be) nor always acceptable; but, after a century of debate, his conclusions form a frequent battle-ground. You may not agree with him, but, often, you can hardly discuss Shakespeare out of him. Mr. Walkley, in a recent book, has indicated the danger of Shakespearean critics, such as Coleridge and Professor Bradley, regarding the characters of the plays as veritably persons of real life, and explaining the circumstances of the plays by the probabilities based on this assumption of reality. But there is one feature of Coleridge's sayings concerning Shakespeare which has an unimpeachable excellence—his faculty of interpreting the emotion of a play. Just as a single line of verse sometimes evokes a certain universal mood, so Coleridge, in a single sentence upon Romeo and Juliet, for example, revives and interprets the profound emotion of that tragedy:

It is a spring day, gusty and beautiful in the morn, and closing like an April evening with the song of the nightingale—a criticism, as Professor Mackail notes, in which words are used with the effect of music.

Professor Mackail observes that Coleridge's chief work as a critic of letters is found in his criticism of poetry; but he speaks a little lightly of his proneness to generalise. True:

Comprehensive definitions are not as much definitions as crystallised impressions;

yet it is with the "general ideas" that Coleridge is most profoundly occupied, and it is these that engage with so ardent a fascination the minds of other critics and all readers. Definitions of poetry are as arresting as they are apparently conflicting. For Coleridge it is "the best words in the best order;" for Wordsworth it is "the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings, taking its origin from emotion remembered in tranquillity;" for Arnold it is "a criticism of life." The first definition takes no obvious account of the special matter of poetry; the second is concerned explicitly and exclusively with the origin of poetry; the third ignores the distinctive form of poetry. They are often on our lips. Poems are considered by some surprising critics according as they are comprised in one particular definition; fail in that iron test, and you are no poet. Yet each is a serious effort in the "business of criticism," which has for aim simply the ascertaining of reasonable principles of judgment, not the providing of ready-made judgments; and none is false except in so far as it is made exclusive, or allowed to usurp the province of another. It would be idle, though easy, to instance or postulate the most ludicrous applications of these dicta; it is more profitable to note that, between them, they afford a fairly comprehensive (though by no means conclusive) test of poetry, only wanting an adequately precise provision as to form, which the present writer will on no account venture upon here. Clearly, for example, the "Ode to a Nightingale" is a judgment of life, with the best words in a supremely perfect order; and clearly it is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings. So, too, in various degree, are a sonnet of Shakespeare, a lyric of Wordsworth, "In Memoriam;" so is a Psalm of David, a song of Burns, a prayer of Crashaw.

The limitation of these detached sayings, however, when taken separately, is obvious. Wordsworth's accurate sense of the origin of poetry did not prevent his assertion that:

There neither is, nor can be, any essential difference between the language of prose and metrical composition;

an affirmation which Coleridge set himself to refute in a famous passage. We may, indeed, press the distinction emphasised in the "Biographia Literaria" to a farther issue than Coleridge had immediately in view. Worthy people have said to us, with bland, blind conviction, that the art of poetry is merely decorative; that it has nothing to do with life; that it is not one of the "great realities;" and that whatever is said in verse could be said more plainly, directly, effectively in prose. The perversity of this is both sad and mad. Coleridge declared the infallible test of a blameless style in verse to be its "Untranslatable-ness" in words of the same language without injury to the meaning.

And the whole distinction between poetry and prose lies just here: that poetry can not be translated into prose, for the sufficient reason that the subject-matter and creative impulse of poetry are different (though not necessarily remote) from the subject-matter and creative impulse even of what is called lyrical or impassioned prose. What of emotion, what of love, hope, apprehension, faith, regret, is not utterable in verse, is not utterable out of verse. Coleridge himself, in the "Ancient Mariner," his only completed masterpiece, has used both verse and prose as his medium; but where is found the incommunicable magic of the "wizard twilight," if not in the verse? Is the "Ode to the West Wind" utterable in prose, or "Life of Life," or "Kubla Khan," or a song of Blake, an ode of Patmore, or Tennyson's "Break, break, break"? The supreme thing in these, the touch that unseals the infinite in our forgetful bosoms, is the thing which the mere words do not express, the power these all alike have of awaking a responsive rhythm and music—the power of evoking an image, of discovering a light. Definitions and tests are, ultimately, valueless in regard to the noblest things, whereof the nobility—independent, often, of the mere idea expressed—remains incommunicable if not spontaneously apprehended. It cannot be too plainly or too urgently said that in poetry is heard the last refinement and the profoundest note of human speech. In it is that which is strange as the thrill of Spring, quick as Spring's fire, purifying like prayer, redeeming like faith. We would be understood in the most literal and exact sense in saying there is that in pure poetry which lifts the soul as by a great wind, and renews in us the primal ecstasy, wherein joy and sorrow are lost, are but names of parts, hints of a transcendent whole.

For Wordsworth, poetry is "the first and last of all knowledge, immortal as the heart of man." For Shelley, it "redeems from decay the visitations of the divinity in man." Less impassioned than theirs, Coleridge's conception of the office and power of poetry is hardly less lofty. Hungering after Eternity, he seemed to taste something of eternal nourishment in the English poets, and—hardly secondary—in the older prose-writers he loved so well. For a brief wonderful space he had a vision and lived under a spell. When the enchantment failed, he had done the highest it was given him to do in verse; but he brought to the work of criticism a memory and a hope. There was on his lips the immortal savour of honey-dew and milk of Paradise.

It is an ancient and shallow tradition which assigns to critical work a secondary regard and honour, according to which, for example, Pater, in the "Imaginary Portraits," was doing work of the first rank, and in the "Renaissance" work of a lower rank. Professor Mackail justly insists on the creative value of vital criticism. Every true criticism of literature becomes itself a "criticism of life," concerned with the "best order" of things; and Coleridge, in his prose criticism, has given us that which is hardly less original, individual, and permanent than his poetry—permanent, we mean, not in particular assertion and appraisal, but in conception and attitude. In him is no thought of literature as wares for the market-place; for him poetry is not a frail competitor with politics or any other local excitement. It is, in truth, an exercise of the soul, a spiritual manifestation, whether it be verse of his own enchanted singing, or the voice of another which it is his praise to have known for authentic, even amid the clamours of the scornful and the doubts of the forgetful.

SIGNIFICANT ETYMOLOGY

Significant Etymology. By the Very Rev. J. MITCHELL, M.A., D.D. (Edinburgh and London: Blackwood.)

THE design of this book is much the same as that of the similar work in German by Harder—namely, to discuss etymologies, whilst at the same time arranging them in categories. Thus the first chapter recounts the etymologies of all such words as are connected with the "The Heavenly Bodies"—i.e., such as "galaxy," "astronomy," "jovial," "martial," and the like. As the work extends to 447 pages, the number of words thus discussed is very large, and there are sufficient indexes. It is, in fact, a partial etymological dictionary, rendered readable by the manner in which the words are grouped.

It is necessarily and admittedly a compilation, founded upon certain works which are named at the end of the Preface, though we find no mention there of a work which has certainly been copied in more places than one—viz., "The Folk and their Word-Lore," by Dr. Smythe Palmer.

At first sight all appears to be satisfactory, especially as regards words from Greek and Latin which have been frequently explained and cannot well be explained otherwise. But it comes upon the reader as a shock when he finds a large number of misprints, especially in the spelling of Anglo-Saxon words. And even if the indulgent reader is ready to forgive these, he cannot but be filled with much distrust when he finds that the author does not keep faith with him. For he is assured in the Preface that Dr. Murray's "New English Dictionary" has been carefully consulted, whereas that authority is frequently flouted and despised. The author does not hesitate to prefer the most idle and ridiculous guesses of the worst days of the guessing "etymologists" whenever he sees fit. This is altogether too bad, and one wonders why so much trouble has been taken to discredit what is otherwise a reasonably serviceable book.

The credulity of the author in this respect is amazing, and it becomes necessary to give specimens of his revivals of exploded absurdities.

At p. 188, after giving an account of the word filbert which is tolerably accurate, we are told that "the name filberde is exclusively English and expresses exactly the distinctive characteristic of the nut—the fact, namely, that it just fills the beard," &c. Yet the evidence shows that it is not English at all, but of Norman origin.

At p. 291, in order to account for almanack, the impudent falsehood of Verstegan is revived, that the Anglo-Saxons called a wooden calendar an almonaght—an impossible form containing gh, there being no gh in their alphabet. They never called it anything of the sort.

At p. 426 heaven is derived from the verb to heave, which the veriest beginner in Anglo-Saxon knows to be impossible, and is expressly rejected by Murray.

On p. 45 commodore is "a corruption of the Portuguese capitão mor, or chief captain," but no such absurdity is endorsed by Murray.

At p. 78 we read that "dog does not occur in A.S.," which is contrary to the fact.

At p. 377 Horne Tooke's famous fiction is revived that "truth is the third person singular of the verb to trow," from which it ought to follow that sooth is the third person singular of the verb to sow, which no one can be expected to trow. But not even Horne Tooke had the hardihood to assert that true was "anciently written trew," and was the past participle (!) of trow, as grew is of grow. Unluckily, the verb to trow was a weak verb, and it is safe to say that the past participle of trow always ended in -od or -ed. The past participle of grow is not grew, but grown.

At p. 91 veterinary is derived from velerinus, "a contraction of veheterinus, from veho, to carry," which leaves the suffix -elerinus (or -lerinus) to be accounted for. It would be curious to know how it can be explained. However, Lewis and Short endorse this error.

We are grieved to find such wilful and needless blemishes in a book which is pleasantly written and affords a compilation of much that is both interesting and instructive.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

MAN FRIDAY

THE general unhappiness of mankind has been noted by philosophers. We remember seeing in the shop-window of a phrenologist at the bottom of Fleet Street a picture of Mr. Hall Caine. Beneath it the phrenologist had written words to the effect that Mr. Hall Caine could never be happy. People who read the announcement were, no doubt, agreeably staggered. For ourselves, it left us unastonished. We have kept it in mind because it looked like elemental truth. Of course Mr. Hall Caine, wealthy and famous though he may be, cannot quite lay claim to singularity in the respect indicated. We believe that there are others, and among them, if we made search, we believe it were possible to find Mr. G. K. Chesterton. Mr. Chesterton appears to have been born several years ago, but as yet he would seem to have failed to compass happiness. His connection with Mr. Robinson Crusoe Cadbury, of Daily News Island, is well known, and we shall not expatiate upon it. But for the sake of a simple pleasantry we shall dub Mr. Chesterton Man Friday. He came to Mr. Cadbury from chaos and nowhere in particular at a moment when Mr. Cadbury was most desolate, and he has remained his faithful henchman ever since. Possibly he came to Mr. Cadbury on a Friday, which, when you look closely into it, was a paradoxical thing to do. And, to cut a long story short, he has lately written and published a book called "The Man who was Thursday," thus clearly getting a day ahead of himself as it were. We have read Man Friday's performance with a great deal of interest. The untutored savage in process of attainment to the higher civilisations is usually worth observation. Man Friday began, as Men Fridays might be expected to begin, with a little poetry, dedicated, unless we are mistaken, to his father. There was no harm in this, and we mention it only for the purpose of reminding ourselves that Man Friday had his beginnings. We recollect that the poetry included at least one piece which was quite good. We recollect, too, that it included another piece which bore the marks of Man Friday's fingers all over it. It had something to do with love, and it suggested that on the day when Man Friday's lady gave him "both her hands" "a cart-horse built a nest." Probably it was a quite impersonal effort. Indeed, if we thought that it were otherwise we should say nothing about it. But there it is in cold type, and we find ourselves unable to forget it. "She gave me both her hands," and "a cart-horse built a nest"! It is as though Man Friday should call lustily, "Come and be my Valentine, and we will drink blood together." The cart-horse built a nest somewhere back in the 'eighties. In chapter I. of "The Man who was Thursday," flung to us hot from the press only the other day, we find Man Friday celebrating himself as follows:

"There again," said Syme, irritably, "what is there poetical about being in revolt? You might as well say that it is poetical to be sea-sick. Being sick is a revolt. Both being sick and being rebellious may be the wholesome thing on certain desperate occasions; but I'm hanged if I can see why they are poetical. Revolt in the abstract is—revolting. It's mere vomiting."

It is the same Man Friday, you will note, as the Man Friday with the cart-horse's nest. Time cannot stale nor custom wither him. The unpleasant thought burns in his brain, and he is incapable of holding it down. Print is his outlet; into print we must needs disject ourselves. Now it is easy to argue that the cart-horse business and Man Friday's faith in the literary quality of his bilious attacks should be considered small deer, and allowed to pass like specks on a peach. But we shall venture the opinion that you may judge a writer with great sureness from the spots on him. When we read Man Friday's cart-horse rhymes—though, as we have said, they comprised at least one good poem—we knew, and said in print, that it was impossible for him ever to do much as poet. And when we read the passage above quoted from "The Man who was Thursday," we knew perfectly well that nowhere in the remaining chapters of his book would Man Friday achieve anything of merit. We are not blind to the fact that in "The Man who was Thursday" Man Friday has tried his hardest. It is to his credit that he does not belong to that class of author whose aim in letters it is to give the public precisely what the publishers believe them to desire. As likely as not, if "The Man who was Thursday" had been Man Friday's first attempt at authorship, his publisher would have returned it to him with words of counsel and encouragement. He would have said, "My dear Man Friday, you write with some skill, and you think like the chairman of a debating society; but for the love of heaven don't imagine that unpleasantness and ungainliness are the greatest possible fetches of genius. There is no reason in the world why a natural-born vat-rattler should refrain from endeavouring to express himself fictionally. On the other hand, there is really a difference between high thinking and stertorous bellowing. And when a writer would compel the clouds he would be well advised not to attempt them with a battering-ram." Man Friday, however, is not an entirely new author. He wrote "The Napoleon of Notting Hill," and you may read him in the Daily News and the Christian Globe. Furthermore, he has a reputation as the provoker of a certain kind of giggle among a certain kind of red-tied, hirsute, nut-chewing babblers, and he is the proud possessor of a vogue. So that "The Man who was Thursday" went through, and you can get it at all the libraries. As for the fiction itself—nightmare Man Friday prefers to call it—the least sophisticated of maids and matrons will not be taken in by it. Virtually it is a detective story with plenty of cheap anarchy and the merest suggestion of love thrown in. There is nothing about it, quâ story, which could not have been accomplished by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle or any of the smaller practitioners whose work is called "clever" by the snippet press. The plot is trite and obvious, and might in reasonable hands have furnished forth entertainment over a dozen or so magazine pages. Man Friday, however, has bulged it out into conventional novel length, thereby inviting his readers to bore themselves to death. For the rest, you get bladders with peas in them, fine writing done with a burnt stick and an amount of unwieldy reaching after tremendousness which suggests the elephant raising heaven and earth in an attempt to pull down the stars. We are sorry that we cannot find it compatible with our duty to current letters to advise Man Friday to persevere. "The Man who was Thursday" is neither better nor worse than "The Napoleon of Notting Hill," neither windier, nor sillier, nor less fatuously conceived. Its appeal—if, indeed, it have an appeal—will be only to the "stalwarts" and "intellectuals" who mistake the buffooneries of Mr. George Bernard Shaw for meat and the Medoc of Soho for wine. These people imagine that they have put a girdle round the world of thought and that they are about to inherit the earth. They are a feeble if prancing folk and their day is not long. When they are tired of laughing at themselves and pass, as they inevitably must pass, Man Friday will pass with them. We do not pine for this good time, neither do we desire to delay it. Thou shalt not kill, but needst not strive officiously to keep alive. To the sane mind, Man Friday is no more of a portent than the Tuppenny Tube. There are men and women on this footstool who enjoy the Tuppenny Tube, and who daily and hourly thank God that they have been born into an age when such wonders might be. Man Friday's real vocation in life is the making out of a blatant and paradoxical case for the Tuppenny Tube. And even when he would fain exploit the empyrean he makes a point of doing it in a balloon. So that there is no particular harm in him, and, consequently, precious little good. We desire to note, finally, that Man Friday, as is natural, takes himself for a great man. In a dedicatory dithyramb with which he prefaces "The Man who was Thursday" we find this couplet:

Fools as we were in motly, all jangling and absurd,
When all church bells were silent our cap and bells were heard.

Which is the personal Muse on silver tiptoe.

ALL WE LIKE SHEEP—

MISS MAUD ALLAN, the craze of the hour and the idol of fashion—Miss Maud Allan, successful applicant for the toleration of the clergy, and goldmine to the Palace Theatre shareholders—Miss Maud Allan can afford to turn a deaf ear to the jarring note.

The note, sounded long ago by a journalistic John the Baptist in the phrase "governess-like capers," was quickly drowned in the loud and imposing proclamation of the names and titles of the patrons of Miss Allan's Wednesday matinées. The distinction of the new dancer's art may be taken for granted, it seems, but never the distinction of her audiences. This is rubbed in daily. "In a box we noticed Prince F— of T—, while in the stalls were the Duchess of R—, Lady C— D—, Lord A—, and Mrs. B—."

All this was not Miss Allan's fault. The somewhat gross manipulation of the Allan "boom" is probably due to the genius of an unknown Press agent. But when Miss Allan wrote her opinions of the "Art of Dancing" in the Daily Mail, and expressed her gratitude to London for "opening its arms" to her, she associated herself with her own advertisement. She is not a writer, but a dancer. When she began to address the public, as a public favourite she identified herself with the extraordinary nonsense that has been written about her. And she made an error in judgment when she replied not only for herself, but for Mademoiselle Génée and Signora Tetrzzini.

This response to the toast proposed by public favour made some of us feel uncomfortable. We did not grudge Miss Allan her success—success, by whatever means it is won, is a splendid achievement—but Génée, Tetrzzini! In the words of Whistler, Miss Allan, "Why drag in Velasquez?"

Why drag in Adeline Génée? We did not "open our arms" to her, if by that phrase is meant a private trial malinée to which all the great in the land are invited, and a tremendous pean of praise from every critic in London before any public performance takes place. It took Génée ten years to establish her position among us. Only very recently has this accomplished dancer received her due.

And Tetrzzini? She came to London unknown, and was not advertised at all before that wonderful night when she made her first appearance at Covent Garden in Traviata. But she had achieved a very fair amount of success in Italy, in South America, and, I believe, in Russia. In London, in her middle years, she made in a single night a reputation of which she had never dreamed, but the foundations of that fame had been laid by years of work in opera-houses in more obscure parts of the globe.

So why drag in Tetrzzini, Miss Allan? Her case is not a parallel. Your success with us stands absolutely alone.

How has it come about? Miss Allan tells us that it is because she practises a new art.

But nine years ago there came to London, unheralded, unboomed, unadvertised, a young American girl, Miss Isadora Duncan. She also practised this "new art." She danced Chopin, danced Grieg, danced Monteverde. She also went bare-footed and bare-legged. She had an almost miraculous "elevation," which Miss Allan does not possess. Yet she came to London and left it without attracting notice or provoking controversy.

Miss Duncan did better in Berlin. There they built a theatre for her. This theatre has for some years been crowded night after night with rich German patrons of the arts, each patron with opera-glasses glued to his eyes. . . . Miss Duncan, like Miss Allan, wears no tights.

From no other outward help than the great masters' works have I succeeded in uniting music and the plastic into a form which is not generally understood as dancing, writes Miss Allan. Miss Allan studied music in Berlin, the Berlin where Miss Duncan was uniting music and the plastic nightly, and Miss Allan did not go and see her! Nevertheless, Miss Duncan was Miss Allan's predecessor; and the failure of London to recognise the art of the predecessor makes me question if London's recognition of the art of the follower shows genuine instinct.

All we like sheep go to the Palace Theatre. Before ever Miss Maud Allan had appeared in public we had been assured by the Press (on the strength of an invitation performance before Press and Parliament, painters and peers) that she was, in the beautiful American phrase, "the greatest thing that ever happened." By the art of advertisement were we first drawn to the Palace. But we still go there. Two months have passed. The audiences are as large as ever, and twice as fashionable. Should one not rejoice at the spectacle? Yes, if Miss Maud Allan is a genuine artist, a great dancer. (The word "dancer," by the way, is big enough to use. David "danced" before the Ark.)

But is she? There is a story in the "Arabian Nights" of a man and a carpet. I haven't the book by me, not even in Sir Richard Burton's translation, but the main facts are that the man hypnotised the Great Sophy and the Grand Vizier and all the Court into thinking that he was showing them a carpet. He moved his hands as if he were unrolling it, he described the pattern and the texture, he praised the colour, he sang of its grace and beauty. And soon all the Court were talking of the carpet. Was there ever such colour? What a glorious design! "It is certainly the carpet of the world."

Then a little child was held up to look at it.

"But there is no carpet!" said the child.

That child has not yet been to the Palace Theatre. Perhaps in these days its uncompromising truth would be unacceptable. The hypnotism that Miss Allan exercises would prevail against it.

Some of the adulation given to Miss Allan as a dancer should be transferred to her as a hypnotist. She makes the audience think her wonderful. As it takes two to make a work of art, is not the thought of the audience as important as the skill of the performer?

If one is not easily hypnotised, however, one cannot help noticing the rigidity of the new dancer's body and the immobility of her head. One cannot help criticising the movements of the arms—movements which seem to be made academically rather than as an expression of emotion, as if the dancer were instructing a class in the Delsarte method rather than translating beautiful sound into beautiful form.

This "translating" of music is, anyhow, rather a dangerous business. Would every composer admit that his melody became more expressive when interpreted by the dancer? Sometimes Miss Allan seems to misinterpret or to obscure what she sets out to reveal. This is notably the case in Rubinstein's "Valse Caprice," where Miss Allan hugs the ground like a lapwing precisely where the music suggests that she should leap like the hart.

Miss Allan is a very earnest young lady with a sincere conviction of her mission. She dances like a revivalist preacher, and makes as many converts. It would be stupid not to admire the character which has brought about so great a success. But it is just as stupid to mistake this character, this American "grit" and "bluff" for beautiful art. There is very little art in Miss Allan's performance. She herself admits this when she says that she has never learned to dance. Perhaps this is one of the secrets of her success in England. The English people dearly love a lord. The English lord (and the class he represents) dearly loves the amateur.

GEORGE HORBURY: RECOLLECTIONS

[COMMUNICATED.]

I AM sure that many readers of THE ACADEMY must have seen with regret the recent announcement of the death of Canon Horbury, for so many years High Usher of Lupton. To his old pupils George Horbury will ever remain a precious memory; and many who had not the privilege of coming immediately under his influence feel that they owe him a debt; or, as an old Harrovian has happily expressed it:

Horbury was like a pebble thrown into a pond. His influence was not felt merely in loco, but broadened out in ever widening circles. I was never at Lupton, but Horbury meant a good deal to us at Harrow, and I have heard Giggleswick boys speak of his songs as a rich inheritance.

I think all public schoolmen would echo these words; in his way Horbury was as great a force as Arnold. His songs have been mentioned, and these school songs were not the least of the many forces for good that he wielded so successfully. They have long ceased to be the peculiar property of Lupton; they have established themselves in the affections of every public school in England, and I do not think I exaggerate when I say that these vigorous and stirring poems have done not a little in moulding the character of modern Englishmen. There are many unwholesome and miasmatic influences in the air. No man felt or dreaded these influences more than Horbury; and he set himself to counteract them in every possible manner. His pupils at Lupton were taught both by precept and example, but his songs did their work far from the great school in the Midlands, and many a man who never saw the High Usher face to face would confess his obligations to the author of "Follow Away." I cannot resist quoting the first verse:

I am getting old and grey, and the hills seem far away,
And I cannot hear the horn that once proclaimed the morn,
When we sallied forth upon the chase together.
For the years are gone, alack! when we hastened on the track,
And the huntsman's whip went crack! as a signal to our pack,
Riding in the sunshine and fair weather.
And yet across the ground
I seem to hear a sound—
A sound that comes up floating from the hollow;
And its note is very clear
As it echoes in my ear,
And the words are: Lupton, follow, follow, follow.

CHORUS:

Lupton! follow away:
The darkness lies behind us and before us is the day.
Follow, follow the sun,
The whole world's to be won:
So Lupton follow, follow; follow, follow away!

An old pupil sang this verse to him on his death-bed, and I think perhaps that some at least of the readers of THE ACADEMY will allow that George Horbury died "fortified" in the truest sense with the "rites of the Church"—the Church of a great aspiration.

"Follow Away" was from the first a prime favourite in "Chantry," but Horbury scored an even greater success with "Rocker," in which he sang the praises of the Lupton Football Game:

Once on a time in the books that bore me
I read that in olden days before me
Lupton town had a wonderful game.
It was a game with a noble story:
[Lupton town was then in its glory,
Kings and bishops had brought it fame.]
It was a game that you all must know;
And ROCKER they called it long ago.

CHORUS:

Look out for "brooks," or you're sure to drown,
Look out for "quarries," or else you're down.
That was the way
Rocker to play;
Once on a day
That was the way;
Once on a day

That was the way that they used to play in Lupton town.

Strangers who have been admitted to "Chantry" have confessed that the effect of "Rocker," thundered forth by 600 voices, was a thing not readily to be forgotten. Broad-minded men have told me that they felt as if they had participated in a great act of worship. I remember that the late Bishop of Wareham emphasised this aspect, maintaining that the canticle Benedicite omnia opera justified him in doing so:

We call upon Snows and Frosts (he said) to "bless the Lord"; why should we except from the great Song of Thanksgiving those Games which have done so much to make England and Englishmen what they are?

Another prelate, who is still living, takes, I am glad to think, the same view. He has but lately pointed out that the misfortunes of Russia are in all probability due to the lack of that Katharsis which is provided by the compulsory games at our great public schools. Such, then, was the work that Horbury accomplished by means of his Lupton songs.

Horbury was, above all things, a Christian. Not perhaps a Christian in the narrow and narrowing sense in which the word is used by party men; but in the broad, charitable, all-embracing meaning which has largely superseded the old sectarian interpretation, which can claim in the English Church the sanction of such names as Hobbes and Hoadley and Tillotson, of that "sage Latitudinarianism" which was the glory of the eighteenth century, which Arnold proclaimed so boldly in the reluctant ears of the Tractarians. George Horbury taught us to be Christians chiefly by example; he disliked dogma heartily, and did his best to make us dislike it too. On one occasion I remember that he felt bound to oppose the Vicar of Lupton at a School Board Election. I cannot say that the Vicar was what would be called an extreme man, though I think I have often seen the church door open on weekdays, but he was certainly in favour of definite dogmatic teaching, and Horbury was ready to make any sacrifice of his valuable time if by so doing he could "free the schools"—to use his own words—

From the tortuous scholasticism which in some extraordinary manner has been confused with the simple teaching of the Saviour.

Hence he disliked all creeds, "those human attempts to define the undefinable," as he called them, or, in another and even happier phrase, "fossilised Christianity." He was fond of showing that the real appeal of true Christianity was wholly an ethical one, and I have heard him deprecate a too literal citation of the New Testament even with respect to ethical questions:

We do not require our clergy to go about in the dress of Syrian fishermen of the first century (I have heard him say). Why then should we be required to clothe our thoughts and our faith in garments which are now strange and uncouth, whatever they may have been eighteen hundred years ago?

But Horbury was no iconoclast. He felt the need of preserving the Establishment in all its dignity, and he maintained that, in a sense, the Palace was more important than the Cathedral. A cathedral, he said, might be the home of superstition, of tawdry ecclesiastical millinery, of clericalism in its worst form; but the Bishop's palace, with its broad lawns, with its stately, though Christian, home-life, was a constant witness to the wholesome restraints of the State:

Depend upon it (he would say) the whole atmosphere of such a place is invaluable. Wareham Palace would have brought Francis of Assisi to his senses in six months; and in a year or two you would have seen little Francisculi playing about the lawn.

I think Horbury's chief dread was that the Ritualistic clergy might form an alliance with the Socialistic elements among the working-classes. I shall never forget the disgust with which he put down the Life of one of the most notorious of these clergy:

I had rather have a Red Republic than a Ritualist Republic, he said; and I know that he watched the attempts of the Ritualists to gain over the working-classes with constant dislike and apprehension. He was a sound Liberal, but he was no demagogue, and he pointed out that all the great political reforms of the nineteenth century had been made possible by the very touching faith of the employed in their employers—the great Liberal manufacturers. If this faith should ever be shaken he feared that the worst might happen, and that the industrial supremacy of England might become a thing of the past:

And if this does happen (he said) you will see it brought about by the Romanising party in the Church of England.

I have heard him blame Ministers for their want of statecraft in allowing these industrial questions to arise. He thought they should distract the populace by bringing forward measures of more political interest, and I have heard him demonstrate the usefulness of what he called his "Free and Open Church Bill"—a measure to give the Dissenting bodies a right of user over the old churches and cathedrals of England:

Here (he said) you would have a measure popular with everybody, except the Ritualists, who are, politically, non-existent; a measure framed on the lines both of common sense and Christian charity; a measure for which ample precedent might be found. And while people were discussing such a Bill as this, capital would be left alone to continue its admirable and beneficent work.

He was grieved, I think, at the attitude taken up by the Liberal party as a whole towards the mine-owners of South Africa. "One should never alienate," he used to say, "any sphere of influence."

I must not forget the work that Horbury did in the school chapel. At Lupton the rule has always been for the Head Master to preach in the morning, and for the High Usher to address the boys in the afternoon. Many an old Luptonian on the steaming plains of our great Indian Empire, or amidst the icy fields of "Our Lady of the Snows," recollects that figure standing high above the six hundred boys, that trumpet-toned voice reasoning and pleading with them, those eloquent outbursts against priestcraft and mediævalism and meanness of every sort. At the earnest request of some old friends, George Horbury was prevailed upon to publish his "Lupton Sermons," and I believe that they have been widely read and appreciated. Personally, I shall never forget the wonderful sermon on the Parable of the Talents, and readers of THE ACADEMY who do not possess the book may be grateful for the following excerpt from this most characteristic discourse. The boys, I am sure, realised for the first time the true nature of the sin of the man who hid his one talent.

I daresay (Horbury began) that many of the older amongst you have wondered what this man's sin really was. You may have read your Greek Testament carefully, and then have tried to form in your minds some analogy to the circumstances of the parable—and it would not surprise me if you were to tell me that you had failed. I should not be astonished, I say, if you confess that, for you at least, the question seems unanswerable.

Yes! Unanswerable for you. For you are English boys, the sons of English gentlemen, to whom the atmosphere of casuistry, of concealment, of subtlety, is unknown, by whom such an atmosphere would be rejected with scorn. You come from homes where there are no dark corners that must not be pried into; your friends and your relations are not of those who hide their gifts from the light of day. Some of you, perhaps, have had the privilege of listening to the talk of one or other of the great statesmen who guide the destinies of this vast Empire; you will have learned, I am sure, that in the world of politics there is no vain simulation of modesty, no feigned reluctance to speak of worthy achievement. All of you are members of this great community of which each one of us is so proud, which we think of as the great inspiration and motive force of our lives. Here, you will say, there are no hidden talents, for the note of the English public school—thank God for it!—is openness, frankness, healthy emulation; each endeavouring to use his best for the good of all. In our studies and in our games each desires to excel, to carry off the prize; we strive for a corruptible crown, thinking that this, after all, is the surest discipline for the gaining of the crown that is incorruptible. If a man say that he love God Whom he hath not seen, and love not his brother whom he hath seen! Let your light shine before men. Be sure that we shall never win heaven by despising earth.

Yet that man hid his Talent in a Napkin.

What does the story mean? What message has it for us to-day?

I will tell you.

Some years ago, during our summer holidays, I was on a walking tour in a mountainous district in the North of England. The sky was of the most brilliant blue, the sun poured, as it were, a gospel of gladness on the earth, and towards the close of the day I was entering a peaceful and beautiful valley amongst the hills when three sullen notes of a bell came down the breeze towards me. There was a pause; again the three strokes; and then for the third time this dismal summons struck on my ears. I walked on in the direction of the sound, wondering whence it came and what it signified; and soon I saw before me a great pile of buildings surrounded by a gloomy and lofty wall.

It was a Roman Catholic monastery. The bell was ringing the Angelus, as it is called.

I obtained admittance to this place, and spoke to some of the unhappy monks.

I should astonish you if I mentioned the names of some of the deluded men who had immured themselves in this prison-house. It is sufficient to say that among them were a soldier who had won distinction on the battlefield, an artist, a statesman, and a physician of no mean repute.

Now do you understand?

Ah! a day will come—you know, I think, what that day is called—when these poor men will have to answer the question: "Where is the talent thou wast given to?"

"Where was your sword in the hour of your country's danger?"

"Where was your picture—your consecration of your art to the service of morality and humanity—when the doors of the great exhibition were thrown open?"

"Where was your silver eloquence, your voice of persuasion, when the strife of party was at its fiercest?"

"Where was your God-given skill in healing when one of Royal Blood lay fainting on the bed of dire—it might have been mortal—sickness?"

And the answer?

"I laid it up in a napkin."

In his school work he was wonderful. He was not content to impart the ordinary lesson from the ordinary text-book. He taught the boys to think; he taught them that even their form work was a part of life, and related to life in its broadest sense. I remember a lesson he gave on the contrast between English and French art and literature. He dwelt on the wholesome and restraining influence of English society—of the English social structure—and illustrated this point by reading out to us, first Tennyson's "Fatima" and then a passage from one of the later Idylls. He dwelt with great satisfaction on the circumstance that in England every man, were he a poet or were he a soap-maker, wished to be considered a country gentleman; and he showed how in the arts this feeling made for the repression of all morbid and extravagant tendencies.

In the last few weeks of his life his mind was somewhat clouded. He suffered from a delusion that the boys at Lupton were learning Latin out of the Breviary and French from Villon; while compulsory dominoes had been substituted for Rocker; and these misconceptions caused him great distress.

His last words were:

"Played, Lupton!"

ALADDIN'S LAMP

I FOUND the boy sitting on a door-step in a deserted alley near Covent Garden. He was small and ragged and sufficiently dirty, but when he rubbed the old bicycle-lamp on his sleeve and looked hopefully up the street, my envy overcame my scruples.

"Oh, Aladdin!" I cried, "lend me your lamp!"

"My name is George Wonder," he said, handing me the lamp gravely. I fled through the market with my treasure, and, though it stained my sleeve with old oil, I rubbed it not without hope. At the corner I met the man with the grapes, and he greeted me sadly.

"They are good grapes," he said, looking thoughtfully at his stock; "but when you come to consider how many cats have lost their way in the dark, you must wonder whether it is worth it. Every spring they used to bring them, little cold kittens who had not seen, and we buried them at the root of the vine. Of course, there were too many, but it seemed a pity, you know. Still, they are good grapes."

He offered me a bunch, and when I refused with horror, placed a grape between his lips and bit it. I was not really surprised when I heard a faint mew, and recognised the sad little song of a blind kitten; but I ran wildly from the murderer, looking for a policeman as I went. Dimly I knew that there were no more kittens in the world, and, like Southey I mourned for the universal cathood that had befallen the most civilised of things animate. The policeman was leaning against a crimson pillar-box, and I recognised that, even for a policeman, he was passing melancholy. When I spoke to him his eye avoided mine with a furtive air that ill became the assurance of his uniform, and there was a noticeable spot of mud on one of his boots. "It's the streets like white worms," he said, with a shudder; "of course, we keep them down with our huge feet, but how they must writhe and stretch between the houses when we are not here. They are fat and soft, and they peer into my dreams with white, stupid eyes."

"What would you have?" I said wearily; "of course, we are all civilised nowadays."

He turned his tired eyes up to the kingdom of roof-tops and telephone-wires.

"If I could only live up there, out of reach," he said, "and study astronomy in the quiet places! But I have no tail."

He wandered off on his beat, a melancholy figure of a man; and as I watched him I knew why policemen always walk so heavily. But the lamp was still in my hand, and, as I touched it with my sleeve, a man ran up and clutched my arm. "He's looking for me," he cried, nodding in the direction of the distant policeman; "he's looking for me, and he'll get me sooner or later."

"What have you done?"

"I don't know; I can't understand. I was tired of all this, you know, and I wanted to shuffle the cards ; so I went down to the Embankment to look for sleep in the water. But the sun was out, and the water was covered with the silver tracks of snails, so that I could not do it. No one could drown in shining waters ; it's impossible. Then I got up on to the railway, and walked down the platform and put my head on the line before an engine. The rail was hot and blistered my cheek. I can't understand it after that ; but I got up off the line, and there was the body lying at my feet with a smashed head. I tell you it's impossible. There was no one there but me, and then when the engine had passed there were two of us. How could it be ? Then the people came down from the station calling 'Murder !' and I ran away. And now they will hang me when they catch me, and I'm afraid, because I don't want to die any more." He broke off hoarsely, and as he turned away I could see the mark of a burn on one of his shaking cheeks.

The lamp still lay in my hand, slowly oozing in the spring sunshine, but I began to regard it with horror. There in Covent Garden, where fatalistic costermongers whisper the proud motto of their noble landlord, I had asked the Slave of the Lamp for the imaginative world of my childhood. As I love to recall it, it suggests chiefly Stevenson, flavoured with a dash of "Peter Pan," and a third of one of a certain writer's articles in the Daily News. But this was a nightmare. When a man approached me, who had sandy noises in his mouth and made unknown horrors in the deaf-and-dumb alphabet with his cropped fingers, I ran for my life. And while I ran I noticed that all the people in the streets had faces twisted with fear, and not till I reached the arid wastes by Kingsway did I find solitude in which to pause and reflect.

Of course, the wise reader will long ago have detected my error. Like all grown-up people, I am, perforce, a gatherer of facts. I know what happens if you put nitric acid on copper, I know that it is possible to buy a Golden Treasury for a silver shilling, I know that dry ginger-ale makes barmaids sneeze ; but in the time of life when we really are imaginative we know none of these things, and the world is ours to make as we wish. Striving to avoid the limitations imposed by my adult wisdom, my borrowed imagination could make nothing but horrors, for fear is the only emotion we have not succeeded in training along civilised lines. And so my Utopia became a nightmare.

When I returned to Covent Garden I found the boy still seated on his doorstep, but now at his feet there crouched a grubby and admiring little girl.

"Here is your lamp, Wonder," I said.

He took it and rubbed it with his coat, and immediately assumed the gaiters and riding-breeches of a stable-boy. "Oh, look at Georgie," cried the girl ; "don't 'e look a little nib !"

I nodded my head sadly.

"He does, indeed, Madam," I said, and passed back into the world of the disenchanted.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

THE PASSING OF VENUS

OF the Central Hall at the New Gallery the greater part of the west wall is occupied by a panel of Arras tapestry. It is executed by Messrs. Morris and Company from the last cartoon designed by Sir Edward Burne-Jones, and the title thereof is "The Passing of Venus." I am not here concerned with a defence of that painter's art—an art, by the way, which, to my thinking, ever found its happiest means of expression in tapestry or stained glass ; but whatever our opinion may be as to the result, we can hardly deny to Burne-Jones the virtue of striving continually to express sheer beauty. Our idea of beauty may not coincide with his, for ideals of beauty vary with the individual as well as with the race and the age. We may even condemn his ideal form as anæmic, unhealthy, morbid, or what not, but at the same time we cannot help being conscious of the nature of his quest. And it is because this quest seems to have been abandoned by nearly every other exhibitor that the title of the Burne-Jones tapestry stands as a symbol of this summer's exhibition at the New Gallery.

Beauty, it would appear, has passed from the ambition of the painter, who has joined the philosopher in his hopeless chase after that will-o'-the-wisp Truth. Tardily following in the footsteps of the writer, the painter has jilted Romance for Realism. There would be no need to cast aspersions on the character of his new love did the painter possess her utterly, but since he can at best capture her attention in a single mood to lose it in another, he is in the position of the dog who lost the substance in the attempt to grasp the shadow. Theoretically there may be no such thing as ugliness, as Rodin has declared ; but, admitting this, there remain degrees of beauty and the question why the lesser should be preferred. All men—and all women—are not equal in beauty, nor in any other characteristic or attribute. All aspects of land and sea are not equally beautiful, or, if they be so theoretically, in practice there is a wide difference in their power of affecting the individual spectator. To dictate to the painter where to find his beauty would be folly. He must find it where he can—in the pots and pans of the kitchen, as Chardin, or, as Monticelli, in dreams of gallant assemblies. Chardin chose the way of Realism, Monticelli the way of Romance ; but each one convinces us that he was spurred along his own road by an intense sense of beauty. With Chardin it was a beauty seen, with Monticelli a beauty imagined ; but, different as the results be, the motive was in either case the same.

Now at one time the New Gallery, as successor to the old Grosvenor, was peculiarly the home of beauty imagined, the prevailing ideals being those of the mediæval wing of the pre-Raphaelite following. To-day, apart from the tapestry, only Mr. Southall's "The Sleeping Beauty" and a picture by Mr. Strudwick, that faithful follower of Burne-Jones, remind us that that ideal ever existed. Of another ideal I can hardly find a trace save in Mr. George Spencer Watson's Watteauesque dream of "Diana and Actæon." Elsewhere I only find decoration or realism—and neither of the highest order. Mr. Brangwyn's picture is an exception, and comes nearer to the real picture magic than any other exhibit.

"The Rajah's Birthday," otherwise known as the "elephant picture," is certainly not realism, and it is not exactly romance, for the motive is not so much sheer beauty as pomp and circumstance. At all events, this swirling design of Eastern pageantry does grip the eyes and memory as no other exhibit, and abounds in that vitality which is sadly lacking elsewhere. There is vitality, too, in Mr. Hornel's "Tom-tom Players, Ceylon," with the copper girlish forms hewn, as it were, out of a mosaic of porcelain paint. It is tremendously strong work, it is decorative, and it is real, despite the marked conventions of the painter. But though it is a picture which commands respect, which makes a strong appeal by its colour, the very science of it all seems to chill our admiration, and leaves our pulse unstirred by the indefinable magic. More emotional is Mr. Austen Brown's "Ploughing by the River," perhaps the best of the landscapes. To the captious it may appear "unfinished," but it has something better than the elaboration of unimportant details, a synthetic rendering in quivering greys of the eternal sorrows of eventide. That is its distinction, its power of convincing us that the painter has felt something, and is inwardly impelled to show us the thing seen. So few pictures seem to bear this stamp of inward urgency. They wear the air of things done for occasion, of things "that will do." Mr. and Mrs. Blank desire to see themselves on canvas. The painter must live ; and, though he is not particularly interested in his sitter, he wearily does the best his mood allows—and the result is sent to the New Gallery. It will "do" for the sitter, apparently it "does" for the New Gallery, but what does it do for the painter's reputation ?

Even in these depressed moods of professional routine one portrait-painter is better than another, but the differences between them is hardly worth comment. The one portrait-painter who does seem intensely interested in what is to be painted is a woman, Mrs. Annie L. Swynerton, whose portrait of a dog and his master (158) is a convincing and well-illuminated piece of vigorous realism. The Brittany peasants of Mr. Charles W. Bartlett in the South Room also bear the stamp of vigour and interest, and if beauty is denied them, they have that character which modern realism offers as an effective substitute. But beyond these few pictures, one can recall at best only the "adequate" and the pleasant—"adequate" portraits by Messrs. Lavery, Sargent, and Shannon, pleasant landscapes by Messrs. Mark Fisher, Hughes-Stanton, Adrian Stokes, Montague Smyth, and Moffat Lindner, well enough in their way, but not so remarkable as to add to the painter's reputation. In sculpture there is still less, Mr. Fleming Baxter's vigorous "Quarryman" being the one exhibit of note; but in the applied art there are exhibits of skilled silver-work and well-designed jewellery by Harold Stabler, H. Wilson, Mrs. Hadaway, Lalique, Gaillard, and others. Indeed the handicrafts are so good that it is almost a pity the exhibition was not confined to them.

On one of the series of decorative paintings for Pennsylvania, which Mr. Abbey has been showing to the few who have heard about them at the London University, is a quotation from Plotinus :

Art deals with things for ever incapable of definition, and that belong to Love, Beauty, Joy and Worship, the Shapes, Powers, and Glory of which are for ever building, unbuilding, and rebuilding in each man's soul, and in the soul of the whole world.

We have only to ponder a little on the not remote possibility of defining the things dealt with by the exhibitors this year at the New Gallery in order to recognise the worth of them as works of art.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Confessio Medici. (Macmillan and Co., 3s. 6d.)

IN spite of a pleasant and easy way with him, "Medicus" gives his readers an uncomfortable feeling that, after all, this book is only an advertisement—an advertisement for the medical man as such. Now the ordinary leech does not need any apology. We have long since measured his worthy foot. If any apology is put forth it should be for the whole close trades union, which masters the public, the body medicinable, in a way which must sooner or later come up for revision and restraint. But "Medicus" hardly admits even knowledge of the jealous unionism; he chats of the student and the practitioner with a gentle graciousness, and touches delicately upon burning questions :

We cannot understand, we cannot explain, the anthropoid apes. Still that is no reason why the anthropoid apes should explain us.

That is how he touches waggishly, but without strong conclusion. This very want of conclusion leads him to odd coquetry with opposite conclusions. He has a fine platonic plea that the good healer should himself have needed strong healing and had it. There is a heartfelt description, for instance, of a case for operation. Then, again, he pleads that the practitioner must work "always in the ring fence of materialism," by which he means that the body has to be mentally isolated by the practitioner and treated as a mere automatic corpus. This seems to bring forward and sanction one of the most illogical flaws in our therapeutic methods—the refusal to admit the healing or hurtful effects of mental states, the impatient shrug with which the bare notion is greeted. In one corner of this "Confessio" the author goes seriously astray, and not prettily either. He tells his readers, who will mostly be country surgeons, that the patients will not send for the man who is interested in something beyond his calling—say, in art or history. That is not only nonsense, but very mischievous nonsense. The ordinary practitioner, when you get him away from the epigastrium and the obsonic index, has nothing to talk about even now, except it be the finance of the local tennis club. Here is a writer who actually encourages him to be so blindly concentrated on all the nasty diseases and shortly to be superseded remedies for them, that he is not to know or care what thoughts of beauty walk the earth, nor to recognise their progeny when he meets them. Could anything be worse advice for the practitioner than to have one eye always on his practice? Even in the smoking-room to repress his interests and inquiries and wire them into the asphalt path of daily routine. The medical fraternity are too given this way already. They tuck their minds into some cul-de-sac, some appendix vermiformis, off the main road of their patients' travelling, and from that nasty back-alley look out narrow-mindedly upon the clinical material which rolls by them. The less they scheme, cog, plan, talk, and evolve themselves for practice only, the more they are likely to commend themselves to the helpless and stricken. The more they concentrate and specialise upon the pulsing, pill-taking, germ-breeding, tissuey side of life, the less, in the general opinion of all wholesome persons, will they take a clear, sane, and balanced view, even of that which they affect to study so exclusively.

The History of Ireland to the Coming of Henry II. By ARTHUR UA CLERIGH, M.A., K.C. (London : T. Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.)

REFERENCE to library catalogues shows a dearth of histories of Ireland, and although one or two good short histories have been written in recent years, there is room for further research, of which this work shows evidence of a kind.

But quite half the book is taken up with the mythical and legendary stories found in the Four Masters and other annals which belong more properly to the region of folklore and romance. As such they are very well told, and with an enthusiasm that arrests our interest, though we cannot always follow the author's deductions and surmises. Perhaps the best chapters are those on the ancient tribal system. The account of the invasions of the Northmen seems to us inadequate, and adds nothing to the learned treatise of Halliday on the Scandinavian Kingdom of Dublin. There is a great deal of discursive writing, and a certain lack of order and method in the arrangement. Mr. Arthur Ua Clerigh is a man of wide reading, but the information he has acquired appears insufficiently digested. A good bibliography and an exhaustive index are especially needed. We cannot understand the omission.

The Thoughts of Leonardo da Vinci, as Recorded in his "Notebooks." Arranged and Rendered into English by EDWARD MCCURDY. (Duckworth and Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

THIS comely little volume consists of a series of excerpts from Mr. McCurdy's larger work on the Notebooks of Leonardo da Vinci, which was published in 1906. It may be said to contain, however, the flower and quintessence of Leonardo's writings. Mr. McCurdy has divided his book into three sections, entitled respectively "Life," "Nature," and "Art." The epigrams and aphorisms in these pages help the reader to a clearer understanding of the spiritual outlook of one who, in Mr. McCurdy's own words, "took all knowledge for his province." The universality of Leonardo's interests may possibly account for his limited output as a painter. He was a man of a restless and penetrating intellect, scornfully impatient of the facile conventions which his contemporaries accepted as needs, a hater of shame, and, before all, a lover of truth. He possessed a knowledge of anatomy exceedingly rare at that period. His scientific attainments were considerable, and we find him demonstrating with convincing force the impossibility of a universal Deluge. At times he attained to a perfect lucidity of expression, and there are thoughts in this volume which bear upon them the imprint of immortality :

In life beauty perishes, not in art.

Helen, when she looked in her mirror and saw the withered wrinkles which old age had made in her face, wept, and wondered to herself why ever she had twice been carried away.

In art we may be said to be grandsons unto God.

In collecting these scattered utterances of the great painter of the Renaissance Mr. McCurdy has rendered a service to pure literature which it would be hard to over-praise.

FICTION

Three Miss Graemes. By S. MACNAUGHTAN. (John Murray, 6s.)

"THREE Miss Graemes" is a novel which the reviewer would like to praise unreservedly. The human interest is well sustained, and the narrative abounds in witty dialogue and in a quiet humour which none but the dullest reader can fail to find irresistible. The book is marred, however, by the last chapter, the sentimentalism of which is as unexpected as it is inartistic. Miss Macnaughtan has a style which is at once racy and individual, but she declines towards the close of this volume into a weak imitation of Dickens in his weaker moods.

Helen, Agatha, and Jean Graeme are the daughters of a retired army officer of secluded habits, who dies suddenly, heavily involved in gaming debts. From their inaccessible island retreat in the Atlantic Ocean they emerge into the new and untried world of London. They have but little acquaintance with the manners and customs of polite society, and a series of amusing if embarrassing episodes reveals to them how little adapted they are for success in this new sphere. Their aunt, a certain Lady Parfield—whose facility in obtaining introductions for her friends into "the best circles" is her dominant characteristic—robs them with a clear conscience. Matters indeed drift from bad to worse. Agatha's health breaks down, and she is forced to fly, in company with Jean, to Biarritz, in order to avoid the possibility of a serious illness. In the meanwhile certain harmless indiscretions on the part of Helen place the elder Miss Graeme in a painfully false position. Thrown on the world, she is forced to accept a situation as typist at a salary of one pound a week. Deliverance, however, awaits the two elder girls in the shape of two elderly but eminently respectable lovers, and the book closes to the music of marriage bells. Helen is once more reinstated in her island home, and Agatha is left looking forward to the title which is bound to come her way before very long. What of Jean, however? Miss Macnaughtan is discreetly silent. Perhaps she realises that as Jean appears so infrequently during the course of the narrative the reader is not likely to exhibit much curiosity as to her future.

Miss Macnaughtan is at her best in the delineation of odd types of character. She has an eye for the mildly grotesque, and in the garrulous Mrs. Jocelyn and the melancholy Batt she has succeeded in creating two unforgettable types. It is when she soars to the heroic that she is least convincing. Perfection personified—we have it in Major Hanbury—is apt to be a little dull.

The Ring. By BERYL TUCKER. (Heinemann, 6s.)

THIS is, we believe, Miss Tucker's first story. From any high standpoint of criticism it must be pronounced a failure, but in so judging it we pay its author the compliment of anticipating work of real excellence from her pen. She has, manifestly, imagination, to say nothing of qualities of sincerity and enthusiasm, less readily discernible through quite a variety of verbiage, but in point of plot, incident, characterisation, and (specially) style she sorely needs a touchstone. The plot is woven round a theme that will spoil it at once for a good many people. A man, capable in several ways of greatness, has been in his wild youth seduced by a married woman of irredeemable viciousness whom (after her divorce) he marries, only eventually to murder her in a frenzy of despair at the ruin to which she has brought him. He escapes detection and starts afresh; but years afterwards, when he has pulled himself high and dry from the slough of remorse and humiliation, he falls passionately in love with a young girl whom he discovers to be his stepdaughter, and weds her, after a tremendous struggle with himself, without telling her the truth. This, though a perfectly legitimate, is, we think, a somewhat unnecessarily dreadful theme. It might at least have been softened by making the two women sisters instead of mother and daughter. In this way, while preserving the horror of blood-guiltiness and the restless terror of the main situation, Miss Tucker would have avoided the charge of excessive ugliness that will be freely, however unfairly, levelled against her. Unfairly, we repeat, for the book is really entirely modest from cover to cover. Yet in some inexplicable way Miss Tucker has discerned a "sweetness" in the tie between this particular mother and daughter which is completely and emphatically absent. These things apart, the tragedy, to attain distinction, let alone greatness, should have been handled as broadly and simply as possible; think a moment of the story of Œdipus. Here the author goes wildly astray. For she has introduced a highly ingenious, semi-psychic, pseudo-scientific system of machinery whereby the body of the murdered woman is transmuted into a blood-red jewel, near which hovers ever the tortured soul to exert a baleful influence over the protagonists. The thing is not badly done; it is "exciting;" it may attract attention and win popularity. But it mars the homogeneity of the book, destroying all semblance of reality in a story in many ways essentially modern and realistic. It is all of a piece that in incident and characterisation alike Miss Tucker has attempted too much. She drags in two mysterious servants, apparently as melodramatic agents, only to let them drop out again. She does not know how doctors talk. Her man of science could never have taken a degree. She emphasises her heroine's French extraction by the really horrible device of making her speak invariably of one woman as "ma cousine" and of another as "ma tante." Her hero has to talk in one place as no man of his character could ever talk to a girl he loved, and in another like an over-wrought schoolboy. From all of which it follows that a style capable at least of adequacy carries hither and thither a quite unnecessary flavour of society-journalese. But when all is said the book has force and sap. One can read it, uncritically, with real pleasure. Langton Quin is a man, Yvonne a living and loving and charming girl. We hope that Miss Tucker will take the trouble to search diligently in all directions for touchstones.

The Missioner. By E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM. (Ward, Lock and Co., 6s. net.)

MR. OPPENHEIM's new work appears to us to be pitched in a quieter key than most of its predecessors; but, though we look almost in vain for the melodramatic incidents which he has led us to expect in his work, we are glad to be able to congratulate him on having written a very pleasant novel. The central character of "The Missioner" is a young man who has inherited a large amount of "dirty" money from a money-lender uncle, and consequently regards himself as holding it in trust for the human race, and endeavours to improve the conditions of the English poor. It must be counted not least of Mr. Oppenheim's successes that he has endowed this young man with practically all the virtues, and yet has avoided making him an insufferable prig. In the course of his Mission Mr. Macheson arrives at the model village of Thorpe, which is owned by Wilhelmina, a proud but very human girl, with an embarrassing but innocent past. Naturally enough, she does not regard the young man's proposed interference with her tenants with favour, and Mr. Oppenheim makes it appear equally natural that, in frustrating his spiritual campaign, Wilhelmina should fall very much in love with the Missioner. Of course, therefore the past straightens itself out, and the book ends with the conventional marriage. But it is a clever and by no means conventional book.

The Cottage on the Fells. By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE. (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

RECALLING the fine qualities of simplicity and imagination that were present in "The Blue Lagoon," and also, in a minor degree, in "The Crimson Azaleas," we must confess to being bitterly disappointed with Mr. Stacpoole's new novel. "The Cottage on the Fells" is a six-shilling shocker, a detective-story liberally adorned with murders and mysteries; but the murders fail to thrill us, and the mysteries only give us a headache. Mr. Stacpoole's plot is so improbable and so complex that the mind of the reader is more concerned with the wearisome throb of the author's machinery than with the story itself. Perhaps, if Mr. Stacpoole's previous work had not led us to expect better things from him than this, we should feel inclined to congratulate him on going to Gaboriau for the model of his detective rather than to the more artificial creation of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. But we hope that, after this excursion into a field where to succeed is to fail, Mr. Stacpoole will be willing to return to that region of romance in which we hope and expect that he will do great things.

Paradise Court. By J. S. FLETCHER. (Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

THIS is a not unentertaining story of the type which, we believe, is popularly associated with travelling on English railways on Sundays. In other words it is, as the publishers inform us on the cover, "a thrilling romance of love, mystery, and adventure," and as the love is wisely subordinated to the mystery and adventure, and as the book is not deficient in such thrilling properties as bombs, chloroform, hypnotism, motor-cars, and Russian spies, it should be duly successful. The heroine is a foreign governess of exalted birth, the hero is a brave and extremely foolish Englishman, capable of misquoting Matthew Arnold most vilely while under the influence of anæsthetics. The book is quite exciting, and ends happily.

Leroux. By the Hon. Mrs. WALTER R. D. FORBES. (Greening, 6s.)

WE have had more than enough of the so-called "historical novel," in which a feeble and utterly pointless love-story often makes a brave show owing to the fact that the hero receives a flesh wound on some famous battlefield or is honoured with the personal friendship of some well-known historical character of the time, dragged in for the purpose. Many a tame and insipid climax has gained a certain reflected glory from the fact that Nelson, his empty sleeve across his chest, is present at the marriage ceremony of a happy pair of lovers, or that Napoleon, in a characteristic attitude, has grunted a gruff benediction over them. "Leroux" does not belong to this band of imposters; it is a historical novel in the best sense of the word. The author's knowledge of the history of the period is sound and accurate, and though Napoleon Barras, and other men of the day, play a prominent part in her pages, the chief interest of the tale is centred on Leroux and Gabrielle de la Fontreille. The story is based on the fact that during the Reign of Terror a soldier of the Republic might claim a prisoner as his bride, thus transforming her from a condemned aristocrat to the wife of a good "citizen."

A Gentleman of London. By MORICE GERARD. (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.)

THIS story is dedicated to the Lord Mayor of London. The hero, son of an alderman, becomes himself first Common Councillor, then Sheriff and Alderman, and finally Lord Mayor in 1815. Small wonder, then, if in style and substance the book reminds us somewhat of a City banquet, prosaic and rather heavy, but good of its kind. We have a succession of sufficiently exciting adventures served in methodical courses, described in admirable, if rather pompous English, ending with cheerful conventionality with a wedding in the church of St. Helen, Bishopsgate. The villain—and a rare villain he is—is a Frenchman, which is just as it should be in so eminently British a romance. That the bride is also a "foreigner" is tempered by the fact that she possesses property in Devonshire.

Crossriggs. By MARY and JANE FINDLATER. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

THE little village of Crossriggs, near Edinburgh, doubtless exists under another name, for the story of the place and its inhabitants impresses the reader as a reminiscence rather than as a product of the imagination. A very kindly humour is shown in the description of the little circle, holding itself proudly aloof from "town," where their "surgeons and bootmakers" lived, though it was but an hour's journey by train. It was the custom, we are told, on alighting at the station after a day in Edinburgh, to "draw a deep breath" and remark with satisfaction: "How good the air tastes after being in town!" The book is full of such little intimate touches, which make it difficult to believe that Old Hopeful and his daughter, the Maitlands, the Admiral, and Miss Bessie Reid did not really live and move in the quiet village which seems such a pleasant memory to the two authors. Most of us have come across an "Old Hopeful," with his quixotic temperament, his hopeless foolishness, and his inextinguishable optimism, at some period of our existence, and can appreciate the gentle satire with which he is portrayed. Those who would know him and his daughter Alex better need not be daunted by the unusual length of the book; they will find it well worth the trouble of reading.

A Gilded Serpent. By DICK DONOVAN. (Ward, Lock and Co., 6s.)

ACCORDING to the sub-title, this is the "Story of a Dark Deed," and the experienced reader of fiction will read no further description of the book than this. It is melodrama of the oldest-fashioned and most conventional type. The characters are puppets, and the incidents, to say the least of them, uncommon. There is a murder of which the hero is suspected, but which is really committed by some one not "in the story" at all. There is a villain who tries to marry the heroine and suborn false evidence against the hero; and lastly, there is a detective with "emissitious" eyes. Further description is surely needless. Those readers who like this kind of work may follow for themselves the trials of the heroine whose pulchritude (another of Mr. Donovan's choice words) is unexceptionable; and it would be a shame to forestall their enjoyment. For ourselves we must protest that we prefer something more closely related to naturalness both in style and plot.

The Finances of Sir John Kynnersley. By A. C. FOX-DAVIES. (John Lane, 6s.)

MR. FOX-DAVIES is a most ingenious man, and it is to be hoped for the sake of the security of property that he will be content to confine his ingenuity to the manufacture of fiction, and not himself practise the brilliant frauds and swindles which he ascribes to his hero. For brilliant in conception as the various frauds are which help to consolidate the finances of Sir John Kynnersley, the skill with which he covers his trail and renders detection impossible is even more brilliant.

The main idea of the book is revenge. Sir John has been "let in" to the extent of his whole fortune by an Israelitish financier—Moses Ikesteyn; and he determines to get his own back with interest added. This he succeeds in doing in various ways, each more galling than the last. And not only does he manage to hurt the Jew in pocket, but he also adds insult to the injury by making his victim supremely ridiculous. In the end, Ikesteyn, stung beyond all endurance, is bold enough to prosecute Sir John with fraud, but the latter has been so careful of every detail that not a single one of the half-dozen charges can be brought home to him, and his counsel secures him a triumphant acquittal. Altogether, Sir John collects about £600,000, and retires into an honest private life, with the girl of his choice, whose story forms the last and most exciting chapter in the book.

The most noticeable point in the book is, perhaps, the skill with which Mr. Fox-Davies succeeds in keeping the readers' sympathy for his disreputable hero. It is not that Sir John is especially fascinating; he is, when all is said and done, a very ordinary character—clever, resourceful, and determined. But, in spite of his scoundrelism and dishonesty, he remains a "gentleman," to use a banal word for want of a better, and the reader forgives his dishonesty, at times even is inclined to hold him justified.

If for no other reason, the book should win success for its sheer audacity. It should also stamp Mr. Fox-Davies as a writer of clear imagination, and no little skill both in devising a plot and in its execution.

The Hand on the Strings. By RALPH RODD. (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)

FOR the first half of this book Mr. Rodd dabbles in mystery upon mystery. Two murders are committed for no apparent reason except mere vulgar revenge, and the reader wonders why such an important personage as the Earl of Diss, Minister for Foreign Affairs, is dragged into the story. And then, suddenly, the mystery reveals itself, and instead of being simply a murder story of the "Hansom Cab" order, the tale becomes Ruritania, and the highest of high politics prove to be its motive. Mr. Rodd is very skilful in the arranging and development of his plot. Surprise follows surprise, and disappointment succeeds disappointment, for his hero. "The Hand on the Strings" is the hand of a Dr. Smith, in reality Adolph Schmidt, Republican and Revolutionary of Neustria—a Ruritania State in Central Europe. His object is to prevent the accession of the son of the late King to the Neustrian throne, and his weapons are a mysterious poison, and a still more mysterious drug which makes men reveal their most secret thoughts. Such weapons should be absolutely irresistible, and the game should unquestionably be in his hands; but, unfortunately for himself and his political ideals, he has a heart, and his heart is wholly devoted to the heroine. Consequently he does not get rid of the hero as he should, and in return is checkmated. This action on the part of a callous political schemer is perhaps a little improbable, but Mr. Rodd allows but little time for reflection concerning probabilities or improbabilities, but carries the reader along with him at a breathless speed, and, what is much more, holds him interested right up to the last. "The Hand on the Strings" is one of the best books of its kind that we have read for some considerable time.

An Actor's Love Story. By ALICE M. DIEHL. (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)

In spite of the title, the actor does not appear until quite late in the book, and with his appearance the charm of the story dwindles. The opening chapters are certainly the best, and the description of the young girl fresh from her convent, and full of somewhat hysterical love for her nuns and the convent life, is very well done. But after that Mrs. Diehl fails. She has succeeded in gaining our sympathy for her heroine, and then brings on the scene Julian Strong, the fascinating actor-manager. There have been many pictures of actors in modern fiction, some fairly natural, others theatrical and unreal in the extreme. But of all the actors whom we have met in novels Julian Strong is, we think, the most "grease-painty" hero of them all. Mrs. Diehl is careful to tell us of his wonderful charm and power, but in spite of her insistence he remains a flashy sort of scoundrel, who has nothing in his character to attract such a refined nature as the heroine. None the less he does attract her, and she marries him secretly, only to find that he is already married. Had there been any reason for pitying the fascinating Julian, we might have had some pity for his victim; as it is, she develops from the hysterical school miss, whose obvious sincerity is a strong plea in her favour, into a shallow sentimentalist, whose untimely end leaves us unaffected, even uninterested.

The Lady in the Car. By WILLIAM LE QUEUX. (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.)

MR. LE QUEUX has been hailed by more than one literary reviewer as the Master of Sensation and Mystery. If such a title be deserved, more than usual may be expected from a novel with Mr. Le Queux's name on the title-page. In the present case it is to be feared that such expectations will be disappointed, for the incidents which are grouped together under the title of "The Lady in the Car," and in which the chief character is a certain bogus prince, are of very ordinary merit either from the sensational or the mysterious standpoint. Viewed as single short stories in any of the more popular sixpenny monthly magazines, any one of the chapters would serve to while away part of a tedious railway journey, but reprinted in book form they are on a different plane and challenge more serious criticism, and it must be admitted that this challenge is not justified. That Mr. Le Queux can do much better than these stories he has proved again and again, and it is a pity that he should choose to reproduce in a lasting form such ephemeral work.

The central idea of the stories is the career of a certain ex-public school man, who poses as a foreign Prince, and with the aid of quite a number of confederates commits various frauds and robberies. The lady of the title is generally the dupe of the Prince, although in one or two cases it is a case of diamond cut diamond. In the end the Prince, the Parson, the Chauffeur, and the rest of the gang are safely hidden somewhere that the author knows, but the police do not, and there (we fancy) the public will be quite content to let them rest.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE RESEARCH DEFENCE SOCIETY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I do not know whether Lord Cromer's appeal to the public for support of the Research Defence Society will meet with response. If it does, I doubt whether it will be from those who have considered most carefully the subject of vivisection. In this day the exact sciences are conceded an almost autocratic right to control those who are incompetent to answer the expert, but the question may one day arise whether intellect, armoured by scholastic training, shall always dominate the gentler feelings that lie fundamental in our humanity. It is, indeed, not unlike that question, long ago answered, when brute force, privilege of pedigree, and material possessions claimed an inalienable right to control the simple and poor. And many, though they have not knowledge enough to distinguish between the rival claims of the men of science and the anti-vivisectionists, both of which classes are honest, yet neither altogether scrupulous in their arguments, yet hold to their aboriginal feelings; they remain suspicious of the physiologists' privileges and unassailable secrets. Nor will such be comforted by any cant praise of the physiologists' devotion to suffering humanity, nor by protests against the absurdity of questioning a scientist's goodness of heart. They may perhaps admit that all Lord Cromer's statements are correct and yet not feel justified in supporting the Research Defence Society.

Sir, I am no anti-vivisectionist in the ordinary sense of the word. Indeed, I grant that the physiologists have a good case. I admit even that the anti-vivisectionists spoil their own by inaccuracies and exaggerations. Nevertheless I sympathise most deeply with that man who doubts because, better even than he, I recognise the intolerable danger of allowing the physiologist the free hand that practically is accorded to him. It is no good shutting our eyes to the fact that quite unutterable barbarities have been again and again perpetrated in the cause of science, nor that there is little to prevent in our own country the horrors that are tacitly sanctioned in some Continental laboratories. Moreover, I see no reason for regarding men of science as more humane or less liable to deceive themselves as to the suffering they inflict than any other class of men. The habitual witnessing of suffering inevitably and always blunts the finer feelings unless, as in medical practitioners and nurses, suffering is studied solely for the sake of relieving it. It is not now questioned that in slave-owners, in jailers, in asylum proprietors, at one time, the daily witnessing of injustice and torture blunted the feelings and distorted the judgment of the interested parties. Yet the aboriginal feelings of the people in each of these cases have overcome privilege and wealth and authority. Slavery is abolished, prisons are reformed, asylums are inspected, and the people no longer suspect either prison or asylum administration because the law has adjudicated between a native passion for justice and the doom of the criminal and the lunatic.

And some of us, in our anxiety to ensure that no unnecessary suffering be inflicted upon the creatures we love, do demand that the law shall look after the dogs in the same spirit as it has protected the jailbird and the madman from the callousness of authority. We want thorough inspection—as thorough and frequent and disinterested at least as that forced upon the private asylums. If we get this and a more stringent application of the existing law, many at least will cease to vilify the physiological laboratory as entirely as they have forgotten their hatred of the asylum doctor. Granted a more conscientious use of anæsthetics, the prohibition of curare, the discontinuing of experiments upon living animals for teaching students, and all need for the Research Defence Society will vanish.

But, Sir, there is another aspect to this appeal of Lord Cromer's. The medical profession are fully convinced that the less the public mind is concerned with medical matters, the better for its health. The converse is equally true of purely sanitary affairs, though perhaps no hard-and-fast line can be drawn between. The study of disease plants fear in the heart, while the pursuit of health makes it fearless. The making of the public familiar with disorders of the flesh, which misfortune the daily Press and such appeals as this now before us are unwittingly enforcing, finds some sort of antidote, no doubt, in Christian Science and other new religions; anything may be welcomed that will counteract the public fear. Some may deny the increase of this fear. But physicians know of it only too well. And that society conversation nowadays finds in the appendix vermiformis, premature burial, and Christian Science its chief pièces de résistance entirely justifies the claim that the fear of disease and the pursuit of quack remedies are undermining the decency and sanity of life. It is for such reason that I think Lord Cromer's appeal ought never to have been made. The physiologists have always proved their ability to look after themselves, and should be too proud to seek public support, especially when they realise full well the hunger of the public after unwholesome food. For God's sake let us reform vivisection if only that we may forget it.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "SPITCHCOCK"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I think that Dr. Skeat is probably right in connecting the word "spitchcock" with the words spil (M.H.G. spiz, G. spiess) and cock (G. kocken). The derivation from spil and cock were suggested in Annandale's "Concise Dictionary," 1892. Dr. Skeat offers evidence in support of this suggestion. There is one point on which I should like to make an observation. Dr. Skeat tells us that the z in the M.H.G. form spiz was pronounced with the ts sound. It had really a kind of s sound, as is proved by the modern German pronunciation spiess. Dr. Skeat seems to have confused M.H.G. spiz = G. spiess, "a spit, broach," with M.H.G. spiz (spilz, spitze), "a point, tip," from O.H.G. spizzi, where the double z was pronounced as double ts. For the twofold pronunciation of z in the older German language see Wright's "Historical German Grammar," 1907, p. 13.

IRONY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The amusing letter of "Australis" demands an answer not less amusing and ironic, but of this not every reviewer is capable. I will, however, venture to reply to that part of it which I presume to be not "facetious."

The sayings of ha'penny papers are not, of course, of the least consequence to your readers; nor does it greatly matter that Mr. W. Watson, in his Fortnightly poem (itself no lovely thing), should protest against the verse of various other poets—probably including Mr. Doughty. It is to be wished, indeed, that Mr. Doughty would himself take up the question of the technique of recent poetry, for his ideas of it are apparently as singular as his verse.

Full admission was made in these columns of the general defect of his style, but I would gently deprecate—as "facetious"—the suggestion that it is a fustian style. The obvious fault of it is due, firstly, to the author's scrupulous and severe economy of words. It is plain that, had he chosen to write "Adam Cast Forth" in the fluent style of the "Idylls of the King," the book would have been thrice its present length—and the "joke" thrice tedious to "Australis;" while the "Dawn in Britain" would be in eighteen books instead of a mere six.

Secondly, it is caused by his habit of sacrificing almost every grace to the austere virtue of strength; hence the licence, the barbarous lines, and strange inversions. Yet the verse (and this is the point) is not obscure. The expression may be harsh, but the meaning is never doubtful, as is the case with fustian poets, living and dead. There is too much rather than too little labour. It would be grotesque to compare it with Milton's verse, to Milton's disadvantage; it would be uncritical to condemn it because it is not Miltonic, or because it is unfamiliar. Mr. Swinburne was unfamiliar once, and Blake, and Coleridge.

But, recognising the faults of this strange poetry—which to imitate were deplorable, nay, surely impossible—it is wise to consider whether Mr. Doughty's book bears evidence of the imagination and qualities of form proper to poetry. If "Australis" cannot discover for himself evidence of imagination and a sense of form, cannot discover the simple beauty of poetry in many pages, with but the slight distraction of eccentric punctuation, if he is so discouraged by the faults of some verses as to be deaf to the music of the whole poem, then I am afraid there is no more to be said. His conception of verse is fundamentally different from that of

"THE STIBBERT ART COLLECTION"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—At length it is reported that the King of Italy has signed a decree recognising the legal existence of the Stibbert Museum, and the English Colony in Florence may congratulate itself that the campaign, so ably conducted by the Florence Herald, has reached its first plunge successfully.

Alluding to the letter of "Experience" in THE ACADEMY of the 18th inst., the editor of the Florence Herald says:

With regard to the ground of the British Government's renunciation of the bequest, it is known to have been declined because the majority of the trustees were not of British nationality.

In any case the next few months will show us whether the Italian authorities are trying to do their duty in this matter.

It is satisfactory to learn that the Florence Municipality were much impressed by the indignation of the English Colony, and awakened the authorities at Rome to a sense of it.

A friend informs me that he foresees much still remains to be done before the Museum is in full working order, and that it will require constant supervision. Like "Experience," he prognosticates that a charge for admission will be made on the visitors, which seems preposterous after a fund has been bequeathed large enough for all purposes, especially as it is not intended to pay the curator more than 3,000 to 4,000 lire, or equal to £120 or £160 per annum.

"We must," says my friend, "watch matters closely."

Experience—I mean my own experience—teaches me that "watched Italian kettles never boil." At any rate they boil very slowly.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—By referring in your authoritative journal to the question of "The Stibbert Museum of Florence," and in publishing Mr. William Mercer's most appropriate remarks thereon, I believe that you have rendered a real service to the dignity and reputation of Florence in contributing to the cessation of what is certainly a reproach at least, if not a scandal—namely, the dilatoriness on the part of the local authorities in the opening of this Museum to visitors. The local authorities have certainly been most slothful in the matter, to say the least, and they may now perhaps, and it is to be hoped they will, bestir themselves and properly appreciate Mr. Stibbert's munificent bequest. It is to be desired that this most interesting and instructive Museum may soon be open to the public, as Mr. Stibbert wished and intended it to be.

From what you have published it is quite evident that you and Mr. Mercer are actuated by the most praiseworthy sentiments; you are strenuously and properly striving to urge the easy-going local authorities to appreciate rightly Mr. Stibbert's generosity—his genuine tribute to this city, so renowned for and jealous of its admiration, esteem, and respect for arts, science and literature. May your laudable efforts be crowned with all and speedy success, and may every right-minded, intellectual Englishman recognise that by your action in "stirring up" and "hurrying on" the procrastinating local authorities you have been instrumental not only in opening the doors of one more interesting, instructive, and attractive museum in Florence, but also that you have thereby contributed greatly to the perpetuation of the justly-deserved fane acquired in Florence by a most worthy and exemplary Englishman.

At the time of Mr. Stibbert's death I likewise (as an English resident in Florence) paid a feeble tribute to his respected memory, copy of which I hand you for publication, if you think that it will gratify your readers to peruse it.

EDWARD ST. JOHN FAIRMAN.

IN MEMORY OF

CAVALIERE FREDERICK STIBBERT,

An esteemed, estimable, and widely-respected English resident of Florence.

Died Florence, 10th April, 1906.

CONSOLATION

To his affectionate Sister.

The death of Brother is a loss severe,
When he to loving Sister was most dear.
An aged stranger saw you by his bier,
And at your grief he shed a heartfelt tear.
He recognised the pain you had to bear;
With Sister's love no love can, certes, compare.

And when the service in the church was o'er,
And men along the aisle his coffin bore,
You left your seat in pew with hurried pace,
And took beside his bier the nearest place,
It truly seemed that coffin bore away
All that for which on earth you wished to stay!
You seemed to cling to him with anguish sore
And say: "Dear Brother, stay one moment more!"
Your Brother's death your heart with sorrow tore;
You scarcely had the strength to reach the door!

Your tearful eye, your falt'ring step, indeed,
Showed signs of how a Sister's heart can bleed
When Brother borne away, in solemn speed,
And in the hearse is laid with gentlest heed.
In your sad face each feeling heart could read
That but God's consolation was your need.

Aye! God His consolation certes will bear
To you, and He will bless your Brother dear.
He is not dead, but lives in heav'nly sphere!
Have faith in God, His Righteous Will revere.
Your Brother's love to you is ever near;
Fond mourning Sister dry your burning tear,
Your well-lov'd Brother, though he is not here,
Will pray for you in peace for e'er and e'er.
With ceaseless faith in God, O dry your tear;
Pure faith and hope in God your heart will cheer.
Your Brother fond on earth much good has done,
And has for such eternal peace, certes, won!
O may it soothe you in your anguish sore
To know that he is mourned by hundreds more.
His name will live for e'er in hearts refin'd,
For he possess'd a noble, cultured . . . mind.

EDWARD ST. JOHN FAIRMAN.

PURE ENGLISH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Machen refers me to the A.V. of the New Testament in justification of his use of "that" for "who" in the sentence quoted last week, on the principle, it would seem, that a man suffering from "mental measles" might with advantage be advised to read the works of Mr. Hall Caine.

I suggest to Mr. Machen a reference to "The King's English," (pp. 75 to 84), where the proper and improper uses of "who" and "that" are clearly set forth.

Mr. Machen must pardon me if I express regret that in his able article on "Modernism" (p. 689) he permitted himself to use such a phrase as "we proffer all the comforts of home, and everything as nice as mother makes it."

H. P. H.

March 22.

[Mr. Machen writes: I think "H. P. H." must have misunderstood me; I had no idea of charging him with "mental measles." I do not even know the nature of the disease in question. My impression was that "H. P. H.'s" acquaintance with the great standard and example of pure English speech was, perhaps, rather limited. I cannot help feeling that his equation of Mr. Hall Caine's works with the New Testament is surprising. I wish he would justify it at length. I am sorry to say that I have not read "The King's English," but I should be glad to hear more about it. I do not merely pardon "H. P. H." for his expression of regret; I am delighted with his friendly interest in my phrases. Again, I wish he would develop his views at length, not only for my information, but for the edification of all the readers of THE ACADEMY.]

FALSTAFF

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—That the fat knight in Henry IV. at first appeared under the title of "Sir John Oldcastle" is known to everybody; but whence did the playwright obtain the character that he grafted on to that blameless, if misguided, Wicliffite?

In 1562 Gerard Legh brought out the first edition of his "Accedens of Armory," and this is the opening paragraph of the section which treats of Rebatings:

The first: he beareth azure, a point dexter parted or. This may be for too much boasting of himself in man-hood and martiall actes. Such one was Sir William Pounder, much bragging of his knighthood, who seemed to be a Lyon by his countenance, but in his heart was no lesse than a fearful hare. If a man be of deede doughtie, yet is it not gentlemanlike to boaste thereof.

Is anything further than this known of Sir William? Did he ever exist, or is he, like the whole of the Theory and Practice of Rebatings, a figment of the imagination of Gerard Legh, or of some earlier heraldic writer from whom Legh copied?

It looks almost as though Shakespeare had been reading through all the eight Rebatings before he wrote his play, as thus:

2. A point champine; whoso killeth his prisoner with his own hand.
3. A point plain; that telleth lyes to his sovereigns.
4. A point in point; too slouthful in Warres.
5. Two gussets. But in rebating there is but one gusset, that is to say, if he be too letcherous the gusset is on the right side; if he commit idolatrie to Bacchus, then the gusset is on the left side. If both, then both.
6. A gore sinister; he that is a coward to his enemy.
7. A delf. To him that revoketh his owne challenge, as commonly we call it, eating his word, this is given in token thereof.
8. An escocheon reversed. He that discourteously entreateth eyther Maid or Widdow against her will, or flieth from his sovereign's banner, he shall bear his armes on this wise.

Nearly all these characteristics may be found buckled within Falstaff's capacious belt.

THE SHAKESPEARE MEMORIAL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—With reference to the proposed Shakespeare Memorial, it appears desirable to make the following statement.

At a meeting of the General Committee, nominated at the numerous and influential public meetings held at the Mansion House in 1905, a Special Committee was appointed to consider what form a memorial to Shakespeare should take, and various proposals, including that of a National Theatre, were carefully considered. This Special Committee included Lord Avebury, Lord Reay, the late Sir Henry Irving, the late Sir R. C. Jebb, Sir E. Maunde Thompson, Mr. F. R. Benson, Mr. S. H. Butcher, Mr. W. L. Courtney, Mr. Walter Crane, Dr. Furnivall, Mr. G. L. Gomme, Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins, Mr. Sidney Lee, Mr. Bram Stoker, Dr. A. W. Ward.

The recommendation made by this Committee was that "the form of the memorial be that of an architectural monument, including a statue."

The recommendation of the Committee was submitted to the General Committee, and unanimously adopted. An Executive Committee was then formed to act upon it.

A competition for the design is now being arranged for the erection of a monument by 1916, the tercentenary of Shakespeare's death.

Whatever sum may be subscribed over and above the amount required for the monument will be applied to purposes best calculated to promote the dramatic presentation and literary appreciation of Shakespeare's work.

We need not reproduce here all the arguments for or against a national theatre as the primary form of the proposed Shakespeare Memorial. These arguments were fully considered by the Special Committee.

It may, however, be convenient to state that those who were responsible for the decision arrived at were largely influenced by the fact that, although the matter had been under discussion for many years, no workable scheme for a theatre national in the ordinary sense of the term had been accepted by those able to appreciate the difficulties of the problem.

The late Sir Henry Irving estimated that a capital of £1,000,000 would be necessary.

The proposal for a national theatre appeared to be fraught with so many elements of controversy that the originators of the Shakespeare Memorial Movement who had set first among their aims a permanent memorial to serve as the token of a world-wide homage to Shakespeare came to the unanimous decision that the memorial should be an architectural and symbolical monument.

At the same time, in the Special Committee's report, the idea of a Shakespeare Theatre, "for the furtherance of dramatic art and literature," was singled out from the various proposals for future consideration as a possible subsidiary project, if the Shakespeare Memorial Fund permitted.

The functions, therefore, of the Executive Committee are, in the first place, to foster the movement for placing on record in the most suitable and perfect form, by means of the arts of Sculpture and Architecture, the fact that the people of this age are at one in their desire to pay homage to Shakespeare, and to attest the world's debt to his genius.

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer AND PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PRELIMINARY ANNOUNCEMENT.

DEAR SIR—A Club is in process of formation in London to be called

THE IMPERIAL COLONIAL CLUB AND OVERSEAS UNION with premises in Piccadilly, facing the Green Park, and near the Ritz Hotel.

The First Membership of the Club will be limited to 1,500 habitual Members, of whom 650 may be Ladies, and 1,000 Overseas Members, of whom 300 may be Ladies.

The Subscription to the Club will be 5 guineas a year and 5 guineas Entrance Fee, but in the case of the first * 400 International Members elected and the first 250 Overseas Members this Entrance Fee will be waived. There will also be elected, as Members of the Club, 300 Founders or Life Members at a fee of 10 guineas each.*

The Objects of the Club shall be—

- 1.—The Extension of Good Feeling and a Cordial Understanding between Great Britain and her Colonies, and between London, as the capital of the Empire, and the English-speaking Peoples Overseas.
- 2.—The Entertaining of all persons from the Colonies, and Members of other English-speaking Peoples Overseas who are in England on any Political Mission, connected either with the affairs of the Colonies, or the Commercial Reciprocations of the World.
- 3.—The Reception of all Foreign Ambassadors, Ministers, Delegates, and Rulers who may be in London on Missions affecting the Colonies, or connected with the Maintenance of the Friendly Reciprocity of Nations.
- 4.—It is suggested that a reception shall be held once a year in the interest of the Colonies (on a date to be fixed) ; and at the half-year from this date to hold at the Club an Organised Meeting of Discussion, to which Delegates of the Peace Congress (or other Congresses) then in London, Members of the Press, and others shall be invited, the subject of which shall be the Consideration of Inter-Colonial Commerce and the Progress of Nations.

For the Use of Members there will be provided handsome Reception Rooms, Dining Rooms, Billiard Rooms, Smoking Lounge, Writing Rooms, and Reference Library, Tea Rooms, Dressing Rooms, and the usual Club accommodation, and 50 Bedrooms.

The Form of the Club will be Proprietary, and no liability of any kind whatsoever will attach to Members beyond the payment of their subscriptions, nor to the President or Vice-Presidents.

Application for Membership should be made (supplying two social references) to the Organising Secretary of the Imperial Colonial Club, 3, Bolton Street, Piccadilly, London, W., from whom forms of nomination can be obtained.

* These lists are now closed.

LIFE AND LETTERS

WE have received several letters from correspondents applauding the views of Mr. St. John expressed in last week's ACADEMY on the dancing of Miss Maud Allan. We have also received a letter from the manager of the Palace Theatre. It would have been very easy for us to print this letter and make mincemeat of it in an editorial note. Without being unduly puffed up with our own conceit, we flatter ourselves that we are more than able to hold our own with the manager of a music-hall who is rash enough to attempt to teach us our business in the matter of literary allusions, style, and grammar. But we desire to "play the game," and as our position has been all through this matter one of absolute disinterestedness, we shall not give way to temptation. We have accordingly suppressed all the letters which we have received on this subject with equal impartiality. Our position remains exactly as it was before. We have not seen Miss Maud Allan's dancing, and we are therefore unable to pronounce an authoritative opinion thereon. As far as THE ACADEMY is concerned the matter is now at an end.

It is a truism that irony is a dangerous weapon to make use of. Only a week or two ago we received a letter from a correspondent who had made the mistake of attributing an ironical intention to a very appreciative and a perfectly sincere and serious review of a book by Mr. Doughty. This week we have received a letter which we are unable to print because its main subject is concerned with the dancing of Miss Maud Allan at the "Palace," and we have already explained our reasons for not giving publicity to letters on that subject. Our esteemed correspondent, after making flattering allusions to Mr. Machen's "brilliant pleadings for the Catholic faith," goes on to say:

And why, after Mr. Machen's articles to you, ask us to read about the Protestant gentleman to whom you devote nearly two pages in this week's issue?

We had imagined that the article referred to—"George Horbury: Recollections"—with its delightful parodies of certain doggerel school songs would not have imposed upon the credulity of any one of average intellect. It now becomes necessary for us to explain to our correspondent that the article in question was a skit, and in our opinion a particularly brilliant one, on the sort of nonsense that has been written about certain "great schoolmasters." It looks as if we should be obliged in future, when making use of the noble and powerful weapon of irony, to adopt the method of the late lamented Mr. Artemus Ward and to append a footnote, "N.B.—This is sarcasm."

The other day William Blake's spectacles were sold for £6. Not long ago as many of his wonderful visions might have been purchased on paper for that sum. The "Canterbury Pilgrims" was actually sold in 1853 for not much more, and that is in tempera upon canvas, a work of enormous toil and patience. We wonder what the owner of the spectacles will see through those wonder-optics—no more explanations of the prophetic books, we hope. We suggest that they should be lent in turn to the Trustees of the National Gallery. In spite of Romney, Lawrence, Chantrey, and Flaxman, and now notably of Sir William Richmond, it is useless to hope, as long as the Trustees of the Chantrey Bequest have needy acquaintances, with no points of resemblance to Blake but the lack of a market, that they will be brought to realise that he was a great man who worked and nearly starved in England. His works are likely to remain a monument of the blindness, nepotism, and uselessness of art officials. It would be much better if the Chantrey Bequest were purged of any duties of selection based on merit, and its funds frankly devoted to a most laudable object—the needs of contemporary artists. The majority of its purchases might be re-sold for the benefit of the fund, to the great advantage of the public galleries, where they now take up valuable space and do much to render the English school of painting ridiculous.

We are glad to see that Mr. Fisher Unwin has issued a new edition of "Annie Besant: an Autobiography." It is not that the book is a literary masterpiece—the style is easy enough, with a tendency to slipshod—but its moral uses are invaluable. Mrs. Besant tells the story of how she found out Christianity, how, much against her own inclinations and feelings, and so forth, she was compelled to become a militant atheist, how she battled year after year in behalf of secularism, and how she met Madame Blavatsky, and was received into the fold of Theosophy. And we cannot help thinking of the familiar adage about straining at gnats and swallowing camels—nay, dromedaries, mastodons, pteradactyls, ichthyosauri. It is really difficult to follow many of Mrs. Besant's mental processes. She tells us that she was an earnest Churchwoman in her younger days, and yet the severe illness of her child was to her a demonstration that there could be no God. Dixit insignius in corde suo:

The presence of pain and evil in a world made by a good God; the pain falling on the innocent, as on my seven months' old babe . . . all these, while I still believed, drove me desperate. . . . All the hitherto dormant and unsuspected strength of my nature rose up in rebellion.

It is all very curious; it seems to show that Mrs. Besant was never a Christian in any true sense at all, but rather a sentimentalist who was for a time attracted by the Church, something of a curate-worshipper, and an authority on the "Black Letter Saints." But, however inadequate her instruction, however cloudy her devotion, it is singular to think that any human being could arrive at the age of twenty-four and be surprised by the discovery that there are such things as Pain and Sorrow in the world. Twenty-four is not a very advanced age, but most of us have had to make up our minds at fourteen that the day's work includes a good many uncomfortable things. At fourteen and twenty-four we shake our heads, like a dog who has just had a thrashing, and conclude, if we are sensible, that we do not understand all things; later, if we are wise, we often see that the thrashing had a meaning, that the Universe is a Process—and sometimes a very unpleasant process. And after all, if one thinks of it, the writing of a book is often a very unpleasant process, and it is only when the last line is written that one is able to recognise that horrible breakdown in chapter I. as a blessing in disguise. But the eyes of Mrs. Besant seem to have been firmly closed to such considerations as these; and so, with the help of her child's pains, and a "Harmony" of the Gospels, she decided that the Christian Religion was a malevolent imposture.

And the last words of her preface to this new edition of her life-story are :

When, in future days, a world rejoicing in a universal religion shall count over the great souls who laid thereof the foundations, not the least of those master-builders will be revered as H. P. Blavatsky.

It is true, indeed, that the whirligig of time brings in his revenges ; but, perhaps, one would find it difficult to adduce so savage a revenge as this. The woman of twenty-four could not believe in the Christ, and the woman of sixty-seven believes in the partner of M. and Mme. Coulomb. It is horrible—but it is sad, too. This is not the place to give a history of "Theosophy," to catalogue the detected tricks, the unclean intrigues, the unsavoury histories that have contributed to make a title that was once honourable disgraceful—Böhme was once known as "the German Theosopher"—but, again and again, how one wishes that poor Mrs. Besant could have listened to Dr. Pusey. She could not suffer the Gospels, she abhorred the Christ, she despised the saints, she spat upon the faith, she did her utmost to destroy the sense of the Eternal in the hearts of men—and she bows before the message—"Judge's plan is right : follow him and stick"—the message that was supposed to come from "Master." And despising the company of the saints, she has made herself the companion of persons who are unlikely to become recipients of the order of merit. Mrs. Besant is now the head of the Theosophical Society by virtue of "Master's" instructions. One would laugh at it all ; at the catalogue of follies, and cheats, and infantile trickeries and lies, if one did not remember that there are many in the world who are not over-wise, that a noble fish can sometimes be caught with the most trumpery bait. So, instead of laughing, it seems better to say :

Fratres, sobrii estote et vigilate : quia adversarius vester diabolus tamquam leo rugiens circuit quærens quem devoret : cui resistite fortes in fide.

Admirers of "Don Quixote" who do not read the quarterly statements of the Palestine Exploration Fund may be interested to learn the apparent origin of the episode in the judgment given by Sancho Panza. It will be remembered that when two old peasants were brought before that shrewd person, in a matter of the non-payment of a debt, the debtor, before swearing upon the cross that he had already repaid the money, handed his staff to the creditor to hold for him while he took the oath. When he had taken it, and the creditor had handed back the staff, and was disposed to accept the debtor's oath, Sancho Panza ordered the staff to be broken open. Out fell the money of the debt. It should scarcely be necessary to point out that the debtor adopted the ruse of concealing the money in the staff and handing it to his creditor, in order to avoid verbal perjury.

"R. A. S. M." points out in the Palestine Exploration Society's interesting little pamphlet that the trick repeated by Cervantes was played by an earlier debtor at the Dome of the Chain hard by the "Mosque of Omar," and was the cause of the chain's withdrawal into heaven. Before the use of the chain had been abused by the craft of man, it had hung suspended from heaven within reach from the ground, and had served to test the truth of evidence. If the witness spoke the truth he could grasp it, if he were forswearing himself it rose above his reach. "R. A. S. M." questions whether the story of the staff was borrowed by Cervantes, or whether its recital is a mere coincidence. It is surely quite evidently the adaptation of a story fairly familiar to Cervantes's contemporaries.

It would be interesting to know upon what grounds of conscience or other principle Mr. Clement Shorter figured in the "Rita" litigation as a witness for the defence. The Red Letter is, no doubt, a journal of the very highest consequence in the circles which "take it in ;" but that it should have the smallest interest for Mr. Clement Shorter is incredible. Consequently, it does not seem probable that he volunteered his services in the matter. Was he subpoenaed, or did he appear as expert witness lured on to skittles, as it were, for a fee ? In any case the sooner Mr. Shorter and all persons of his kidney are brought to due knowledge of the fact that the Harmsworthian species of editor may not tinker and tamper with the writings of even moderate artists, the better will it be for them and Mr. Shorter. We should have imagined that Mr. Shorter was the kind of editor who would "boil with indignation" at the bare thought of any person blueing out either the essential or the inessential parts of a novel without the author's consent. We take it that he can learn at his own hearth that the editing of poetry is wicked—unless, of course, by consent. And it is even so with prose of the set fictional order. Therefore his appearance against "Rita" appears to us unnatural.

The writer "R. A. S. M." also tells very well an admirable story of the modern Fellahin at Abū Shūsheh. A gun belonging to a local intendant, a "Mr." Murad—why he should be caricatured by that incongruous appellation we do not quite know—was stolen by one of certain twelve men, but by which there was no evidence to show. The local Sheikhs therefore decided that the whole twelve should proceed together on a certain day to the tomb of a deceased wely (when will explorers discover some uniform and reasonable system of transliteration?), and take an oath of compurgation on his tomb. This wely is wont to detect culprits by means of his own. The morning of the appointed day was passed in deep consultation among the twelve. Since the wely's severity in matters of morals was well known, and since the thief was possibly of the twelve, and might take the oath, it would be no wonder if the wely struck him dead. If he did, the Government would be sure to hear of it, and would believe, or pretend to believe, that he had been killed by the eleven, and would consequently leave the whole village no peace for years. The twelve therefore decided not to risk the wely's judgment, but to subscribe together and purchase a new gun for Mr. Murad. How wise, just, and economical, and "what a lesson to us all !" It has been said before, "Agree with thine adversary quickly whiles thou art in the way with him ;" and a great Judge, recently deceased, is said to have given this advice to a young admirer, "Suffer anything rather than have dealings with the Law." Wits may argue that the advice was given after Lord Brampton had retired from practice ; but there is also the more serious explanation, that as death approaches, the soul, as it becomes detached, sees more clearly into human affairs.

The omens for a satisfactory settlement of the education question are distinctly favourable, and victory for the Church is within sight. Everything now depends on a firm stand being made by those people who are referred to by the enemy both within and without the Church as "extreme" men. It is extreme men who ultimately win all the battles. They don't often get the credit for it, but that does not hurt them, and being the only people who are absolutely sure of what they want, and mean to get, not for themselves but for the general good, they can afford to be magnanimous when the battle is won. The type of Churchman who is represented by the abject Spectator, which is for ever bleating about "moderate men of all parties," does not count one way or another in a controversy of this kind. Whether he knows it or not, he will ultimately be found doing exactly what the extreme men intend him to do. The Spectator from its permanent position on the fence may continue to exhibit alarm at the "dangerous" behaviour of those who really believe and mean what they say, but nobody will be influenced by it, and at the end of it all, when it steps in, as it surely will do, and claims the settlement of the controversy as a triumph for itself and the aforesaid "moderate men of all parties," those of us who, in THE ACADEMY, the Saturday Review, the Church Times, and a few other organs, have done all the real work, will be able to smile and say nothing.

Last week Dr. Ludwig Wüllner gave a recital at the Bechstein Hall. He is not yet known in London. The number of empty seats bore silent witness to the melancholy slowness with which Londoners are wont to recognise the presence of a great artist. Wüllner stands alone and supreme as a "liedersänger," like Genée among dancers, like Duse among actresses, like Paderewski among pianists. He has a fine voice, but that alone would not give him his position; many singers are better endowed. His voice becomes a perfect instrument of interpretation, and his interpretative power is amazing. To hear Wüllner sing songs of Schubert and Schumann and Strauss is to hear them for the first time. They live again in all their perfect beauty. Their appeal is irresistible. Nor is it one mood, one shade of beauty, over which he is master; every mood and every shade of beauty are under his complete control. His range of expression is infinite. All the world's sadness seemed to be expressed in Schubert's Totenfeier Heimweh, all man's spirit of brave rebellion seemed to pass into the Prometheus, and all joy into the Frühlingsnacht. Nor is his mastery less sure over the lighter moods—in the humorous songs of Hugo Wolff with which the programme ended. But as many singers are able to express these, and no one can express like Wüllner the deeper and more solemn moods, we were a little disappointed at the large number of the lighter which prevailed. But his singing of Strauss's "Cäcilie" as an encore did much to alleviate this. In spite of the smallness of the attendance, those who were wise enough to be present were immensely enthusiastic, as who could fail to be? We hope that his next recital will be less of a reproach to those in London who care for music. To have missed hearing Wüllner is to have missed something rare and beautiful.

A SONG OF DEVON

Were I offered a city with streets of gold
 Ringing with music from dawn of day,
 Whose winds were laden with stories old
 Of lovers who linger and priests who pray,
 I would not listen nor change—not I—
 For the sun and the scent of this Devon lane,
 And the song of the brook as it wanders by
 Is music enough for a wearied brain.

Do you tell me of islands whose skies are deep
 Behind a lattice of steadfast stars,
 Where forests of crimson coral sleep
 And white foam murmurs on hidden bars?
 I will show you the moor and its sunny dells
 Crowded with foxgloves, shoulder-high;
 Hedges brimming with honey-bells,
 Garths of wild hyacinths, blue as the sky.

O, strong and loud is the rain on the leaves—
 ('Tis distant cavalry racketing past!)
 O, fine and clean are the windy cleaves—
 (Fairy cavalry, galloping fast!)

Three thrushes are whistling, deep in the wood,
 For the earth smells sweet as a thousand flowers;
 The banks are snowy with hawthorn-wood,
 And Summer and life and love are ours.

Shade in the valley, light on the hills,
 But at even, the sun through a porch of green
 Flames by the clustered tree-trunks, fills
 Each swift cascade with a rainbow sheen;
 Who would exchange for a Southern strand
 This grey old bridge, or this winding lane?
 Then sing for the dear, brave Devon Land
 Whose children must ever return again!

WILFRID L. RANDELL.

REVIEWS

ST. JEROME

The Life of St. Jerome. In Six Books. Translated from the original Spanish of FRAY JOSÉ DE SIGUENZA, 1595, Monk of the Royal Monastery of San Lorenzo, Madrid, by MARIANA MONTEIRO. (Sands and Co., 12s. 6d. net.)

THIS is not a book of scientific history, and the translation is somewhat ponderous; but, for all that, it contains much information of a curious and interesting kind. No doubt the Most Catholic King, Philip II., regarded the author, a Jeronimite monk whom he lodged in the Escorial, as a walking lexicon of theology and ecclesiastical history. Indeed, as a Life of the great Doctor of the Church, written at the end of the sixteenth century, this large volume, divided into its six Books, is a marvel of painstaking labour in compilation.

The book on the origin of the Cardinalate in the Roman Church is amusing as well as illuminating in the style of the period. Fra José traces the office indirectly through the Seventy Elders of the Synagogue to Moses himself, and supports the theory by such exalted authorities as Popes Innocent III. and Sixtus V. At any rate, the inscription found in the church of Arezzo points to the fact that in the reign of Pope St. Damasus the title of Cardinal was in use, being given to those who exercised authority delegated at least from the Supreme Pontiff to act as his representatives. Fra José seems to prefer violent comparison even when more pointed similarity lies to his hand, for he compares the broad-brimmed, elongated hat worn by members of the Sacred College to "the wand or caduceus of Mercury, messenger between gods and men." We cannot help wondering whether he did not really mean the petasus. He claims more appropriately that the scarlet colour is symbolic of the wearer's duty to support the Apostolic See even to the shedding of their blood. In the time of the Emperor Frederick II. the scarlet may have had a grim practical significance, as indeed also during the latter part of the pontificate of Urban VI., the friend of St. Catherine of Siena; for there is considerable historical authority for believing that Urban caused several of his own Cardinals to be slowly put to death while he recited his breviary in the gardens of his palace, on account of their supposed intrigues with the French Anti-Pope. In view of the present spirit of Biblical criticism, which threatens to become feverish, it is well to recall the placid words of this Spanish son of St. Jerome:

To those who love the truth and are obedient to the Holy Church of Rome, the determination of the Council of Trent is sufficient, for it bids us receive the Sacred Books in St. Jerome's Vulgate Version as authentic, nothing being found in them but what is in harmony with the Christian religion and the doctrine taught by Holy Church, which she carries written not alone on parchments and paper, but engraven on the living tables of her heart by the very finger of God, which is his Holy Spirit.

The familiar legend of St. Jerome and the lion is naively and picturesquely told, reminding us of the pictures in the Church of San Giorgio degli Schiavoni at Venice. Carpaccio's subject was, of course, dictated by the fact that St. Jerome was born near Aquileia and translated the Scriptures into Sclavonic. Fra José tells us finally that he holds the story of the lion to be matter of fact, howbeit he relates it in a somewhat childish fashion.

The controversy between St. Augustine and St. Jerome takes up a whole book, and reminds us a little of the Manning-Newman episode in nineteenth-century ecclesiastical history, though we can hardly imagine the decisive and practical Archbishop of Westminster writing the following words to the more learned Oratorian priest:

Hence once more I beseech you with all simplicity and freedom to correct me, where you may see I need it, because, although according to the dignity of the titles, which are already received in the Church, the bishopric may be higher than the priesthood, nevertheless Augustine is less than Jerome; but, when corrected by an inferior, he should not then be despised.

On the other hand it is difficult to imagine Cardinal

Newman using the violent and acrid expressions of St. Jerome, though against St. Augustine he was in his milder mood. The Doctors of the Church were pre-eminently frank at the opening of the fifth century.

It is almost inevitable that misprints should occur in a volume of nearly eight hundred pages, but they are not numerous or of importance. A more serious blot is the omission of any index, for no volume of this nature and length should be published without one. We hope, now that Miss Monteiro has given us this translation from the Spanish of the sixteenth century, a task which she is thoroughly qualified to perform, that some one will give us a Life of St. Jerome written in accordance with the methods of modern scholarship for twentieth-century students. Such a Life would be particularly appropriate to an English scholar, since an eminent English historian, Abbot Gasquet, has recently been placed at the head of the Papal Commission for the revision of the text of the Vulgate. This is a compliment which Bible-loving Englishmen should specially appreciate. It is also noticeable that vernacular versions of the Scriptures made in the light of later research have generally tended to approach nearer to St. Jerome's stupendous work rather than to differ from it more widely.

SPAIN

The Soul of Spain. By HAVELOCK ELLIS. (Constable, 7s. 6d. net.)

In Spain. By JOHN LOMAS. (A. and C. Black, 6s. net.)

SPAIN is a country which the ordinary tourist either leaves unvisited altogether or neglects until he has completed the usual tour, a tour that may take him beyond the limits of Europe. Mr. Ellis speaks of Spain as an "unfamiliar country," and the reason for this unfamiliarity is probably to be found in the fact that, to quote the preface, Spain is not an easy land to comprehend. . . . And, taken as a whole, is by no means a land for those who attach primary importance to comfort and facile enjoyment.

Yet Spain is always associated in the mind with romance, not only by its suggestion of fierce passion and fond adventures, but also for its history, its past enterprise, and for the spell of fear conjured up by the memory of the Inquisition. Mr. Ellis, however, is eager to destroy the popular conception of the cruelty of that historic Court, and is at some pains to show that :

The belief that the methods of torture used by the Spanish Inquisition were exceptionally cruel in their character or their degree . . . is due to sensational writers who have played on the credulity of their readers.

That our views have been disturbed by this means there can be little doubt, and we are also very apt to forget in reading these accounts of "sensational writers" that at the time when these methods were being practised by the Inquisition, torture was commonly applied also in the secular courts, and was accepted as a natural and inevitable part of many judicial proceedings. But Mr. Ellis is not chiefly concerned in this book of his with the destruction of preconceived ideas so much as with putting before his readers a clear if somewhat idealised conception of the people of Spain. It is because Mr. Ellis deals with his subject so much from this inner side that we would recommend all who are interested in the subject to read at the same time Mr. Lomas's book "In Spain." These two works form an admirable contrast. The one, "The Soul of Spain," being essentially a literary conception concerned with the life, the thought, the feeling of the nation ; the other, "In Spain," giving us a description of the towns, the villages, the architecture, the topography, and what are known in the guide-books as "features of interest." Briefly, one treats of the animate interest, the other of the inanimate. Of Mr. Lomas's book we need only say here that it is a reconstructed and enlarged edition of his "Sketches in Spain," a work published in 1884, and now out of print. The present edition is copiously illustrated with many beautiful reproductions from original photographs, and the letterpress, if not altogether engrossing when read as a study of the country, is admirably descriptive of the places treated, and should serve to awaken interest in Spain as a land eminently worth visiting.

The work of Mr. Ellis deserves somewhat closer examination. His writing always calls for attention, and his matter, in the present instance, is of a kind that certainly merits recognition, inasmuch as it embodies a definite expression of feeling. Moreover, Mr. Ellis has committed himself to certain criticisms and statements of opinion which stamp his work as one of original observation and thought. As an example of these pronouncements we may quote a passage from the introductory chapter—a passage dealing with the effects of civilisation :

A nation that is alive (says Mr. Ellis) must needs borrow from other nations. The process is vital and altogether beneficial so long as the borrowed elements are duly subordinated to the development of the national genius. A nation that in its anxiety to reach the level of other more prosperous peoples moulds itself servilely in their ways, and lets go the hold of its own traditions, condemns itself to hopeless mediocrity.

This is a statement that embodies a truth, and is one that may well be remembered in the study of modern nations.

We must, however, find some fault with Mr. Ellis for the carelessness of his writing, in which there are at times lapses even from grammatical accuracy, and in the matter of style we think he might, for instance, have polished such a passage as the following :

It is so usual for writers on Spanish women to dwell on the eminence they have attained as queens and saints, that it seemed as well to point out that the great personal qualities of the women of this race have been very far from confining them to success in merely the more honoured avocations of the throne and the convent, or the more modern platform, but have also enabled them to inspire respect and admiration even in those walks of life which are counted least honourable. . . .

Space does not permit us to notice in detail the many sides of Spanish life which Mr. Ellis treats so sympathetically, but we would note the chapters on "The Spanish People," "The Women of Spain," and "Ramon Lull at Palma" as being especially full of interest.

INTELLIGENT TRAVEL

The Marches of Hindustan. By DAVID FRASER. (Blackwood, 21s. net.)

THIS is a delightful "record of a journey"—of most intelligent travel. Mr. Fraser tells us that he travelled through Central Asia with the express object of gaining some understanding of the physical and economic conditions obtaining in regions strategically adjacent to India. He has been very successful, and has produced for our reading a clear outline of the economic and strategical situation on the marches of Hindustan. The tale of his travel is told with an admirable sense of proportion. There is an absence of wearisome detail, and Mr. Fraser shows a wise discretion in his choice of anecdotes, which he tells with a restrained sense of humour. It may be fairly said that among the 516 pages that the book contains there is not one dull page.

The photographs are all interesting, some very pretty ; but there is nothing prettier in the book than the dedication :

To British officials abroad, from whom, wherever encountered, the author invariably received assistance, courtesy, and hospitality.

All of us can in some way share the thrill of pleasure with which this graceful tribute will be read in many far-off posts.

Mr. Fraser left Calcutta for Darjeeling in January, 1906. Thence he travelled into Thibet, taking advantage of the opportunity offered by the return of the Tashi Lama from India. With him Mr. Fraser entered Shigatse, and he tells the tale of the State entry and reception with a vivid sense of humour. The national life in Thibet is brought near to us, and a favourable impression is conveyed of the Lama class from a moral point of view. Writing of the Tashi Lama, he says (p. 44) :

The Lama himself has clean living clearly written on his face, and the traditions of the Gumpa (monastery) and its many dependencies are all against indulgence. It is easy enough to hide licentiousness, but it is impossible to hide the nature of the soil wherein it might flourish.

But the Lama system spells paralysis for Thibet. More than a third of the adult male population is lost to the country. They are celibates and produce nothing, and there is lost in supporting them the labour of the rest of the community, which ought to be directed to other fields, notably to stock-raising, for which there is a great possible future.

Mr. Fraser insists on the influence which Thibet must always have on Buddhist India, and more particularly on Bhutan, Nepal, and Sikhim, and regrets that Lord Lansdowne vetoed in 1904 the proposal of the Indian Government to establish a representative at Lhasa.

Having returned from Thibet, our traveller :

Came to the conclusion that it would be impossible ever to rest content with knowing what, after all, is but a comparatively unimportant section of the Indian frontier (p. 83).

And so he undertook the long journey of which he has written. His road lay through North-east Cashmir into Chinese Turkestan, thence to Russian Turkestan, and so into Persia. Simla had to be visited to get necessary passports, and there, having equipped himself afresh, he took the road, riding and walking, but chiefly on foot. The Valley of the Sutlej evokes some beautifully descriptive writing (p. 85-86), worth picking up to read without context.

At Nagar a sportsman's paradise is found—a bear before breakfast, woodcock, pheasant, or chuckor during the day, a basketful of trout before dinner—and so into Ladakh, crossing some terrific passes and some lovely scenes. Ladakh is described as a paradise for women. Polyandry obtains, and a most amusing chapter is devoted to the institution (chap. x.). Divorce is simple :

Divorced parties are free to marry again—the man indefinitely, the woman up to nine times, after which propriety “enjoins widowhood” (p. 110).

Mr. Fraser found it a little difficult to get into Russian Turkestan, and a telegram had to be sent to the Ambassador at St. Petersburg. But once in the country, every courtesy and much hospitality was shown him, and he found among Russian officials very outspoken critics of their own bureaucracy. Very soon after crossing the border were found three Russian farms, worked entirely without native aid—presenting a great contrast to what English settlers can do in Asia :

Russian occupation with a vengeance ; and it is the fact that Russia is able to transplant her pure blood into her central Asian possessions with every assurance that it will flourish that gives her position in these regions a security and permanency which never could be achieved by military occupation alone (p. 301).

And later on in the book (p. 359-362) an interesting comparison is drawn between the attitude of Englishmen and of Russians towards their Asiatic fellow-citizens :

The keynote of our rule in India is justice, while that of Russia in Central Asia might be termed tolerance.

But Mr. Fraser records his view of the result of each attitude :

That the Russians are far more acceptable personally to the natives of Turkestan than are the British to the natives of India I have no hesitation in saying.

And this opinion is given after living seven “fascinating years” in India. The great unproductiveness of Russian Turkestan is demonstrated. There are 11,000 square miles of arable land, but 700,000 square miles of absolutely irreclaimable desert, with perhaps 40,000 square miles of poor pasturage :

The civilisations that extended back for over two thousand years got practically all out of Central Asia that was possible without scientific knowledge.

And scientific knowledge will not help very much in irrigating Turkestan. But modern science has been productive of much activity in another field. Turkestan is connected with Russia by two lines of railway—one from Orenburg to Tashkent and Chernievo, one from Krasnovodsk, on the Caspian, to the same point. Mr. Fraser upholds that these railways are military rather than commercial—for the economic conditions of Turkestan do not excuse their construction. A branch line connects Merv with Kushk, on the Afghan frontier, and it is said that it is in contemplation to construct a branch from Samarcand to Termes, while a river service is organised to the same point from Charjui on the Amu Daria. Although the construction of these railways is much criticised, and although about one-fifth of their carrying power is absorbed by water and fuel, a vast army could be placed on the frontiers of Afghanistan in a comparatively short time—for Mr. Fraser considers that twenty-four to thirty trains could arrive daily.

Turkestan has been a battlefield from all time, and great names are connected with the struggles that have there taken place—Alexander the Great, Genghis Khan, Tamerlane, and Nadir Shah. Let us hope that the arising democratic spirit in Russia will curb the ambitions of the bureaucracy and prevent Turkestan being the stepping-off point for another great struggle—the invasion of India. At Tashkent Mr. Fraser saw the Governor-General of Turkestan, who did not encourage his lingering on the way. From there to Askabad, on the Persian frontier, to which point the passport committed him, the rédacteur of the Times of India was sped on his way.

And so we visit Persia with the author. A road has been constructed to Meshed, and is in course of construction to Teheran, subsidised by Russia. We pass through the comparatively fertile province of Khorasan to Meshed. Here is a mosque over the remains of one of the Imams, and where, too, lie the bones of Haroon-ul-Rashid. It is surrounded by a wall six to seven miles round, and here is sanctuary (bast) for criminals of all kinds, and a sanctuary where all necessities are obtainable.

Mr. Fraser shows that the trade of Khorasan and of fully half the well-populated districts of Persia must go to Russia, because of the propinquity of the Transcaspian Railway. But the idea of further railway development is much discouraged. Persia is surrounded by a girdle of mountains of difficult approach. The small degree of humidity, due to a very small rainfall, makes it impossible that Persia should ever produce enough to pay for the cost of railways, and minerals seem to be a negligible quantity. If railways were made, trade would not be furthered because the country has nothing to give in exchange for imports.

The want of success of most commercial and financial enterprises is stated emphatically. But the Imperial Bank of Persia (with a British charter) is now doing well, though after writing down one-third of their capital. Mr. Fraser describes the great want of sense of proportion among the Persians, both politically and commercially, and he does not take the reform party seriously.

We leave Mr. Fraser on the Caspian Sea, on his way home, the descent of the Elbury Mountains through the rich belt which stretches from their lower slopes to the Caspian affording an opportunity for graphic descriptive writing. And leaving him, we think that few of his readers will do so without regret that they have come to the end of a very fascinating book.

HORTUS INCLUSUS

Flosculi Graeci Boreales, sive Anthologia Graeca Aberdonensis.
Series nova. Decerpit JOANNES HARROWER. Aberdoniae : apud Typographos Academicos. MCMVII.

WE have seen in Scotland many a little garden, sheltered and cared for tenderly, where little flowers struggled with the snows that Nature never meant them to encounter. And so much love was lavished on them, so much pride attended their brave attempts to bloom, that truly they made a better show than many such gardens in more favoured lands. That is why all gardeners are Scotchmen; and to some extent all Scotchmen are gardeners.

These little Greek flowers of the northland bear witness to the gardener's care. In imagination one can see them first as tiny seedlings in boxes; next comes the selective process, when the weaklings are discarded, and the more promising growths are pricked out into an array of 64-pots, and watched with loving pride as, gradually, they reach the stage at which they may be planted out to mature and burst into blossom beside their hardier brethren of the border; tender annuals all, whose work is done when they have blossomed once, save that their seed may yield another generation of delight: never reaching the glory of the full-grown plant upon its native soil, but rather serving as evidence of the skill and patience of the gardener. However diverse be their forms, all translations into Greek verse have this one characteristic in common of forced exotic growth. Be the writer ever so deeply imbued with a love of the Hellenic spirit of poetry, it is rare indeed to find that he possesses that spirit itself to a degree which will give him the power of original expression in his chosen medium. Almost always he imitates, almost never he creates; and, creating or imitating, he is hardly ever capable of sustained effort. If he can produce one flower upon his tiny planting, he has done his all.

In a great number of instances, too, another almost fatal influence is at work. The "little flower" is the product of an ill-assorted hybridism. Greek words are wedded, perforce, to English thought; Greek phrases are tortured to represent the ideas and the very language of an English-writing poet. The forms and the colours of the two parents do not blend happily—there is no true Hellenism of thought save that of Hellas—and the jejune growth must be lavishly decked out with palpably "wired-on" tags to present even a decently familiar Greek appearance.

The reasons for these things are manifold. But chief among them all is the obvious fact that all scholars are not poets, and only too often the man who can write good Greek cannot write poetry, whether in Greek or in his own tongue. Thus his understanding of, and sympathy with, Greek modes of thought are hampered by the necessity of seeking his poetical form in the work of a poet whose inspiration came from no Hellenic source. That is why even a mediocre translation from the Greek generally has more of the Hellenic atmosphere about it than the most polished translation from a modern language into Greek.

Once upon a time, when we were endeavouring to learn—or rather when our preceptors were endeavouring to teach to us—the art of "Latin verse composition," we used, to aid us in the task, an exercise-book in which various English passages were "set" and paraphrased for translation into verse. Among these passages was an American advertisement of a patent pill! No doubt the learned gentleman who first twisted that piece of vulgarity into elegiacs was mightily proud of his performance. But to our minds it affords a peculiarly poisonous example of the unhealthy tendency of the modern school of "classical" verse manufacturers. To many of these the writing of Greek and Latin verse is a kind of mental gymnastic. The tour de force is the highest achievement, and the more absurd the prostitution of their art the better they are pleased. They mate the sublime with the ridiculous, and chuckle over the monstrous offspring of the match.

Thus it is with especial pleasure that we record the complete absence from this beautiful volume of such abominations. We can safely say that there is not a piece among the hundred here, collected from the work of a score of hands, that cannot lay some claim to poetical and scholarly distinction. Many of them are of a length sufficient to banish reminiscence of the "fair copy" of the average classical lecturer, and even in the shorter iambic pieces we have no cause to complain of the fantastic over-polishing which spoils so many laudable efforts of the kind. Some turns of phrase are peculiarly happy.

"And count that moment immortality" is well rendered by Mr. J. D. Symon:

ἐπιμένει αὐτὸς ἐν θανάτῳ.

while a fortunate metrical experiment is the translation of Henry Newbolt's "The Only Son," by Mr. A. W. Mair, though there are undoubted harshnesses in the Greek itself. Admirably suited to the tone and subject of the original English is the very smooth rendering of Keats' "Happy Insensibility," in Anacreon's metre, also by Mr. Mair, to whom more than a quarter of the total number of contributions is due.

In the solitary strophic-antistrophic experiment we are doubtful about the propriety of disregarding synapheia, even at so clearly marked a point as the end of the turning line. But we are glad to note the strict observance of syllabic correspondence. This rendering of a "Lament" by the late Professor Geddes has, as a whole, considerable poetic merit. There are no really brilliant iambics. Perhaps, where the general level is high, we may give especial praise to Mr. R. A. Nicholson's translation of a passage from Ossian, which contains some fine lines.

Of the epigrams and similar short pieces the most interesting are the three translations by different hands of the well-known lines:

Upon thy mother's knees, a new-born child,
Weeping thou sat'st, while all around thee smiled;
So live that when thou tak'st thy last, long sleep,
Calm thou may'st smile, while all around thee weep.

Of the three translations the happiest is that by Mr. A. Petrie:

Παῖς νεογνὸς ἐὼν ἐπὶ γούνασι μητρὸς ἔκειτο ἡδόμενος πάντων μούνης ὀδυρόμενος ὡδὲ βίον διέχους ὡς νήργετον ὕπνου ἐπισπείν
ἡδόμενος πάντων μούνης ὀδυρόμενος

for not only does it preserve the inversion in the second and fourth line, but also eliminates the superfluous "calm" of the original.

The inevitable "Nugae" are not offensive. "Mary had a little lamb" takes well to Anacreontics; but in:

They say the camel can go thirty days without a drink; but who the devil wants to be a camel?

Ἦματα πόλλ' ἀπότους ἀνέχουσαί φασι καμήλους τὸν δὲ καμηλώδη τίς κ' ἀνέχοιτο βίον;

ἔξ is as fatal in the Greek as is "but" in the original. The translator has missed his chance.

But in Mr. J. A. Stewart's translation of Burns' cruel jest we have the real thing:

Κηρύσσω θάνατον, φυσίζους ἦναι Γαῖα
Ἄδην, εἴτε προῖν Μυρτίλος ὕστατ' ἐπνεῖ ἀλλὰ σὺ γὰρ βέλτεστον ἀφῆρξας παράδειγμα πῶς δρ' ἔγῃν σάβης μωρὸν ἀπεργάσασθαι;

The book is beautifully produced, and misprints are few and far between. It is with pardonable pride that the writers make their final boast:

Ἐξέλ' Ἀθηροδότην καὶ τὴν περιαιετώσαν
Ἥλιος οὐρανίας ἐξαπέλασε πλακούς.

THE EVOLUTION OF PLANTS

The Origin of a Land Flora. By F. O. BOWER, F.R.S. (Macmillan and Co., 18s. net.)

THIS book is not intended for the use of the layman, but for the advanced student, and even he must turn to its pages in grim earnest and read slowly. But it must not be supposed that the author has chosen to discourse in ultra-scientific fashion, or that he has been maliciously technical; the extremely difficult character of his theme left him no choice in the matter. It is an ambitious book, and one which will appeal only to the more philosophical botanist—who is unhappily in a minority. But he will find in this most learned treatise a peculiarly stimulating source of information, and a most laboriously thorough exposition on the evolution of the higher plants.

His object being to demonstrate the evolution of plants, he makes no reference to those simple organisms which occupy debatable ground in the organic kingdom, and avoids all reference to the relations which these primitive microcosms bear to the vexed question of the origin of life. On the whole, perhaps, this is well, for even as it is his book is sufficiently bulky, and this subject has already been discussed on many occasions, with no very satisfactory results.

If Professor Bower does not begin at the very beginning of his story—according to our notion of the way it should open—he starts somewhere very near it, for he leads off, as may be supposed from our comments, with the aquatic algæ, and with the hand of the master draws for us a graphic picture of the earliest plants. He shows us that these simple organisms had their origin in the waters that bathed the shores of continents which have long since passed away; and he further traces their development into plants of more and more complex being—a complexity which gathered in volume as these lowly plants gradually acquired the ability to live upon dry land. The importance of all this the “mere man” probably seldom, if ever, realises. Yet it is a fact that but for this later development which gave us grasses, shrubs, and trees, none of what we are pleased to call the “higher animals” could ever have come into being.

It would be impossible in the space of a review to relate the sequence of events so skilfully traced by Professor Bower, but we may well indicate the scope of his work by a condensed epitome of his conclusions. Given in “tabloid” form, then, the algæ appeared first in the form of minute globules of protoplasm, such as may be met with even at the present day, often serving as indispensable allies to many of the lower animals and plants. Some of these humble and microscopic forms developed skeletons of exquisite beauty—such as are seen in the “diatoms,” for example—while others developed into the various types of bacteria, some of which are among the most potent scourges of the human race, while others are to be reckoned among its greatest benefactors! A further advance in algal development gave rise to the various types of “sea-weeds,” and other aquatic vegetation, such as the familiar confervæ and stoneworts and the fungi of various kinds—beneficent and otherwise. Simultaneously with these came the lichens and mosses, and later the ferns. These last, probably, gave rise to the higher forms of vegetation—the fir-tree and the stately oak, and the innumerable flowering plants, which may, perhaps, be considered the crowning glory of this wonderful drama of evolution, so full of mystery, so fraught with imaginary terrors to those who have not acquired the art of deciphering even the simplest of the hieroglyphics in which the book of Nature is written.

THE WONDROUS REIGN

The History of England during the Reign of Victoria (1837-1901). By SIDNEY LOW, M.A., and LLOYD C. SANDERS, B.A. (Longmans, 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS volume completes the series of books on the political history of England which Messrs. Longmans have been issuing during the last few years. It is a series which no student of our Constitution can afford to neglect, and it is due to Messrs. Low and Sanders to remark that, in the matter of painstaking research, the concluding volume is no whit behind its eleven predecessors.

On the whole the historians have performed their task well. They have avoided that sin of partisanship which so relentlessly dogs the footsteps of the compilers of history, and, while achieving impartiality, they have contrived to escape dullness. Furthermore, they have made full use of the numberless sources of information which are open to the writer on Victorian politics and history. It can hardly be denied that they have been fortunate in their choice of subject. For the Victorian period is one which may well vie in interest with even the Augustan Age of Anne or “the spacious days of great Elizabeth.” In all those reforms that minister to the material side of life it stands unparalleled in our history. It was essentially the age of the dissemination of comfort. It witnessed the rise of the railroad, the introduction of a penny postage, the repeal of the Corn Laws, the passing of the Factory Acts, the extension of the franchise, the development of the means of communication. Its statesmen included such names as Peel, Palmerston, Disraeli, Gladstone, Parnell, and that political will-o'-the-wisp, Lord Randolph Churchill. Among men of letters it boasted such figures as Browning, Tennyson, Newman, Ruskin, Carlyle, and, at a later period, Meredith, Hardy, and Swinburne. In religion it saw the rapid growth of the Oxford Movement, in art the enthusiasm of the Pre-Raphaelites. To the student of politics, however, it is chiefly of interest as exhibiting the conflict between two irreconcilable ideals of statesmanship. Disraeli and Gladstone usurp the political arena to the exclusion of all lesser figures. Messrs. Low and Sanders summarise the situation in a sentence that is more epigrammatic than truthful:

Disraeli brought back to English politics the spirit of Romance while Gladstone vindicated the claims of Righteousness.

This is hardly fair to either of the great protagonists; for he would be an ignorant and unscrupulous partisan who should hold that the Liberal party held a monopoly in righteousness—though we have heard such an opinion expressed in our own time—while even the middle-class Liberalism of the 'sixties was not devoid of its romantic elements. But our authors discover a certain perspicacity in recognising Gladstone and Disraeli as the typical exponents of the two systems of political philosophy which have become most closely identified with the later years of the Victorian period, while they indicate, in perhaps the happiest phrase in the volume, the limitations of both statesmen:

With all his acuteness Disraeli sometimes misunderstood the British people; and Gladstone occasionally forgot the British Empire.

The diplomatic history of the Victorian period is dealt with in great detail, and full justice is done to the important part played by the late Queen herself in many political questions. Especially admirable, too, are the chapters on the Indian Mutiny and the Boer War.

On the ecclesiastical side the volume is frankly unsatisfactory. “He who would understand England,” wrote Carlyle once in a pregnant phrase, “must understand her Church, for that is half the whole matter.” To Messrs. Low and Sanders, however, it would appear to be but an infinitesimal fraction of “the whole matter.” A brief and cursory reference to the Public Worship Regulation Act and to the ritual prosecutions which followed it, is practically all the information which is vouchsafed on one of the most stirring and eventful periods in our ecclesiastical history.

The summary of Victorian literature in the concluding chapter leaves much to be desired. The authors do not seem to have heard of Newman, whose name never appears once throughout the volume, though full recognition is accorded to the transcendent claims of such writers as G. P. R. James and Charlotte M. Yonge. Exception might justly be taken to the assertion that “The Ordeal of Richard Feverel” is the “masterpiece” of George Meredith, while the statement that the “Idylls of the King” revealed Tennyson as a writer of blank verse which, if it lacks the Miltonic majesty, has a Virgilian sweetness, a magic of structure, rhythm, and phrasing never surpassed in English, and never equalled except, it may be, by Keats, is only comprehensible in the light of William Cory's famous dictum:—

One's feelings lose poetic flow
Soon after twenty-seven or so.

These, however, are merely matters of taste, and, after all, it is not on the soundness of its literary criticism that the value of such a volume as this depends. As an intelligent, luminous, and reasoned summary of Victorian politics this book may be confidently commended. It is entirely free from those defects of taste which disfigure such a work, for instance, as Mr. Herbert Paul's “History of Modern England.” It is written, as we have before said, in a spirit of scrupulous impartiality, and it neglects no essential fact in the history of the political and social legislation of one of the most eventful periods in our annals.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY

[FIRST NOTICE.]

THERE has been an Academy Dinner without speeches. Consequently it is of no importance for us to say who was at this dinner or what happened. The Royal Academy and its guests, we presume, took their food and said as little as possible. One can imagine a Lord Mayor's banquet without speeches. It would conduce to apoplexy and nothing else. The terror that keeps Ministers from over-feeding themselves at these orgies is the speech-making afterwards; so that Lords Mayor's banquets will continue, we hope, to be lengthened and adorned with oratory. Of course, questions of excess could not in the nature of things, arise at the dinners at the Royal Academy. They have always been understood to be elegant affairs, and a cut above the Lord Mayor's prandial functions. And the speeches have at time and time been admirable, witty, wise, and full of entertainment. But the glory is departed. at the request, it seems, of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The Prince of Wales is not fond of speeches; who that hears so many of them would be. It is understood that his Royal Highness complained last year that, while there were galleries full of pictures waiting tremulously to be inspected, the Royal Academy kept its guests with their noses to the grindstone on what may be termed the speech lay. His Royal Highness's protest has been duly taken note of, and this year the speeches have disappeared. Beneath the Prince of Wales's feathers we have hitherto read "Ich Dien." For the future we shall read—that is to say, when we think about the Royal Academy—"Ichabod."

And consequent upon the aforesaid strange happenings, there would appear to have come over the present show at Burlington House an entirely unsatisfactory spirit. We called on Saturday, as is our custom, and went up an exceedingly ill-decorated staircase to the rooms or galleries. Lunch being just over, we found the place choke-full. Everybody was there who desired to be considered anybody. There were the usual Jews, the usual grinning critics, the usual publisher, the usual novelists, the usual shabby painter, and the usual decent people—these latter, of course, being very well tricked out in more or less excellent clothes. Indeed, the general effect of the place suggested a sort of indoor Ascot rather than a gathering of persons met together to consider pictures. As all the world knows, Burlington House is not so spacious that it cannot get crowded, and the crowd on Saturday was big, and determinedly, if deliberately, pushful. One required all one's energies to get round the galleries in anything like the quick time prescribed by journalistic exigencies, but with the help of a light foot and a side motion, we did our duty. As to pictures in the general sense of the term, the show is full and running over with them. We take it that all of them possess a certain merit; otherwise they would not be here, for we are not to suppose that the Committee accept things from the mere and sheer necessity of covering the walls. On the other hand, we are free to confess that there is little or nothing in the collection set forward which is likely to enthrall the minds of such unfortunate persons as may happen to visit Burlington House for Art's sake. We are not insensible to what may be termed the reasonable excellence of many of the exhibits. It would be rude of us to suggest that in a collection of new pictures, many of them bearing names which are supposed to be household words in the field of Art, there is nothing worth seeing and nothing worth buying. But this is just our trouble. Strive as one will to think nobly of England's brethren of the brush, whether hung on the line or skied, one is forced to the conclusion that they have departed as one man from the spiritual view of their craft and concluded that it is the business of all persons who paint to produce something worth buying. And when you consider the mob that foregather at Burlington House on Saturday afternoon, you would perceive at once that "something worth buying" must not mean in any sense edifying goods.

Out of the general depression of spirits which will inevitably fall upon anybody who looks on this year's Academy with a serious eye certain small satisfactions will arise. For example, one observes with a holy joy that there does not appear to be a picture of the year in the whole show. This comforting circumstance is, no doubt, due to the absence from our midst of any work by the extraordinary Sigismund Goetze, which abounding workman would appear for the nonce to have failed to come up to the scratch. Whether Mr. Goetze has really not painted an Academy picture this year, or whether, having painted one, he has been advised not to exhibit, we do not know. In any case, he is not represented among the exhibits, excepting by a portrait which cannot be considered of much particular account. We do not believe that anybody, save the reporters, will be very sorry. Failing their Goetze, the Academy mob have naturally found themselves somewhat gruelled for a canvas over which they might exuberate. They have looked to the right, and to the left, and to the centre, and even to the ends, and found nothing that could fairly be sensationalised. And the daily Press, with its usual regard for duty, has been compelled to come to their rescue. "What! no picture of the year," cries the daily Press, "then we will make one." And the daily Press immediately lays pencil to a specious and altogether unlovely piece of work by the Hon. John Collier, which is called, we believe, "The Death Sentence." It is a picture which represents an altogether too-handsome doctor telling an altogether too-healthy patient that he (the patient) has only got a few weeks to live. The Hon. John Collier is understood to have informed a reporter that the idea of this picture was imparted to him by "an elderly inmate of a workhouse." We can well believe it. The Hon. John Collier is also understood to have explained to a reporter that the patient in the picture is suffering from a disease "we are all afraid of." But probably in the interests of our common humanity the Hon. John Collier refuses to put a name on it. We are left to our own conclusions in the matter. The young man in the picture may have consumption, or aneurism, or a floating kidney, or drinking diabetes, or rickets, for anything the Hon. John Collier will tell us. The result is that many eminent physicians have been to look at the picture with a view to diagnosing the young man's complaint. And, singular as it may seem, not one of them can find any symptoms. This, obviously, is as it should be. On the other hand, it is purely idiotic art. We are at a loss to understand why the Hon. John Collier should lend himself to such performances. For "The Cheat," which he bestowed upon us some time ago, there was, perhaps, a shadow of excuse. The great world was bridge mad at the time, and cheating was rife in consequence, so that everybody understood what the picture was about; besides which, "The Cheat" was a sort of picture, even if you did not know what it meant. In the present instance, however, you have nothing topical, and nothing that concerns anybody but the young man under sentence and the Hon. John Collier. If the Hon. John Collier believes that one of the true purposes of art is to frighten gentlewomen and gouty old persons, he is justified of his picture; if not—! As the inspiration for the picture before us was given to him by an elderly inmate of a workhouse, we may hope that next year he will go for inspiration to a blind school. Meantime, we do not believe that, despite the kindly offices of the daily Press, the Academy mob is at all disposed to take Mr. Collier's picture for the picture of the year—at any rate without large doses of bromide.

Of course the faults of the Hon. John Collier are not to be credited to the Royal Academy. He sends in his pictures and they are accepted in the ordinary course. What happens in the cheap Press outside is nobody's fault. In the course of a further article, however, we shall have occasion to call the attention of the polite world to the extravagances of a popular painter for whom the Royal Academy would appear to be desirous of standing sponsor. But we must reserve this pleasant duty for next week.

THEORETICAL SOCIALISM

OF making books on Socialism there seems no end—some destructive, setting aside both past and present theories; others constructive, substituting new ideas by way of criticism; others merely speculative or even imaginative; others political, concerned with ideas of class war; while yet others, earnestly contending for economic progress, advance definite proposals of reform for the general social welfare. In considering such works, we may roughly divide them into two classes, theoretical and practical, assigning to the former the books now before us.

Mr. W. H. Mallock* brings his well-known critical faculty and wealth of striking and pertinent illustration to an examination of the theories of various—let us call them—Socialist denominations.

His first six chapters are taken up with an elaborate criticism of the Marxian axiom that "manual labour estimated in terms of time is the sole source of economic values or wealth," and of other resultant theories of the relation of capital to labour. The fundamental error of the Marxian theory, according to Mr. Mallock, is its omission of the important factor "directive ability."

Undirected and unorganised labour would leave the whole nation of workers in a condition only just above the level of actual bodily want:

Labour, from the most ordinary up to the rarest kind, is the mind or the brain of one man affecting that man's own hands and the single task on which his hands happen to be engaged.

The directive faculties are the mind or the brain of one man simultaneously affecting the hands of any number of other men, and through their hands the simultaneous tasks of all of them, no matter how various those tasks may be.

Mr. Mallock well draws out the distinction between manual labour and directive ability, and it is curious to note how strong an objection to this distinction comes from America—a country where, perhaps, more than in any other this power of direction has raised men from the position of manual labourers to that of millionaires.

Having disposed of the Marxian theories, Mr. Mallock claims that the intelligent and educated Socialists of to-day join with him in the repudiation of Marx, but merely to find themselves face to face with new difficulties.

Very cleverly he formulates the two crucial problems "which for Socialists may be said to be practically new," and on which he believes "everything will be found to turn":

One being the problem of how, under the conditions which Socialism would introduce, the ablest men could be discovered, and invested with the requisite industrial authority; the other being the problem of how, under the same conditions, it would be possible to secure from such men that full exertion of their talents on which the material prosperity of the entire community would depend.

These problems and other kindred difficulties are discussed at considerable length in succeeding chapters.

Mr. Mallock is no believer in bureaucratic Socialism, and he urges forcibly the loss of that energising motive, which ordinarily spurs on individuals if they become merely paid agents as a corporation of State officials. Of this loss, and the proportionate loss to the community, we observe that there is already abundant and striking illustration in the blundering of municipal corporations, their shameful waste of the ratepayers' money, and the contraction of vast municipal debts on a scale that would soon spell bankruptcy for the private capitalist.

But, unfortunately, Mr. Mallock's clever reasonings are likely to appeal only to his intelligent, highly-educated, and judicially-minded Socialist, who may be sought with a lantern by daylight. They are as words to the wise, and are not likely to penetrate the "long furry ear of the British public," to whom the Marxian and other exploded theories are as widely preached and as readily accepted as ever.

On the other hand, Mr. Mallock's illustrations are so telling that he might well consider the question of writing a shorter criticism addressed ad populum. We cannot leave Mr. Mallock without noticing his trenchant remarks on:

the astounding ignorance of the world, and especially of the world of industry, which is betrayed with so much naïveté by the Socialist of the Christian pulpit.

Ignorant interference in economic problems is worse than useless. Ne sutor ultra crepidam. Apart from his contact and sympathy with the unemployed and the poor, what does the average young clergyman who joins the Christian Social Union really know of the theories, aims, and proposals of Socialism? We have no doubt that Christian Socialists, so-called, are as keenly alive to the diseases of modern society as they are to the problem of original sin, with this distinction, that they are perhaps better able to propose remedies for the one than the other. So long as they inculcate the just performance of Christian duties, and do not play into the hands of men who want to render unto Cæsar the things that are God's, nor dabble in economic problems which they do not understand, they may help to extend that practical fulfilment of Christian brotherhood, which we believe was better understood in mediæval times than in our own, on principles widely different from modern pseudo-Socialism, even when called Christian, and still more diverse from the Socialism of, say, Mr. Blatchford.

But, as Mr. Mallock shrewdly asks:

How can any Christian clergymen—men presumably sane and educated—propose, whether their programme be really Christian or no, to re-organise society on the basis of a moral conversion which is confined to the few only—which would exact from the able minority the maximum of effort and mortification, and secure the maximum of idleness and self-indulgence for the rest of the human race?

Mr. Mallock concludes his work by showing that naturally he is not averse from practical reform, but that his aim has been to show:

That the improved conditions which Socialism blindly clamours for are practicable only in proportion as they are dissociated from the theories of Socialism.

To turn from Mr. Mallock's clear logic and acute reasoning to Mr. H. G. Wells's rhetorical writing† is like leaving the study for the popular lecture in a town-hall. His book is in great part a sort of apology for Neo-Socialism. Like Mr. Mallock, he sees that many old crude theories have been abandoned by the "intelligent" Socialist. But he fails to grasp the fact that the majority of modern propagandists really advance the old theories in new form. So Mr. Wells, in his best personal manner, as it were, takes your arm confidentially and says in effect, "Don't be alarmed." Then he hastens to reassure you:

The earlier Socialist was fierce and unjust to owners.

The modern Socialist is not a communist.

The modern Socialist has no designs upon the money in a man's pocket.

This is particularly comforting, especially when we are told that:

What is needed is merely a scientific public organisation of the general property in Nature (!).

How very simple. And then:

I think the State may prove a far more generous and sentimental landlord in many things than any private person.

After this nothing surprises us, not even to learn that

The advent of a strongly Socialist Government would mean no immediate revolutionary changes at all;

And that

In very truth, Socialism would destroy no property at all, but only that sham property that, like some wizard-cast illusion, robs us all . . . the property, the claim of the creditor, the mortgager, the landlord and usurer, the forestaller, gambling speculator, monopoliser, and absentee.

We believe the cry for novæ tabulæ is two thousand years old. But, whatever new worlds for old may arise, it is one not likely to be heeded even by a "generous and sentimental" Socialist Government.

† New Worlds for Old. By H. G. WELLS. (Constable and Co., Ltd., 6s. net.)

But Mr. Wells is a prophetic optimist, not altogether free from "wizard-cast illusions," and though personal optimism may be cheering (and amusing) in some directions, in others it is too often vague, elusive, and self-deceptive. Such are Mr. Wells's further views on Utopia as expounded in this book; his original "personal dream," "A Modern Utopia," he complains, "has not been read so widely as I could have wished."

We find it difficult to take seriously a book in which occurs such a passage as this (and there are many similar):

The county arms of Devon will be on the butter-paper, Hereford and Kent will guarantee her cider, Hampshire and Wiltshire answer for her bacon . . . I rather like to think of the red dagger of London on the wholesome bottled ales of her great (municipalized) breweries, and Maidstone or Rochester, let us say, boasting a special reputation for jam or pickles. Good honest food all of it will be, made by honest, unsweated women and men, with the pride of broad vales and uplands, counties, principalities, and great cities behind it.

In the contemplation of this delightful vision we may leave Mr. Wells. The unconscious irony of the title of his dream or revelation, "New Worlds for Old," is the best guide to its purport. But, after all, old lamps are sometimes better than new.

P. S.

THE FRENCH NOVEL OF TO-DAY

AT no period in the history of French literature has France been poorer in novelists than just at the present time. England has Thomas Hardy and George Meredith, but against such names as these France has no one to set in rivalry. It is, of course, impractical to take the bare date of the publication of a book—the "To-day" of Miss Winifred Stephens—and treat it as the limitation of a literary epoch. Huysmans, Zola, and even Alphonse Daudet are as much novelists of to-day as Bazin or Loti, though the former are dead. This artificial limitation, which an accident might vitiate to-morrow, and thus superannuate the claims to be included in her list of any one of the novelists, Miss Stephens writes about in "French Novelists of To-day" (John Lane), is not fair to the literature she is concerned with. It forces her to ascribe undue eminence to insignificant writers, to give a representative character to nonentities, and to exaggerate the quality and the importance of what is essentially mediocre, in order that her book may have an excuse for existence. English readers are liable to be led astray by Miss Winifred Stephens into thinking that modern French literature, in the department of fiction, has nothing better to show than Paul Bourget or Maurice Barrès, and, as the reputation of French literature of to-day stands deservedly high, the tendency of such an erroneous conception would be either to give to Bourget and Barrès a higher rank than they deserve, or to make one think less of contemporary French fiction than it really merits. De Goncourt, De Maupassant, Alphonse Daudet, Elémir Bourges, Zola, are all writers of to-day. They are the giants of the forest, with whose underwood Miss Stephens is mainly concerned. There is no more reason for writing about Marcel Prévost, Barrès, Bazin, and Pierre de Coulevain than about Pierre Louys, or Marcelle Tinayre, or Georges de Labruyere—they are none of them the leaders of schools, nor do they stand out as novelists of exceptionally individual gifts. With respect to M. Anatole France, it should be remembered that he has always, and on sufficient grounds, disclaimed the title of novelist. Miss Stephens tells us in her Preface that a "veteran in the world of letters" said to her, "Anatole France and Maurice Barrès are our only living novelists worth writing about." It would, perhaps, be impolite to hint that this anonymous veteran must be in his dotage, but it is difficult not to form this opinion when one remembers the reservation already made as to himself by Anatole France, and reflects that the real meaning of the word "novelist" is in its essence "writer of romance." Who could seriously accord this title to the pretentious egoist, the noisy literary clown whom the Academy has recently elected to its membership?—not because Maurice Barrès could claim to figure on a level of intellectual or artistic quality with most dead or living immortals, but because when Georges Picquart was made a General it was good warfare on the part of the reactionary Academy to make Barrès an Academician. As for M. Edouard Rod, he is, or at least was, a Belgian. Neither Bourget, nor Prévost, nor René Bazin stands for the French novel in the sense that Zola, de Goncourt, Alphonse Daudet, and Guy de Maupassant did a dozen years ago. They are third-rate or fifth-rate survivors of a great epoch which they did little or nothing to inspire. Their influence upon literature has been practically nil. What have they to tell us outside of the commonest yarn-spinning; and what more do they mean to the earnest student of French literature than do Hall Caine, "Dick Donovan," or Conan Doyle to the student of our own literature? The popularity of such writers as these has little to do with letters. It is a purely commercial question, which concerns the printers' unions, the papermakers, the bookbinders, the lending libraries, but has no more literary aspect than the price of potatoes or the decline in the birth-rate has a moral aspect.

There is M. René Bazin, for instance, who writes (and unless he takes exceptional pains he writes poorly enough) for the lower-middle classes of France, the small land-owners, the metropolitan and provincial shopkeepers of the third or fourth degree, who have not yet fallen victims to Dufayel or the Bon Marché, and he would have us believe that he is lu et approuvé by the clergy. Approved he may be by them, but read is doubtful; the practice of the confessional makes it difficult for the clergy to read fiction. If he is popular with the lower-middle class, it is because he panders, not always artistically, to many of their least commendable qualities—their avarice, their unhospitality, their artificial patriotism. All René Bazin was revealed in a cruel study—life-like enough, by the way—which he made of an English governess, "Miss Ellen." The poor girl, shown over her employer's garden, admired the strawberries and the melons. M. Bazin adds that she admired them only because she expected to eat them—"j'observais seulement qu'elle appelait beau ce qui pouvait lui servir, et qu'elle se taisait sur le reste." Miss Ellen is dismissed, apparently for not diligently "reporting" her lazy young pupils, and M. Bazin follows her from the door with a bad butler's grin. A lesson to all such impecunious parasites of foreign birth, who have neither the price of a pourboire on them, nor the 2fr. 75c. for the purchase of a Bazin novel, to aspire to the strawberries and melons of a well-to-do French industriel!

If Bazin be but one degree above zero, where shall we place Bourget? Miss Stephens (if it be Mrs. Stephens, I beg her pardon) would place him high, to judge from the amount of space that she devotes to him, and she quotes Robert Louis Stevenson, whom she calls a "master of style," of having said of Bourget, "I may admire others with all my strength, it is with you I would choose to live." "Le style c'est l'homme." But she wisely balances this eulogium by quoting, not with absolute disapproval, the "Perfect Snob" as the title of a review of Bourget's last novel. Bourget is indeed a product, like the snob, of democracy. Allowing for certain differences of degree, he is the Tittlebat Titmouse of the French novel. The snob, that hard-to-be-defined tertium quid between the nobility and the mobility, proceeding from the destruction or the weakening of class distinctions—is a consequence of social revolution. There have never been so many titles in France as since the decree which abolished them. In the sliding scale of modern French literature, which has its maréchaux (among whom Balzac proudly claimed to be), its heroes and heroines, its martyrs, its criminals of both sexes, its simple gentlemen, and its honest artisans, Paul Bourget is the Papal Count. One cannot help feeling about him that in a sense, which is not meant to be at all offensive, he is entirely uneducated. For instance, had he known anything about geography he would not have been the last Frenchman to discover America—though there will be others. What is the use of analysing such an analyst as this? what is the use of disputing the question whether Maurice Barrès was right or wrong (Miss Winifred Stephens says he was wrong) to espouse the Boulangist cause, and to oppose in the Chamber the rehabilitation of Alfred Dreyfus? Let us lay the soothing unction to our souls that nothing that Maurice Barrès ever said, did, or wrote matters one farthing dip to any human soul save himself. The Academician, whose mistakes in French are shortly, it appears, to be made the subject of a monograph by one of M. Barrès' contemporaries, the Nationalist, whose political methods establish him as one of the most valuable assets of the present anti-Nationalist Government, the anti-Semite leader who has materially helped to lose every battle for that interesting cause, the careful paradoxist who might have been manufactured out of a sheet of Mr. Robert Hichens's blotting-paper, after he had written "The Green Carnation," why tell the unsophisticated English reader that, as a social, moral, or artistic force, he counts! Why speak of him in the same breath with Anatole France, who, with all his faults and limitations, has nevertheless done some work which will live, or at least deserves to, though it cannot be strictly classified as novel-writing? Worst bevue of all, why hint that there can be any comparison between the diminutive bourgeois Barrès and the great aristocrat Châteaubriand?

Perhaps it is with the idea of giving importance to her subjects that Miss Winifred Stephens supplies her readers with an elaborate account of M. Marcel Prévost's artistic methods. Why she should have selected him in preference to Georges Ohnet, or in what respect either of them differs as an artist from the late "Ouida," it would be difficult to explain. The Marcel Prévosts and the Ouidas are always with us, and, until the novel ceases to appeal to the middle-class feminine mind, their sentiments and style are certain of survival, being enclosed in a vicious circle which passes from the keyhole of my lady's chamber to the kitchen-table, and back again. This is a literary phenomenon which has no more importance in France than in England.

Miss Stephens places Pierre Loti last in her list, when she might more justly have placed him first. His most recent work makes us regret "Mon frère Yves," "Matelot," and "Pêcheurs d'Islande;" but he is none the less one of the giants. As for Madame "Pierre de Coulevain," Miss Stephens quotes a remark made in Paris that "no one in France reads her or knows her." If this was the "literary veteran," we may forgive him.

ROWLAND STRONG.

THE DISCOVERY

DUE east and west went the high road, a broad, dust-coloured ribbon cleaving the trim Midland landscape. From where he stood the boy could see it stretching away before him, till it was lost over the shoulder of the hillside, where already a faint green was veiling the brown of the ploughed slopes. On the other fields, too, the grass meadows in which the lambs were playing together, a stronger colour had begun to show beneath the grey of last year's stubble, and here and there the dark hedgerows were dashed with a sudden foam of blossom. From his halting-place, this point at which the road dipped to the little hollow which was his goal, he could look back over a great part of the way by which he had come. It was a familiar way enough by this time, yet never travelled by him without some sense of mystery, of adventure, and (a little strangely perhaps in this connection) a kind of consolatory peace. But the Roman road held in the boy's life a place apart, not easily to be explained.

In the distance—miles upon miles away it seemed, though as a fact it was not more than eight or nine—the roofs and spires of the town still showed like faint smoke on the horizon; above them all the tower of the school from which the boy had but now been set free. He turned his face resolutely from it, and began to run down the hill. At the foot was a farmhouse and a disused gravel-pit in a field that was entered by a gate on the left-hand side of the road. This was the end of his journey.

Years afterwards he was to remember that afternoon as one on which the peculiar magic of this secret haunt of his was more than commonly manifest. The familiar aspects of the place, the close turf, the ragged sides of the pit, tawny yellow at the edge, especially seen against the clear sky, even the clang of the gate swinging to behind him—these things had never before seemed so intimate, so comforting. He flung himself face forward at full length upon the side of the pit, burying his hands in the grass, and putting his cheek so close to the ground that he could feel the reflected warmth of it beating back on him full of the undefinable earthy smell—the special breath, as it were, of this one spot, unlike any other—that always affected so strangely.

For a long time he lay thus, motionless, thinking of nothing, but content only to let the happy associations of the place sink into him with that delightful sensation of peace which, whatever his mood, they never failed to produce. It had always been so, ever since the half-holiday afternoon years ago when he was quite small, and had found it for the first time, coming upon it unexpectedly at the end of one of those long solitary walks of his, of which even then he had been so fond. After that first discovery it had become his chosen refuge from the troubles of a rather lonely and miserable school-life. Fortunately no one else seemed to know of what to some would have been its sole attraction, which he himself had only by accident found on a second visit—the scraps of broken pottery, Roman and British, that were to be unearthed here and there among the gravel, showing its origin as a station on the great road. So he was always sure of being alone. But there was something in its charm for him beyond mere solitude, something strangely more human. The boy could hardly, even to himself, have given this thought a definite expression; but unconsciously he had come to look upon the Roman field as though it had been actually the home of a friend to whose sympathy he could turn certainly for consolation. It filled for him the place that the living comrade, longed for with such lonely heart-aching, could never hold; had come to be indeed, in a sense, that other self which his own brooding and over-sensitive nature had always so passionately and vainly desired. It was the balm of companionship, idealised and half-fanciful, as of the embodied genius of the place, that was comforting him now as it had done before in many of his desolate moods.

He lay so still that presently the rabbits, which had scuffled away at his coming, began cautiously to peer from their burrows again. One by one he saw them hop very silently out into the sunshine, pausing each on the threshold for an anxious instant, long ears curiously pricked, and nostrils aquiver against the wind. Soon the whole slope was astir with their odd, mechanical-looking movements, till suddenly the most venturesome dislodged a fragment of something hard, which fell tinkling from stone to stone, and on the instant the whole company had vanished panic-stricken.

But the noise had roused the boy too. He sat up, noticing as he did so the position of what had fallen, a gleam of dull red upon the sand at the foot of the pit. Samian ware; it was a find! The sight of it woke all at once a quite different feeling within him, the primitive, universal excitement of the treasure-hunter, the instinct of hide-and-seek. Yes, it was that exactly that gave the simpler element to the double fascination of this place that had once formed part of all the mystery and magnificence of Rome. The very contrast with its present aspect, so silent and deserted in the sunshine, did but make more wonderful the uncertainty of what message from the past a chance look might reveal, or of what, at that very moment perhaps, one had passed over, hidden only by the slightest covering that a touch would have dispersed. In a secret corner of the boy's study at school he guarded jealously a little store of these—a clasp, a battered coin or two, even a rusty spear. Small wonder that, while he scrambled eager-eyed about the shifting slope of sand and gravel, the old pit should seem changed. It was no longer only a refuge for his dreams, it had become itself a dream, full of glorious possibilities. It was El Dorado, John Silver's Island, the Cave of Ali Baba, and something better than all these, more intimate to the boy himself; as though indeed, the old Romans had hidden their forgotten treasures just here with the very purpose that he, and he only, should discover them. Thrillingly, one seemed at the thought almost to touch their actual fingers.

It was upon him now—this feeling of expectation, of suspense, stronger than he ever before remembered it. Often in the solitary hours that he had spent here he had had the fancy that he was being observed, that the dead lords of the place were still present, very close about him, so that at any moment an unexpected turn might surprise them, watching. To-day, as soon as he began to search, he was almost overpoweringly conscious of this. He had stooped to gather the piece that had fallen (a fragment of a Samian cup, dull-red, with a pattern of raised leaves) when all at once the feeling became so insistent that he stood up, straightening himself uneasily, for the first time a little afraid. Somehow the very silence seemed to have grown strange, to have taken suddenly a new significance. The rabbits had disappeared; there was nothing before him but the empty, sun-steeped quarry on three sides, and behind and beyond it the quiet English country, where far away a few sheep were leisurely cropping the new grass. And yet—had not something moved, ever so slightly, there, close beside him, where a white gleam, the lip of a broken vase perhaps, now showed half buried in the sand to his left? He had not noticed this before, but the movement, if indeed there had been one, and not merely the shadow of a passing cloud, had drawn his eyes. His heart was beating unreasonably fast as he went towards it.

And then—the wonderful thing happened that was ever afterwards to set that day of his life apart from all others, that (as he came to look back upon it) seemed in some way to explain what had before been strange in the influence upon him of the place. For, as he put out his hand to touch it, he saw the gleaming thing suddenly for what it was—no vase, but the bones of a skeleton arm thrust outwards from the sand, the slender, undeveloped bones of a child—a lad perhaps of his own age—and upon them, where the wrist had been, a narrow circlet of bronze. For a long moment the boy stood staring, white-faced, then with an involuntary cry he saw that the whole ledge of sand from which the arm came was beginning to move. . . .

It slipped downwards and fell, breaking in a little avalanche about his feet, and there before him lay, uncovered, the figure whose burial-place this had been. It lay upon its side, one arm upon which also was a bracelet like the first, thrown across the breast where the small ribs had fallen in, crushed by the centuries-long weight above them. In the sand and gravel upon which it lay were other things—beads of a strange blue colour, and a brooch, of which the pin, thick with the rust of two thousand years, still moved in the clasp within which the dead fingers, so infinitely far away, had fastened it. So the secret of the place was told; he had found him, this other boy who had been his friend, whose possessions these once were. Very reverently he took them in his own hands; and, as he did so, surely before the magic of their last human touch had left them, did not he, too, catch for one blinding instant a vision of that mysterious life from which they came to him, as it were, still warm. For an instant only, then the link was broken. He looked round him, shivering a little and bewildered, as one awakened suddenly out of a dream. He was quite alone.

ARTHUR ECKERSLEY.

LONDON'S LOST MAY-DAY

Is London to lose its May-day as completely as it did when under the yoke of those Puritans who hacked down Maypoles, and also, it may be recalled, made it illegal for a mother to kiss her child on the Sabbath? Is the domination of the devils of hustle and gain to win a triumph over the charming old popular street merry-makings, even more enduring than that won by the Covenanter? It looks like it. Within living memory the London chimney-sweepers on each May-day put off for the nonce what Charles Lamb called the "obscuring darkness and double night of their forlorn disguisement," to assume a moving habitation of verdant green, escorted through the street by pipe and drum. Was any Jack-in-the-Green seen in London town last Friday? Within two memories, pretty milkmaids, "in comely colours drest," and bearing a "garland" consisting of an erection of polished silver plate decorated with ribbons and posies of fresh flowers, danced before the doors of their customers' houses. The motor-'bus to-day would make short work of dancing milkmaids, if indeed even a milkmaid should have the heart to dance in the blue reek of petrol-fumes by which we have replaced the clear air breathed by our grandfathers.

In that clear air, untainted by the poisonous exhalations of "progress," and in the leisure of their reasonable lives, those grandfathers lived a jolly town existence undreamt of by their anæmic descendants. Where we have foul smells, pestilent dust, the clanging roar of an Inferno, and life taken at hurricane pace, the Londoner of old enjoyed—yes, actually enjoyed—his streets. For three hundred years he danced round his London Maypoles every First of May. Then came the Puritan interlude. Then as far back as we can see, even to Chaucer's time, his May shafts stand surrounded with their merry throng.

To take the older chronicles first. How splendid was the pageant by which the restoration of Maypoles was inaugurated in London on the First of May, 1661:

Let me declare to you (says the writer of a rare tract) the manner in general of that stately cedar erected in the Strand, one hundred and thirty-four foot high, commonly called the Maypole, upon the cost of the parishioners there adjacent, and the gracious consent of his sacred Majesty with the illustrious Prince, the Duke of York. This tree was a most choice and remarkable piece.

The "remarkable piece" was brought with a streamer flourishing before it, with drums beating all the way, and other sorts of music. The "handy-man" of the day was called in to erect it, as it was supposed that landsmen could not possibly raise it. So the Lord High Admiral of England commanded twelve seamen to the task, and after three great crowns had been brought by three men, bare-headed, with more drums and music, then, to the sound of trumpets, the pole was raised, and the shouts of the people "did ring throughout all the Strand."

Next came a Morice dance, with "Tabor and Pipe as the ancient Musick," round the pole; the dancers, who were finely decked in purple scarfs and "half shirts," thereafter dancing "the rounds of their liberty." And as a perpetual honour to seamen, and to give light in dark nights, and to shine "so long as the pole stands," three great lanthorns were hung on the pole, one for the Lord High Admiral of England, one for the Vice-Admiral, and the third for the Rear-Admiral. So London had again a Maypole worthy of the city's state, and, says our chronicler:

Little children did much rejoice, and ancient people did clap their hands, saying golden days began to appear.

In its old age, in 1717, the Maypole, then falling into decay, found honourable retreat, at the request of Sir Isaac Newton, in a park in Essex, where it supported the largest telescope then in existence, and which measured 125ft. in length.

History is dumb as to what became of the three great lanthorns, the "three honours" of English seamen, which were to shine on the wild and brawling Strand of the Restoration. But that their light was needed is shown by the fact that, six years after the splendid erection of the Maypole, one Mr. Robert Perceval was found lying dead near its site, with a deep wound in his breast, and "his sword, drawn and bloody, lying beside him." He was but nineteen years old, and had fought as many duels as he had lived years.

Yet another London Maypole made some figure in those Restoration days. This was the Drury Lane Maypole, set up by a smith, at the north end of little Drury Lane, to commemorate his daughter's good luck in marrying George Monk while he was but a private gentleman, and in sharing his elevation to the dukedom of Albemarle—whereby hung a pretty tale and three trials at the Bar of the King's Bench, opponents of the new Duchess asserting that she possessed a prior husband, yet alive, in the person of one Thomas Ratford with whom she had Lived at the Three Spanish Gipsies, in the New Exchange, and sold wash-balls, gloves, and such things.

We do not hear whether the Drury Lane Maypole took part in the King's Bench trials; but assuredly it may claim to be the only Maypole intimately associated with a bigamy case.

London's most famous Maypole—famous for the tragedy that brought about its deposition, and for the high comedy of its final destruction—was that of the "shaft" on Cornhill, fixed every May-day morning before the south door of the Church of St. Andrews, the steeple of which it out-topped, the church thereby coming to be known as St. Andrew Undershaft. Chaucer, himself a Londoner born, mentions this (the earliest known of London's Maypoles) when he speaks of a vain boaster:

Right well aloft, and high ye bear your head,
As ye would bear the great shaft of Cornhill.

During some two hundred years the London lads and lasses played their "May games" round the towering shaft, until the tragic occurrences of Evil May-day, as the First of May, 1517, was named. For at that time there was great jealousy in the city against foreign artificers, and these sixteenth-century Tariff Reformers had lusty ways with them. On April 28th, says Stowe:

Divers yong men of the citie picked quarels with certaine strangers as they passed along the streets, some they smote and buffeted, and some they threw in the channell: for which the Lord Maior sent some of the Englishmen to prison.

Then suddenly rose a secret rumour, and "no man could tell how it began," that on May-day next following "the citie would slay all the aliens." This rumour coming to the King's Council, the Lord Cardinal on May Eve sent for the Mayor and bade him preserve the city's peace. The City Fathers met in the Guildhall at seven o'clock that evening, and Sir Thomas Moore and the Recorder brought them back word at the Guildhall at half-past eight that no man after nine of the clock should stir out of his house, but himself and his servants stay within shut doors till nine o'clock of the May morning. Conceive our modern London commanded to keep itself and its servants within doors from nine at night till nine the next morning! The Guildhall Conference having broken up, it being then near nine o'clock, an Alderman, one Sir John Munday:

Found two young men in Cheape playing at the bucklers, and a great many of young men looking on them.

And Sir John bidding them desist, the 'prentices cried:

"Prentices, prentices, clubs, clubs!" and out at every door came clubs and other weapons . . . and forth came serving-men, watermen, courtiers, and others, so that by eleven of the clocke there were in Cheape six or seven hundred.

And then the vigil of "Evil May-day" merged into the famous midnight riot of the day itself. The "Counter" prison was broken open. Sir Thomas Moore, taking stand at St. Martin's Gate, vainly desired the "rebellious rout to cease;" men were sore hurt, houses and unhappy Frenchmen were "spoyled," and the May morning riot held till three o'clock, when the Mayor, overpowering the mob, no less than three hundred were sent to Newgate, the Tower, and the Counters. The Lieutenant of the Tower, by the way, "shot off certain peeces of ordnance against the city;" but, says Stowe, "did no great hurt."

On May 4th following the Duke of Norfolk entered the city with 1,300 men; and the prisoners were brought through the streets

Tyed in ropes some men, some lads but of thirteen or fourteen years old.

Thirteen were adjudged to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, and ten pair of movable gallows were set up, to go on wheels

From street to street and from doore to doore, whereas the prisoners were to be executed.

The Tudors encouraged no nonsense about humanitarian executions; if they hung and quartered a man it was for good reasons, and they were careful to let his fellow-subjects know it, and to give them a good view of the deterrent painfulness of the operation. So on the seventh day after the black May-day, divers adjudged to die were drawn on hurdles to the standard on Cheape, and there the hangings began; but no sooner had the first been executed than a respite came from the King, and his Majesty and many lords, on May 13th following, came to Westminster Hall, whither the prisoners were brought,

Bound in ropes, in a ranke, one after another, in their shirts and every one had a halter about his necke, being in number 400 men and 11 women. Then the King, after admonishment, gave pardon, the gallows were taken down, and the citizens kept for ever after on May Eve "a strong watch in armour in remembrance of Evill May-day."

The curious may read a fine old ballad in which the whole story is told; and there we learn that the 'prentices made so great a slaughter of "foreign strangers in the street" that all the "channels" ran with blood, and that the wild youth of London were at last awed by the simple expedient of hundreds hang'd by martial law

On sign-posts at their master's door.

The ballad of the period seems to have savoured somewhat of the posters of our own 3d. Press, but Stowe's sober account finds confirmation in the fact that Chaucer's shaft of Cornhill lay unrequited, hung up on iron hooks over the doors of the houses in Shaft Alley for nearly fifty years, from this evil May-day until in 1552 its long existence was ended in high comedy. For then a curate, preaching at Paul's Cross, denounced the Maypole as no less than an idol. Wherefore the neighbours, greatly moved by the curate's sermon, and, says Stowe, "after they dined to make themselves strong," fell upon the shaft, sawing it in pieces; and thus, concludes our chronicler, was "his [the curate's] idoll . . . mangled and after burned." This frenzied attack on Cornhill's historic shaft recalls the description by another sixteenth-century writer of the town and village Maypole as a "stinking idoll."

Saner things, as we have seen, came in with the Restoration, and the Londoner recovered and retained his Maypoles for another three hundred years. At least one London Maypole is known to have survived till about 1795, standing near Vauxhall Road, and being "much frequented, particularly by milkmaids." If we may credit with accuracy the writer of some pleasant verses, dated May 4th, 1825, and beginning:

In London thirty years ago,
When pretty milk-maids went about,
It was a goodly sight to see Their May-day Pageant all drawn out—the decline of London's May-day set in as early as the opening of the nineteenth century. Our modern creators of pageants might do worse than restore some of the glories and jollity of his lost May-day to the denuded Londoner of 1908.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Saints in Art, with their Attributes and Symbols alphabetically arranged. By MARGARET E. TABOR. With Twenty Illustrations. (Methuen, 3s. 6d. net.)

Not long ago the Professors of a well-known School of Art were heard to express great surprise at the erudition of a bystander who alluded to a picture of an ancient bearded man accompanied by a lion and a Cardinal's hat as a St. Jerome, without any previous consultation of a catalogue. Miss Tabor's handy little volume is, therefore, likely to meet "a felt want." The stories of the Saints which she gives do not pretend to be more than adequate to explain most pictures in which they figure—and she attains her object. Though in her small catalogue of some two hundred and fifty Saints and Patriarchs she necessarily omits a vast number represented in painting alone, she manages to include some dozen or more, locally celebrated, which are often omitted in much more comprehensive catalogues. Such are the Bergamesque Saints, Alexander and Adelaide; St. Giovanni Colombini; and St. Torpé or Torpet of Pisa. "La Jussienne" may prove a useful explanation of St. Mary of Egpt, but we distrust "Apolline" as a French form of Apollonia, and must deny that "Diego" is Spanish for Didacus. Once again, Triphon, Triphone, Trifo, or Trifone is not Italian for Tryphonius. "El putu Triphone" is the little boy with the singing basilisk; nor is the Latin form of his name Tryphonius, any more than that of the philosopher's is "Platonius." It is Tripho; the "Acta Sancti Triphonis" should prevent this common error. Surely any one with sufficient intelligence to look at pictures might guess that "Mattias" is a form of Matthias, without being told so, in a book, which only gives the foreign names of some few saints. Miss Tabor must, by the way, insert the "h" in her next edition, it has dropped out of the English form in her index. Since she names Fra Angelico as a painter of the martyrdom of St. Cosmo and St. Damian, it would have been more logical to add to her list the names of their brothers, Antimus, Leontinus, and Euprepus, and especially of the two youngest, the two exquisite figures which alone appear alive in the well-known last panel of the predella, the only one of the series which is in the Louvre; for she does include in her list the names of other "Companions."

In fact, Miss Tabor's defects, such as they are, are those common to the numerous ladies of literary and artistic tastes, quite qualified to write useful and pleasant volumes on their favourite subjects. They cannot make up their minds what their exact object is, and carry it out. If Miss Tabor intended to produce a pocket-book, she should have sacrificed her nicely chosen illustrations, and substituted for them succinct descriptions of such easily described garments as the dalmatic and the scapular, so useful in distinguishing—the first, deacon saints—and the second, the Confessors of the Religious Orders which wear scapulars, from those which do not. If she intended her book for reference at home, she might have added with advantage a vast number more names and attributes, with very little extra trouble. Nevertheless we welcome her nice little book, and our criticisms must be taken as a mark of appreciation, and we hope that they may be useful in indicating the line of improvement, when she prepares her second edition.

Records of Stirring Times—1726-1822. By the Authoress of "Old Days in Diplomacy." (W. Heinemann, 10s. net.)

THE editing and publishing of old letters is not always commendable or even defensible, however interesting they may be, unless two conditions are fulfilled—the clearing up of undetermined points of history and the filling of lacunæ in hitherto ragged stories. This book of records is more than justified; it would have been a sin not to have given them forth, for they enlarge the knowledge on several debatable points, and dot the i's and cross the t's of much that has been guesswork. The actual owner of the many letters reproduced is the granddaughter of Queen Charlotte's Vice-Chamberlain, Colonel Disbrowe (a variation of Desborough), the close friend and adviser of the family of George III. Her father's eldest sister married Sir Herbert Taylor, the confidential secretary, consecutively, of the Duke of York, George III., Queen Charlotte, and William IV. The letters are varied in value and matter—some trivial and of merely domestic interest, others of considerable State import. They are written by Queen Charlotte, King George, the Princess Elizabeth, and most of the notabilities about the Court of the period. One obtains a very intimate insight into the political intrigues of the day, and more than one or two open issues are explained, so as to make the shadowy history of those stirring times more lucid and understandable. The editing, by M. Montgomery Campbell, leaves nothing to be desired, and there is a full and useful index.

Women of Florence. By ISIDORO DEL LUNGO. Translated by MARY C. STEEGMANN. (Chatto and Windus, 7s. 6d. net.)

To gain a true insight into the cause and effect of historical events we must step aside from the high-road of politics, where our eyes are dazzled and blinded by the progress of kings and the tramp of armies, and penetrate into those obscure byways where dwells the nameless multitude of humbler folk who live and die unknown to fame. History as a rule is a record of prominent personages, written, moreover, from the point of view of man alone. The "Women of Florence" is a historical study of a different nature. In this delightful collection of stories Professor del Lungo deals not with the exploits of the noble and the mighty. He gives us instead glimpses of the intimate life of the men and women—chiefly the women—of that day, wives and mothers and maidens who played their modest parts in the drama of life and died, as they had lived, unknown. With this object Professor del Lungo has investigated sources of information ignored or lightly passed over by the official historian—those family archives, domestic papers and records, inventories of wedding outfits and household property which now possess such inestimable value in enabling us to reconstruct the inner history of a bygone time. Here, indeed, the actual woman is revealed with all her frailties and virtues, her prejudices, loves and hatreds. And how much more alive she is than the great queens and dames of high lineage whose fortunes are told and retold in the pages of history! What a clear idea we get of her relation to man from the farewell letter of the Florentine mother to her daughter on the eve of her marriage! Many and stringent are the injunctions given to the young bride as to her future conduct towards her lord—the second of these commandments being that she should Seek to know what viands he most prefers at dinner and at supper and see that these be prepared for him. And if it should happen that those dishes do not please thee, I would have thee, nevertheless, feign as though they did please thee; for it is seemly that a wife should conform unto the tastes of her husband.

Not a few of the other twelve admonitions given by this wise and gentle dame would kindle the wrath of the emancipated woman of to-day. But such rules came out of the heart and out of the reality of life.

Del Lungo is a historian of distinction, and his book is no mere compilation of dates and facts; indeed, we occasionally feel the lack of precise information in the shape of dates and authorities. He is a scholar and a classic, and this probably accounts for the florid style of his writing, which is not quite suited to the description of the trivial particulars and details of family affairs. Nevertheless, in some measure perhaps owing to the skill of Miss Steegmann, who has adapted rather than translated the original Italian to suit the English taste, the book is singularly attractive. The illustrations, too, some in colour and some in half-tone, and the binding, which is copied from a late cinquecento pattern, are worthy of the letterpress.

Vie de Michel-Ange. By ROMAIN ROLLAND. (Hachette, 2f.)

IT is a terrible and pathetic picture that is drawn for us by M. Rolland of the great spirit of the Italian Renaissance. The little book is designed on strange lines, for it seeks to communicate to us the author's sympathy with Michael Angelo by throwing into lurid relief all the weakness of his personality, all the misery, mental and physical, of a man for whom his genius was too great. Michael Angelo, says M. Rolland, was a being strangled and buffeted by an outrageous and overweening spirit of Art within him. Neither his mind nor his body, neither his natural disposition nor his natural ambitions, were those of this spirit, and it was almost in spite of himself that the morbid, pusillanimous man was forced to become the great, the stupendous artist. Not that he fought against his genius; on the contrary, he spent himself, wore himself out, in a furious endeavour to keep pace with it. But the inherent weakness of the man prevented the artist from carrying out his projects. The utter indecision of character of the proud and sensitive bourgeois of Florence made him as bad a master to the genius as even Pope Julius himself, with his ever-varying schemes and gusts of savage fury. Inherited tendencies in the man, whose father and brothers were brutal and grasping, subserviency, vacillation, suspicion, panic, ill-temper—these were the foes of the divine inspiration which was imprisoned with them in one overwrought body. Yet it seemed as though that body drew fire from the spirit, and that the same purifying flame drove out the weaker qualities of the man. For in the actual service of his Art his patience and his devotion were unending. Only the bitterness of unaccomplished tasks pursued him to the end.

We have heard so much of Michael Angelo the artist—so little of Michael Angelo the man. And M. Rolland has succeeded well in this book; for, to realise the intensity of suffering through which the man went, which would never have been his save for the artist in him, is to know the man, and thereby to understand the artist. And in the figure of "Night" we can read the weary waiting for that day, which the artist dreaded as the end of human endeavour, and for which the man longed as the beginning of divine rest:

Beata l'alma, ove non corre tempo!

Kafir Socialism. By DUDLEY KIDD. (A. and C. Black, 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. KIDD's name is already closely associated with the intimate study of the Kafir by his two previous books, "The Essential Kafir" and "Savage Childhood." The present book is intended to be an Introduction to the Study of the Native Problem in South Africa, and consequently, has politics as its base rather than ethnology or anthropology. The two latter sciences, of course, are prominent in the book, but only as the means or guide by which the solution to the Political Problem may be reached.

As an Introduction to the Problem the book is necessarily short; but there is no scamping of detail where detail is necessary for the satisfactory proof of the author's point. When Mr. Kidd publishes—as he undoubtedly should—an exhaustive work on the same subject, there should be at once a most interesting and complete treatise on a subject that is as important as it is fascinating—a work at once welcome to the philosophical student, and absolutely necessary to the politician and builder of Empire.

Mr. Kidd divides his book into two parts—Kafir Socialism, and The Dawn of Individualism. In the first he discusses primitive Socialism, Kafir conceptions of justice, and the native franchise; in the second he deals with the education of the Kafir, and offers constructive criticism as regards the future development of the race, and the solution of the native problem. We have, then, a study that is at once retrospective and prospective; at the same time, contemporary conditions (as is only natural) hold their own in the horizon of the author.

On the first page Mr. Kidd makes sure of his position, for he offers a definition of that vexed and doubtful term Socialism, and the use of the word throughout the book must be understood in those terms. He says:

The word Socialism is used in these pages to connote an organisation of society in which the means of life—whether production, distribution, or protection—are held in collective ownership.

Whether this definition is adequate or no need not be discussed here. Such a discussion may be left to Fabians and other philosophic Socialists. But there does arise a question in connection with this definition which is most germane to the subject of review. That under the Clan-system of the Kafirs all goods, means of life, and even life itself are held in collective ownership for the good of the Clan, and ultimately of the Tribe, is evident and undeniable. So far the Kafirs are indubitably Socialists. But beyond this Socialism there is something else. This Socialistic tenure is subject absolutely to the will and judgment—too often, perhaps, to the caprice—of the paramount chief, and in this aspect the Kafirs are subject to an autocracy as unquestioned and irresponsible as it is possible to conceive. There is no "government of the people by the people for the people." Such an idea is, according to Mr. Kidd's reiterated statements, entirely hostile to true Kafir thought, and is only to be found among the "half-baked" educated Kafir, who has shaken off all Clan duties. Mr. Kidd would draw a hard-and-fast line between this Democracy and the true Socialism of the Kafir, and consequently readers, in order truly to appreciate his meaning and point, will have to keep constantly before them his definition of the word in use:

The Native Problem is the problem of the native. This is so obvious when once stated, that one would be ashamed to say it unless it were so constantly forgotten. Before we can understand the bearings of the Native Problem, we must study native customs and thought.

These words in Mr. Kidd's preface show the line of his whole argument, and he judges the good or evil effect of our "Reforms" not only by the evident actual results on the subjects of our experiments, but by the attitude towards those reforms of the subjects themselves. For example, we have at any rate emasculated, if not entirely destroyed, the Clan system, and the result is that we are not thanked for our efforts; nor, on the other hand, have we succeeded (speaking generally) in improving the Kafir in spite of himself. That we should be thanked by the Kafir for improving him was, of course, not to be expected. He is evidently most conservative and stationary by nature, and lives and rules by tradition. But that we should have improved him in spite of himself, if he was capable of improvement, might surely be expected. That he is capable of improvement Mr. Kidd proves quite conclusively in the chapters "The Education of the Kafir" and "Can the Ethiopian Change his Skin," but it is equally clear that such improvement is in spite of our methods rather than because of them. The fatal mistake which we seem to have made in our dealings with the Kafir is, according to Mr. Kidd, that we have consistently tinkered with symptoms and not gone to the causes of the evils which we have set about to cure, and that we have striven for uniformity of legislation for a race whom different environment has transformed or varied into quite divergent natures. Adaptation to environment has produced such great changes among this migratory race that whereas, for example, at King Williams-town the natives are quite ready for the Glen Grey Act dealing with land tenure, their cousins in Natal have developed along quite different lines, and the Act would be neither "welcome or useful." In this connection Mr. Kidd notices a strange phenomenon. In his personal research among the Kafirs he has noticed that the further south they have penetrated the lower they have sunk in the social scale, and he states that the Kafir in Cape Colony is degenerate as compared with the Kafir of Nyassa or Tanganyika.

After all this destructive criticism by Mr. Kidd of our education of and legislation for the Kafir—by-the-by, he is convinced that the franchise is not wanted by the Kafir, and would be an immense weapon for harm in his hands—some constructive criticism will be demanded by his readers. This he gives us in his last chapter ; and here we feel that the limits of his book as an introduction have hampered him. At the same time he gives in the Preface a very valid excuse for thus confining his discussion :

There is a further and final reason for not attempting a complete discussion of the Native Problem. It is a most unsuitable time to make such an attempt, because the present Liberal Government, by reserving the affairs of the Kafirs in the Transvaal and Orange River Colony for its own special care, and by interfering in the native affairs of Natal, is virtually stifling discussion ; for what colonist cares to waste his time in presenting a reasoned statement of his views concerning a thousand details of administration when he has every reason for feeling certain that the party that meditates interference in the domestic affairs of South Africa will be guided not by facts and sound sense, but by the uninformed sentiment of "moral experts" ?

At the same time, we are given at least one most fruitful suggestion—the foundation of an Ethnological Bureau, which, from the close and careful study of the folk-lore, tradition, religion, and customs of the Kafir, may reasonably be expected to arrive within an appreciable distance of the Kafir mode of thought, and so may be of immense assistance in legislating for him in such a way as may at the same time give him the boasted British justice, and yet not appear to him to be hopelessly unjust.

As Mr. Kidd says, it is difficult for the white man to think black, but it is certain that until he does he can never hope to succeed in his well-meant efforts to develop and improve the Kafir.

FICTION

Marotz. By JOHN AYSCOUGH. (Constable, 6s.)

It is very rarely that we find in a present-day novel the qualities that combine to make "Marotz" a great book. Simplicity and spiritual force have no place in the number of tricks and mannerisms which constitute the so-called technique of novel-writing. Our ears are troubled with much violent writing about intellectual bullies and the emotionally insane, and our eager vivisectors would have us believe that the human mind is a place of harsh and perpetual clamour, where vice wages endless war with prudence. It is pleasant to leave all this hysterical cleverness behind us and to read the life of a good woman as Mr. John Ayscough has told it with a simplicity which in itself is sufficient to make the book before us unconventional. In spite of this quality, however, we were surprised after reading the book to find on reflection how lacking in sensation had been the life which Mr. Ayscough had made so interesting. Marotz is born of noble Sicilian blood, and she is beautiful. This we should have known even if the author had not told us. When she is seventeen she enters a small convent as a postulant, but leaves it after two years because she is not sure that she has a vocation. She marries a bad man, but soon separates from her husband and brings up her son until he reaches years of indiscretion, when he falls under the influence of his father, and is only saved from utter corruption by the latter's tragic death. We leave Marotz when she is about to marry the man who has always loved her. All this is simple enough, and even the majority of the events we have enumerated are rather mentioned than described. For it is spiritual and emotional happenings that interest Mr. Ayscough, and it is with their aid that he has given us a portrait of a woman, so beautifully and truthfully drawn that we must include Marotz in the small number of fictional characters who have become more real for us than the men and women who share our conscious life. Nor is it only in his treatment of his principal character that the author shows his deep understanding of human nature. "Marotz" contains at least a score of portraits which startle us with their vividness and their lack of conventional values. "Poor Sister," the foundress of the convent, with her ready gift of loving and her gentle humour ; San Vito, the blunt grandfather of Marotz, whose death affords one of the finest chapters of the book ; Hals, her philosophic father ; Maso, the miserly robber ; and Piccolo, her ardent, wayward son, are just a few of the men and women whose images stay in our memory and increase our obligation to the author. As we have suggested, Mr. Ayscough handles these characters in a quite unconventional way, and for the practised reader of novels who has acquired the habit of deducing the contents of each page from the course of events on the page preceding it "Marotz" provides endless surprises. And yet there is no straining after the unusual nor is there any passionate recording of the commonplace. It is merely that Mr. Ayscough adopts a point of view to which our sheep-like novelists have not accustomed us, and that he has the power to convince us that his resulting impressions are as accurate as they are stimulating. There is something of the same freshness in his style, which, at its best, is quite admirable, though here and there it shows traces of the malign influence of foreign languages. We must mention, too, that there are some striking descriptions of Sicilian scenery, though this is, as it always should be, carefully subordinated to the characters who hold the stage. And, finally, there is Marotz. Her we have not endeavoured to describe, for it would seem like an impertinence to condense the author's loving study into the limits of a review. We have narrated the bare facts of her story, and we must refer those who wish to meet and love the living woman herself to Mr. Ayscough's work. Here we will content ourselves with noticing that "Marotz" is dedicated by permission to the King of Sweden. We hope his Majesty deserves it.

The Fifth Queen Crowned. By FORD MADDOX HUEFFER. (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.)

THIS is, apparently, the third of a series of novels dealing with the life of Henry VIII.'s fifth Queen, Katharine Howard. Not that there is anything in the book itself, except its general air of incompleteness, to show the reader that it is a sequel ; but from the advertisements at the beginning and end we learn that the two previous volumes were very good. After perusal of the volume in front of us we find it difficult to believe in the excellence of the forerunners, "The Fifth Queen Crowned" having both in matter and style very little to recommend it. There are at least two ways of writing an historical novel, the discreet and the indiscreet. "Esmond" and "John Inglesant" belong to the former method, where the principal characters of the book are unknown, or unimportant historically, and the great personages of history are only there incidentally and as a setting. In this case the principal characters are Henry VIII., Archbishop Cranmer, the Duke of Norfolk, and Katharine Howard, and their most intimate thoughts and intentions are given at length until the mixture of fact and fiction becomes a folly. Even this defect might have been overlooked to some extent if there had been beauties of style and workmanship in compensation ; but the whole book—the narrative part as well as the conversations—is written in a style which has now become commonly known as "Wardour Street English," from that well-known Soho thoroughfare where antiques and, more especially, sham antiques were to be found in such abundance. Mr. Hueffer, indeed, gives us the impression that he has had at his elbow the catalogue of some second-hand emporium. We have no doubt that much of this antiquarian lore will pass muster, but we should very much like to know whether the little chapel of Edward IV.'s reign was really round-arched.

There is another impression, too, to be gained from this sham archaic writing, and that is that it has been chosen in order to conceal the author's incapacity for writing plain English. It is always dangerous to point out errors where such a method has been adopted, but we think it will be difficult for any one to justify the following examples that have been culled here and there from the many instances which gave us pause :

As if with the furtive eyes and feathery grace of a blonde fox Cranmer's spy came round the great boards.—It was not till very lately since this canon of wedding by a holy friar hath been derided and contemned in this realm.—May the God to whom you have prayed, that softened the heart of Paul, soften thine in this hour.—Near the doorway it was all shadow, and soundlessly she faded away among them.

The italics are all ours. Errors and inelegances peep at us from every page, and we have found it quite impossible to count how often the different characters speak or look "sardonically," or "swallow in their throats," or find their "eyes suffused with blood;" this last unpleasant trait is, we hope, a strictly Tudor one, and is perhaps the result of Mr. Hueffer's antiquarian researches. But we did take the trouble to count, and we found that he has used the word "heavy" in a figurative sense seven times in the first two short pages, and has even had to help it out with "weighty," which occurs twice. No, not even the Outlook, the Daily Telegraph, the Daily News, and others, aided by the Revue des Deux Mondes, whose commendations figure so aggressively on the fly-leaves of this book, shall deter us from saying that "The Fifth Queen Crowned" is a sham, and a "heavy" sham at that.

The Ancient Law. By ELLEN GLASGOW. (Constable, 6s.)

It is some considerable time since America—that land of strange surprises—has furnished us with a genuinely finer novel than "The Ancient Law," by Ellen Glasgow. The book is one of those rare exercises in the art of fiction-writing that deserve to be dignified by the term "a work." The theme of the book is expounded in the large manner that is now so seldom met. The chronicle of Daniel Ordway is related, as all tragic history should be related, with a calm, almost literal, simplicity that at times through its very subject-matter is tinged with an unhappy splendour. The story is really the biography of Daniel Ordway from the time he leaves prison. His after-life is minutely described in all its many varied phases, and we learn in graduating periods, from a slow but precise undertone that runs like a thread of silver fire through the gloomy texture of the entire history, the growth and expression of the man's expanding spirit. Every character in the book is etched with a sure hand that has mastered technique and the relative values of light and shade. Banks, "the impossible;" Baxter, the benevolent tobacco merchant; Milly Trend; Lydia, Daniel's wife, who lives in an atmosphere of anæmic sainthood; Alice, Daniel's prodigal daughter; Beverly, the inconsequent relic of the old Southern aristocracy; and lastly, the woman who loved Daniel and was beloved by him, are all portraits in Miss Glasgow's picture-gallery that stand out with a boldness of outline that is astonishingly life-like. There is little in the book that is dramatic, and nothing that can be called theatrical. The story might easily have degenerated into a sequence of cheap situations and tawdry climaxes. It offers very obvious temptations for an author to produce meretricious effects, but all these Miss Glasgow has avoided with a restraint that is as commendable as it is rare. She has preferred to tell her story of Daniel Ordway with a serene disregard for melodrama or sentimentalism. Yet all the thought in the book is expressed through feeling, and the clear, sonorous prose that rolls out this history of courageous enterprises, immutable sufferings, and the consolation to be found in moments of transient compensation, carries in its burden a depth of emotion that is beyond the compass of shrill or exclamatory expression. Miss Glasgow knows her America well, but for the most part the America to be discovered in "The Ancient Law" is not the habitation of "Tammany," or the "Great Trusts," or the "Jungle." It is old Southern America, beaten, impoverished, and wellnigh forgotten, but touched with the dignity of defeat and a pathos irresistibly associated with the crumbling dissolution of any State or human community that has been driven into the backwaters of the world. Such a background, breathing the autumnal spirit of decay, makes an admirable—it would seem an inevitable—setting for Miss Glasgow's powerful and very actual story.

Anne Page. By NETTA SYRETT. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)

In her latest novel Miss Netta Syrett's manner is at direct variance with her matter. The former is almost cloyingly sentimental, the latter almost brutal. The whole story is powdered over with fine sugary sentiment, embellished with innumerable floral decorations, and heavily sweetened with a liberal allowance of that syrupy substance which is, perhaps, the chief constituent of schoolgirl romance. This style of writing is harmless enough when it is utilised to express a congenial theme, but in Miss Syrett's case the ugliness of her story is accentuated, and in places rendered positively repellent, by a method of narration so utterly unsuited to its subject. We start well enough in the old approved fashion of tea-garden sentimentalism. We are introduced to the soft afterglow of the sunset, the sweet-scented lilac trees, the lichen-stained sundial, the cool, plashing fountain, and last, but not least, the quiet-mannered, beautiful woman, whose face "had the delicacy of a white rose," and whose eyes were as blue as corn-flowers. Truly a promising start, and, having concluded the first chapter, we come unreservedly to the conclusion that "Anne Page," or "Sweet Anne Page," as she is called throughout the story, would make an ideal companion for all our little girls when they return home for summer holidays. However, our conclusions, built somewhat rashly upon slender premises, were rapidly proved to be erroneous. After a time we are translated from "the lavender garden," the parsonage, and the general atmosphere of quiet English country life into a Paris that is all art and naughtiness. We discover that "Sweet Anne Page" has "a past." She had been the mistress of a painter and a genius. She had refused to marry this shadowy personage, but had decided, nay, had even invited, a casual union from motives that, properly considered, can only be regarded as the baser appetites of the flesh. Moreover, Anne Page's indiscretions appear to be of an alarmingly common variety amongst the women who inhabit Miss Netta Syrett's "lavender gardens." The local doctor's wife also visits Paris, and is also apparently quite willing to become the mistress of another painter and genius, a gentleman of light conversation, who was an intimate of that other great man of Gallic origin, who had formerly enslaved the passions of Anne Page. However, the doctor's wife agrees to return to her husband, and, upon Anne Page's advice, to deceive him. Even here the full catalogue of Miss Syrett's erring ladies is not exhausted. The local clergyman's daughter is preparing to start for America with a theatrical company under the guidance of the traditionally wicked manager, when the ubiquitous Anne, whose tastes, it should be remembered, lie all in the direction of Parisian painters, intervenes. The end is very much after the fashion of the beginning. We have June roses, and sundials, and sunsets, and fragrant country gardens once more. The only reflection aroused by this curious novel is a reassuring belief that the ladies who adorn our English country life are neither so incontinent nor so inherently stupid as Miss Syrett would have us suppose. Our author's style in parts and places possesses an actual charm.

The Grey Knight. By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE. (Smith and Elder, 6s.)

To open a new novel by Mrs. Henry de la Pasture is to experience a feeling of pleasurable anticipation. She is the possessor of a style that is always distinctive, and an art of happy narration whereby the most threadbare incidents are redeemed from the commonplace. "The Grey Knight" is an excellent example of her method. The story has been told before more than once, but in the hands of Mrs. de la Pasture it acquires a more vivid interest and a deeper pathos. It is, in brief, a love-story in which the man is many years older than the woman. He is a widower, she a widow. "A common greyness silvers everything." But the grey turns rose with the dawning of love. Sir Harry Gwynn is not in externals an attractive character, but he is capable of a deep-rooted attachment, and he cannot bear to think that the woman he loves should be unworthy of his adoration. In order to live he must idealise—it is one of the marks of the egoist. Louise, the loved one, is guilty of a momentary indiscretion. It is, at the worst, a pardonable fault, due rather to weakness than to folly, but in the eyes of the infatuated lover it assumes the aspect of the unpardonable sin. Complications ensue, and there is much unhappiness for two fond creatures whom freakishness rather than fate has kept apart, but in the end the expected happens. In the meanwhile there is much diverting by-play, and a charming picture of life in a country house. Mrs. de la Pasture has a finished touch, and her minor characters are to the manner born. Anna Owen, with her uncompromising and wholly exasperating honesty, and Gwenllian Cadoc, that perfect embodiment of English girlhood, are especially delightful, nor would one willingly forget Dr. Morgan, and his Dresden shepherdess of a wife. The author, indeed, has but one fault that matters. She is too conscious of her background, and is for ever taking the reader out into the garden to see the marigolds in blossom. This is an excess of literary hospitality. But it has, nevertheless, to be said that in "The Grey Knight" we have a novel which for a certain quiet charm and sweetness of atmosphere it would be hard to match. It is a worthy successor to "Peter's Mother."

The Trailor's Wife. By W. H. WILLIAMSON. (Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

THE most noticeable thing about this book is the style in which it is written. Owing to the fact that it is composed almost entirely of short, dry sentences, the reader is propelled through it by sharp jerks which are distinctly disconcerting. He is left with a confused impression of anarchist plots, beautiful Russian countesses and villainous Government officials; but what really remain in his memory are trenchant statements such as these—"Ideals have more power than individuals;" "Those who work in the dark must expect to work double!" "Silence is of the beasts that perish, speech is man's glory;" "Experience teaches!" "Nothing can upset power but power;" "The joy of a crowd is to destroy;" "So many things in this world come too late." Extreme brevity sometimes leads to confusion, and when the bewildered reader is told that "he dropped a white handkerchief over his car," he is led into the wildest conjectures as to the relative sizes of pocket-handkerchiefs and motor-cars in Russia.

The Gates that Shall Not Prevail. By HERBERT M. FARRINGTON. (Lane, 6s.)

SHOULD Mr. Farrington be prevailed upon to follow on the footsteps of Mr. Hall Caine and dramatise his book—a step which we should sincerely regret—he would be sure of instant success at Drury Lane and in the provinces. The story speaks for itself. A well-known artist of atheistical tendencies is engaged on a picture in which the central figure is that of a monk. He is still searching in vain for a model who will realise his conception of this monk when Lord Mauverne, an elderly roué, offers to introduce to him a certain Paul Servain, commonly known as "Brother Paul," in whom he takes a mysterious interest. The artist meets "Brother Paul":

A man in the prime of life, . . . tall, sinewy, . . . with a broad forehead, . . . firm-set mouth and jaw, . . . wonderful dark eyes, dressed in a monk's gown of rough brown stuff, girt round him with a cord of the same material;

takes him as his model and finishes the picture, which is, of course, the success of the year. He then visits "Brother Paul" at his Settlement in the East End, and makes the acquaintance of several of his friends, notably one Bunker Bill, king of the sandbaggers, and excellent material for melodrama. Having once been thoroughly pummelled by the indomitable "Brother," he has dedicated his life to the pummelling of all Servain's foes. Unfortunately a frail but alluring beauty, Violetta by name, casts a jealous eye upon Servain, and many intense and dramatic "situations" ensue. The last scene, in which Violetta makes a violent repentance and Lord Mauverne acknowledges Brother Paul as his son, would be described by a Drury Lane audience as thrilling. We are led to believe that Violetta ends her life as a district visitor.

The Primadonna. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. (Macmillan, 6s.)

"THE PRIMADONNA" is an excellent example of Mr. Crawford's work. Although he must be by now the author of nearly forty volumes, this, his latest, may be accounted amongst the best. No other writer of to-day could have given us such a blend of exciting adventure and skilful character-drawing. Furthermore, the author begins by giving us the impression that his heroes are all villains, but the subsequent "whitewashing" is done with a gracefulness that disarms criticism. Margaret Donne, the primadonna, possesses a personality, half real, half theatrical, that influences everybody with whom she comes into contact. Mr. Van Torp and others come under her influence for a time, but the millionaire is really in love with Lady Maud, a married woman with a Semitic appetite for hard cash that is strangely blended with a delicate sense of honour. Amid all the complications of a murder mystery and the persecution of Van Torp, the suspected murderer, Margaret Donne, the American, Lady Maud, and Logotheti work out their salvation, finally assorting themselves into the couples convention demands in a modern novel. There are several other persons of importance to the literary skill of Mr. Crawford, if not to the story he sets out to tell. The mannerisms of singers, in society and out of it, are excellently described, and there is a great deal of humour, quiet and cynical, which will be thoroughly enjoyed by the reader whose sense is not numbed by a recital of adventures. Readers of "The Soprano" will not be disappointed in "The Primadonna." The latter is in every way an improvement on its predecessor, and is really one of those rare instances where a sequel marks an advance in method. The publishers are to be congratulated on the make-up of the volume. The book is pleasant to handle and the type gratifying to the eye.

Marozia. By A. G. HALES. (Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

It is not to be expected that one man should be able to write twenty-two good short stories—the number embodied in Mr. Hales's new book—and if the author of "Marozia" fails to hold the reader each time, he is not to be blamed for failing to accomplish the almost impossible. "Marozia" is the name of the royal adventuress who dominates the first eight stories, and there is never any doubt as to the original of the character. Mr. Hales writes with a certain cosmopolitan glamour, and he introduces us to Balkan mountains, brigands, and caves with a familiarity that suggests the born traveller and romancer. There is plenty of colour in his stories and a superabundance of fighting and love-making. Marozia, a sort of modern Lais, provides the author with material for eight love-stories, and, as this is much above the Mrs. Grundy average, the character of the queen can be easily guessed. The other contributions to the volume are not so well written, with the exception of the last, "The Fiddle of Death"—which is quite the best thing in the whole book—and, after the enticing adventures of Marozia, such episodes as a murder, a duel, and a battle seem tame enough. It is scarcely necessary to emphasise Mr. Hales's skill as a writer of romance, for he is rapidly becoming one of our most prolific novelists, but it is to be feared that he may write too much. "Marozia" is an interesting and well-written collection of short stories of the super-magazine type. Whether literature of this kind is worth reproducing in volume form is doubtful, though it can be said that Mr. Hales very nearly justifies it by his latest volume.

Where Passion Swayed. By W. ASHLEY LARKINS. (12s. net.)

IN his essay on Fontainebleau Stevenson wrote sympathetically of "the last heart-throbs of that excited amateur who has to die in all of us before the artist can be born." The phrase recurs to us irresistibly in connection with the novel under notice. It is not merely that Mr. Ashley Larkins publishes his book himself in an ugly binding at an improbable price, nor would we venture to call Mr. Larkins an excited amateur for his Preface alone, though therein he modestly proposes to preserve order in the world by writing fiction. But on every page of this book there is the mark of the amateur, the man who has not taken the trouble to learn his trade of writing as he might have learnt it, and the result is a quantity of undigested thought flung together at random and expressed in the vilest of English. The book appears—for the author's incoherence is at times almost pathetic—to be a kind of allegory, in which Mr. Larkins seeks to express his disapproval of passion and lawyers. But the whole thing is incredibly stupid, and we have deemed it kinder to tell Mr. Ashley Larkins the truth than to leave his nonsense unnoticed.

CORRESPONDENCE

POLITICS WITH A VENGEANCE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am wondering what measures will be taken to make you sorry for having published this week's paragraph concerning the pledges given to Manchester's Asiatic Colony by the candidate with the double-barrelled nationality and allegiance.

If the paragraph had appeared in a daily journal it would have been promptly followed with the withdrawal from its columns of the advertisements of Dr. Defraudemstein's Lightning Cancer Cure, of Swindleitch's Free Diamond Ring Offer, of Swettenberg's 11s. Overcoat, and of other profitable patronage. But, unfortunately, a weekly literary journal is not such a suitable medium for advertising sovereign remedies, "free jewellery fakes," and sweat-shop clothing as are the various organs of Atheism, Semitism, Anglophobia, and Anti-Nationalism that are published daily, and so you will have to be made to realise the error of your ways other than through the medium of THE ACADEMY advertisement department.

How you could have been so reckless as to publish the paragraph I cannot understand. If a writer for a halfpenny daily were to pen anything of that character he would be shipped back to New York by the very next steamer. If the naturalised Italians, Germans, or Frenchmen in this country were so regardless of their oaths of loyalty to their adopted country as to attach greater importance to the unrestricted immigration of the harpies, paupers, prostitutes, lepers, criminals, and lunatics of their race than to any matter affecting the interests of the mere natives; and if some semi-foreign politician in exchange for their votes were so false to his duty to his country as to pledge himself to secure the further abrogation of the law designed to exclude these alien undesirables, any unfavourable comments you might make on his conduct would be excusable. But when you condemn the action of a semi-Yankee politician who promises to play the traitor in order to secure the votes of members of the noble breed which has furnished our country with 90 per cent. of its brothels, sweat-shops, usury offices, and gambling dens, which has enriched our population with a huge swarm of perjurers, thieves, swindlers, procurers, souteneurs, white-slave traffickers, etc., and supplies, at least, one of our political parties with its campaign funds—you prove yourself to be an anti-Semite of the deepest dye.

But perhaps, Sir, you did not mean it, and are already sorry, and anxious to make amends. If such be the case, you should hasten to communicate with the private secretary of Sir Percy Mosenstein, c.o. C-bd-n Club, the popular leader of the powerful Jewish Party in the Commons, the "glose bersonal frendt of dot sblendit veller ———," the big contributor to the Radical Party funds who arranged that little deal whereby all the principal opponents of the Aliens Act were, with one exception, given important posts in the present Government, and the Chairman of the Society for Promoting the Colonisation of Britain with the Superior Races of Mankind.

Upon forwarding your letter, you will receive a series of articles showing the great benefit Great Britain derives from the 50,000 "religious refugees" who come here each year to fill the gaps made in our population by the disappearance of the 300,000 natives who, thanks partly to the generous pecuniary assistance of Sir Percy and the great Lord Hoggstein, are enabled each year to seek a living in other lands. By publishing these articles in THE ACADEMY, and the letters signed "Modern Huguenot," "British Patriot," "Anglo-Saxon," "Fair Play," etc., with which you will also be supplied, and which contain some very caustic comments on the narrow-minded persons who selfishly want to keep Britain for the use of the subject race, you will atone for the wicked anti-Semitic outburst you have been guilty of.

CATHOLIC MARTYRS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—On Monday, May 4th, the Catholic Church keeps the memory of "All our Blessed English Martyrs since the schism of 1534."

At Tyburn alone ninety-one perished, usually after hideous tortures. The roll of martyrs included the monks from the Charterhouse, priests (secular and regular), undergraduates from the Universities (especially Oxford), laymen, and artisans.

Many of them died praying for England and the King. Standing on the site of the ancient Tyburn, near the Marble Arch, is one in a row of handsome houses. This has been purchased by a convent of nuns who keep alive there the memory of the martyrs. The drawing-room has been turned into a chapel. Over the door, beneath the cross, is inscribed the word "Tyburn." In this chapel for three days, May 1st to May 4th, is kept a solemn festival in honour of the martyrs. Behind the altar, with its white draperies, is hung the English flag, and before it stand two large candles, marked "For the King" and "For England."

ETHEL ROSS BARKER.

THE JUDGES AND FLOGGING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In a recent Memorial to the Prime Minister, the Secretary of the Humanitarian League stated that three of our most experienced criminal Judges steadily refused to award the lash for robbery with violence. These three Judges all bear Catholic names—Russell, Brampton, Mathew. Lord Justice Mathew was identified with the work of the Criminal Law and Prison Reform Department of the League, while Baron Brampton was in friendly touch with its Hon. Secretary, Mr. Collinson, to whom he wrote in 1899:

The victim of the lash will become a brutal outlaw.
Flogging brings out the very worst in a man's nature.

In naming these three great administrators of the law the Secretary of the Humanitarian League was unconsciously giving Catholics a point that is not likely, I think, to pass wholly unnoticed in polemics; for, in the words of a writer in the Tablet:

Here, at least, is a category in which the formula "one man in three" is not an over-statement, but an under-estimate in Catholic and Protestant proportions.

SIMPLIFIED SPELLING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am not aware if the literary Press has noticed the circular recently issued by the Simplified Spelling Board. Having regard to its influential backing, the document is important and likely to have far-reaching consequences. Many spelling changes are proposed, and many more implied. It is a safe prophecy that in a generation most of them will be firmly embedded in the literature of America. They do not seem to have been yet ratified officially, so that if any debatable points arise out of them the present seems the time to state them. THE ACADEMY was so friendly to the reform movement during the late controversy that it may take upon itself to elicit the British view of the present phase of the question.

The S.S.B. is doubtless acting on the best American advice. The Board itself carries weight, and it has the co-operation of an Advisory Council specially formed for the purpose from among prominent professors of the language and educationists drawn from many of the States of the Union—a body manifestly intended to nationalise the movement.

The new proposals are familiar enough to those who have followed the many endeavours to effect reforms in this country—the substitution of f for ph, the preterit ending of -ed changed to -t where so pronounced, elision of that unsightly relic of our guttural forbears -ugh, and of final e and ue where not lengthening the preceding vowel. There is an unclassified list of revised spellings:—Aile for aisle, ake, agast, gost, bild, foren, forfit, surfit, gard, hight, iland, quire, sissors, sithe, siv, sent for scent, soveren, curtesy, crum, det, lim, thum, wier, wierd, yoman, etc.—forms obviously simpler, and for all of which historical warrant is claimed.

It would be comforting to know that the Americans are not going to take unwarrantable liberties with our language. Professor Skeat, Drs. Murray and Wright, and other British members of the Board have probably seen to that. But have they not been caught napping in allowing to pass such spellings as docil, facil, hostil, servil? It is news that these words are so uttered in America. It cannot be pretended that they are so spoken here.

A SPELLING REFORMER.

A SUGGESTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your notice of the Arundel Club's publications encourages me to write to your columns on a matter which has several times occurred to me before. It is the possibility of formation of a similar club whose members would receive reproductions of contemporary pictures of a kind seldom reproduced. Perhaps something of the sort is now in existence, or has been started in the past, but failed for lack of support. I do not know. And, not knowing, it seems to me that such a club, besides fulfilling a very useful function, would receive a large measure of support. Its success would depend on three things. Firstly, the strength of the committee. That is an essential point; classic names by all means, and also well-known members of the New English Art Club or other of Mr. Wake Cook's Little Bethels. Secondly, the attitude of the artists and owners of the pictures. I cannot see why it should be anything other than favourable. And, finally, the support received from the picture-loving public, which would depend to a great extent on the way in which the first two conditions were fulfilled.

Reproducers of modern paintings confine their attentions pretty closely to the atrocious and the stupid. Personally, I should like to possess copies of works by—well, who knows?—Brangwyn, Ricketts, John, Arnesby Brown, Strang, Bone, and scores of equally well-known and less-famous men. Further, I believe many others think like myself.

Modern colour reproduction presents alluring possibilities which a Committee would decide on in individual cases.

BOOKBUYING VERSUS BORROWING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Just a year ago the so-called Book War was raging, and the book-world was in the throes of a bitter dispute as to the fate of the six-shilling novel. The experiment of issuing new fiction at half-a-crown was attempted by my own firm and a few others, but was successful only for a time, being killed mainly by the apathy of the Book Trade. The six-shilling novel we have still with us, but beyond a few libraries and beyond a few favoured authors its sale has fallen to a very low figure indeed. It is in a sorry plight, and thousands are being sold to remainder-dealers for a few pence. The booksellers who refused to support the fair and reasonable price of half-a-crown for fiction and endeavoured to bolster up the six-shilling novel now find themselves faced with far cheaper fiction, which they are bound to sell because the public demand it. To-day, in spite of the general slackness of the Book Trade, there is quite a boom in shilling fiction. Let any one look at any railway bookstall and see the piles of such recent novels as Rider Haggard's "Ayesha," Keble Howard's "Girl who Never Lied," the Baroness Orczy's successes, and a host of others such as "Sinless," "The Sands of Pleasure," "Brewster's Millions," etc., all attractively produced, many in cloth, and selling by the hundred-thousand. What is the reason of it all? Just this, it seems to me, that the great reading public will buy their books instead of borrowing them if they are issued at a price within their reach. A shilling is a very low figure, but it is possible, if a book is a good one, able to command a large sale. Half-a-crown was a better price still, but the Book Trade would not have it, so now they have much lower-priced books to handle. Yet, if they can only look ahead, they should see how the cheap good book means the salvation of their business because it means reaching a buying public instead of a borrowing one. France has already proved what enormous sales are possible at reasonable prices. Only the other day I picked up a copy of René Bazin's latest novel; it bore the inscription "forty-seventh edition," and this within a month or two of issue. The boom in the shilling novel has not so far been noticed by the Press, but it is a movement that is spreading so fast that it seems worthy of consideration and perhaps comment.

THE ENGLISH PEOPLE OVERSEAS

A History. By A. WYATT TILBY. To be completed in Three Volumes. Vol. I. just ready. Demy 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

In the preface the author says that "it has been his first principle that no settlement of the English-speaking people overseas should be left unnoticed; and his second, that the actors should, as far as possible, speak for themselves from the records they have left behind." He has made a careful study of existing and original authorities; and it is believed that the work will be found both accurate and impartial.

THE WORLD THAT NEVER WAS

"The World that Never Was" is a children's book of an entirely novel kind. It is specially written for children, but the interest and humour of it appeal almost as strongly to adult as to younger readers. It is the newest, quaintest children's book that has appeared since "Alice in Wonderland."

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer AND PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

A NOVEL QUARTETTE

¶ In introducing A NOVEL QUARTETTE I have in mind the general verdict passed upon THE LITERARY FOUR-IN-HAND. The chorus of praise that these four volumes received far exceeded my most sanguine hopes, and from the appearance of the first reviews the success of each and every book was assured. I have no doubt that A NOVEL QUARTETTE will prove as acceptable as THE LITERARY FOUR-IN-HAND.

A GREAT ENGLISH NOVEL

¶ "Such books are worth keeping on the shelves, even by the classics," was the opinion of the Times upon THE WINGLESS VICTORY. The numerous readers of Miss Willcocks' previous book will not, I venture to think, be disappointed in A MAN OF GENIUS. It will be remembered that the critics received her last book with acclamation, which resounded in America, and is vibrating in Germany and Scandinavia, where the book has been translated. A MAN OF GENIUS shows a profound knowledge of art, love, passion, and the elemental things of life. It will convince the reader of the danger incurred by the children of earth in playing with fire. There will be ten illustrations by W. STORY.

A GREAT AUSTRALIAN NOVEL

¶ There are two things that a publisher is always anxious to discover, a Great Australian Novelist and a Great Irish Novelist. When I received my reader's report upon THE BISHOP'S SCAPEGOAT, by T. B. CLEGG, I felt that perhaps one of these discoveries was about to be made. The following quotation will perhaps justify me to some degree: "In my opinion Mr. CLEGG is a novelist who will at no very distant date achieve one of those successes which make a big reputation." Perhaps THE BISHOP'S SCAPEGOAT will be that book. It is instinct that makes a novelist, and Mr. CLEGG has that instinct. He tells only what is necessary to the development of his story; he concentrates; and above all he convinces both as regards description of places and the drawing of character. The Bishop of Capricornia is a fine figure of a man who accepts his punishment without murmur. I can with some amount of reason look forward to a real success for this novel.

A GREAT GERMAN NOVEL

¶ On the publication of CLARA VIEBIG'S remarkable book ABSOLUTION in Germany last autumn, a two-column review appeared in the Westminster Gazette, from which the following passages are selected: "In Germany, this book of the sombre purple cover and the design of a halo surrounding the strange title is everywhere. It is on train and steamer, in little odd bookshops of sleepy country towns, and (often in strange company) among the best-displayed wares in the shop windows of the main streets of great cities. 'It is a terrible book,' people say, as they sit poring over its pages, but we doubt whether any one, having taken it up, lays it aside as too 'terrible' before he has reached the abrupt, dramatic end. . . . The face of a woman, young and proud, and very beautiful, haunts the pages of the new novel by the most powerful of the woman writers of Germany. In the pale face burn the dark, unfathomable eyes, in which, by turn, the passion of heavenly and earthly love flares up and does battle against the childlike simplicity and innocence of heart that makes the woman a danger to every man who crosses her path."

A GREAT FRENCH NOVEL

¶ If ABSOLUTION created a sensation in Germany, THE CHILD OF CHANCE (Le Semeur) had no less a vogue in France. It was the book of the season, and as such immensely discussed in Paris. The heroine of ABSOLUTION is a woman to whom man is the Lover, to Marie-Cécile in MAXIME FORMONT'S NOVEL man is essentially the Father. The justification of illicit love has formed the subject of many plays and novels, but the rights of maternity have been grievously overlooked. Can the maternal instincts in a woman blot out her "shame," and justify her for a, to her, necessary and inevitable act of disobedience to conventional standards? The portrait of Marie-Cécile offers a partial solution to the problem. The audacity of the book is equalled only by its restraint. M. FORMONT knows that he is dealing with a delicate subject, but he deals with it as a man, one who not only recognises the cry for motherhood but knows what it portends.

In addition to A Novel Quartette, I have the following important books almost ready:

(I) THE LIFE OF SIR HALLIDAY MACARTNEY, K.C.M.G., Commander of Li Hung Chang's trained force in the Taeping Rebellion, founder of the first Chinese Arsenal, Secretary to the first Chinese Embassy to Europe, Secretary and Councillor to the Chinese Legation in London for thirty years. By DEMETRIUSC. BOULGER, with a Foreword by SIR JAMES CRICHTON BROWNE, and numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 24s. net. (II) THE SHAKESPEARE PROBLEM RESTATED. By GEORGE GREENWOOD, M.P. Demy 8vo. Price 21s. net. Scholars admit that a large portion of the dramas contained in the First Folio of 1623 did not emanate from the pen of Shakespeare. Was the author of these plays really William Shakespeare? In the present work the author restates the arguments for the negative case—viz., that the Stratford player was not the real Shakespeare. No attempt is made to uphold the Baconian, or any other theory of authorship, or to arrive at any positive solution of "The Shakespeare Problem." (III) THE CREED OF BUDDHA. By the author of "The Creed of Christ." Crown 8vo. 5s. net. The author of "The Creed of Christ" here makes an attempt to ascertain the inner faith of the Founder of Buddhism, and reaches conclusions diametrically opposed to the views about "Buddha" which have long been current in the West. He believes that Buddhism, as taught by its founder, was identical, in the last resort, with the teaching of Christ.

SPIRIT, MATTER, AND MORALS.

By R. DIMSDALE STOCKER.
This book is an attempt to establish practical religion upon a thoroughly credible basis. The author finds morality, or human conduct, to be the foundation. He discusses "Spiritualism," "Materialism," and "Modern Rationalism," in the claims of neither of which he discovers that of which the modern thinker is in search. His conclusions will be acceptable to all who are alive to this pressing problem of the hour.

"It is one of the most stimulating books we have come across for a long time. The insight and wit with which this inquiry is carried out are remarkable as a deep-going criticism of modern science and philosophy. This is so delightful a writer that we could go on quoting him with pleasure for pages."—The Theosophical Review.

GREENING'S SPRING LIST

Messrs. Greening beg to announce that they have just published a book that should be worthy of the attention of sociologists and others interested in the workings of the brain. It is entitled "Education, Personality, and Crime," and is written by Dr. Albert Wilson, whose authority is unquestioned.

EDUCATION, PERSONALITY, AND CRIME

By ALBERT WILSON, M.D.

With about 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo., cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

The Author makes a new departure in suggesting that degeneracy forms as distinct a class as insanity. As a scientific basis he gives a full analysis of the brain of a degenerate who was a murderer. There are many micro-photographs to prove his case. If later observers support this view it will form quite a novel feature not only in pathology, but also in sociology and in the medico-legal aspect of crime.

Education, Responsibility, and Empire-building each occupy a chapter, while the subject of multiple personality and the sub-ego receives special attention. The Author details one case, already published, which he watched for thirteen years, and also a second case recently brought under his notice, besides enumerating several other cases from various sources, both at home and abroad.

The Author's remarks on crime and criminals will cause much discussion and controversy amongst the experts, his theories on "multiple personality" alone being startling yet convincing.

Amongst the important Books of 1908 must be reckoned Mr. Samuel Cowan's "History of the Royal House of Stuart," which has been acknowledged by critics to be the authoritative work on the subject.

THE ROYAL HOUSE OF STUART

Demy 8vo., cloth, 2 Vols., £2 2s. net.

This work is illustrated with portraits of all the Stuart Sovereigns, and contains the most complete collection of Stuart Portraits ever brought together, including a large number hitherto unpublished. By special permission of the Duke of Sutherland the famous Orkney portrait of Mary, Queen of Scots, has been now for the first time reproduced, while another valuable picture—the portrait of Queen Annabella Drummond, wife of Robert III.—is also given through the courtesy of Sir James Drummond of Hawthornden.

The Author has spent much labour and research in the production of this work. The "House of Stuart" is undoubtedly the most interesting chapter we possess of Scottish History, and the author starts as far back as the eleventh century, when we get a glimpse of the Thanes of Lochaber, the progenitors of the Stuarts. The early part of the work is devoted to an outline in brief of the High Stewards of Scotland, the first time that a consecutive narrative of these officers of the Crown has been attempted, and this is succeeded by a condensed narrative of the official life and administration of every Sovereign of the House of Stuart, concluding with Queen Anne, the last Sovereign of the Stuart line.

THE ROYAL HOUSE OF STUART

Messrs. Greening's List of Spring Fiction will be found by novel readers to satisfy the most exacting taste.

A REMARKABLE NOVEL BY THE "JEWISH KIPLING." THE NEW GALATEA.

By SAMUEL GORDON. 6s.

Mr. Samuel Gordon is to be classed among the small but noteworthy band of novelists, including Maarten Maartens and Joseph Conrad, to whom English is an acquired language. In fact, Mr. Gordon did not speak or write a word of English till well in his teens. But that did not prevent him from earning, for his Jewish stories, the title of "The Jewish Kipling." However, for his novel, "The New Galatea," Mr. Gordon had chosen a thoroughly English group of characters, and handles a theme which in its boldness is reminiscent of the most advanced Continental writers, with a delicacy which cannot offend even the most Puritanical taste.

LIFE AND LETTERS

If the children's fête in aid of the National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children at Claridge's on Tuesday last cannot claim any space in these columns under the heading of "Letters," it can anyhow claim to have been a piece of "Life," and very pretty life at that. Now we come to think of it, there was also an element of "Letters" about it, for Mrs. Walter Cave's little play, The Three Wishes, without having any pretensions to being a serious piece of literature, was nevertheless a very charming and pleasing affair, and many more pretentious dramatists might learn a lesson from that clever and cultivated lady as to the value of simplicity and directness. The whole fête was a brilliant success in every way. It was in reality a Beauty show of the very first order, a striking and almost bewildering witness to the beauty, grace, and charm of English children. There were beautiful women there too, and if we were inclined to draw such a dull thing as a moral out of such a faëry spectacle, we might point it by saying that it was rather a curious thing to observe that the women who looked most beautiful, most young, and most happy were precisely those who do not hunger and thirst after "Society," but who are content to live their lives according to their best lights, without troubling their heads for one instant about whether "Society" from the Top (with a big T) to the bottom approves of them or not. "Society" is full of noble and splendid women with beautiful souls in beautiful or ordinary bodies; on the other hand, it is equally full of mean, foolish, spiteful, and backbiting women with ugly souls in beautiful or ordinary bodies. In other words, it is made up of individuals, and the wise are those who realise that, while individuals can benefit or hurt "Society," "Society" as a whole is powerless against the individual unless with his own consent. "Society" can neither hurt nor help a great man or a great woman. Resist "Society," and (unlike the Devil) it will run after you.

It appears that there is a paper published in the neighbourhood of Tudor Street which is edited in part by a gentleman whose real business lies in Mincing Lane. This gentleman's feeling for letters will be understood when we mention that he prints in large type under his own name such pretty sentences as the following :

His frock-coats are immaculate, and has he not rendered the flannel collar fashionable among the gilded youth (and the youthful guild which studies fashion at Hope Brothers)?

As a sort of side-line this gentleman's paper devotes much attention to "cheap sugar" and fortune-telling with the help of stale ribbons. And he appears to have concluded that he is a great judge of other matters; for he takes it upon himself in his current issue to decide between ourselves and a certain music-hall manager. His decision is of no consequence whatever. But he makes certain suggestions which are without foundation. He has evidently misconstrued the whole matter—which is not surprising in view of his alien connections. If he values the good opinion of his readers, we should advise him to stick to his sugar-boiling and his fortune-telling, and leave matters which are beyond his comprehension to take care of themselves.

A letter from Mr. R. W. Raper in the Times of May 6th on the Preservation of Mountain Scenery, and a previous letter from Mr. Salt, deserve notice. Mr. Raper pleads practically for the preservation of beautiful scenery by means of nationalisation, with due regard to the rights of private property. Particularly he advocates the institution of a Department of State for this purpose. He suggests that such a Department should form part of the Board of Agriculture, the Local Government Board, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, or that the National Trust should be constituted a Department of State for the purpose. Though we fully agree with Mr. Raper in desiring the preservation of the remaining natural beauties of this country, we cannot advocate any increase of Government, whether national or local. We should naturally prefer the former as the less stupid and corrupt of the two, but we doubt whether any existing political party would not readily sacrifice all the mountains in these islands in favour of the commercial syndicates on whose support they depended. It appears to us that far more can be done in the matter by societies than by legislation.

We desire to congratulate Mr. Birrell on the safe passage through the House of Commons of his Irish Universities Bill. It is a very cheering sign of the times to find that the Nonconformists, and Protestants within the Anglican Church can only muster thirty-eight votes on a division. It is only another indication of the extraordinary force of the Catholic revival in the English Church which is now going on. When taken in conjunction with the fact that the Nonconformist bodies are on every side deploring heavy defections in their numbers, it forms a most unexpectedly hopeful state of affairs. We do not seem to hear much nowadays of the National Protestant Alliance, and we have for some time past been blissfully free from any public demonstrations on the part of Lady Wimborne. That the baneful influence of Protestantism in the English Church is not, however, quite extinct there is, unfortunately, sufficient proof to be found in the deplorable and scandalous action of the Bishop of Newcastle in connection with the Mission of the Holy Resurrection at Newcastle. We have before now drawn attention to this disgraceful state of affairs, but apparently nothing can be done. The Bishop of Newcastle, in acting as he does, is flouting the opinion of all the churches in his diocese, and there are undoubted signs that his presence as Bishop in that diocese is becoming intolerable to the clergy and laity alike.

Mr. R. J. Campbell, speaking at the City Temple the other day, made use of the following words :

Since the day when I first stood here as your minister I have become the best-hated man in the British pulpit.

Now it is a lamentable thing that Mr. Campbell should make such a foolish mistake as to imagine that he is hated. It is a typical result of the theological fog through which he is groping his way that he should confuse hatred of his doctrines with hatred of himself. Nobody hates "the New Theology" and all its works more than we do, and yet we can honestly say that never at any time have we been within a thousand miles of hating Mr. Campbell. One only has to look at his face to see that he is a decent, clean, straight man. We recognise that Mr. Campbell's errors are entirely due to his present state of "invincible ignorance." We have not the least doubt that Mr. Campbell will become a good Catholic before long. (Need we say that by the word Catholic we do not necessarily mean Roman Catholic?) It seems to us inevitable in the case of a man of his nature, and he is probably much nearer to it than he imagines. Our advice to Mr. Campbell is to stop preaching for two years, and during that time to read and listen and think, and cultivate intellectual humility. It will be a very difficult thing to do; but it can be done, and he ought to do it. In the meanwhile he may take it from us that nobody of any consequence hates him or wishes him aught but well.

An exhibition of jewellery made by Miss Violet Ramsay will be held at Leighton House from May 22nd until June 4th. We take this opportunity of calling attention to Miss Ramsay's work, not only on its own merits, but as representing a society of artists and craftsmen and a technical school which have not yet received the attention which they deserve. Miss Ramsay's exhibition is confined to her own work, but it does great credit to the Sir John Cass Society of Arts and Crafts, of which she is an active organising member, and further, to Sir John Cass's School, which alone supplies members to the Society and is solely responsible for Miss Ramsay's technical training. Sir John Cass's School is fortunately well-endowed, and has not the opportunity for self-advertisement entailed by the necessity for begging. That the School forms excellent craftsmen has been shown by the two exhibitions already held by the Society, and we hope that the School will take its proper place at the approaching Art Conference. The Society is the product of the School, though constitutionally a separate body. Its two exhibitions—the first at Mr. Goldman's house in the summer of 1906, and the second at the Rowley Gallery on Campden Hill in the autumn of 1907—were unfortunately of such short duration that they missed much notice. At these, besides Miss Ramsay's jewellery, Miss Ethel Agnew's beautiful translucent enamelling, and Mr. Arthur Hughes's metal-work—to mention the work of but three exhibitors—showed the fine temper of the School's technical teaching, which leaves the pupils to develop in whatever style of design commends itself to their taste. We were glad to see that the exhibitors were little influenced by L'Art nouveau, and those we have named, not at all. Miss Ramsay's work is characterised by technical skill and accuracy, and by a sound knowledge of the principles of design. This enables her to give proper play to her individuality when it is least easy to do so—namely, in geometrical designs—as may be seen in the simple pectoral cross which she has made for the Bishop of St. David's and will exhibit at Leighton House. Though the best examples of her work are, of course, those in which she is unrestricted as to design and material, she shows much taste in making the utmost of stones intrusted to her for resetting, even when they are of a very unpromising sort. This particular faculty naturally brings her many clients.

In the interests of Technical Education in spheres of work suitable to women, and gentlewomen in particular, we have pleasure in calling attention to the Exhibition which was opened on Monday, the 10th, in Prince's Skating Rink at Knightsbridge, and will continue open until May the 30th. While we have much sympathy with the individual stallholders who are bonâ fide engaged in women's works, we have very little with the Yellow Press taste which appears in the vulgar title given to the Exhibition and in the official general catalogue. For this the stallholders are in no way responsible; indeed, considering that they represent in the main serious and useful work, they have reason for considerable annoyance; and if we are accurately informed that space was let to them on the distinct understanding that their stalls would not have to enter into competition with those of London shops, they have ground for more than annoyance. While giving every credit to the promoters of the Exhibition, for the kindest intentions, we doubt whether it is wise, considering that the sense of humour is not entirely dead, to advertise the Bishop of London's blessing on a purely commercial undertaking, which includes the sale of "The Children's Encyclopædia"; nor do we credit the many shrewd and capable women who have invested in stall-spaces with any tendency to rely on spiritual subsidies for their commercial success.

Among the most interesting stalls we notice that of Miss Crooke's School of Gardening, French Gardening, and Poultry-keeping, established at Bredon's Norton, near Tewkesbury. It is the only representative in the Exhibition of the admirable and sensible French system, and can easily be found by its being arranged as an unglazed greenhouse adorned with climbing roses, and by the scarlet gardening jackets worn by the principal and her helpers. Besides great natural advantages of soil and climate, the School possesses an attraction shared by no other—a Ladies' Club. This is housed in an old manor-house on the estate of Miss Woodhull, who has furnished it for its present purpose, and takes much interest in its success and development. The Club serves as a residence for students, and for workers already trained, who wish to take up land in the neighbourhood, and for visitors wishing to attend special classes at the School or in Cheltenham. It also provides meals at very reasonable rates for members living in cottages, and forms a general nucleus to the working gentlewomen who revolve more or less round Miss Crooke. Many of our contemporaries have already written of the whole centre in enthusiastic terms from personal investigation, and we are glad to add our approval to theirs, from the accounts which we have received from independent sources. We regret that we have not space to notice the many excellent products offered on other stalls, the results of good technical training; they range from garden-produce, confected food of all descriptions, with needlework of every kind, to the breeding of dogs and donkeys, while such activities as secretarial work, motor-driving, and rifle-shooting are also represented.

THE ACADEMY is not the Lancet, so we must speak with some diffidence as to the present position of the old controversy of Homœopathy versus Allopathy. One is under the impression that the debate has died a natural death; but it is interesting to find that the method of Hahnemann is being applied in other regions. Last Sunday a certain Anglican cleric, preaching on behalf of the Church of England Temperance Society, chose his text from the story of the Pool of Bethesda, where an angel troubled the waters, and, before going on to his assumption that all the poor sick folk were brought to their sad condition by their sins, he favoured his congregation with a very pretty obiter dictum to the effect that the pool doubtless possessed "intermittent mineral properties," due to the bubbling up of a spring. Here, then, is an instance of what may be called Spiritual Homœopathy; the preacher had no doubt noted the prevalence of a certain malady called Modernism, and was resolved to cure any incipient cases amongst his hearers by the exhibition of his famous "Mineral Properties" Globule. Similia similibus curantur; our cleric felt sure, we may assume, that any "Modernist" present would make a rapid recovery after this dose of the angel translated into mag. sulph.

On any other hypothesis the preacher's remark would be hard indeed to justify. The careful and honest and scholarly investigation of the Bible, conducted by scholars for scholars with all reverence and reserve and precaution, is, without doubt, an admirable duty. The scholars and theologians to whom such duty belongs are aware of the infinite incapacity of the human intelligence, of the propensity to fallacy which lurks in our ratiocinative faculties, of the immense danger of leaping to conclusions from faulty premises, or from no premises at all. They will remember the case of the "Higher Critic" who decided that writing was unknown in the time of Abraham—a few months before the discovery of a great store of documents written at a date prior to the Patriarchal period. They will remember, too, how the "Higher Criticism" has had to yield position after position as to the genuineness and authenticity of the books of the New Testament; they will even be taught by physical science that all sorts of events, which would have been pronounced "impossible" a hundred years ago, are now things of common knowledge. The Stigmata, which once "proved" the chroniclers of the life of St. Francis of Assisi to be peculiarly impudent, and foolish and superstitious liars, are now the subject of medical investigation in the hospitals. The "dwarfs" for which Herodotus was derided were giving shows in the London music-halls quite recently. Such considerations might be multiplied indefinitely; and above all our theologians will remember the great consideration that, the Christian religion being confessedly a "supernatural" religion, there is no antecedent improbability in the mention of the "supernatural" in its records. And, to conclude, they will beware of an error which medical men as a rule have the sense (and the kindness) to avoid; they will not disturb the minds and hearts of the lay-folk by all kinds of premature and uncertain disclosures of highly dubious "results." The quack doctor may announce his "Powders to Cure Cancer," but the honourable physician is more cautious. He works, and watches, and experiments, and waits—and the public are not asked into his laboratory or his dissecting-room.

It is surely not necessary to labour the fatal and enormous folly of the opposite course, either in medicine or theology. On the supposition that the preacher who has furnished us with our text was not a spiritual homœopathist, if he did not equate the angel with mag. sulph. with the intention of disgusting his hearers with Modernism and all its works for ever, his conduct was utterly and wholly indefensible. Most of those present were simple folk who in all probability went away with the impression that the Bible was not true and that angels had no existence; and readers of THE ACADEMY will recollect the case of the cobbler mentioned by Dean Swift. He had heard that there was some doubt in the minds of the learned as to the text of the Three Heavenly Witnesses. "If that be so," said he (to give the substance of his remarks), "I can get drunk as often as I please, and beat my wife whenever I have a liking to do it." And, the utter mischievousness of "Mineral Properties" apart, think of the folly of it! Are the big miracles to be saved by throwing the little ones overboard? Is there any class of men who are quite willing to believe in all the (humanly) incredible events in the New Testament, so long as you allow that there was no angel, and that the Pool of Bethesda was no more wonderful than Bath and Baden? It is a pity, indeed, that a man cannot hear a Mass without being troubled with such stuff as this.

SELEUCUS OF LESBOS

Seleucus his new vessel brazen-lined

Dipped, at Arcturus' rise, in dimpling seas;
On his return the drowning Hyades
Through scudding drifts drew over him the blind
And vexèd deep. His bones the mews will find,
And in the thin-grassed dunes no goat will browse,
The tempest hollowed his last dwelling-house
Where grey sea-hollies toss before the wind.

There beating the same circuit in still flight,
The mews melt into sliding sparks of light,
And the unrelenting wind is rarely stayed;—
Earth, sea, in pity of his shadow dim,
Upon the sands where his bright bones are strayed,
Do thou be light, and thou, be still, for him.

THOMAS MORE AND THE "UTOPIA"

The Utopia of Sir Thomas More. Translated by RALPH ROBINSON. With Introduction and Notes by H. B. COTTERILL, M.A. (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.)

THIS is a very good school edition of the "Utopia." Its editor knows all the facts and dates; he is able to draw parallels or point out discrepancies from Plato; he can tell his readers to "Note this" and "Note that;" he has studied the original as well as Robinson's translation, and he lacks the smallest spark of sympathy with his author, the least vestige of comprehension of his strange and baffling personality. It is a very good school edition; it is a very bad edition for any one but a schoolmaster, an examiner, or a University Extension student.

Let us do Mr. Cotterill justice. He tries hard to be fair. His resentment that the author of "Utopia" should be a Catholic, should have lived a life of the strictest piety and conformity to Catholic rule, should have upheld the Catholic faith not only as a private man and as an author, but as a Judge and a Chancellor, and should have died for that faith on the scaffold—the resentment at this, which must remain a puzzle to all who, however well they may know Thomas More's times, do not know Thomas More, Mr. Cotterill keeps manfully in the background. His unfairness is due to inability to understand, not to any desire to misrepresent. But it is a great pity that he should not have read—since Father Bridgett's attitude is clearly too hard for him, and Nisard's probably that of a fool—the illuminating little volume on the Blessed Thomas More by M. Henri Bremond, published in "The Saints" series, and translated, with others of that series, into English. Had he done so, we should have had less nonsense about More and tyrannicide, More and the punishment of heretics; we should have been spared the vulgar and antiquated misinterpretation of the words used by Erasmus—to explain More's renunciation of his hopes of being worthy to live the religious life. (Must it really be pointed out again that what prevented him from becoming a Franciscan was not the corrupt lives of the religious of his day, but precisely the fear whether he himself was strong enough to endure the necessary renunciation?) Finally, had Mr. Cotterill approached his author under the guidance of M. Bremond—or, indeed, under that of Nisard, or Bridgett, or even Hutton, or any one who was not cramming the subject for a school-book—we should have been spared the impertinent assurance that when More made Hythloday claim the authority of Christ for the communism of Utopia, he was not joking:

More did, in spite of all the meshes of mediæval superstition which cased him in, feel in his heart the longings for the light of a truer Christianity.

Could anything better prove the absolute unfitness of a man to edit the work of the Blessed Thomas More than that astounding and disgusting sentence?

One thing necessary to the comprehension of the "Utopia" and its place in More's life is, of course, a knowledge of dates. Mr. Cotterill has this knowledge—has it, at any rate, sufficiently to make out a "Chronological Summary" for his pupils. His work—in spite, we repeat, of his obvious desire to be fair, to "make allowances" for what he cannot understand—shows but few traces that the knowledge of dates has been brought to bear on the formation of his opinions. We have to search for a particular passage in the Introduction to assure ourselves that Mr. Cotterill really does know that "Utopia" was written in 1515-1516; that the "Ninety-five Theses" did not come till 1517, the burning of the Bull till 1519, and the "marriage" with Anne Boleyn till 1533. But a much more important thing to know is the nature of the man who wrote the book, and of this knowledge Mr. Cotterill shows nothing at all.

There are three things to remember about More before the first step in his acquaintance can be made. The first and greatest is that throughout his life, from his birth to his martyrdom, he was a Catholic; the second that he was a humanist; the third that, in public and private, on the Bench and in his family circle, with a pen in his hand and when his head lay on the block, he was, in his own favourite phrase, a "merry" man—a jester, a wit. Like some few other great intellects who have succeeded in puzzling a matter-of-fact world, he not only had ideas, but played with them.

If these three characteristics are kept in mind it becomes futile to ask—Did he mean what he said in "Utopia"? Of course he meant it, meant it all. He dreamed of an ideal State, and he saw it, like all such dreamers, in the light of the actual condition of his own times. This and that are the causes of our own shortcomings and unhappiness. Let us imagine them away and see what happens. Sheep-farming, oppression of the poor, ostentation and extravagance, an excess of clergy in proportion to laity, war, rapine, political and commercial dishonesty—he dreamed of a State where these things were not known, and the dream provides a valuable criticism of the England of his day. But—and it is a very big "but"—it is one thing to dream of an ideal State, and quite another to put your ideas into practice on the existing condition of things. And if it is important to remember that "Utopia" was written seventeen years before the "divorce," it is still more important to remember that the author of the book was, without reservation or exception, a Catholic. It would be, no doubt, extremely pleasant if England were an ideal State, in which the partial religious toleration and free discussion introduced by King Utopus were possible. But when truth—truth absolute and immutable—is attacked by pernicious error, when not only the safety of the realm, but the peace of religion is endangered, it is no time for the dreams of the humanist, for gracious imaginings, for that mood of pleasure or merriment which can create beautiful ideas and play with them, while a half-smile of amusement at the baffled pundits of posterity crosses the writer's mouth. In face of virulent disease, doctors do not theorise on the perfect man; they administer nasty and powerful drugs to the actual man, to the discomfiture of the evil thing. And when More's life is examined from his own point of view, the wonder is not that the dreamer on religious toleration punished heretics, but that the Catholic attacked so mildly as he did the disease, that was making such strides among his people. For once, and for that once only, the two men in More were at war; and it was not the humanist but the Catholic who went to the wall. He could jest with Silver; and Silver's apt reply so delighted the "merry" Judge that he let the heretic go free. In another aspect of the battle against evil the Catholic and the wit were at one. Whoever knows not More's controversial writings knows not More.

The great difference between the state of religion in Utopia and in England was this: that in the former several religions existed side by side, their adherents even agreeing to such an extent that they could worship all in one temple (surely a Cowper-Temple); while in the latter the only aim and hope, the breath of life, the very raison d'être of the "new faith" was the destruction of the old truth. Had the "reformers" on their side been Utopians, More's dream might have been translatable into practice. That they were not, that they directly assailed the Church, and that anything but scarcely needs to be pointed out. Even in Utopia itself the mildest-tongued of the "reformers" would have been "decreed banishment or bondage" for "vehemently and fervently in this cause striving and contending." It was no case of amicable arrangement; it was a case of a violent attack on what was the sole religion of the country, and More would have been less than a Catholic, less than an honest man, had he failed to take his share in repelling the invading monster.

There is the obvious explanation of the supposed inconsistency which has puzzled generations. We feel that we ought almost to apologise for stating again a truth that has been better stated many times by More's apologists; but our excuse must be that it is clear from Mr. Cotterill's book that there are still well-intentioned if inadequately enlightened people who find it necessary to make excuses for More, and continue to hand on a false idea of him to the young of the country for which he died.

It is fruitless to speculate on what might have been; but it is easy to understand how deep must have been More's mental sufferings during the last years of his life. No one knew better than he the abuses within the Church which called for reform; no one must have regretted more than he that the work of reform should have fallen out of the hands of the men of education, faith, intellect, and humour, of whom he was one, into those which were destined to drag it so through the mire. He knew that the house needed to be set in order; all the more must he have suffered at the spectacle of the rude and violent hands laid upon it, and trembled at the excesses of brutality, the worst of which he did not live to see. And the fate which actually befell the Church, in England as elsewhere, is not the only thing that makes sadness in the hearts of students of the life and writings of Thomas More. Anything that touches him touches them, merely because he suffered in it. His fascinating personality, his wit, his learning, his piety, his ardent friendships, his "merriment," his home life, the very contradictions in his nature, which at once puzzle and allure—all these combine to make him one of the most living of dead men, one of our closest friends among those honoured of the Church.

THE MYSTERIOUS REPRINT

Eothen. By A. W. KINGLAKE. (Blackie, 1s.)

Goethe's Poetry and Truth. Two Volumes. York Library. (Bell, 4s. net.)

Hazlitt's Lectures on the English Poets. Universal Library. (Routledge, 1s.)

Cobwebs of Criticism. By HALL CAINE. Universal Library. (Routledge, 1s.)

THESE are fairly representative of the variety of reprinted books which the publishers are continually offering to an avid and apparently insatiable public. Here are but four of forty which have been sent forth during the last few months, and one might be tempted to think that there is a feverish anxiety to read on the part of many millions. More or less attractively produced, and in the main astonishingly cheap, these abundant new editions are, you would say, certain to accomplish a speedy improvement in the public taste; yet novels nasty and noisy, and commonly silly, still sell by thousands, and the lowest journalism thrives increasingly among the very classes to which cheap books are calculated to appeal.

This is a great mystery, from which any plain movement seems unlikely to resolve. Nevertheless, the mere fact that these reprints are so frequent and varied is a brighter rather than a darker sign. Quite apart from this question, however, there are works in the long list which even sound and hearty bookmen may excuse themselves for having overlooked. Not every reader, who is not a professed critic, may have read Kinglake's little masterpiece; yet it is one it were pity to pass by. Vivid and natural in style, the record of Kinglake's journeys in the Holy Land, in Egypt, and through the desert, and of a visit to the singular Lady Hester Stanhope, has a sustained interest and brightness, a certain individuality, which have sufficed to preserve it until now as a living book.

Of Goethe's "Poetry and Truth" it is late to speak. It is autobiography on a generous scale, the two volumes before us, of some eight hundred pages, being occupied with the story of only the first twenty-six years of the poet's life. Had it been taken on to a later stage in Goethe's long journey of eighty-two years it would have been indeed formidable. It is a book one does not soon forget. Reading it you are constantly reminded—by mere contrast—of that other great autobiography, Rousseau's. His own aim has thus been described by Goethe :

To represent the development of a child who had grown to be remarkable, how this exhibited itself under given circumstances, and yet how in general it could content the student of human nature and his views ; such was the thing I had to do.

"A noble commentary, instructive in many ways," Carlyle calls it, and speaks of the "magically-recalled scenes of childhood and manhood."

Hazlitt's "Lectures on the English Poets" is a well-known book in the familiar, hearty style of the Table-Talker, to which Keats's phrase, "indescribable gusto," may fitly be applied. Much of it is hardly criticism, as we have come to understand the term, but it is Hazlitt. These eloquent proclamations of personal preference, brilliant gyrations around great names, are perhaps of rather limited value to us after a century of earnest and minute criticism ; but while the love of letters lasts Hazlitt's fine virile commentaries will last also. We wish we could have heard these lectures, of the delivery of which Talfourd has left such an admirable description. We wish we could have seen Keats there, his great Odes yet unwritten, listening to the ardent and just praises of the poets—Chaucer and Spenser, Shakespeare and Milton—he loved so passionately, and of whose renown he was the destined inheritor. Is there not something of Hazlitt's inspiration in "Bards of Passion and of Mirth" ?

The last book on our list indicates how widely the publishers' net is cast. Mr. Hall Caine has provided a new Introduction for his "Cobwebs of Criticism," first issued in 1882 ; and in the last sentence of this Introduction—"I am not an author with a grievance"—he disclaims the only conceivable reason for resuscitating the volume. We could very well understand that, in order to discount the criticism which his work has received when it has been noticed at all, he should be at the trouble of reviving an early book in which is set forth a catalogue of critical "howlers" of a past generation, and, remembering that Wordsworth and Coleridge were once heartily abused, should console himself with the not very obscure inference. It would appear, so far as we can ascertain, that this fresh edition is meant as a renewed impeachment of criticism—which is very proper in an author who can appeal, with evidence of defiant prosperity, from the critics to the public. Well, THE ACADEMY will accord the book the only merciful criticism which such a tangle of incoherencies as the Introduction can demand for it—silence.

A MORALIST OF THE FIRST CENTURY

TACITUS: Dialogus, Agricola, Germania. Translated, with Introduction and Notes, by W. HAMILTON FYFE, Fellow of Merton. (Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d. net.)

It is as a moralist and rhetorician, rather than as a historian, that the greatest prose-writer of the Empire presents himself to us in the "Dialogus," "Agricola," and "Germania." In these treatises Tacitus shows hardly at all his greatest quality—his amazing power of psychological analysis. In the "Agricola," however, we have an occasional glimpse of the barbed arrow of that mordant vein which is so characteristic of the "Annals" and "Histories." In the "Agricola," c. 12, he tells us that the British sea produces pearls, but they are of a dull leaden hue, adding :

Some attribute this to the divers' lack of skill ; for in the Red Sea the oysters are torn alive and breathing from the rocks, while in Britain they are gathered as the sea casts them up. Personally, I could sooner believe the pearls deficient in quality than mankind in greed.

His Life of Agricola, as well as his "Germany," is full of covert criticism of Roman life in the first century of the Christian era. They remind one of Xenophon's "Cyrus" and Johnson's "Rasselas." Thus in "Agricola," c. 21, in dealing with the Romanising policy of the Roman Governor, he writes :

Even our style of dress came into fashion, and the toga was often seen. Gradually the Britons yielded to the seduction of our Roman vices, and took to lounges and baths and elegant banquets. This was all part of their slavery. The ignorant called it "civilisation."

In the same spirit Calgacus, in c. 30, is made to describe the British raj :

To robbery, murder, and pillage they give the false name of Empire, and when they make a wilderness they call it Peace. Nature has willed that men should love best their children and their nearest kin. Our children are carried off by levies into foreign slavery : our wives and sisters, if they escape the enemy's lust, are brought to shame under a pretence of hospitality and friendship. Our goods and fortunes go in tribute, our fields and the year's yield in gifts of corn, while the strength of our hands is exhausted amid blows and insults in clearing woods and marshes. Slaves that are born to their position are sold once for all, and their masters feed them. Britain pays its masters every day, and finds them daily food. In a household the last new-comer is a butt among his fellow-slaves. So it is with us. In this old household of the world we are the worthless new-comers who are marked out for destruction.

On the question whether Agricola was poisoned by the emissaries of Domitian, Tacitus does not pronounce an opinion ; but he seems to think that the universal admiration and affection with which he was regarded could not have failed to prove fatal to a great public man under an Emperor whose Cruel red face was his natural bulwark against shame—sacvus ille volutus et rubor quo se contra pudorem muniebat.

The last two chapters of the "Agricola" are perhaps the finest examples of eloquence that Latin prose literature has handed down to us ; and they are finely rendered by Mr. Fyfe, whom the reader will already have recognised as a brilliant translator. He is sometimes, perhaps, a little too brilliant, importing into his rendering figures and fancies not to be found in the original, as in ("Dial.," c. 6) :

The crops we plant and cultivate ourselves are pleasing, but Nature's wild-flowers give the greatest pleasure—

Quae seruntur atque elaborantur grata, gratiora tamen quae sua sponte nascuntur.

There is nothing about a rainbow in "Agr." 10, where we read :

Where others have embellished their ignorance with rainbow rhetoric, my story will simply rely upon facts.

Nor is there anything about a lion in "Germ." 22, where the translator gives us :

as is natural where winter takes the lion's share of the year.

However, these modernisms give an easy air to the version, and do not mislead the reader. As brilliant renderings not marred by supposititious graces we would quote a phrase used ("Dial." 25) in distinguishing ancient from modern eloquence :

I am ready to admit that there was something lacking in their style. It was still in its teens, and had not reached its prime ;

again ("Dial." 31) :

he will be able to feel the pulse of his audience—tenebit venas animorum ;

and ("Dial." 34) :

they secured rivals and opponents who fought them in real earnest with the butt on off their foils—ferro non rudibus dimicantes ;

and in "Germ." 18 :

In Germany no one laughs at vice nor calls mutual corruption the spirit of the age.

But the tone of the Latin is lost in "Germ." 20 :

In Germany it does not pay to be childless : Nec ulla orbitalis prelia.

The interesting criticism of Cicero in "Dial." 22 runs very smoothly and easily :

I come now to Cicero, who fought with his contemporaries the same battle that I am fighting with you. They admired the ancients, while he preferred the style of his own day. His superiority to the other speakers of his own time is above all shown in his critical taste. He was the first to perfect literary style by paying attention to the choice of words. He made writing an art. He even attempted flowery passages and invented some good sayings of his own, at any rate in the speeches of his later period towards the end of his life, when he made progress in the art, and learnt by experience what was the best style of oratory. His earlier speeches are not free from the vices of the antique style. His introductions move slowly; his narratives are longwinded, and his digressions tiresome. His feelings are not easily roused, and he seldom glows with emotion. Few of his periods are neatly rounded off or end effectively. There is nothing to pick out and carry away with you. He reminds one of primitive architecture where the walls are strong and durable but lack finish and ornament. A rich householder is not content with a mere shelter to keep out the wind and rain; his house must delight the eye. Nor is it enough for him to have in it merely such furniture as he positively needs; he wants gold and jewels which he can handle and view with pleasure. So it is with the orator. There are some things which he should avoid as musty and old-fashioned. He must not use rusty archaisms, or allow his sentences to halt and drag like the early annalists. He must shun low and tasteless jokes, and vary his periods, not letting them all end in one and the same rhythm.

There is no recognition of anything like the "Clauselgesetz" in the "Dialogus." We meet hexameters in "Germ." 32 and 39:

Maiores apud Chattos peditum laus quam Tenciteris, Auguriis patrum et prisca formidine sacram.

The two themes of the "Dialogus" are the relative merits of (a) poetry and eloquence, (b) ancient and modern eloquence. In the latter the question is raised, When does the modern epoch begin?—a difficulty which besets the study of history as well, and which has not been answered satisfactorily. We find ourselves in an ancient Battle of the Books, where the vigour of Gracchus and Crassus is compared with the "affected flourishes" (calamistri) of Maecenas and the "jingling assonances" (linitus) of the Gallio who "cared for none of these things." Tacitus recognises that high eloquence, like great poetry, flourishes more in troublous times, but gives his vote for material wellbeing rather than the promotion of Art:

I do not maintain that it was worth the country's while to produce traitors in order to provide her orators with materials for great speeches, but, as I constantly remind you, we must not forget that the art of which we are speaking flourishes the more readily in times of trouble and disturbance. Nobody denies that it is more pleasant and profitable to enjoy peace than to be troubled with war: yet war breeds more great soldiers than peace. It is the same with oratory. The more often an orator has taken his stand, as it were, upon the stricken field, the more blows he has dealt and taken, the greater the adversaries and the fiercer the contests he has encountered, the more is his style heightened and elevated: it wins distinction from his dangers, and lives on the lips of men, whose nature it is to praise enterprise while they prefer safety.

Both in the "Germany" (c. 33) and the "Agricola" (c. 12) Tacitus praises the policy of fomenting factions among the dependent States. In the former passage he recognises "the white man's burden," and moralises in a cynical vein on the annihilation of the Bructeri by a coalition of the neighbouring tribes:

Perhaps they hated the pride of the Bructeri: perhaps they were tempted by the prospect of loot: or it may have happened by a special intervention of Providence in our favour. For we were even permitted to enjoy the spectacle of the battle. Over 60,000 of them fell, not under the swords of Rome, but, what was far more magnificent, simply as a show for our gratification. If the natives will not love us, long let them hate each other. May that spirit never die among them. The destiny of empire is a heavy burden. No gift of heaven could be more welcome in these days than disunion among our enemies.

From a literary point of view the bringing together of these treatises is highly interesting and instructive, as showing the evolution of the Tacitean style from the flowing Ciceronianism of the "Dialogus," through the brisk terseness of the "Agr." and "Germ." to the crisp impressionism of the "Annals" and the "Histories."

THE SPECTACLE

The Diary of a Looker-on. By C. LEWIS HIND. (Eveleigh Nash, 7s. 6d.)

THE looker-on, it is said, sees the most, and certainly Mr. Lewis Hind is a striking exemplification of the truth of this frequently reiterated adage. For there is not much that escapes his inquisitorial, if sympathetic, scrutiny. But it may be well doubted whether the looker-on knows the most—knows, that is, not in the mere sense of amassing information, but with that certitude which belongs to the man who has succeeded in penetrating, if only for a moment, beneath the outward veil of phenomena. For the rules of the game are not invariably confided to the bystander. Mr. Lewis Hind contrives to preserve at all moments his interesting and amiable individuality, his enthusiasms are never ill-regulated, his emotions are always tempered by an admirable discretion. If he never lapses from the perfect level of good taste, he never soars into the exalted regions of ecstasy. He views life as the man in the stalls views the bioscope at the Palace Theatre. To him the world is a spectacle, not a battlefield, a succession of shadow-shows, not a series of conflicts. In the ardours and agonies of the man in the fighting line he has no share. It would not occur to him that:

One crowded hour of glorious life
Is worth an age without a name.

But from his study windows he watches the blossoming of the flowers, the tall trees in the meadows, and the sailing of the great ships. Life has its compensations for the looker-on. The skies are blue, women are pleasant to look upon, and ah there is a redness in the wine. To such an one detachment is of the very essence of enjoyment. Of this manner was Montaigne. Mr. Hind is a lesser Montaigne. He lacks, indeed, many of the advantages of the great Frenchman, for it is not given to this generation to witness the unfolding of a new world or the recovery of a lost culture. But humanity is a subject of perennial interest, and there is a world to be said yet of art and music and literature, and the vagaries of men and women.

We would not be understood as censorious in these remarks—as, indeed, other than deliberately appreciative. "The Diary of a Looker-on" is a delightful book. Especially delightful is it when its author contrives to get away from his pet subjects, and to treat of emotions and experiences which are the common property of man—when, for instance, he writes of:

A midnight walk through a desolate country, the impalpable night, ominous, mysterious all around, cottage windows dark, lanes with banks so high that the stars are nearly hidden, furry things darting across the road, the long-drawn-out wail of a dog winding from some remote farmhouse, the moan of the wind in trees, and that torture of the imaginative wayfarer—the sound of footsteps somewhere behind that stop when you stop, and patter again on the silent road when you step breathlessly forward.

When, too, he remarks of Mr. Hall Fielding's literary style that it is "candid as a child's face," we feel that the thing is finely, and even finally, said.

And, after all, there is something to be said for this attitude of isolated appreciation. It carries with it certain unmistakable blessings, among them being a wide and all-embracing charity—a charity which enfolds even Dr. Torrey. By virtue of this charity the looker-on is always and everywhere exquisitely at home. He is equally happy in the salons of the learned or when listening in some stuffy Welsh chapel to the vapid outpourings of a ranting revivalist. He is sensitive to the antique charm of Oxford, but he has a good word for tramps. He venerates Rodin, but thinks that we are inclined to underestimate the importance of the sportsman. He loves music, and shares the pride of the Englishman in his local rifle-club. It is only when confronted with the deeper problems of life—the problem of pain, the mystery of suffering—that we feel he has nothing of value to tell us. What, we keep asking ourselves, is his attitude in the face of ultimate things, those things which, being not seen, are eternal? Well, it would appear that to Mr. Lewis Hind, Life, "with all it brings of joy or woe, is just"—a note of interrogation. And it is precisely at this point that Mr. Hind's philosophy breaks down and that his limitations become most immediately apparent. For the Wisdom that was before all worlds is hidden from the eyes of an acolyte at the altar of Laodicea.

THE "TIMES," MR. MURRAY, AND MR. WILFRID BLUNT

WE cordially congratulate Mr. Murray on the result of his action against the Times. That result, needless to say, causes us no surprise. The Times never had a leg to stand on, and it was from the first only a question of how much in the way of damages Mr. Murray would obtain. The Times has appealed against these damages, so we will say no more on that point, it being still sub judice; but we should like to draw a moral from the verdict and to call the attention of our readers to a striking fact. That fact is that the methods of the Times in dealing with Mr. Murray form an exact parallel to its methods in dealing with Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, to which we drew attention some little time ago. In the case of Mr. Blunt, exactly as in the case of Mr. Murray, a violent, abusive, and, in our opinion, libellous article was written, and immediately afterwards an equally violent and abusive letter, purporting to be a bonâ fide communication from an outside source, was printed. In both cases the article and letter were written or directly inspired by some one person inside the Times office. In Mr. Murray's case the person was Mr. Hooper, in Mr. Blunt's case it was Mr. Moberly Bell. As we pointed out at the time of the publication of Mr. Blunt's pamphlet, "Mr. Blunt and the Times," from which we gave copious extracts, the manoeuvres of Mr. Moberly Bell were discreditable and fatuous and utterly unworthy of a great paper like the Times; and in some respects the case of Mr. Blunt was even worse than that of Mr. Murray. In the first place, Mr. Blunt had been an unpaid contributor to the Times for more than twenty years; and, in the second place, the Times, with unparalleled effrontery, absolutely declined to print any reply from him to the ridiculous, offensive, and inept attack which it had made on him. These circumstances, which did not exist in the case of Mr. Murray, undoubtedly aggravate the conduct of the Times, and should Mr. Blunt do as we hereby strongly advise him to do—namely, take an action against the Times, there can be no two opinions as to what the result would be. Will Mr. Blunt take action? We sincerely hope he will; it is a duty he owes to himself and to the best interests of journalism, which have been so sadly smirched by the recent discreditable tactics of the paper which ought, from its exalted position, to set an example of strict probity and honesty to other papers. The Times has never apologised to Mr. Blunt, and it has refused point-blank to withdraw its remarks about that gentleman, who is notoriously a man of unblemished reputation, of great achievement, and assured and honourable position in the opinions of every man of consequence in this country, whether they agree with his views or not.

When Mr. Blunt's daughter was married in Cairo to Mr. Neville Lytton, it was Lord Cromer (his greatest political opponent) who, in Mr. Blunt's unavoidable absence, gave her away. Could there be a more striking piece of evidence as to the esteem and respect in which Mr. Blunt is held by all honourable men? And yet the Times, in its obstinacy and ignorance, refuses him that fair treatment which is due to every Tom, Dick, and Harry. Not only has the Times refused to apologise to Mr. Blunt, or to give him the privilege which is allowed, as a matter of course, by every decent paper in the world—that of replying to an attack, but it absolutely ignored the indictment made against it in THE ACADEMY of December 7th, 1907. It bore in meek silence the very strong and caustic comments both of ourselves in these columns and of Mr. Blunt in his pamphlet. Any effort to represent this abject attitude as one of "silent contempt" would only expose it to the ridicule and inevitable laughter of those who read our former article, and who have seen how it has been justified by events, and, indeed, of any one of ordinary common sense. If the Times thought at that time that it could afford to treat THE ACADEMY with contempt it certainly does not think so now. The contempt, as it must be painfully aware, is all on the other side. Those brilliantly "keen business men" Mr. Moberly Bell and Mr. Hooper have succeeded by their childish manoeuvres in landing the Times with a heavy pecuniary loss, and a still more damaging blow to its prestige and reputation.

And this brings us to our moral. It is one that chiefly concerns newspaper proprietors, whether they be individuals or syndicates, and it is this: Never let your business manager get the whip-hand of your editor. The editor must be supreme on his own paper. A manager may or may not be a "keen man of business," but in the long run it will generally be found that his "keenness" is apt to be devoted rather to his own interests than to those of his paper. Does any one in his senses suppose that if Mr. Buckle had been allowed to use his own discretion he would ever have let the Times get into its present ghastly and discreditable situation either with respect to Mr. Murray or to Mr. Blunt? The idea is unthinkable. No, it was the "keen business instincts" of Mr. Moberly Bell and Mr. Hooper that were responsible for the silly fiasco. Mr. Buckle was probably told that he was not a man of business, and that he had better confine himself to the literary side of the paper—just as if a man who edits a paper with any sort of success could possibly fail to be a man of business. We have lately been led to form a rather poor opinion of "men of business," and, indeed, if we may say so without offence and in a general and epigrammatic sort of manner, we have sometimes been tempted to think that of a great proportion of them it might justly be said that half of them are vain fools and the other half clever knaves. (That there are brilliant exceptions is of course obvious.) We will back a poet, provided he is a real poet (a somewhat rare article), against any business man in the world. It is quite true that in the ordinary course of events poets are not interested in business, and consequently know and care nothing about it. But if once circumstances force them to become acquainted with business methods and business tricks they become formidable people to deal with. The explanation is very simple: nobody can be a great poet without possessing a great brain and a great intellect, and any one who has a great brain and a great intellect can soon learn to be more than a match for the ordinary business man. We seem to hear some one say, "How about Henley? He was a great poet and he edited several newspapers and never made one of them pay. He was a sink for the money of those who backed him." Now there is an answer to this, but we do not propose to give it; it might seem unkind to the admirers of Henley, who are estimable people for whom we have respect and with whose illusions we should not like to tamper. But perhaps some of our readers may say, "All this about poets may be very interesting, but how does it apply to the case of the Times? Mr. Buckle, the editor of the Times, is not a poet." To which we reply, Exactly so, that is precisely what is the matter with him; if he had been a poet he would never have allowed Mr. Moberly Bell to behave in so foolish and childish a fashion; if Mr. Buckle had been a poet he would have exhibited a fine frenzy and told Mr. Moberly Bell to keep himself in his proper subordinate place, or, alternatively, to go to the deuce. The further moral of all this seems accordingly to be, If you want to find a good editor endeavour to get hold of a poet, and if you are fortunate enough to secure one do not interfere with him or allow him to be interfered with by "business men," whether of the "keen" or of the merely foolish variety.

ISRAEL, WINSTON, AND MOLONY

IN the sweet city of Oxford the other week Mr. Israel Zangwill delivered an address on Women's Suffrage. Now Mr. Zangwill is an Ebrew Jew and proud of it; for the which nobody will blame him. On the other hand, one might reasonably expect from him a certain soundness of judgment. Hence one is bound to take him more or less seriously. And in the course of this marvellous deliverance of his in the sweet city of Oxford aforesaid, Mr. Zangwill is reported to have informed his auditory that he was a Suffragette. "One of those noble beings stands before you," quoth Mr. Zangwill, "absolutely incarnating the ancient ideal. I am a Suffragette, and I think you will admit that I am ugly, elderly, masculine, and eye-glassed." If Mr. Zangwill can afford to be rude to himself we shall not protest. We have long suspected that he was a Suffragette. For the rest he has said it himself. And here you have a pretty picture.

And while we are picture-seeing, let us look at another and apposite work provided for us at Dundee so lately as last week. The scene is a shed at a gas-works, and there is scarcely room to swing a cat. The furnishings include an old table and a packing-case. On the old table sits Mr. Winston Churchill "repressing his indignation with difficulty." On the packing-case stands a Miss Molony "haranguing the assemblage in her most voluble style." It is Mr. Churchill's meeting, but Miss Molony, of bell-ringing fame, has forced her way into it, and she declines absolutely to allow Mr. Churchill to speak. And in the end the Right Hon. Winston Spencer Churchill, Member of his Majesty's Government and President of the Board of Trade, is compelled "to get down from the table and light a cigarette." A Minister of the Crown shut up by a shrew, falls back on nicotine! Here, as we have said, is another picture, and we respectfully beg for it the attention of some such artist as the Hon. John Collier.

In Mr. Zangwill's oratorical denial of his manhood and in Mr. Churchill's base discomfiture by the Molony we see the same trouble at work. In a sense, it is the newest of all the troubles which have overtaken the human race. From the earliest times the animal man has found it expedient to indulge grave suspicions about the animal woman. Early in his chequered and variegated career he discovered that the other and better part of himself, though charming and amusing to a degree, was not really to be trusted. Hence he took particular care to keep her under his thumb, and when his thumb grew tired, he would employ his heel rather than let her go free. This was nobody's fault; nobody should be upbraided for it; nobody had the smallest right of complaint. It was Nature or the Order of Things who arranged matters as they were arranged, and it is not for the creature to improve however so little upon the views of the Power who created him. We shall spare the reader fat disquisitions upon the middle history of this strange relationship, contenting ourselves with the observation that right down to the present silken epoch the creature man has insisted upon being "lord of the fowl and the brute."

And in spite of thousands of years of tradition, and thousands of years of broadening down, as it were, we find ourselves face to face with what is probably the most annoying and least edifying portent that has ever threatened to interrupt the orderly processes of civilisation, the said portent taking the shape of the Screaming Cockatrice and her loose-witted male supporters and victims. It is worth noting, at the risk of triteness, that the behests of the Order of Things cannot really be disobeyed. Wherever you find unnatural action or unnatural thought, there, if you look closely, you will surely find the authentic law silently insisting upon correction. Which is to say that all foolishness, howsoever applauded, or howsoever supported, comes in the end to be a sort of triumph for wisdom. A straw will serve to show how the wind blows. There is Mr. Zangwill, for example, and his pretty avowal of turbulent and rebellious femininity. At the New Gallery, or some such show, they are just now exhibiting, among other choice products, a life-size statue of Mr. Zangwill seated in a chair with his head thrown proudly rearward, and his legs boldly crossed. The artist has done full justice to Mr. Zangwill's manly front, and has given him somewhat of the air of Ajax defying the lightning from the safe seclusion of a club saddle-bag. And on a slim pedestal at Mr. Zangwill's immediate right there peeks down upon him, so to speak, the short bust of a handsome and suitably coiffured young lady, who, it is understood, is Mr. Zangwill's wife. It seems to us (taking into account the dates) highly probable that at the time Mr. Zangwill was calling loudly for justice for women at Oxford he and Mrs. Zangwill were giving sittings to the sculptor of the redoubtable group to which we have referred. And here we have the Order of Things going about its business in the surest and most insistent manner. Mr. Zangwill believes in his heart and acknowledges in his brain that woman is the equal of man, just as good and, if anything, a little better than her master; and so great is his faith that he goes to Oxford and proclaims it to an assemblage of purring old ladies, wearing the while metaphorical intellectual petticoats. Yet when it comes to having one's family done into imperishable marble or terra-cotta, it never occurs to Mr. Zangwill to have two chairs on the dais and two Ajaxes defying the lightning. Not a bit of it. The woman must stand on the shelf like a cracked china ornament. At Oxford Mr. Zangwill would have put himself up for the bust and seated Mrs. Zangwill beautifully in the chair. At home he takes his natural place as a man and a brother. Furthermore, Mrs. Zangwill acquiesces, and the sculptor agrees that it is great business. We do not complain in the least. Far otherwise. But the lesson is obvious.

Then let us turn to "dear Winston," the cigarette-smoker. We find this gentleman in very proper arms against the Molony. He "represses his indignation with difficulty." He "will not apologise." He fills the shed with shouts in a wild endeavour to outshout the Molony; and, ultimately, he falls off his rickety table in a mangled heap, as it were, and takes refuge in the noxious cigarette. Mr. Churchill cannot, gallant man though he may be, bring himself to love the Suffragettes. Though he would not say so, we should like to wager that he believes them to be prime daughters of the devil. Yet is he a burning and shining light of the political party out of which, and out of which only, the Suffragettes might hope to extort a trifle of honest approval. The Liberal Party sets itself up as the Party of justice and broad freedom. The Suffragettes say that there can be no political justice and no broad freedom while themselves, lily-wristed darlings that they are, remain voteless in outer darkness. But the Liberal Party has had its fill of Suffragettes, and its heart is hardened against them. So may it, and so will it, long remain; because the primal law is still good and not capable of being deflected or diverted by a hair's breadth.

England, as the poet Wordsworth put it, is more or less of a fen, and we, to make open confession, are wretched men. We have sprawled in our noble rage and admiration for this fairest of God's creatures and we are reaping something of the whirlwind. To put it another way, we have taught the parrot to speak, and we have allowed her out of her gilded cage. She flops about in startling plumage and shrieks her phrases with an assiduity which shows her to be a bird of pluck and perseverance. But she is becoming an obvious and dangerous nuisance. She disarranges the room. She rings bells. She shouts for apologies. And she will not allow poor papa to get on with his Elections. What is he to do? We say it with regret, but there is only one thing that he can do, to wit, he must place the bird back in her cage. His irresolute hands will probably suffer in the process. If she can't bite them she will peck them. All the same, the time has come for severe and firm measures. The ringing of bells under the noses of poor gentlemen whose only desire in life is to hop easily into safe seats should be made, and we believe is, according to the statute book, a misdemeanour.

If a male person did it he would be torn limb from limb and fined forty shillings. If he went on doing it, he would be imprisoned, and if he went on doing it again he would probably find himself in the padded arms of a lunatic asylum. Gallantry forbids the tearing of Molonies limb from limb, but the other things remain to us, and we must make use of them or render the whole conditions of existence too ridiculous for tolerance.

DISSENTING LOGIC

"I COULD never bring myself to any admiration of the schoolman's famous formula, Credo quia impossibile." These are the first words of Dr. Horton's Preface to his book, "My Belief: Answers to Certain Religious Difficulties" (Clarke). It would be very interesting to know the name of the schoolman in whose works the cited phrase occurs; but it would have been as well, perhaps, if Dr. Horton had given the true source of the paradox. Qu. Sept. Flor. Tertullianus, who lived about a thousand years before the great period of the Scholastic Philosophy, writes as follows:

Natus est dei filius; non pudet quia pudendum est: et mortuus est dei filius; prorsus credibile est, quia ineptum est: et sepultus resurrexit; certum est, quia impossibile. De Carne Christi. V.

However, a trifling point such as this does not obscure Dr. Horton's meaning. "For my own part," he goes on, "I believe only what appears to me certain," and he assures us that he is only to be convinced by strong and irrefragable arguments. This being the author's position, it may be interesting to examine one or two of the arguments on which, as he says, Christian Belief may most certainly be founded.

Personally I was very much struck by an argument to prove the authority of the Bible. Dr. Horton, it may be said at once, dismisses all authority of Church or Chapel; the Bible, he says, will not fail to prove itself if you read it without any theories whatever.

Here is one instance from thousands which can be quoted: A man was in Durham gaol, doing a term of penal servitude for attempted murder. A Roman Catholic, he had registered himself as a Protestant for certain supposed advantages in the prison life. He therefore found a Bible in the cell, and read it to pass away the time. One day, as he read the New Testament, it occurred to him: "If this book is true, the priest is not. I can pray to God myself." He knelt and asked forgiveness; he vowed that he would go back to the village where he had committed the crime, to show that he was changed. . . . He began to speak as a local preacher; his work was blessed, and now he is a missionary in India.

"A book that works in that way," says Dr. Horton, "carries its own authority with it." It may be so; but it seems to me that the corollary to the story and the deduction is that a mind which works in Dr. Horton's way carries very little authority with it. The prisoner in question was a murderous ruffian, he was a lying ruffian, he was also a hypocritical ruffian, and, above all, he was an excessively ignorant ruffian. "I can pray to God myself!" Will Dr. Horton be so kind as to cite the rule of the Roman Catholic Church forbidding any layman to pray to God by himself? As for the conversion, it may have been honest; but I believe that the life of a Protestant missionary in India is often a comparatively comfortable one. In another place the author shows that the "historical trustworthiness" of the New Testament is established "beyond the reach of critics"—by the reports of the British and Foreign Bible Society. These are the "reasons" which convince our sturdy follower of argument, our stout Protestant, who will not believe unless under the strictest logical compulsion. But they are interesting, as they serve to illustrate the very important distinction between paradox and nonsense. The credo quia impossibile is paradoxical in expression; its meaning no doubt is: I believe in certain religious mysteries, amongst other reasons, because they are mysteries, because they transcend all the facts of every-day and commonplace experience; because religion, by its very definition, implies transcendence; because a religion which propounded nothing beyond average human knowledge would not be a religion at all, though it might be a capital moral code. This is the "schoolman's" paradox which our cautious, hard-headed Doctor cannot away with. It is seen in analysis to be reasonable in the highest degree; while Dr. Horton's "reasons" are clearly no reasons at all, but rather the effervescences of a somewhat weak sentimentality. That Durham prisoner who was so evidently determined to be as comfortable as possible, those famous missionary reports—in cold logic they amount to something less than nothing. Even if these instances had been advanced to prove the proposition: Many men have been affected by reading the Bible: they would be weak enough; but, cited as they are to show the authenticity of the New Testament, they are almost incredibly impertinent. The truth of the Koran, of the Book of Mormon, and of Madame Blavatsky's "Secret Doctrine" could easily be proved by such "arguments" as these.

Let us take another instance of Dr. Horton's logical abilities. He argues that, since a man without religion would not be a man at all, therefore there is no such thing as a man without religion. Technically, the enthymeme seems fallacious, and there is the confusion between potency and actuality; every man, no doubt, is born with the one, but there are very many men who never attain to the other. It is true that the author would call a man who was afraid of spilling salt or going under a ladder, or believed in carrying a mascolle to the roulette-table religious; but this is to give a word which is generally, if vaguely, understood a new meaning and a confusing meaning. And it is, moreover, certain that there are many people quite devoid of religion who do not even believe in "luck" or fate. It seems, then, on a comparison of the Preface in Praise of Argument with one or two casual instances of the arguments actually employed by the author, that he would be wiser to rely on his intuitive rather than on his ratiocinative faculties. He is no doubt right in his conclusion that the New Testament is trustworthy, but this conclusion is not legitimately drawn from the premises of the converted gaolbird and the Bible Society. The Serpent, Dr. Horton will remember, rose up to Daath in the Tree of Life, while the higher faculties remained uncorrupted.

I am afraid that a further examination does not do much to shake my conclusion as to Dr. Horton's weakness in the mere logical process. I hasten to say that there are some excellent things in the book, though it must be noted that the author refrains himself with sedulous care from the paradoxes that he derides in that old "schoolman" of the Preface. Perhaps Protestantism discourages brilliance; perhaps our amiable Doctor agrees with Cartwright, who wrote, "Being the Canon bars me wit and wine," for there is nothing that can be called striking either in matter or manner from one end of the volume to the other. But though in one place the author cites material prosperity as evidence in favour of Protestantism, he recants this most unbiblical, most unchristian, and most wicked position in another chapter, and says, very sensibly, that the motor-race will no more promote true happiness than did the mela fervidis evilata rotis. It is melancholy that any one calling himself a Christian should dare, in the face of the express words of the Christ, to say that material riches and their results are an evidence of the Divine favour, and a testimony to the truth of Protestant dogma or no-dogma; but it is well, at all events, that the author throws over the motor-car, even if his logical consistency is again in question. It is charitable to suppose that there was a good deal of truth in the accusation uttered the other day at the Baptist Conference. The ignorance of the Bible, it was said, was scandalous, even in candidates for the ministry. Still, this is more or less of a domestic matter; and, though the Catholic Church has always urged the extreme importance of Biblical studies, the tolerance of the present day would not suffer us to compel Dissenting preachers to read their Bibles.

But, to proceed with our examination of "My Belief:" Dr. Horton desires to prove that God is not unknowable, since we can surely know Him by His works. As, the writer says, I know the mind of Holman Hunt by his pictures, so I know the Mind of God by the evidence of created things—of the Universe. This granted or (in Dr. Horton's mind) proven, he proceeds to deduce from the consideration of the aforesaid Universe a God of Wisdom, Beauty, and Benevolence. For example :

If a wound is made in the body, immediately a process is set up which can only be compared with a gang of workmen sent post-haste to a wrecked train. . . . It is an Intelligence other than my own which restores the balance, invigorates the weak part, heals the wound.

And, again, all things, animate and inanimate, are said to be "steeped in the magic of beauty." And, further : history shows that there is a continuous progress, a perpetual ascent of man. "The ape and tiger within us gradually but surely die. Man is in the course of appearing." And this progress is highly moral ; witness the fact that Henry V. was smitten down with disease within a few weeks of Agincourt, that the Crown of England lost its possessions in France for ever. Furthermore, we may infer the nature of God from human nature, with all its faculties and powers. I believe, by the way, that there is an error of fact in one of Dr. Horton's instances from Nature. He says that bees are mere automata, that they "have not the sense to overcome the slightest unaccustomed obstacle." The threatened lack of a queen is surely an unaccustomed crisis in the hive, and we know that the bees in such a case will administer "royal food" to a common grub, which thereby becomes in due season a queen. An even stronger instance is that of the experimenter who tilted the bees' house to one side, endangering the equilibrium. A sufficient number of bees immediately mounted to the other side to maintain the balance, while another gang tried to make the hive secure in its new position.

However, these instances do not affect the main argument, to which we now return. Take the case of the wound. The vis medicatrix naturæ proves, according to the author, a God of Wisdom and Benevolence. What does suppuration prove, then ? What do inflammation, mortification, and death of the patient prove ? That gang of healing workmen declares the goodness of God ? Whose glory, then, is declared by the other workmen whose operations are Plague, Tetanus, Typhoid, Diphtheria, Smallpox, and the rest ? What sweet influences are manifested by the fair sisters Sarcoma, Epithelioma, Carcinoma ? All things, too, are steeped in the magic of beauty ? The Pterodactyl, the Hippopotamus, the Rattlesnake, the Cobra, the Devil Fish, for example ? And is it so absolutely clear that there is a continual ascent of man, a continual progress to better and holier things ? Is it, for example, certain that Chicago is infinitely superior in all things to Athens in the days of Sophocles ? Are its morals better ? Is its Wisdom more exalted ? Is its Art immeasurably more beautiful ? Is its literature as noon-day to twilight compared with the literature of Athens ? Can it produce a drama which would drive Æschylus, Sophocles, Euripides to despair and suicide ? Is it socially more pleasant to inhabit ? Is it politically more pure ? Do its public buildings cause the Parthenon to appear a mean hovel ? Would its police-courts abash the Judges celebrated in the Eumenides ? Or—with a change of scene and time—would Plato have sat humbly at the feet of Dr. Aked, that fervid social reformer, and chaplain to Mr. Rockefeller ? And the Tiger and the Ape ? I read the newspapers now and then, and I seem to have detected, not infrequently, the tracks of these beasts. It will be noticed that I have chosen Athens, which was pagan, I regret to say ; I think the case might have been more strongly presented by the instance of a mediæval city, but I am aware that Dr. Horton does not hold with Popery. And as to the moral purpose of history, this is shown, it seems, by the illness of Henry V. and the loss of the English possessions in France ; the moral being, of course, that theft does not prosper. How then was it with the case of the Saxons who stole Britain from the Britons, with the Normans who stole England from the English, with the colonists who stole the country of the Massachusetts ? I would instance the Turk, who is still at Constantinople, but I must not do so, because the inhabitants of Byzantium were not Protestants. Dr. Horton has visited Cairo, and, the Coptic Christians not being Protestants, he confesses frankly enough that the intelligent onlooker might hesitate between the claims of the Christian Church and the "splendid mosque on the citadel." And then there is the argument from the nature and powers of man. How do we know that Casanova, Tiberius, and Charles Peace were not the really typical men, the examples that we ought to follow, the indices pointing to our true source and origin ? Nay, how do we know that savagery is not our proper state, that history is not the record of our lapse from happiness, while that which we call "civilisation" is the cause of all our miseries ? Shakespeare was a man ? Certainly ; and the dunce, the fool, the monomaniac are men too.

Now it must be said that in a later chapter Dr. Horton admits a great deal of all this ; he does not perceive, it would appear, that the earlier argument is thereby nullified. He is content to say that on a shipwrecked vessel the useful man is he who gets out the boats and points to the shore. Most certainly ; but the handy man in question would not shout through the swelling storm that it was getting calmer every minute ; he would not assure his fellows that the boiling waves were firm land ; he would not point to the savage rocks and say, "Look at the pier ;" he would not say that the dozen or so of unhappy wretches just swept overboard were safe ashore ; he would not deduce from the general circumstances and surroundings of the moment the safety and, indeed, luxury of going to sea. The other passengers might possibly regard such an one as a dangerous lunatic and as the crowning misery of their misadventure. Again, I must say that it is a pity that Dr. Horton does not study the Scriptures more carefully and thoroughly ; if he were to do so he would discover that the Bible does not depict the world of Nature or the world of Humanity as a kind of Cokayne, or pleasant Lubberland, where the ripe fruit drops into the open mouth, where the gaping wound is invariably and automatically healed, where the fiercest animal is a tabby kitten, where vice is perpetually being punished and virtue is always finally rewarded. This sort of conception has become obsolete even in that most conventional of all spheres, the stage ; it is odd, indeed, that a Dissenting teacher should compose a scenario of the Universe which makes one think that he has confused the Creator of all things with Messrs. Sims and Pettitt. Let him search the Scriptures ; he will not find that the world is at all like an old-fashioned Adelphi melodrama. We often hear sectarians speaking with awe and respect of "the spirit of the age." In the Bible, too, we are told somewhat concerning the Prince of this World ; but the Personage in question and his dominion are not precisely held up for our admiration.

I have noticed several statements in "My Belief" which seem to me questionable, or more than questionable :

If God is the one Power He can and will make Himself plain.

Well, if God has made Himself plain to the Holy Catholic Church, then He has not made Himself plain to Dr. Horton. Dr. Horton says it is better to be a Buddhist, a Mahometan, an antique pagan, or an atheist of the Continental type than to be a Catholic Christian, Catholic Christianity being a pest and a scourge. This sentiment is expressed in various passages throughout the book ; it is tersely and distinctly enunciated on p. 80 :

If Catholicism is Christianity, the world must deliver itself from Christianity if Catholicism as it is known to us in history is the best that Christianity has to offer, the world which is bent on liberty, light, and truth must consent to let the dream of Christianity die.

It seems that the world has changed in the course of the centuries. There is no need now for the consolatory declaration, "I have overcome the world," since the world (of Latin Atheism) is bent on liberty, light, and truth. I have always been under the impression that the world in question was chiefly bent on Loot, or, as they call it in France, Liquidation. Still, however that may be, the problem remains. Dr. Horton says that God has not made Himself known in Catholicism, nor yet in Calvinism or early Protestantism—only, it would seem, to Dr. Horton and his Hampstead congregation. Patiens quia Æternus indeed; and one is a little reminded of the Welsh preacher's sermon. He was enumerating the Redeemed, according to their denominations, somewhat in this manner :

Baptists—a few. Wesleyans—a few. Independents—a few. Presbyterians—a few. Churchmen—a few. (With sudden vehemence) Welsh Calvinistic Methodists !—a great multitude!

Then there is a place which contrasts "simple Christian teaching, which finds its ready entrance into every unprejudiced human heart, the teaching of the New Testament itself," with the "corrupt historical systems"—i.e., of course, with the Catholic Church of Christ, as before. Now, one would like to ask Dr. Horton, the Logician, the Friend of Reason, whether there is an a priori probability that Religion, a scheme of things which professes to give an everlasting, heavenly clue to the whole Universe, would be "simple." Is the human heart "simple"? Is Psychology "simple"? Are the Sciences "simple"? Is Philosophy "simple"? Are the Arts "simple"? We know that none of these is simple; we know that in the speck of dust in the sunlight there lie latent all the mysteries, all the tremendous problems which have awed and perplexed the hearts of the greatest sages from the foundation of the world. Is it then reasonable to suppose that a system which professes to be the clue to the awful labyrinth of all things could possibly be a simple system? Then, passing from probability to certainty, was the religion of Christ, of His Apostles, of the New Testament, in fact a simple religion, winning its way to every heart which was not fortified against it by violent prejudice? If this be a true description of Scriptural Christianity, why did the disciples murmur and say, "This is a hard saying; who can hear it?" Why did many of these disciples go back and walk no more with Him? Why was Christ crucified? Why was St. Stephen stoned? Why were the saints hewn asunder, thrown to wild beasts, hideously tormented, burned with fire? Why was the Gospel a stumbling-block to the Jews, foolishness to the Greeks, and felony to the Romans? Why were the companions of the Lord, the Holy Apostles themselves, in darkness more or less complete till the very Day of Pentecost? Why was it said that no man could know the Lord save by the miracle of the Holy Ghost? Nay; but the disciples and the Apostles surely had no prejudice against the truth; the Jews were a devout people, the Greeks were the most eager enquirers after Truth that the world has ever known, the Roman law was amazing in its broad-minded toleration; every cult was welcomed by it—except that one cult, which, according to the Sage of Hampstead, is so "simple," so entirely self-evident. But it will be said, perhaps, that Dr. Horton believes that the ancient world was stubborn, prejudiced, "invincibly ignorant"—to borrow a phrase from the enemy—while since the coming of the Christ the universal human heart has been transmuted and changed. But this is not so; for Dr. Horton is explicit as to the doctrine that all religions of all ages and all climes are revelations from God. Judaism was a revelation :

But so also was the religion of Bel-Merodach in Babylon, the worship of Athene and Apollo in Greece, the jejune cultus of ancient Rome.

It is impossible, then, to regard the ancient world as fortified against this "simple" faith of Christ by obstinate and demoniacal prejudice, since the ancient world was in possession of "the revelation of God according to its capacity and willingness." In fine, then, though Christianity is so "simple," so self-evident that all but the most inveterate are compelled to give it their assent, at the same time the very Apostles of the Lord failed to grasp its meaning, and Jewry, Greece, and Rome rejected it and its teachers with vehement disgust. And at the same time this self-evident religion, so simple as to be axiomatic, became hopelessly corrupted in a century or two from its foundation, the corruption being otherwise known as the Catholic Church; and this faith, which no one in his sober senses can escape crediting, is at present so far from being credible in modern England that

The proletariat of an English city . . . probably come nearer to being without religion than any other population in the world.

Also :

Thoughtful and intelligent Europe is now non-Christian ; and Christians are in a minority, derided by the intellectual, railed at by the workers, ignored by the fashionable.

It seems to me that Dr. Horton has been unjust to himself in his famous Preface. He says that he cannot receive the Credo quia impossibile. Surely he is mistaken; he can do much more than believe in a verbal paradox. He can believe at once that all A is B and that some A is not B—a feat so novel and so surprising that I do not remember to have seen any technical name for it—in the Logic Books.

To proceed. On p. 64 we learn that :

Christianity was a Judaism which discounted the external and ceremonial side of religion, laying the whole stress on the inward life, the state of the heart.

This statement is, I must say without circumlocution, absolutely and entirely false—directly at variance with the plain and literal text of the New Testament, at variance with the express words of Christ and His actions, at variance with the express words of the Apostles and their actions, at variance with the express words of the immediate successors of the Apostles and their actions. I cannot weary the readers of THE ACADEMY with the catena of texts that I have cited on other occasions again and again; I will not insult them by supposing that they are ignorant of the rites and ceremonies of Baptism, the Lord's Supper, Unction of the Sick, Bestowal of the Holy Ghost; I will not insist in detail on the plain and notorious fact that the Christ gave His solemn approval by word and deed to the whole system of the ceremonial law. I simply declare that Dr. Horton's statement as quoted above is not true, and I refer him, in the approved Protestant fashion, to Rev. xxii. 15.

My materials are by no means exhausted, but my space is limited. I have approached "My Belief" from the logical point of view, because Dr. Horton himself indicated that point of view in his Preface. "For my part," he says, "I believe only what seems to me certain;" and, again, declaring his belief in mysteries, he points out that the steps which lead up to these mysteries are "strong and irrefragable arguments." I have examined a few of these strong and irrefragable arguments; and now I should like to lighten the end of this review with a point which is more or less a matter of taste :

I recall (Dr. Horton says) a feeling which came over me in Athens; after studying the noble remains of ancient art, the ruins of the Acropolis, the temple of Theseus, and the sculptured reliefs of the Ceramicus, I felt a strange and sickening revolt against the tawdry mummery of the Orthodox Church, which seemed not only lifeless, but deadening.

Now we will not be so uncharitable as to suppose that Dr. Horton formed his judgment as to the "commonness of this ci-devant Christianity" on the evidence of a casual, hurried visit to a ceremony which he did not understand. The American gentleman certainly did form his judgment on English justice in some such manner, but I will not condemn Dr. Horton as guilty of such folly as that. We will rather believe that he has made an exhaustive study of the Eastern Church—of that Church which has kept the faith through centuries of sword, impalement, torture, and cruel oppression, which offered up anew its martyrs a few years ago. We will credit the Hampstead Doctor with a careful examination of the Eastern Liturgies also; and we can only regret that he found nothing in the Orthodox Church of the East but commonness and tawdry mummery.

Here is a bit of mummary from the Divine Liturgy of St. James :

We render thanks to Thee, Lord our God, for that Thou hast given us boldness to the entrance in of Thy holy places, the new and living way which Thou hast consecrated for us through the veil of the Flesh of Thy Christ. We therefore, to whom it hath been vouchsafed to enter into the place of the tabernacle of Thy glory, and to be within the veil, and to behold the Holy of Holies, fall down before Thy goodness ; Master, have mercy upon us ; since we are full of fear and dread, when about to stand before Thy holy altar, and to offer this fearful and unbloody sacrifice, for our sins and for the ignorances of the people. Send forth, O God, Thy good grace, and hallow our souls and bodies and spirits, and change our hearts to holiness, that in a pure conscience we may present to Thee the mercy of peace, the sacrifice of praise.

And here is a vulgar, deadening prayer from the Divine Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom :

None is worthy among them that are bound with fleshly desires to approach Thee, nor to draw near, nor to sacrifice unto Thee, King of Glory ; for to minister to Thee is great and fearful, even to the heavenly powers themselves. Yet through Thine ineffable and measureless love, Thou didst . . . become man, and didst take the title of our High Priest, and didst give to us the Hierurgy of this offering of the unbloody sacrifice, as being Lord of all ; for Thou only, O Lord our God, rulest over things in heaven and things on earth, who sittest upon the cherubic throne, Lord of Seraphim, and King of Israel, only holy, and resting in the holies.

This sort of thing must be very disgusting to a man accustomed to the stately ceremonial, the dignified ritual of the English Independents.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY

[SECOND ARTICLE]

WE have been to the Royal Academy for a shilling, and we have rubbed shoulders with the gaping art-loving shilling multitude. As the Royal Academy puts up but one price of admission, the shilling multitude should be fairly representative. For a shilling, of course, sections of the same crowd go to Earl's Court—of which more anon. On the other hand, at Earl's Court, there are side-shows and opportunities for eating and drinking which do not somehow arise at the Royal Academy. Besides having gone patiently to the 140th Exhibition of the Royal Academy of Arts with the general public, we have taken immense pains in the examination of the first few pages of the Royal Academy's current catalogue. We have learnt, to our extreme joy, that the hours of admission to the Exhibition are from 8 a.m. to 7 p.m. The 8 a.m. idea is excellent, affording one exceptional facilities for the combination of picture-viewing and early rising. We have promised ourselves that in the near future we will be round at 8 a.m. On another page we find a portentous list of Honorary Members, Academicians, Associates, and "Professors." And on the title-page we discover the most significant thing of all—namely, a motto which the Royal Academy would, one assumes, have us take closely to heart. The motto in question appears to have been compiled by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and it runs as follows :—"The excellence of every art must consist in the complete accomplishment of its purpose"—which is most admirable, if a trifle mechanical and over-true. But as writing of gold for the Royal Academy it is simply delightful. We have already indicated humbly our view as to the real "purpose" of the average person who exhibits at Burlington House. Whether that purpose invariably obtains "complete accomplishment" is another question. There can be no doubt, however, that it has a good try.

Now, as we have more than once suggested, it is not proper to be too severe upon the Royal Academy. If genius of the proper sort does not happen to be painting just now we must not wholly blame the Royal Academy, any more than we should blame the farmer when the "turmits" are not all ten-pounders. At the same time, it would be idle and unseemly of us to allow our charitable feelings toward this august body to run away with us. The Royal Academy takes the public's shillings, and is consequently susceptible to common criticism. We admit that its difficulties are, or should be, enormous. The nature of those difficulties will readily occur to the intelligent, and we need not dilate upon it. For all that, we are of opinion that the Council has, in setting forth the present year's exhibition, committed at least one error of a most glaring and flagrant kind. We refer to the hanging in a prominent position of Sir Hubert von Herkomer's phantasmagoria, "The Council of the Royal Academy, 1907." It seems to us that the Royal Academy are to be held responsible for this extraordinary piece of portraiture in a far greater than usual sense. In other words, it is fair to assume that Sir Hubert von Herkomer did not compose this canvas with the almighty assistance of a surreptitious snap-shot photograph ; it is fair to presume that Sir Hubert von Herkomer went about his work in something approximating to a decent manner and was careful to get sittings from the members of the Academy Council, and it is fair to presume that each member knew why and for whom he was sitting, and was acquainted also with the fact that the result would figure in the Royal Academy exhibition of 1908. Consequently we have in Sir Hubert von Herkomer's canvas something which is tantamount to an expression of opinion on the part of the Royal Academy that Sir Hubert von Herkomer is a great portrait-painter. On the face of it, such an expression of approval, coming as it does from so presumably high a quarter, is most flattering to Sir Hubert von Herkomer, and if Sir Hubert happened to be Sir Hubert von Herkomer, Limited, instead of a simple, uncapitalised English painter, his stock would be materially uplifted in consequence. It is possible, of course, that it has never occurred to Mr. Sargent to whisper sweet nothings about painting a collective portrait into the Council's ear. It is possible, also, that if the thing did occur to Mr. Sargent, he felt himself to be altogether too busy to undertake so vast and temerarious a work. And it is possible, even, that when Sir Hubert von Herkomer made his advances on the subject the Council were a trifle upset, and consented merely out of courtesy. Anyway, we will do them the justice to suppose that they now look back upon their acquiescence with touches of regret. Frankly, we are of opinion that it is a great pity that the picture hangs where it does, and that it is a still greater pity that the hobbledhoys from provincial art schools who visit the Exhibition with a view to inspiration, delight, and instruction should be invited to suppose that Sir Hubert von Herkomer's effort is great portraiture. In point of fact, we believe that even the stout boys who paint huge round moons in the provinces will do their best to decline to be deceived, and will probably tuck away in the back of their uncouth minds the half-thought that the Royal Academy Council is not quite so profound a judge of the portrait as one might expect it to be.

We are not concerned to heap abuse upon either the Royal Academy Council or Sir Hubert von Herkomer. Neither are we concerned to puff Mr. Sargent at anybody's expense, or to puff other more or less distinguished painters of portraits who have managed to find corners for themselves on the Academy walls. But we believe that if it had been in the least necessary that the Royal Academy Council of 1907 should have its picture painted, there is more than one comparatively unknown or unpushful painter now exhibiting at Burlington House who could have done better than Sir Hubert von Herkomer. If Sir Hubert would care to know what we mean, let him repair to one of the southern corners of Gallery No. 4. Here he will find a picture marked 253, "George and Lucy, Children of Sir Archibald Campbell, Bart., of Succoth." The painter is Mr. Sholto J. Douglas, and we do not say that the work in question is equal to some of his past performances. But we think that if the Academy Council should ever again desire to be painted it might send for Mr. Douglas. And if it comes to "fashionable" persons, even Mr. Solomon J. Solomon or Mr. Arthur Hacker might prove serviceable.

And now to Earl's Court. Life has its small compensations, and it is notable that when you get tired and a little eye-sick and heart-weary over Royal Academy Exhibitions, of whatever year, you may depend on finding within a stone's throw of the Welcome Club a scratch collection of pictures by such-and-such foreign artists. This year it is the Austro-Hungarian community who furnishes forth the funeral baked meats, as it were. There are probably but two hundred pictures in the Earl's Court gallery. Some of them are bad and, one might almost say, horrid. But the best of them will not disappoint you in the least. If one may say so, they are too good to be where they are. We should advise the Royal Academy Council, not forgetting Sir Hubert von Herkomer himself, to take a swift char-à-banc and proceed for an afternoon's instruction to Earl's Court. They will see one or two things there which are bound to edify them, that is to say, if they be—as we believe them to be—unbiased and reasonable members of their profession.

THE MADNESS OF SPRING

If we accept Johnson's definition of madness as a perturbation of the faculties, we must acknowledge that there is more than a conventional association between madness and the earlier months of the year. While the buds are breaking, the faculties of all of us are perturbed with a vengeance, and never a green leaf unrolls beneath the sky but one of us tramples under foot the laws he has made for the guidance of his life. Sometimes our mania is clear to every one, sometimes we are the most cunning of madmen, only wearing the straws in solitude, and duly imitating the lives of our grandfathers before our suspicious neighbours. But, however this may be, we are all mad in the spring, and though their perturbations vary as widely as the new leaves, our faculties sing drunken songs together along the wind-swept streets of the world.

This is a period when it is very good to be young, and so I willingly sympathise with the madness of my friend Florizel, who drives about London looking for his lost youth in a taximeter filled with children and chocolates. There are moments, he tells me, when this annual search seems to be crowned with success. Perhaps for an hour he recovers the forgotten ignorance of his early years; the children treat him with the genial rudeness of comradeship; he is patronised by ticket-collectors and policemen. But he goes home an old man. No less do I sympathise with the youthful and agreeable Hamlet, who staggers along the Charing Cross Road at this season with his arms and pockets filled with books. These are not, alas! the spoils of a conqueror, but the sacrifices of the vanquished, for every spring Hamlet falls in love, and madly sells his books for flowers and art jewellery. His dream-girls are always of the practical kind, and their affection for Hamlet appears to pass with his library; but Hamlet loves the spring nevertheless. So too, I suppose, does Pericles, whose madness, however, fills me rather with envy than with sympathy, for to him the spring brings a passion for work that enables him to squander the summer hours at Lord's or the Oval like a capitalist. There is something immoral in being able to perform prodigies of work when all the world is stretching from its winter sleep. But so it is with Pericles, and his friends will know him no more until these delicious months are over.

In truth there is no harm in these vernal follies; they are only the fuller expression of that self over which our conventional cunning has no control. Perhaps if we were honest and not quite so civilised we should dance blithely along Piccadilly every day of our short lives. Perhaps if we understood our neighbours better we should endue every night with the dreamy colours of our desires. As it is, it is only in the spring that we are willing to acknowledge the charm—I might almost say the virtue—of wise excess. Over a certain section of one of the London parks there used to rule a policeman so dour that he never wearied of condemning himself for the frivolous character of his dreams. He felt that the midnight caperings of his spirit went far to counteract the rectitude of his conscious life, and over all his asceticism there hung a bitter consciousness of its futility. At last, on a golden day of spring, he proposed to and was accepted by a nursemaid of obscure charms, and the kingdom of paradox knew him no more. He traced his fall to a bed of tulips.

But most cruel of all are the dealings of this wanton season with those of us who write about little things with wide, splendid words. Never, it would seem, are our emotions more trivial, never are the words with which we hold them wider and more splendid. It is true that this verbal insanity affects us in different ways. Me does the coming of the almond blossom afflict with adjectives—great and gorgeous adjectives in merry companies—fallen together by the chance of the road, but surely inseparable thereafter. There is nothing to be done with these blithe comrades but to enshrine them in note-books and sigh a requiem. For, fine as life is, there is nowhere anything on the earth worthy of such epithets—and I lack my note-book when I wander in the city of dreams. Moreover, this futility extends to the ideas themselves that are bred in our minds during this happy, bitter season. On a fair morning of spring I seemed to have discovered what really should be done with H.M.S. Buzzard, that promising gun-boat which lies off the Embankment for the encouragement of the naval volunteers. As in a vision, I saw her captured at night by twelve decadent millionaires, hopeful of winning the ultimate sensation by their piratical enterprise. Thereafter the tale pursued a pleasant and profitable course. Their number raised to thirteen by the volunteering of a romantic small boy, my millionaires diverted themselves by singing sentimental songs to the tall white masts and by scattering explosive shells like roses all over London. Beaten at last by the invincible force of the British Navy, they blow a magnificent hole in the bottom of the ship, which sinks some three feet, it being low tide, and there are god-like laughter upon the decks. Finally, I think the survivors, being three of the millionaires and the small boy, were to drift down the river towards the sea in a leaky boat, talking pleasant philosophies as they went.

Here was a fine tale with never a woman in it, yet, nevertheless, it was of the spring. For when, in an autumnal mood I revisited the Buzzard, I saw that even the most decadent of millionaires or the most romantic of small boys could not hold that wretched vessel for five minutes against a handful of marksmen. So passed my screaming shells, my armoured tramcars, my ploughed and reddened decks. Before the first puff of saner weather my visionary galleon sailed back to the harbour of dreams.

Yet withal, when the last joss-stick of winter dies in the room and the scent of the violets in the flower-girls' baskets comes singing through the open window, it is only the more cowardly of us who quaff the cautious iron and quinine. Those of us who are lovers know that there are troubling days before us in this season of finite sorrows and infinite joys, and, amateurs of pain as we are, we would not have it otherwise. It is enough for us, though our feet be lame and bleeding, that, from the grey morning and through the hot day and down to the cool time when the stars light up the sky, our love fares on. We may mock ourselves with speech of green-sickness and of faculties devilishly perturbed; we may turn a sorrowful eye on a morrow inevitably grey; but our hearts are for the spring.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Doctrine of the Trinity. Apologetically considered by J. R. ILLINGWORTH, M.A., D.D. (Macmillan, 6s.)

In an age which demands of the clergy feverish action and over-organisation rather than study and thought, the Church of England may well be thankful that there are some scholars left who devote their lives to spiritual philosophy. Of these, Dr. Illingworth is surely pre-eminent. This profound writer now adds one more remarkable book to a learned series, in which he has shown himself to be a student not only of ideas, but also of life, in reference to the deepest problems which stir humanity. In the Preface Dr. Illingworth truly observes that

There are signs that the doctrine of the Trinity is again likely to become the battle-ground that it has so often been before in Christian history—the battle-ground on which the contention for the faith will have for the time to be carried on.

No one will doubt this who has read Mr. Campbell's recent amazing utterances.

Dr. Illingworth boldly faces the theories of doctrinal development. We have seldom read a more convincing argument than the first chapter—Evolution Presupposes God. In the "region of religious experience, the spiritual history of souls," we must divest ourselves of that arrogance which finds expression in the Common assumption that our modern knowledge is universally greater than that of bygone ages. . . . We may be scientific, but the leading minds of other days were spiritual specialists.

While clearly pointing out that fundamental truth is complete in itself, Dr. Illingworth shows that doctrinal development is not, as some would have us think, an addition to that truth, but a deeper penetration into the truth :

The doctrine of the Trinity, for instance, confessedly underwent development, as regards the language in which it was expressed, by the adoption, for example, of such terms as substance, person, eternal generation, circumincession, double procession.

In the chapter "Omnia exeunt in mysterium" Dr. Illingworth considers intellectual objections to the doctrine of the Trinity on the ground of its mystery, which has "been thought to impart fresh difficulty to the already difficult conception of God." But, as he well asks, "Can anything increase that difficulty?" We agree that to reject a mystery because it is a mystery is illogical and unscientific.

Throughout this book Dr. Illingworth lays emphatic stress on the mystery that permeates the universe :

The greatest wonder of the world is its existence. When we pause to philosophise, that is, to wonder, our own existence is our greatest mystery ; and the crux of that mystery is not "how," but "why" we exist.

The practical conclusion of the matter is thus stated :

When objections are urged against the doctrine of the Trinity, on the ground of its metaphysical and abstract character, we may point with confidence to the magnitude of its results. It may not, indeed, be more comprehensible than any other conception of what is essentially beyond our comprehension ; but it has enabled a more vivid apprehension than any other of God's various relations to men, and proved in consequence, if we look below the surface of history, the most practical of powers.

Dr. Illingworth's style is so clear, his method so lucid, his reasoning and philosophy at once so simple and profound, that this book is no mere treatise for the abstruse metaphysician, but rather a guide and apology which we confidently commend to all students of the Christian faith, lay and clerical alike, who desire a thoughtful discussion of the "popular difficulties" which are raised on all sides to-day.

Lectures and Addresses of Rev. S. Singer. (Routledge, 4s. 6d. net.)

THE Jews are always interesting ; and if any one wants to know where they are now dwelling in the world of thought, he cannot do better than read these three books. Singer was the chief reforming Rabbi among the Conformists. He introduced Bible-reading in English, prayers for the King, and children's services into the synagogue. He was also alive to the fact that the status of women needed reconsideration in Israel. He elucidated what romance he could from the Talmud, reformed the Marriage Service—required the express consent of the bride, hitherto of no account—and he set himself to educate and lead the devotions of the Jewesses. He supported a policy, not of making the Ghetto a colony from some unreal Palestine, but of supporting the national hosts, with pen, purse, and even sword. He sent the young Jews to serve in the Army and to learn in our public schools and Universities. He opposed the Zionism which would start by a rush to the Jerusalem which is below. He thought Canada a better land for emigrants. He was, in fact, a shrewd, sane Jew, who saw what might be made out of Judaism with a little faith and a good deal of pluck. Consequently he was a tribal leader rather than a prophet. Of his lectures the most interesting are that of the Messianic idea in Judaism, and that on the Jews' relations to other races. In this latter are some most interesting figures. The Jews form one-eightieth of Germany, but they hold one-thirteenth of the professorial chairs, and one-sixth of the Privat-Dozenten are of this persuasion, a sufficient proof of Jewish ability, if one were needed. The ugly and vulgar side to the Jew may also be gathered even from the cover, which calls the author "Rev. S. Singer." The sack often follows the sample. What could be in worse taste than the Rabbi's assaults upon the Christian Confessional, which he nesciently assures all Israel Lends itself to frightful abuses, exercising a tyranny over the souls of men and women, encouraging the worst forms of hysteria, slackening the cords of conscience, injuring the spirit of self-respect, undermining a sense of personal responsibility, and entailing a consequent enfeeblement of character ; it casts the shadow of the priest across the most sacred intimacies of family life ; creates thoughts of sin by the suggestion of sin ; it is as great a peril to the character of the priest as to that of the people.

These silly assaults upon the religion of their hosts damage the reputation of these guests of Christian nations ; but in spite of several such gamineries, the books contain much that will make the reader say with the Duenna, "So little like a Jew and so much like a gentleman."

Round about the North Pole. By W. J. GORDON. (John Murray, 15s. net.)

READERS of the "Water Babies" will remember how Tom, on his journey to The-Other-End-of-Nowhere, came "to shiny Wall, to the Great Gate that never was opened," and, diving down, came up in Peace Pool, where the good whales go. In the present book Mr. Gordon tells the story of the brave men who have tried, through the centuries, to conquer that barrier of ice and find that smooth water round the Pole where, according to the story told at Amsterdam to Joseph Moxon, Hydrographer to the King, in 1652 :

No land was seen, no ice, and the weather as it was in summer at Amsterdam.

The story of the struggle of man with Nature, fierce, relentless, ever-watching, is always fascinating, whether success or failure crowns the unequal fight. The path of the pioneer attracts far more than the beaten track of the known and open road, and perhaps because the struggle in the cold, barren North is more especially with Nature herself and not with other creatures of her making, its story surpasses others of different climes both in the horror of failure or the magnificence of success. Cortez, "silent upon a peak in Darien," fires our imagination and enthusiasm, just as the cry of the Ten Thousand has always done, but the thrill is more intense, the grip is harsher when we read of Colwell's rescue of Greely on June 22nd, 1884 :

There was a tent wrecked by the gale, with its pole toppling over, and only kept in place by the guy-ropes. Ripping it up with a knife, a sight of horror was disclosed. On one side, close to the opening, with his head towards the outside, lay what was apparently a dead man. On the opposite side was a poor fellow, alive, but without hands or feet, and with a spoon tied to the stump of his right arm. Two others, seated on the ground, were pouring something out of a rubber bottle into a tin can. Directly opposite, on his hands and knees, was a dark man with a long, matted beard, in a dirty and tattered dressing-gown, with a little red skull-cap on his head, and brilliant staring eyes. As Colwell appeared, he raised himself and put on a pair of eyeglasses.

Colwell crawled in and took him by the hand, saying to him, "Greely, is this you?"

"Yes," said Greely, in a faint, broken voice, hesitating with his words, "yes—seven of us left—here we are—dying like men. Did what I came to do—beat the best record."

Near at hand were ten graves. The bodies, despite Greely's remonstrances, were taken up and removed for burial in the United States. . . . One of these . . . had a bullet in it. He had been shot, at Greely's written order, "for stealing sealskin thongs, the only remaining food."

This is but one of many supremely dramatic moments in Mr. Gordon's book; others are, perhaps, more familiar, while the meeting of Jackson and Nansen:

"Aren't you Nansen?"

"Yes I am."

"By jove! I'm damned glad to see you!"

is as famous as "Dr. Livingstone, I presume?"

Mr. Gordon claims that among the many books about

The Polar regions there is none quite like this, dealing with the gradual progress of exploration towards the north along the different areas of advance within the Arctic Circle.

This method has the advantage of system, for he begins from Spitzbergen, and works eastward, through Novaya Zemlya, Franz Josef Land, to Bering Strait; thence to the American mainland, to Baffin Bay, and Greenland. He thus can compare the efforts of succeeding explorers in the same zone; but as the interest of the ordinary reader is probably personal rather than local, it might have made for greater popularity had Mr. Gordon taken each man's work separately, no matter how wide was the extent of his field.

Putting this question of method, however, on one side, and lamenting only in passing the absence of a complete map of the Arctic Circle, in addition to the small sectional maps throughout the book, there is nothing but commendation due to Mr. Gordon for his work. From its nature there is but little that is original, but Mr. Gordon's research and collation are most careful and thorough, and he has succeeded in telling the story of the conquest of the Pole in a manner which is at once clear and fascinating. Names, great and familiar, crowd through the pages, and it is with surely not unworthy pride that we notice that no small number of them are of our own race. From the days of the Merchant Adventurers and the Muscovy Company, when Adrian Gilbert and Frobisher were certain of finding gold as well as a passage to Cathaya somewhere among the ice, down to the modern days of Franklin, Markham, and Jackson, England has borne her full share of the sacrifice, and won her full share of the glory of the conquest of the Northern Seas. Here, as elsewhere, we have paid our price of Admiralty to the full.

Lolus Leaves from Africa and Covent Garden. By ISRAFEL (David Nutt, 3s. 6d. net.)

AUTHORS who would be precious tempt the critic to point out the two rival ditches into which this slippery path sometimes ensnares those who choose it—an elaborate frigidity or an ornate nonsense. Even Pater sometimes fell into one or both, and who can hope to escape when he did not? The reader who likes colour epithets and is not too particular about shape, and does not wince if the song of birds is called crystal or crystalline, will find plenty of bright description of North African scenes, and some unequal musical criticisms. It is not true, for instance, that Beethoven is:

Interested only in God and Nature; not at all in humanity, or that he is as cold, salt, and stinging as the sea:

To complete a Turkish bath in Gounod—who is all hot, enervating sweetness—or a Russian bath in Tchaikowsky, you should take a cold plunge in Beethoven.

This is a fair specimen of the criticism of effort, rather than of power. But the remarks on Elgar are happy:

Some people, as you know, one runs down and likes; others one praises and does not care for. Elgar is of the former kind.

By the way, one cannot be precious and slangy too, and it is a pity to use the word "cheeky" when one aims at being an artist in prose.

H.M.I. By E. M. SNEYD-KYNNERSLEY. (Macmillan and Co., 8s. 6d.)

THIS is a pleasant, garrulous book, redeemed from being an ordinary chestnut-pudding by the fact that it is spiced with some audacity and flavoured with a little mild indiscretion. The school inspector gives us some amusing light upon the rogueries of the Welsh, off whom, to use a racy country idiom, he "lifts the blanket." He explains, too, the exceeding badness of Matthew Arnold at his trade, tells queer tales of parsons, Roman priests, mixed minds, howlers, fiascos, lunches, drinks, pretty maids, and slow-coaches. Altogether this is a book for the hot weather, unless it fall into the hands of those who naturally feel warm whenever they endure the Balliol tone. These should avoid it.

FICTION

Emotional Moments. By SARAH GRAND. (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)

MADAME SARAH GRAND takes herself very seriously. She gives us twelve short stories, of the conventional type for the most part, and prefaces the collection with a dissertation on men and manners that is a re-hash of the usual diatribes against those mysterious beings who go to make up what is termed "Society." But it is sufficient to say that the Preface is quite unnecessary. As for the stories, where the subject is good the treatment is bad, and vice versa. That entitled "The Condemned Cell" verges on the ridiculous. The spectacle of "Lady Charlotte Templemore" awaiting execution for the murder of her husband is too artificial to be taken seriously. We will admit that it is quite possible for a lady of title to murder her husband, but Madame Grand's precedents are few, if they exist at all, and this attempt to create a sensation is a failure. "The Baby's Tragedy" tells of the whims of a lady who sacrifices her baby for the sake of her figure. It is written sufficiently well to deceive the uninitiated. "The Undefinable" and "The Man in the Scented Coat" are laboured efforts with trivial results. Nowadays, when nearly everybody knows the secret of writing bad short stories, such a batch as "Emotional Moments" has little chance of success. Something more than painstaking efforts to re-point old morals is necessary. Originality and freshness of treatment are essential, and Madame Grand shows neither of these in "Emotional Moments." Consequently it must be voted commonplace, despite the Preface.

The Sword Decides. By MARJORIE BOWEN. (Alston Rivers, 6s.)

It is not unlikely that every book Miss Marjorie Bowen writes will be a great success. She possesses the art of writing the essentially modern novel—the series of short, snappy paragraphs, unburdened by too much descriptive matter, deftly welded together to tell a story. Of this class is "The Sword Decides." One can see that there was no hard work spent in building up the necessary "local colour." The writer merely takes a dose of history in order to aid her imagination, and the rest is easy. "The Sword Decides" is, nevertheless, more than a readable novel. It is distinctly above the average, but it does not reach the heights of English composition claimed by some of the reviewers. Perhaps no writer is ever as bad or as good as his or her critics declare. In any case Miss Bowen is not the great novelist her friends say she is. Giovanna of Naples is the storm-centre of Miss Bowen's new work, and around that romantic personality she has woven numerous adventures and love-stories which make the book exciting and pleasant reading. "The Sword Decides" opens with an account of the journey of Andreas, brother of the King of Hungary, to Naples to claim his unseen wife, Giovanna. The latter is, of course, anxious to succeed her grandfather, and though the dying monarch bequeaths his throne to Andreas, she succeeds in keeping him out of his inheritance for a time. When she is compelled to flee from the city she hides in a monastery, and here Andreas follows her. The tenth chapter, which describes the murder of Andreas, is quite the best piece of writing in the book, and that, be it said to the writer's credit, despite the fact that the subject is not the easiest to handle. Giovanna takes more than a passive share in her husband's treacherous murder, and it is this degree of guilt that provides the motive of the rest of the book. Ludovic, King of Hungary, who comes to avenge his brother's death, is ensnared by the charms of Giovanna, and, until he reasserts his manhood, Andreas is forgotten, and the plannings and plottings for supremacy in Naples continue. The finish is not conventional, and may disappoint some readers, but the thrills and shocks of the exciting narrative should compensate. "The Sword Decides" will add many recruits to Miss Bowen's army of admirers.

The Cardinal and Lady Susan. By LUCAS CLEEVE. (Greening, 6s.)

LADY SUSAN VERMOYLE, the nineteen-year-old daughter of an English Peer and an Italian-American mother, comes, on the death of the latter, as a self-invited guest to the house of Cardinal Sapponi, who had been jilted by her mother some twenty years before. Mixed blood, wealth, and an American upbringing have combined to make Susan rather a handful, and, after shocking every one within reach by means of her Yankee outspokenness, she proceeds to fall desperately in love with the Cardinal. Here is a situation that, in spite of its improbability, offers considerable opportunities to the novelist, and the author has evidently been at pains to elaborate the character of the terrifying Susan and in a minor degree that of the perplexed Cardinal. That the result is wholly satisfactory we cannot say. In spite of the author's care Susan remains improbable and a little artificial, and the Cardinal leaves but a faint impression on the reader's mind. However, the book is, on the whole, interesting, and the author shows deftness in her handling of the situations. The dénouement, which the publishers describe as "original and startling," appears to us to be needlessly unsatisfying.

The Coward Behind the Curtain. By RICHARD MARSH. (Methuen and Co., 6s.)

THOSE who like melodrama in its crudest and most violent form will be grateful to Mr. Marsh for his latest novel. The interest of the story centres round a girl who, hidden behind a curtain, watches a struggle between two men, which terminated in one of the combatants striking the other on the head with a champagne-bottle. Her subsequent escape from the room and the manner in which she contrived to elude police inquiries occupy the remainder of the volume, which runs to 310 pages. The book is not one that calls for serious criticism. It is an orgy of absurdities and extravagances. The characters are frankly maniacal, and the author evinces a reckless disregard for probabilities that would scandalise even the writer of a Daily Mail feuilleton. As Mr. Marsh continues to produce stories of this genre in rich profusion, it is evident that there is a demand for them. We have read this volume conscientiously, but we trust we shall be spared a similar ordeal in the future.

The Enchantress. By EDWIN PUGH. (John Milne, 6s.)

WE are not quite sure which quality to admire the more in Mr. Pugh—his cleverness or his audacity. He is undoubtedly clever, for he succeeds in compelling us to read his story right to the very end, although every moment increases the feeling of nausea which the story arouses. And his audacity in his choice and treatment of his subject leaves us gasping. Old "Mrs." Gantry had in her youth been betrayed by Joel Parradyne. Lydia, the daughter of this liaison, has been trained by her mother to regard her sex as an asset in her business-dealings with men. Chance throws her in the way of Jeremiah Parradyne, a cousin of Joel. At her mother's bidding she sets about trying to fool and deceive him—to get him in her toils, to drain him of everything he had, to do all she could to ruin him. Naturally enough, she is beaten in the battle of sex; but later, when she becomes the most celebrated dancer in Europe, instead of only being a member of a touring troupe she has another chance of vengeance on the Parradyne family, in the person of Sir Moses Parradyne, in whom Mr. Pugh reaches what surely must be the limit of revolting realism. Lydia marries this horrible, decrepit satyr, whose description might have won even Swift's envious admiration; but even there her vengeance on the Parradynes is not complete. On the night before her marriage she contrives to meet her old lover, with the result that an heir is expected when Sir Moses dies, whose father is really the man whom he will disinherit. In the end Lydia marries a rather colourless individual who has loved her all through, and whom we are assured she loves. In our opinion the question of morality is not one that has any relation to artistic or literary criticism, but the question of taste undoubtedly does arise. Mr. Pugh must answer others than ourselves on the former count; on the latter, in our opinion, he stands convicted.

The Ivory God. By J. S. FLETCHER. (John Murray, 6s.)

A VOLUME of short stories reprinted from popular magazines is always difficult to criticise fairly. In their original form they are judged as they, presumably, are intended, as ephemeral and for the amusement of an idle hour. But when they are collected and reprinted in book form they are taken out of the realm of ephemeral work and assume a claim to endurance which otherwise would never be thought of. In such a case how are they to be judged? What standard can be applied? It seems reasonably fair to take as a test whether they will stand re-reading. In the present case it is only possible to apply this test in one instance. Of the twenty-seven stories—some of them quite short character-sketches—which compose this book we have only chanced to meet one before. But ex pede Herculem, and Serjeant Murphy's Waterloo easily survives this test. For the others, we may say that, though certainly of unequal merit, they are all readable, some of them more than usually interesting, and in one or two instances really striking either in idea or execution. They vary considerably, both in subject and method, and the most catholic taste should be satisfied. In the story which gives its title to the book Mr. Fletcher works on the idea of the obsession of an opium-eater by an ivory image of Ganesh; while some half-dozen of the stories are simply sketches of Yorkshire village characters. For ourselves, we prefer Mr. Fletcher when he is serious, especially when he introduces just a touch of mysticism.

Drusilla's Point of View. By Madame ALBANESI. (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)

A CAPITAL story, well told, with a strong, original plot, and characterisation at once clear and sympathetic—such is the fare that Madame Albanesi offers in "Drusilla's Point of View." And what more can any one desire? The only quarrel which we are likely to have with the authoress is over the title. It strikes us (to speak frankly) as weak, and not a little clumsy. But that, after all, is but a small matter, and the charm of the book itself is possibly enhanced by the title's lack of attractiveness.

Some critic has said that in English fiction there are three women with whom one would like to be in love—Beatrix Esmond, Di Vernon, and Elizabeth Bennett. Without exaggeration we are tempted to add Drusilla as the fourth Grace. Certainly we cannot call to mind any heroine in modern fiction to compare with her either in charm or real loveableness. Of course she is not perfect—she would be intolerably dull if she were—but her faults are principally those of a spoilt child, and when sorrow comes her nature is strong and true enough to overcome them. Madame Albanesi has succeeded very cleverly in showing the development of her character under the influence of sorrow and love, and unqualified praise is due to her for her delicate yet sure handling of her heroine.

Of the other characters, by far the most sympathetic and attractive is Bertha Heronworth. Her love for Drusilla, and her intense desire to save her sorrow, even at the cost of her own conscience, are shown without the least trace of artifice, and her nature contrasts admirably with the more buoyant charms of her adopted sister. Had Fate allowed her to grow old she might have reappeared as another Miss Matty—though of a far stronger, though not nobler type; and then, like Fanny Price, we might think that “we are all of us better when she is near us.”

As a contrast to these two characters, Madame Albanesi has drawn the picture of an evil-minded woman, whose tongue is as poisoned as her thoughts. But with Aunt Edith, as with Drusilla and Bertha, she preserves a due restraint; and black as the picture undoubtedly is, the colour is not laid on too thickly, and the portrait lives as a consistent and natural piece of work.

It may be said that Madame Albanesi has not been quite so successful with her men as with her women. But we are rather inclined to think that this apparent lack of success is only relative, and that Carlingford and Keston suffer by comparison with Drusilla and Bertha. Viewed by themselves they stand out clearly and naturally—sketches of strong, honourable men.

A Comedy of Mammon. By INA GARVEY. (Grant Richards, 6s.)

THE greater part of this book—“Blanche’s Diary”—has already appeared in Punch. Miss Garvey has now added extracts from two other diaries—Amy Robinson’s and Mabel Frothingley’s—and by doing so has turned what was simply a bright satire of the “smart set” into a complete story, somewhat melodramatic, slightly vulgar, and with no touch of humanity to redeem it from its callous, worldly wisdom. It must not be thought, however, that we wish to condemn the book. Miss Garvey is undeniably clever; she has the knack of catching the right note for her purpose; as her heroine, Blanche, would say, her writing is quite snappy; and while we were reading the book we enjoyed it and laughed with the authoress. But the taste left behind was bitter. Of all the characters, with the possible exception of Mabel Frothingley, not one has any “heart” at all. Even Amy Robinson, whose tragedy is compelling if commonplace, is quite content—even eager—to adapt herself to the exigencies of her newly-found fortune; and we feel that she will prove an apt pupil of old Lady Lacksiller, and perhaps become a serious rival to Blanche herself. The latter is the most prominent character in the book. She is a clever study of the society beauty—a dodo brought up to date. At times she shows some glimmerings of honour, and at the end there is just a hint that she may even develop that “funny old early-Victorian appendage, a conscience;” but the promise is very faint, and we feel that the laughter of her friends—Babs, Wee-Wee, and the lapdog Norty—will prove too much for her, and that she will end as she began, hide-bound by the conventions of her class.

Perhaps, however, this is too serious criticism for Miss Garvey’s butterfly. The book is a satire, meant to win a laugh, and as such it should be treated laughingly. It is all to Miss Garvey’s credit, too, that her whip stings; the pity is that such a whip should be necessary.

The Tree of Heaven. By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS. (Archibald Constable and Co., Ltd., 6s.)

MR. CHAMBERS can scarcely be congratulated on his incursions into the regions of occultism. He has long since mastered the art of the short story, and, technically considered, these tales leave little to be desired. But they produce in the mind of the reader a painful impression of lack of sincerity. Whether Mr. Chambers believes in occultism or not, he has not succeeded in convincing his readers that he believes in it—which is, after all, the thing that matters. An exception must, however, be made in the case of a singularly perfect little story entitled “The Bridal Pair.” The remaining stories—there are ten in all—are only redeemed from the commonplace by their obvious straining after novel and bizarre effects. “The Tree of Dreams” is the kind of story that Mr. Le Gallienne would have liked to write. “The Swastika” is a tedious narrative about a vulgar flirtation. In “The Carpet of Belshazzar,” “The Sign of Venus,” “The Case of Mr. Helmer,” and “Out of the Depths” the mystical element predominates; but, with the best intentions in the world, the author’s machinery is a little rusty, and, do what he will, our flesh refuses to creep or our hair to rise. The publishers find the “Tree of Heaven” “reminiscent of Stevenson’s shorter stories.” We have failed to detect any such resemblance.

MUSIC

LUDWIG WÜLLNER

ON Friday, May 8th, Dr. Ludwig Wüllner gave his second song-recital, which was far better attended than the first—fortunately, those will think who look upon his coming as an event. And an event such an evening as Friday most assuredly is. For Wüllner, as an ACADEMY note proclaimed last week, is a master of interpretation, and what he interprets most clearly is the highest form of beauty. Musicians great as Schubert, or Brahms, or Rubinstein, or Wolff, or Richard Strauss have chosen from poetry, lyric and dramatic, just such works as they desire to deck with music, and Wüllner interprets the beauty of the poem and the new beauty with which the music vivifies it. That is to say, he makes the doubly-inspired life of the song live again, so that while he sings you seem to be in the presence of the most vivid form of life—which is beauty—trebly inspired with vitality. Wüllner’s particular greatness lies in his perfect standard of values: he holds the balance with exactness. Some singers are able to render the notes of a song with accuracy, and the feeling evaporates as they sing, though the notes may be separate sounds of astonishing purity; other singers are dominated by feeling so fiercely that the music falls into a secondary place, which is highly unfit for it. With Wüllner the two are incomparably blended, as they can only be in the work of the very greatest artist. They are forces which do not mingle easily; they must be welded by the power of the man’s personality, like the perfect fusion of his body and his soul. You feel in the presence of a being who has fought his way through all the personal moods of life to complete annihilation of self, so that the joy and the sadness, the terror, the endeavour, and the love which the various songs express seem to be not those of one man, but of all humanity. That is the impression which great art gives.

The amazing thing about a singer like Wüllner is the diversity within his scope. Whether the song be Schubert’s “Wanderer,” that lament of the great man’s loneliness, or his “Doppelgänger,” which tells of the lover revisiting the town where his lady dwelt, or the “Erkönig,” with all its goblin fear and goblin charm, Wüllner’s expression is sure and convincing in its absolute “rightness.” Within the space of thirty minutes his power creates these varying emotions; and he makes those who listen more and more susceptible and pliant to his power. In the next group were six songs of Johannes Brahms, which ended with the triumphant—and the very spirit of joy seemed suddenly to be moving through the hall as he sang it. But the most extraordinary contrast of all was, perhaps, found in the last three songs by Richard Strauss—“Frühlingsfeier,” “Lied des Steinklopfers,” and “Cäcilie.” By that time every one was with him, and the effect of his rendering was unique. He was considerate enough, in spite of the length of the programme, to give two encores.

So willst du des Armen
Dich gnädig erbarmen?

It is to be hoped that when Dr. Wüllner pays another visit to London his recitals will be better attended and better managed. On Friday evening half the audience were unable to obtain the book of words, and a pianist was engaged who, for all her fluent brilliance, was deplorably at variance with the prevailing spirit.

DRAMA

"THE THUNDERBOLT" AT THE ST. JAMES'S THEATRE

It is probable that Mr. Pinero has never written a play of such excellence as this one, which was produced last Saturday night. But at the same time there is little doubt that it will not meet with the same enthusiastic support as has been accorded to some of his earlier productions; indeed, on the first night it was evident that there was a certain portion of the audience that was by no means pleased. From the artistic point of view this is of little importance. The more nearly a work of art approaches perfection the less likely is it to be properly appreciated; but in this case there were reasons not very far to seek why some amount of dissatisfaction might be expected. But these reasons, it seems to me, entirely proceed from the manner of presentation, and not from the play itself.

The play itself owes, perhaps a little too patently, obligations to Mr. Granville Barker's great play The Voysey Inheritance; in each of them there is a scene in which there is a family council round a dining-room table where the financial position of the family is hotly debated. In each case this scene is the crisis of the play and the one which makes the greatest appeal to the audience. To my mind there is no reason why Mr. Pinero should not use this particular idea, though it would be a pity if it became as common in contemporary plays as the inevitable tea-table conversations of the last few years. Otherwise the play was a marvel both of lucidity and of construction. The different characters—the three brothers and their wives, the brother-in-law and his wife—are all introduced to the audience at the same moment with the highest art and ease, and the discussions which ensue show up the idiosyncrasies of each in the most vivid manner. From the first it is sufficiently obvious that the dead man has left a will benefiting his illegitimate daughter Helen Thornhill; but the expectancy of all the next-of-kin is kept keenly alive up to the very end, and the dramatic confessions as to the destruction of the will only fan the greed of the various beneficiaries. It is a very powerful play, with singularly little of the usual love interest, and the end comes naturally and is satisfactory.

In spite, however, of some really fine acting, the play at times leaves one cold. There is not the least doubt that this is due to the fact that Mr. Alexander is badly placed as Thaddeus Mortimore, whose wife has destroyed the will, and who tries unsuccessfully to take the blame on his own shoulders. Mr. Alexander makes the part far too sentimental. Sentimentality is what is expected from Mr. Alexander on all occasions, but in so realistic a play as The Thunderbolt it becomes painfully out of place. He has his plain choice, but that does not permit his appearing himself in such a play. Mr. Norman Forbes, too, as one of the grasping brothers, Stephen, introduced a farcical note that was quite as jarring as the sentiment, and this farcical element at times even affected those two admirable actresses Miss Kate Bishop and Miss Alice Beet. On the other hand, Mr. Louis Calvert as the eldest brother gave a most vigorous and finished performance, and the same must be said of Mr. Wilfred Draycott as Colonel Ponting, and Mr. J. D. Beveridge as an old solicitor. It is very rare to see such fine acting. Miss Mabel Hackney did not altogether please me as the repentant wife who had destroyed the will. It was, no doubt, a powerful performance, but her great scene in the third Act was so entangled with the sentimental methods of her husband that it lost a good deal of its force. One of the greatest successes of the evening was Miss Stella Campbell's appearance as Helen. The memory of her mother Mrs. Patrick Campbell's triumphs on these same boards is so vivid that it is partly with surprise, and yet with no surprise, that one watched this charming young lady's first appearance in London. She had a part which required much gentleness and restraint, and she succeeded admirably. Perhaps my feeling as to what was wrong with the play can most readily be apprehended when I say that there was a moment when the great scene round the dining-room table suddenly took the form of a kind of "Last Supper," with the Rev. R. J. Campbell in the principal part. I wonder how Mr. Alexander managed it.

CORRESPONDENCE

LIFE ON MARS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The public mind has recently been exercised over a controversy which, for all that it has attracted some of the most scientific minds of the day, can scarcely be pronounced instructive, nor even logical. The question raised is: Is Mars inhabited? The real and logical question should, of course, be: What manner of life prevails on Mars? The former would imply the fantastic and scientifically untenable suggestion that amidst the many millions of actually existing celestial bodies, of which our earth is seemingly one of the most insignificant, it alone has been fitted with the apparatus suitable for maintaining physical life. The idea seems, when we inquire into particulars, so monstrous as to have passed over the dividing line and become ridiculous. Nature, said the old philosophers, abhors a vacuum; and, however we may smile over the original application of the supposed rule, it is nevertheless the case, so far as our limited experience on this earth goes, that, wherever a practical opening for life exists, Nature has stepped in and filled it. The earth as a planet does not occupy a very distinguished position; she is, it is true, the leader of the second class of secondary stars revolving round the sun. Venus is very little less in size, and only a little less in mass, so that the conditions of gravity are very much alike. She is a little warmer, yet not so much so but that her Arctic regions, to all appearance, are covered with ice and snow. Why should she be wasted? Is it not folly to suppose that she was only put where she is for the purpose of directing the secular motions of the earth, and by altering during long periods the eccentricity of her orbit so change her momentary climate that in differing ages her companion may become a suitable place of residence for alternative forms of life? Such is certainly not the habit of Nature in cases where we can see her workings in close quarters; and there is no reason to believe that she works differently in localities so little removed. Of course we can never, with our present means of observation at least, be able to see what goes on in Venus, though, for the matter of that, her distance betimes is less than two-fifths of that of Mars, but the fault lies in our thick and misty atmosphere which so refracts and reflects, and generally distorts the light in the neighbourhood of the sun, that a clear definition of her surface has hitherto been impossible. Under the circumstances, and very properly so, the attention of our astronomers has recently been very much directed to Mars.

Mars to the astronomers of the earlier part of the last century seemed in all particulars so like our earth that it was a not unnatural conclusion that he should be inhabited by beings much the same as our own orb. With the instruments then in use we saw, or thought we saw, ocean and continent; when turned away from the sun his poles were markedly white, as if covered with snow, and his ruddy colour seemed to denote an atmosphere not unlike our own. We knew for certain scarcely more than one thing about his surface, but that indicated a difference; gravity on him was less than one-eighth of that on the surface of the earth. How that affected living beings we had no means of knowing; some folk thought people in Mars should be giants, some saw them as pigmies. Seemingly a man, were he there, could do eight times the amount of work possible on earth, and, if so, it seemed possible that, if we looked carefully, we might find some evidence. He was not always immersed, like Venus, in the solar glare, and definition was fairly good, and our telescopes might be increased almost indefinitely in power. Naturally it is the unexpected that ever happens, and when the astronomers commenced to use their new and more powerful telescopes they began to find out that if Mars had an atmosphere at all it must be an infinitely thin one; so likewise they found he had no oceans, and his ice-caps could be little more substantial than ordinary hoar-frost. Then they found what the first observers were convinced were great canals conveying much-needed water over the dried-up continents, and the canals were plausibly attributed to the efforts of intelligent inhabitants. Now the existence of even water is denied, and the so-called canals are alleged to be mere volcanic rifts spreading across the arid plains. We shall probably, with the progress of observation, and perhaps the utilisation of other means of investigation as yet undreamt of, come to know in the near future what are really the conditions of the surface of Mars. At present we seem to have sufficient evidence to show that, although the Martial tabernacle of self-consciousness, and, it may be, intellectual life, be composed of the same elements (carbon, nitrogen, hydrogen, oxygen, calcium, &c.) as on earth, their whole form and mode of combination must be entirely different, so different that we cannot form even a conception of the probable result.

But Venus, the earth, and Mars together form but a minor, almost insignificant part of the solar system, compared with such giants as Jupiter and Saturn, not to mention Uranus and Neptune. What reason other than anthropomorphic have we for believing them uninhabited? We know too little of any of them to venture on anything beyond a crude guess. We have actually never seen Jupiter, which is, nevertheless, the best known to us of the lot. We know that he is surrounded by an atmosphere thousands of miles deep, which has its own period of rotation, and from a peep now and then through a rift we have reason to believe that the body of the planet itself is at least red hot. As such a temperature would dissociate any organic compounds of carbon with which, at least, we are acquainted, we must look for life in some other combination of the elements; but there is no logical reason in our state of absolute ignorance of life itself why we should not consider this as perfectly conceivable.

But our solar system is but a single unit amongst known millions of others—some, we know, immensely greater, others, we have every reason to believe, greatly smaller. So far as we can reason from the known to the unknown, every one of these has its own attendant planetary system, so that our earths, our Mars, and our Jupiters must be indefinitely multiplied. Are we justified in reasoning that our earth is in this matter of life the one exception in the entire universe? Having gone so far, we are justified in carrying the argument still further. If we must fairly allow Jupiter to have his inhabitants framed on an entirely different model from those of our small earth, can we refuse to allow inhabitants to the sun, or Sirius, or even Canopus, the biggest sun with which we are as yet acquainted? True, as we noticed in the case of Jupiter, the form must be entirely different, but here, again, we are not justified in putting any limit to Creative Power. We know that, as an element, silicon, e.g., is nearly as protean as carbon itself, and we know that the sun is composed, in the main, of practically the same elements as our earth. There is nothing contrary to our experience in supposing compounds of iron and silicon, for instance, assuming definite form and shape at temperatures equal to that of the sun. They may not be solid, they may be gaseous; but surely there is nothing inconceivable in imagining life controlling gaseous any more than solid or liquid bodies. The objections are, it seems, fantastic and anthropomorphic rather than real or logical.

The result of any intelligent course of reasoning seems to lead to the conclusion that life, like energy, is universal. One of the greatest, if not the greatest absolute generalisation of the nineteenth century was the doctrine of the indestructibility of energy; may it not be reserved for the twentieth to place on a similar footing the conservation of life? We may sever its connection with the particular mass of matter with which it is momentarily associated as we may alter the form of energy momentarily actuating it. We may transform heat into electricity, or either or both into molecular motion. We may burn down a huge forest and leave but an insignificant mass of blackened stumps, but we do not destroy the life; it is there all the while, ready to form new associations of carbon and hydrogen and oxygen, and, when the time arrives, will appear as the actuating cause of just such another combination of the same elements; it may be in the same place, or it may even be in another quarter of the globe, if it be that, like its prototype, it has not actually left our small globe and moved to the furthest limits of space.

AN ENQUIRY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My brother has picked up some old books out here, some of which seem to me to be really good. I should be very glad if any of your readers could tell me if they are worth bringing to England. The best to me is "Fisher's Drawing-room Scrap-book," "with poetical illustrations by L. E. L.," published in 1839, the engraving being very good. Others are: "The Tourist in Italy," by Thomas Roscoe, called the "Landscape Annual, 1831," with drawings (twenty-six plates), by S. Paret, F.S.A. "Friendship's Offering," a "Literary Album," edited by T. K. Harvey, 1826 (thirteen plates). "Landscape Album"—I. "Great Britain Illustrated," 1832, sixty views by W. Westall, A.R.A., description by T. Moule; II. "Great Britain Illustrated," 1834, with fifty-nine views. "Library Souvenir," edited by Alaric Watts, published by Hurst Robinson, 1826 (twelve plates); and others.

The climate here is very bad for books and so is the constant moving about, and I want to rescue these from harm if they are good.

THE PIRATE LODBROG

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Could any of your readers give me information as to the pirate Lodbrog, who, tradition says, was taken prisoner by Ella of Northumberland and condemned to die in a dungeon full of snakes? Where was Lodbrog taken captive, and is it known in what castle that dungeon was situated?

"INSIGNIUS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I ask what is the meaning of "Dixit 'insignius' in corde suo" in a quotation in the paragraph on Mrs. Besant's "Autobiography" on p. 751 of this week's ACADEMY? It must surely be a misprint. Can it be for "insipiens"? Dixit insipiens is the title of one of the Psalms.

"KEATS'S SONNET TO A CAT"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The recent publication in THE ACADEMY of the story of Thomas Hood's fabrication of an article attributed to Charles Lamb confirms me in the opinion I had formed and expressed some years ago in the column of Notes and Queries that the "Sonnet to a Cat by the late John Keats," which first appeared in "Hood's Comic Annual" for 1830 (page 14), was not written by Keats, but was the production of that arch-mystifier John Hamilton Reynolds. Reynolds had acquired some reputation as the author of "Peter Bell," which many people believed was by Wordsworth, and the "Sonnet to Vauxhall," by Edward Herbert, Esq. (one of Reynolds's assumed names), in the same volume of the Annual, beginning:

The cold, transparent ham is on my fork, is quite in the Keats vein, and is as good, if not better, than the "Sonnet to a Cat."

RESEARCH DEFENCE SOCIETY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I cannot help thinking that your correspondent, Mr. Greville Macdonald, has really hit the nail on the head.

The question of vivisection is one on which both parties take extreme and, probably, untenable positions. The antivivisectionists, while denying, of course, that anything has been discovered by experiments on animals, maintain that, in any event, we have no right to gain useful medical knowledge at the cost of animal suffering. This seems contrary to all usual ethics of the treatment of animals, whom we kill and in various ways cause to suffer for our benefit—if we are sportsmen, for our amusement. The suffering caused and the suffering averted by experimentation can sometimes be quantitatively compared. Suppose that by artificially propagating a disease, say cancer, in, it may be, a large, but still a limited, number of animals, we are able to find the cause and so the cure of the disease. Then the suffering that we save is infinite, while the suffering that we cause, even if it is the same in the animal as in the human being, comes to an end when the experiment is complete.

But is the doctors' position any more tenable? According to this, it is impossible to tell what line of investigation may develop practical results. Therefore any qualified person should be allowed to make any experiment he chooses to elucidate any point in physiology. The physiologist is to be at liberty to plunge his knife into the quivering flesh just as freely as the geologist uses his hammer or the botanist cuts up a plant. Nay, some physiologists avow that they take no account of the suffering of the animals. Any suggestion that the vast powers claimed may possibly be abused is treated as an unwarrantable insult.

Surely to state such claims is to answer them. If we start from the surely undeniable proposition that animal suffering is an evil—if it reaches a great degree of intensity, a frightful evil—then it follows that animal suffering must not be inflicted except for an adequate reason. The question then comes to be—Can the adequate reason—i.e., the probable practical benefit—be judged of beforehand, or are we to fall back on the doctors' plea that any possible experiment which it may enter into the mind of any experimenter (perhaps the man who tells us he takes no account of the pain he inflicts) to make, may possibly result in some epoch-making discovery? Surely it would be against all reason to doubt that many ill-considered, unnecessary, and unproductive experiments may be made and are made, and certainly some vivisectional experiments sound to the outsider very idle.

As a matter of fact, familiarity with pain has the effect of destroying sensibility, so much so that, if I remember right, an advocate of vivisection before the first Commission deprecated physiological demonstrations to medical students, on the ground that that would be to let a lot of young "devils" loose on the public. But it is not necessary to insist upon that. It is enough to suppose that physiologists are like other students. Surely every one must see that a lot of, say, philological and historical research is of the meagrest practical benefit. Fortunately, in these cases no harm is done save the consumption, voluntarily made, of the student's time. Were these researches to involve serious suffering, not to say torture, to any sentient being, they would not be permitted for a single moment. I see no reason why physiological research should not sometimes be equally idle. The argument that all knowledge is equally and infinitely valuable is surely nothing but a gigantic paradox. As has been said, the knowledge that my neighbour's cat has kittens is knowledge of a kind, and might, in certain extraordinary circumstances, be of importance to us, but generally we should treat it as valueless.

To require special proof of reasonable necessity before each separate experiment involving pain is (I presume) impracticable. But what is impracticable in each individual case may, nevertheless, suggest a perfectly feasible general policy.

I would therefore suggest, in addition to what Mr. Macdonald proposes to mitigate the evils of vivisection, the following: Let additional inspectors be appointed (not necessarily with any power of interfering at their own hand, but with unlimited power of access to laboratories and experiments), some of whom to be in the full confidence of the anti-vivisectionists. Then require of all applicants for licences that they (like the applicant for a patent) shall in a general way define the objects and purposes of their intended experiments—and by objects and purposes I do not mean only such as have in view immediate practical applications; I mean also to include the establishment of theoretic principles which may be reasonably expected ultimately to lead to practical results. Then, finally, call upon the experimenters to furnish reports showing how their experiments have answered to their expectations. Surely a procedure like this would go a long way to show where and in whose hands and in what directions fruitful lines of research were being followed.

THE BRITISH SUNDAY AND THE EXHIBITION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I was glad to see the letter from the Honorary Secretary of your Sunday Society in the Times yesterday. As Mr. Judge truly says, the public of France are waiting to learn whether the great Exhibition is to be open on Sundays. I may say that they are anxiously waiting for the answer to the question, for on it depends whether thousands of our people will or will not be able to visit the Exhibition, in which the Fine Arts section will be of such exceptional value that the Times properly describes it as "by far the finest collection of works of art, French and British, that has ever been brought together in this country" (the United Kingdom).

The very idea of closing such an Exhibition on Sunday surprises a Frenchman, for with us it is just on Sundays that such exhibitions receive the largest number of visitors. We, however, take into account the habits of the different countries. Sunday rest has for more than two hundred and thirty years formed part of the legislation of the British people, and has entered into their customs. I understand, therefore, why the industrial and commercial parts of the Exhibition should be shut on Sundays, but need this extend, even in England, to the art collections? As set out in the address of the Sunday Society to the French people, the national collections of art in London are now open on Sundays. Has this opening of the national museums and galleries exercised a bad moral influence? Can it be said that the seeing of artistic objects does not form part of a people's education? It must surely be of educational importance to afford opportunities for the study of the scientific and artistic achievements of two such countries as Britain and France, and draw comparisons between them. Is not that, indeed, the raison d'être of the Exhibition? Well then, let us facilitate visits to the Exhibition as much as possible. It is most important for the French visitor that these science and art collections should be visible on Sundays. Sunday will be the central day of most visits, and it would be regrettable if the Exhibition should be completely shut on that day.

Nowadays the inspection of scientific or artistic treasures is no longer regarded as an aristocratic privilege. But the workman who took a day from work in order to visit the Exhibition would pay heavily for it. In addition to the admission there would be the loss of his day's earnings. With Sunday closing the tendency would be to make the Exhibition a privilege for the well-to-do.

With the liberal policy now adopted by the British Parliament in regard to the Sunday opening of the collections in your national museums and galleries, we cannot believe that similar collections in the Exhibition will be shut on Sundays. If one allows that the result is good in case of works of the past, would it not be the same in the case of contemporary art and science?

SIMPLIFIED SPELLING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your correspondent "A Spelling Reformer" must, I think, be added to the already considerable number (judging by recent contributions) of those who write on phonetics with an imperfect knowledge of the subject, or who, if they have not imperfect ears, must mingle largely with uneducated people. I have lived in the London district for the last twenty-five years, and was educated in the North of Ireland, where English is more correctly used and spoken, I believe, in educated circles than it is elsewhere. Among well-educated persons, facile always, and servile and docile very often, are pronounced with short i. I, however, was taught to say hostile (with long i), and still pronounce it so. In America educated persons use short i in all four words. I might note here a tendency I have noticed in the London district which to my ear is offensive. I mean the use of long i in the word opposite. The variety in such cases is no doubt owing to the study of Latin, which has i long only in hostile and servile, but it is too much to expect that a modern language should show a "facile" or "servile" obedience to Latin quantities. The "opposite" is generally the case, and your modern Englishman, if not actually "hostile," is usually "indocile" to such influences.

A NOVEL QUARTETTE

¶ In introducing A NOVEL QUARTETTE I have in mind the general verdict passed upon THE LITERARY FOUR-IN-HAND. The chorus of praise that these four volumes received far exceeded my most sanguine hopes, and from the appearance of the first reviews the success of each and every book was assured. I have no doubt that A NOVEL QUARTETTE will prove as acceptable as THE LITERARY FOUR-IN-HAND.

A GREAT ENGLISH NOVEL

in playing with fire. There will be ten illustrations by W. STORY.

A GREAT AUSTRALIAN NOVEL

¶ There are two things that a publisher is always anxious to discover, a Great Australian Novelist and a Great Irish Novelist. When I received my reader's report upon THE BISHOP'S SCAPEGOAT, by T. B. CLEGG, I felt that perhaps one of these discoveries was about to be made. The following quotation will perhaps justify me to some degree: "In my opinion Mr. CLEGG is a novelist who will at no very distant date achieve one of those successes which make a big reputation. Perhaps THE BISHOP'S SCAPEGOAT will be that book. It is instinct that makes a novelist, and Mr. CLEGG has that instinct. He tells only what is necessary to the development of his story; he concentrates; and above all he convinces both as regards description of places and the drawing of character. The Bishop of Capricornia is a fine figure of a man who accepts his punishment without murmur. I can with some amount of reason look forward to a real success for this novel."

A GREAT GERMAN NOVEL

¶ On the publication of CLARA VIEBIG'S remarkable book ABSOLUTION in Germany last autumn, a two-column review appeared in the Westminster Gazette, from which the following passages are selected: "In Germany, this book of the sombre purple cover and the design of a halo surrounding the strange title is everywhere. It is on train and steamer, in little odd bookshops of sleepy country towns, and (often in strange company) among the best-displayed wares in the shop windows of the main streets of great cities. 'It is a terrible book,' people say, as they sit poring over its pages, but we doubt whether any one, having taken it up, lays it aside as too 'terrible' before he has reached the abrupt, dramatic end. . . . The face of a woman, young and proud, and very beautiful, haunts the pages of the new novel by the most powerful of the woman writers of Germany. In the pale face burn the dark, unfathomable eyes, in which, by turn, the passion of heavenly and earthly love flares up and does battle against the childlike simplicity and innocence of heart that makes the woman a danger to every man who crosses her path."

A GREAT FRENCH NOVEL

¶ If ABSOLUTION created a sensation in Germany, THE CHILD OF CHANCE (Le Semeur) had no less a vogue in France. It was the book of the season, and as such immensely discussed in Paris. The heroine of ABSOLUTION is a woman to whom man is the Lover, to Marie-Cécile in MAXIME FORMONT'S NOVEL man is essentially the Father. The justification of illicit love has formed the subject of many plays and novels, but the rights of maternity have been grievously overlooked. Can the maternal instincts in a woman blot out her "shame," and justify her for a, to her, necessary and inevitable act of disobedience to conventional standards? The portrait of Marie-Cécile offers a partial solution to the problem. The audacity of the book is equalled only by its restraint. M. FORMONT knows that he is dealing with a delicate subject, but he deals with it as a man, one who not only recognises the cry for motherhood but knows what it portends.

THE LIFE OF SIR HALLIDAY MACARTNEY, K.C.M.G., Commander of Li Hung Chang's trained force in the Taiping Rebellion, founder of the first Chinese Arsenal, Secretary to the first Chinese Embassy to Europe, Secretary and Counsellor to the Chinese Legation in London for thirty years. By DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER, with a Foreword by SIR JAMES CRICHTON BROWNE, and numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 24s. net.
THE SHAKESPEARE PROBLEM RESTATED. By GEORGE GREENWOOD, M.P. Demy 8vo. Price 21s. net. Scholars admit that a large portion of the dramas contained in the First Folio of 1623 did not emanate from the pen of Shakespeare. Was the author of these plays really William Shakespeare? In the present work the author restates the arguments for the negative case—viz., that the Stratford player was not the real Shakespeare. No attempt is made to uphold the Baconian, or any other theory of authorship, or to arrive at any positive solution of "The Shakespeare Problem."
THE CREED OF BUDDHA. By the author of "The Creed of Christ." Crown 8vo. 5s. net. The author of "The Creed of Christ" here makes an attempt to ascertain the inner faith of the Founder of Buddhism, and reaches conclusions diametrically opposed to the views about "Buddha" which have long been current in the West. He believes that Buddhism, as taught by its founder, was identical, in the last resort, with the teaching of Christ, and that the source of both these creeds was the spiritual idealism of ancient India.

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE intervention of babes and sucklings in the affairs of the nation is rapidly assuming an aspect which would be merely comic if it were not also a disquieting sign of the times. If the editors of our great daily papers had any sense of humour and any sense of proportion they would realise that it is ridiculous to print the account of the reception given by Mr. Asquith in his private room in the House of Commons to a party of Liberal Members of Parliament, and to follow this up by a letter from Miss Christabel Pankhurst solemnly denouncing Mr. Asquith's proposals as being inadequate and unacceptable to her. La petite Pankhurst goes on to say that "our policy of opposing their (the Government's) nominees at bye-elections, which has proved so successful in the past, will be vigorously pursued." The plain truth is that the Suffragettes' senseless policy, so far from having been successful, has been absolutely unsuccessful. In as far as it has had any effect at all at recent bye-elections, the effect has been solely that of helping the Liberal candidates. Hundreds of people at Dundee voted for Mr. Winston Churchill simply as a protest against the rowdy misconduct of Miss Molony and her pack of silly schoolgirls. We have no desire to be hard on Miss Pankhurst and Miss Molony; they are the victims of designing persons, and it would be unkind to take them too seriously. The right way to deal with them would be to catch them and shut them up in a schoolroom and make them write out five hundred times in their best copper-plate handwriting—"Little girls should not interfere in matters which they do not understand."

What was somewhat cumbrously called the "Shakespeare Memorial National Theatre Demonstration" duly took place on Tuesday afternoon. Lord Lytton was in the chair, and round him were grouped the burning and shining lights of the drama with a member of Parliament or so, an odd "literary gent," and a number of persons of no importance. One listened to the polished rhetoric of the speakers till one yawned. That of course was neither the fault of Shakespeare nor the fault of the proposed National Theatre. But from the flow of oratory we reaped certain conclusions, the principal of which is that the gentlemen assembled on the stage of the Lyceum Theatre on Tuesday afternoon do not really want a Shakespeare Memorial Theatre so badly as they want a national endowed or subsidised theatre. And we can well understand why they want that. Meanwhile it is only due to them to say that they on their part well understand that the name of Shakespeare is a much better name to raise money in—whether that money has to be extracted from the public or from Parliament—than the names, say, of Mr. Edmund Gosse and Sir John Hare. If the Lyceum demonstrators have their way, a huge memorial fund will be started, and to this fund the people of England will be asked to subscribe on the ground that it is a Shakespeare Memorial Fund. But the real object of the fund is to establish a National Theatre. There was no speaker on Tuesday who was in the least prepared to go to the stake or rather to the subscription-sheets for Shakespeare the English poet. Even Mr. Edmund Gosse, who was put up to represent literature in the discussion, did not want a memorial to Shakespeare quâ Shakespeare. What he wanted was a theatre in which Shakespeare would be represented from time to time with Goldsmith and Sheridan, and possibly even some of Mr. Gosse's contemporaries to help the thing on as it were. For ourselves, we do not think that there is the smallest need for a national theatre in this country, and if there be such a need we think it should be met without the dragging in of Shakespeare, who, to be precise, is much more the possession of literature than he has ever been or is ever likely to be of the drama. If the Shakespeare Memorial must be invested with some active form, it might just as well be an endowed Shakespeare printing concern, or an endowed school of literature, or an endowed sonnet-manufactory, as an endowed theatre. It is all very well to suggest that the great actors of London are in need of a haven of rest where they may realise their boldest ambitions on snug salaries, and at the cost and charges of the people. But this same truth applies to a good many publishers and to a good many poets. And we believe that Shakespeare is a poet's man and a publisher's man, and not an actor's man.

Mr. Runciman, in the course of a preposterous speech in the House of Commons on Wednesday, made the following preposterous statement:—"Nonconformity was growing with increasing rapidity all over the country, and, not for the first time, the Established Church found itself in a minority." Whether Mr. Runciman knows it or not, this statement is absolutely untrue. Even in Wales, the stronghold of Nonconformity, it is very doubtful whether the Nonconformists number more than half of the whole population. In the rest of England the proportion of Churchmen to Nonconformists is above five to one, and this, as we have explained before, accounts for the unwillingness of Nonconformists to submit to a census. It is an unwillingness that can be explained in no other way. We use the word "Churchmen" in its broadest sense. There are thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of men in this country who rarely or never go to church, much less communicate, but, all the same, they are Churchmen in the sense that they were baptised in the Church, they desire the teaching of the Church for their children, and in a crisis they will support the Church against her enemies by votes and by influence. Can a more striking comment on Mr. Runciman's absurd statement be found than the fact that not more than three weeks ago some Nonconformist body (we believe it was the Wesleyan Methodist) was deploring the defection from its numbers of 6,000 members during the last year? Mr. Runciman will find that these sort of inaccurate statement "go down" in a meeting which is packed with Nonconformists, but he will only cover himself with ridicule when he talks such nonsense in the House of Commons. The further the Government go with their Education Bills, the deeper do they flounder in the mire. Mr. McKenna's Bill, as they know, is dead, the Bishop of St. Asaph's Bill is also dead. Instead, therefore, of wasting the time of the House of Commons by unnecessary and meaningless debates, let them call in those who are capable of helping them out of the muddle into which their obstinacy and incapacity has landed them.

The promoters and directors of the Franco-British Exhibition are to be sincerely congratulated on the typical weather which attended their opening ceremony of the 14th inst. A large and good-natured crowd ascribed the general mismanagement and incomplete state of the buildings entirely to the rain. The rain perhaps prevented a serious riot. In the sunshine the emptiness of the Exhibition would have been too obvious; even the structures are incomplete, and the decoration and furnishing of interiors in many cases had not commenced; the whole thing was a wilderness of matchwood and brickfields. But what is so serious is the conspiracy on the part of the Press to conceal these facts, although Fleet Street admitted the entire failure of the organisation and the complete fiasco of the inaugural ceremonies. Unfortunate French people will be lured over here in the next two or three weeks under the impression that there is something to see in this "City of Palaces." About July, or perhaps the end of June, there may be something to inspect, and it is only fair to state that, with characteristic punctuality, three essentially English institutions have set an example to the directors. The stalls of the "Religious Tract Society," "The Oxford University Press," and "Fry's Chocolate" are all ready, and should certainly come in for an unusual amount of attention from our French visitors, who will not have very much else to look at for some weeks to come.

The Stadium itself is certainly a wonderful piece of construction, only spoilt by a large advertisement of an esteemed evening paper on the top row of the auditorium. For the Olympic Games let us hope this may be covered, otherwise we shall never get the illusion necessary for their success. Last week how far we were from Olympia, how near to Shepherd's Bush, was emphasized by the extraordinary entertainment which commenced with a procession of some spotty young cockney athletes, and a group of unattractive females in immodest costumes, from the Polytechnic. The second item on the programme was the even more surprising and more painful exhibition of some old and middle-aged gentlemen floundering in a tank. The Prince and Princess of Wales left immediately afterwards, and several of the audience who had come a long distance, at great expense, in the expectation of enjoying themselves, burst into tears.

An interview in the Daily Mail with Mr. Imre Kiralfy has a certain piquancy in view of what occurred:

Every moment doors opened—for the room, like a scene in a French farce, had several—and people came in to ask him questions. A secretary sat on either side of him. To one he dictated rapidly in English, to the other in French. He could do the same in German, Italian, and Hungarian if there was any need.

Those secretaries must have got a little mixed in taking bilingual instructions from their accomplished chief. The element of farce was contagious. But the cream of the interview follows:

"He used to be rosy and plump," said his son, with a glance of concern at the harassed eyes and the drawn features of the Commissioner-General (that is his official title). "But for weeks past he has been over-working, getting too little sleep and irregular meals. He used to be full of fun, always joking and taking his work as if it were play. There are times now when he is almost irritable."

Mr. Kiralfy must still be "full of fun," and we decline to believe that he is ever "almost irritable." Even dictation to many different secretaries in many different languages cannot have taken a sense of humour out of the Commissioner-General, if, as the Daily Mail suggests, he alone is responsible or conceived the programme of the inauguration of the Franco-British Exhibition.

There is a very large class of books—some specimens of which are now and then reviewed in THE ACADEMY—which is above all conspicuous by the stress which is laid on something called, more or less vaguely, "the spirit of the age," "the modern spirit," or "the trend of modern thought." This mysterious entity, whatever it may be, is definition is not to be expected—but so far as one can not precisely defined—perhaps we shall see that precise discover it is meant to represent the general body of vague and floating opinion entertained by the majority of half-educated people on subjects which they have not investigated with any particular care. And it is interesting to note that "the trend of modern thought" varies in its distinctness of expression, according to the subject-matter on which it is exercised. For example, a well-known morning paper, commenting a few days ago on a book called "Anglican Liberalism," draws attention to Dr. Rashdall's pronouncement that disbelief in the Virgin Birth should not disqualify a candidate for Holy Orders in the English Church, and the reviewer styles this dictum "the last word in advanced theology," the word "advanced" meaning, presumably, enlightened. In the same way, any denunciations of creeds, or ceremonies, or the Decalogue will find ready expression and that kind of welcome which the critic accords to Dr. Rashdall and his fellows:

Here the book is [he says], and whoever wilfully shuts his eyes to its pleas and assertions will be as wise as the legendary ostrich, which sought safety by burying its head in the sand.

But there are other questions on which "the spirit of the age" is quite as resolved. For example, it is clear that the vast majority of people prefer "puzzle-pictures" to works of art. The trend of modern thought is distinctly in favour of paintings which set such questions as "Which is the cheat?" "Which chauffeur was in the wrong?" "Was the wine corked?" It has but little to say to masterpieces ancient or modern; it would certainly like to enclose in a lunatic asylum those French artists who impoverish themselves by destroying thousands of pounds worth of goods because they consider these "goods" unworthy of a high and austere standard. This state of mind finds expression to a certain extent; "Was the wine corked?" is noticed, advertised sufficiently; but it is not stated in so many words that the man who does not prefer the masterpiece in question to a wilderness of Turners is an ostrich. And, to get on ground still more "advanced," the trend of thought which pronounces mutoscope machines more entertaining even than puzzle-pictures finds no expression at all. There is no doubt, of course, that the "art" of the mutoscope is far more in accordance with the spirit of the age than the art of the early Italian painters, but—it would not quite do to say so in print. One would run the risk of being called an ass—a worse title than ostrich.

But, to return to "modern thought" considered generally and not particularly, one would like to know more of it. To use an obsolete technicality, what is its differentia, what distinguishes it in a palmary manner from thought which is not modern? Well; veiling one's head in the sand with all reverence and fear and modesty, one would like to say that its chief difference is to be sought in the fact that it is ready to assent in all gaiety and sincerity to the following syllogism:

All A is B,
No X is Y,
Ergo gluc.

In other words, though the modern spirit has discoursed of "reason" till our ears are deafened and our minds are weary, it is utterly deficient in the faculty of "reasoning." Its "conclusions" are nonsensical, and they are drawn from premises which prove nothing. The trend of modern thought is the child of the Chimæra that buzzed in the Void, by an Ignoratio Elenchi that fell into Tohu Bohu during the prosperous reign of King Anarchos. The position may seem a little strenuous, but the evidence in its favour is strong. Here is an extract from Dr. Duncan's "Life and Letters of Herbert Spencer." Spencer is writing to a friend on the study of history:

My position, stated briefly, is that until you have got a true theory of humanity you cannot interpret history; and when you have got a true theory of humanity you do not want history. You can draw no inference from the facts and alleged facts of history without your conceptions of human nature entering into that inference; and unless your conceptions of human nature are true your inference will be vicious. But if your conceptions of human nature be true you need none of the inferences drawn from history for your guidance. If you ask how is one to get a true theory of humanity, I reply—study it in the facts you see around you and in the general laws of life. For myself, looking as I do at humanity as the highest result yet of the evolution of life on the earth, I prefer to take in the whole series of phenomena from the beginning as far as they are ascertainable. I too am a lover of history; but it is the history of the Cosmos as a whole. I believe that you might as reasonably expect to understand the nature of an adult man by watching him for an hour (being in ignorance of all his antecedents) as to suppose that you can fathom humanity by studying the last few thousand years of its evolution.

Frankly: what is to be said of this? So far as one can gather, the object propounded is the getting of "a true theory of humanity." It is of no use to study history, since you cannot do so without your conceptions of human nature entering into that study—in other words, you cannot divest yourself of your own personality, of your humanity in fact, when you open Herodotus or Stubbs. This is certainly true; a man reading a history book remains a man: we have got far. How, then, are we to obtain our "true theory of humanity"? By studying the "facts" around us and "the general laws of life." To the student, who is a mass of fallibility, the best of all possible fallacies when he reads the codified experience of the past, becomes purged and infallible when he seeks his "theory" in the weltering chaos of modern events and passions and incidents and "laws," and at the same moment he is endowed with the grace of an intellectual insight immeasurably superior to that of all the thinkers and writers who have lived from the foundation of the world! That quarrel between Mr. Giles the farmer, Nokes the labourer (some said "poacher"), and Mr. Justice Shallow, as discussed in the thirty-four fully-licensed houses and in the fifteen beer-shops of Little Pedlington, finally (some said unjustly) decided by a full quorum of Justices of the Peace in petty sessions assembled, is infinitely more instructive and illuminating than all the history books that have ever been written, and the reporter of the Little Pedlington Gazette is to be given a confidence denied to Thucydides—even though the said reporter was well known to be Mr. Giles's cousin? And that last paragraph; because you cannot understand an adult man by watching him for an hour, you are to know all about him by glancing at him for the tenth of a second! Or rather—to be quite fair—you are first to read a treatise on embryology, then you must avoid all possible sources of information about your man from his birth to the present day, and, finally, you bestow on him that one piercing glance of a moment as he catches the last train. Ergo gluc!

TO A CUCKOO INTERRUPTING PRAYER.

Cuckoo, thou comest unawares
As with a question to my prayers.
Full am I of my soul's annoy—
And thou, indifferent in joy,
Dost toss thy voice, as if a ball,
Dost chase, and fling, and let it fall—
Tempted am I to thy free-faring:
Cuckoo, but there is no comparing!
The apple hung upon the bough
When, renegade from Eden, thou
To thy freebooter's life broke loose.
My teeth have pressed against the juice,
The foaming juice of sin's delight:
Christ my offences doth requite—
He died upon the Cross for these,
To win back my Hesperides:
And I remain upon my knees.

REVIEWS

VOLTAIRE, MONTESQUIEU, AND ROUSSEAU

Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Rousseau in England. By J. CHURTON COLLINS. (London: Eveleigh Nash, 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. COLLINS' sketch of three singularly interesting episodes in the literary relations between France and England, namely, the visits of Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Rousseau during periods extending respectively from the spring of 1726 to the spring of 1729, from the autumn of 1729 to the spring or early summer of 1731, and from January, 1766, to May, 1767, constitutes one of the most important contributions that has been made for some time past to the history of French eighteenth-century literature. It is sincerely to be hoped, for their own sakes, that French students of this literary period will be made aware of the existence of Mr. Collins' valuable work, which amply merits to be translated into French, and is, in fact, indispensable to a proper understanding of the literary lives of the three famous men with whom it deals. If Mr. Collins' book had appeared a little earlier, M. Jules Lemaitre would have been in possession of many characteristic and picturesque details of Rousseau's sojourn in England which would have amply confirmed him in his severe judgment of the author of "La Nouvelle Héloïse," and would have saved him from a few ridiculous mistakes, notably in the spelling of Marshal Keith's name. That Rousseau was both a "madman" and a "miserable," which appears to be M. Jules Lemaitre's final verdict, is the conclusion which any one must come to after reading Mr. Collins' description of his adventures in England. The one fault that we have to find with Mr. Collins is that he does not sufficiently recognise the genius and the splendid sanity of Voltaire, and that he is disposed to attribute too much importance to the idle gossip of the time, according to which Voltaire had acted as a political spy and left England in disgrace. The evidence in favour of his having shown more than the natural curiosity of a man of such vigorous mentality into the political events amidst which he was moving is purely trivial—"il n'y a pas de quoi fouetter un chat"—and there is multiple documentary proof that to the day of his death he remained on excellent terms with prominent members of the English aristocracy, which would hardly have been the case had he been obliged to quit England under a cloud. Mr. Collins might have quoted, though he does not, that curious letter in the "Correspondance Générale" of Voltaire, addressed to Lord Lyttleton "at my castle of Ferney," for it not only shows that Voltaire, at any rate towards the end of his life, was not quite a master of English idiom, though he wrote English remarkably well, but also that English noblemen were in the habit of addressing themselves to him to secure valuable introductions at the Court of Louis XV. The old man must have felt that one at least of his aristocratic English friends did not sufficiently appreciate his importance in his own country, for he says pompously:

I live in my own lands in Burgundy . . . my manors and my castles are in Burgundy, and if my King has been pleased to confirm the privileges of my lands, which are free from all tributes, I am the more addicted to my King.

And he signs himself "Gentleman of the King's Chamber." We know how brutally Frederick of Prussia sneered at him for his fond use of this title, and vanity was, no doubt, in some measure one of Voltaire's weaknesses, but his courage and achievements were so splendid that one may forget his harmless foibles in the contemplation of his real greatness. To write of his "monkey-tricks," as Mr. Collins does, is out of place and ungenerous, especially towards the brilliant Frenchman, whose admiration and affection for England were so whole-hearted and constant, and so weightily and wittily expounded.

As for Rousseau, Mr. Collins would have been justified in formulating a criticism in much less measured terms than he actually employs, and only the fear of Mr. John Morley seems to have stayed his hand. But on this subject M. Jules Lemaître has said almost everything that need be said with a vigour which no English historian need seek to rival. Rousseau behaved throughout the whole of his residence in England with that peculiar ill-breeding and total lack of honourable principle which are an outcome of certain forms of mental disease. In dementia veritas would be a true saying, and a man who is by nature a cad will be a cad to the *n*th power when he loses his mental balance. The reverse of the proposition is also true: exempli gratia Don Quixote. All that was rascally and contemptible in the Swiss ex-valet came out in Rousseau when his mind went, and to a large extent, of course, even before his wits were hopelessly bemuddled. How far one can condone the vile conduct of wretched beings like him in whose excuse a certain irresponsibility may be pleaded, it is difficult to say. The seclusion of a madhouse is probably the best place for them. But so long as they are at large, sentimental or kind-hearted people will always be found who are ready to extend sympathy and hospitality to them, to defend their interests loyally, and even to take their side against their real or supposed enemies, until they, too, become the madman's victims. For this type of crétin no lie is too vile, no action too mean, when the object is to vituperate or injure those who have befriended him. And it not unusually happens that he wins over a certain section of public opinion to his side, for it is difficult to believe that a man of whom the victims themselves have once spoken in such laudatory terms can be really such an unscrupulous scamp. An insane ruffian of this sort will, moreover, always find plenty of other blackguards to back him up who have not the excuse of insanity; jealousy, or a far-off scent of blackmail will rally them to his banner. This was the unfortunate experience of Hume in his dealings with Rousseau, and Hume was neither the first nor the last generous man of letters who has had occasion to repent the folly of offering kindness to a specious madman with a fluent pen and the inborn manners of a hog. It had been foretold to Hume by "the philosophers of Paris" that he could not conduct Rousseau to Calais without a quarrel, but the worthy Scotchman was convinced that he could live with him all his life in mutual friendship and esteem. The gushing Mrs. Cockburn wrote to Hume that the English were not worthy of Rousseau, and yet she urged him to bring over "the sweet old man . . . dear old Rousseau." History repeats itself, and "sweet old man . . . dear old Zola!" was a feminine shriek in London society less than a decade ago. It must be said for the author of "La Terre" that he behaved himself in London better than he wrote. With Rousseau it was the other way round. Mr. Collins quotes an opinion of Dr. Johnson on Rousseau which M. Jules Lemaître would do well to note, for Johnson was certainly one of the soundest critics of men and manners that our island has produced:

"If you mean to be serious," said Johnson to Boswell, "I think him (Rousseau) one of the worst of men, a rascal who ought to be hunted out of society, as he has been. Three or four nations have expelled him, and it is a shame he is protected in this country. . . . I would sooner sign a sentence for his transportation than that of any felon who had gone from the Old Bailey these many years."

Johnson, of course, had no suspicion that Rousseau was mad. This uncomfortable fact was left to Hume and his other friends in England to discover to their bitter cost. Mr. Collins' picture of Rousseau at Wootton, in Derbyshire, the seat of a Mr. Davenport, who had extended a most graceful and generous hospitality to the poor degenerate after the quarrel with Hume, does not justify to the extent that he would have us believe the analysis which Mr. Morley has made of Rousseau's character. Mr. Morley opines that its chief feature was the exaltation of emotion over intelligence, and that Rousseau was at bottom a character:

As essentially sincere, truthful, careful of fact and reality, as is consistent with the general empire of sensation over untrained intelligence.

This is really little better than nonsense in face of the facts, and it shows how difficult it is for a politician to be either historian or critic. The facts which Mr. Collins brings forward lead to only one conclusion, which is Hume's, and inconsistent with that of Mr. Morley—namely, that Rousseau was:

A composition of whim, affectation, wickedness, vanity, and inquietude, and Hume adds:

With a very small, if any, ingredient of madness.

In view of the circumstances described by Mr. Collins the condemnation is complete. One cannot help feeling that Mr. Morley's political prejudices make it impossible for him to throw Rousseau morally overboard altogether, but that the earnest seeker after historic truth must accept Hume's view of the man, whom Hume knew and with whom he had lived, and against whom he bore, as he subsequently showed, no active ill-will whatsoever. Rousseau produces the impression of a sort of bad moral ape that is constantly trying to bestride people's consciences. Both Gibbon and Adam Smith saw in him, as Mr. Collins points out:

A cunning and despicable knave, black with ingratitude and treachery.

The truth seems to be that he was all this, and that vice had brought on a cerebral degeneration which had unbalanced his mind.

It is a relief to turn from this poor scarecrow to the courtly Montesquieu, who without being Anglophile like Voltaire, nor as Anglophobe as Rousseau, criticised the English manners of his time with keenness of insight and a fine impartiality. He had no very high opinion of English politicians:

They have, he remarks, no fixed purpose, but govern from day to day. Purely selfish and destitute of all principle, their sole aim is to get the better of their opponents; and to attain that end they would sell England and all the powers of the world.

Certain recent by-elections might be quoted to demonstrate that the "English politician" of to-day is not very far removed from his predecessor in the days of Montesquieu. There are still unfortunately many political candidates whose sense of their own importance is stronger than their love of their country's welfare.

THE FATHER OF HISTORY

Herodotus, Books VII., VIII., and IX. With Introduction, Text, Apparatus, Commentary, Appendices, Indices, Maps. By REGINALD W. MACAN, D.Litt., University Reader in Ancient History, Oxford. Vol. I., Part I.; Vol. I., Part II.; Vol. II. (Macmillan, Three Vols., 30s. net.)

SHOULD any one, well enough instructed in Greek to read that language with ease, ask himself what was to him its most precious heritage, he would probably reply, Homer and Herodotus. In some ways Herodotus is a prose Homer, the early books resembling the "Odyssey" and the three latest the "Iliad." It is hard to decide which is the more attractive. Some will give the palm among the nine to the second book, some to the eighth. The history plainly falls into three sections, the last dealing with the invasion of Xerxes and being wholly Hellenic, the first non-Hellenic, as treating a civilised but barbarian world, while the intermediate, telling the story of the Ionic revolt and the first invasion, is largely ethnological, and places Herodotus among the fathers of anthropology as it is now understood.

Dr. Macan's work is monumental. What with the elaborate Introductions and Appendices, written in so sprightly a style that they do not seem boring, though they run to between 600 and 700 pages, together with the full and scholarly commentary, critical and exegetical, the volumes now before us, along with those containing Bks. IV.-VI., edited by Dr. Macan in 1895, constitute what may be fairly described as the most important contribution yet made to the exhaustive study of a Greek historian either in England or abroad. Many of our readers doubtless will learn with surprise that the last section (VII.-IX.) was composed first and the others subsequently, so as to embrace the whole epic conception of the struggle between the East and the West, through the medium of those invaluable digressions which Herodotus tells us that his history throughout affects. The section now before us deals with only two or three years, from the mustering of the forces in the year 481 B.C. to the capture of Sestos in the spring of 478.

The view that the last section was the first composed is not now put forward for the first time. It was advanced by Dean Blakesley in England in 1854 and A. Schöll in Germany in 1855, apparently independently. It was accepted by Rawlinson and Bauer; but the present editor has now for the first time dealt at large with the question of the priority of Bks. VII.-IX., and he has, in our judgment, established his view beyond all reasonable doubt. He thus states the case:

The genesis of the work is a legitimate subject for speculation, and what theory is at once more simple and more consistent with the work as we find it than the view that Herodotus first projected, and to a greater or less extent first elaborated, the History of the Persian War in Bks. VII.-IX., though not in the exact form or with all the details now presented in those books; and that afterwards there developed before his mind the possibility of working up into a vast prelude to that main theme materials amassed during many years of study, research, inquiry, travel—a prelude that should portray the historic antecedents, both Barbarian and Hellenic, of the great struggle, and present in vivid colours a panorama of the two worlds that clashed together in the final duel?

The most striking of the general considerations in support of the priority of Bks. VII.-IX. are drawn from the text itself. There are only two express references in Bks. VII.-IX. to the earlier books. The first (VII., 93) has all the appearance of a gloss; the second (VII., 108) is certainly not a gloss of a scholiast or copyist, but looks very like a subsequent interpolation or addition by the author's own hand. A still stronger argument is drawn from the absence of such references. The Army and Navy Lists in Bk. VII. show no cognisance of the fact that the same tribes and nations are described in I.-IV. Persians, Medes, Scythians, Libyans, Arabians, Æthiopians meet us in the seventh book as if we had never heard of them before; and the conquest of Egypt, as told in the third book, is ignored; so is the Scythian expedition of Darius. The historian's amazement at the bridges and canal of Xerxes is not natural in one who had already described the bridges and canal of Darius—"the latter at least a far more stupendous work." Then there are passages in VII.-IX. which clash with passages in I.-VI.; and the latter would not have been allowed to stand if composed subsequently to the former. Many pedigrees are given in the third section which would have come in far more appropriately in the first; and several persons are introduced in the later books apparently for the first time, as is shown by the use of the patronymic, though they had in the earlier books been mentioned, sometimes with some biographical details.

Vol. II. contains nine Appendices, maps, and Indices, and runs to nearly 500 pages. The fifth Appendix deals in masterly fashion with the real causes of the failure at Thermopylae, and the sixth with strategic aspects of the Battle of Salamis, and the tactical problem, about which the rival theories of Leake, Blakesley, and Goodwin are carefully considered, as well as the differences between Herodotus and the "Persae" of Aeschylus. The other Appendices deal with more general subjects. On p. 3 we meet with a shrewd remark:

Reading between the lines of our Greek authors, we can see for ourselves that the Greek question was not such an all-absorbing topic at Susa as was the Persian question at Athens, at Sparta, at Argos, at Thebes. Probably the Achaemenid Kings—like the Arsacidae and the Sassanidae—were more constantly occupied in securing or extending their frontiers to the north and to the east, and in maintaining their supremacy over the Asiatic provinces and kingdoms than in dreams of indefinite extensions westward.

In connection with authorities other than Herodotus for the Persian War, Dr. Macan refers to a Fragment of Pindar (189), which alludes to the crossing of the Hellespont by the Persians, and another in honour of Alexander of Macedon (fr. 120):

Can he have written, asks the editor, that Enkomion, and have made no reference to that prince's real or supposed services to Hellas in the war with the Barbarian? Was it not that poem above all which moved "the great Emathian conqueror" to spare the poet's house when all the rest of Thebes was razed to the ground?

He describes Aristophanes as a "Little Attiker" on the analogy of "Little Englander" as regards his views about the Persian policy of Pericles. He thinks Aristophanes would have endorsed the motto, "L'empire c'est la paix," and he holds that we take too seriously as a politician one who is really a poet, a wit, and a true lover of culture. "The vulgarity of the new men is what mainly strikes him."

Dr. Macan's estimate of the commanding position of Themistocles in Athenian politics is higher than that of most historians, and is fully borne out by the "Constitution of Athens," attributed to Aristotle. The disappearance of Themistocles immediately after his signal triumph in 480 is implied by Herodotus and expressly stated by other writers. Certainly his name does not appear among the Strategi of 479-478, and his former rivals, Aristides and Xanthippus, are prominent. Ancient historians accounted for this by the jealousy excited by the honours heaped upon him by Sparta. But this is a trivial explanation. Modern scholars interpret his disappearance as the result of a protest against the theory that the war was to be conducted wholly at sea, and a growing demand that Sparta should act energetically on land, with a view to saving Athens from a fresh invasion. Dr. Macan shrewdly asks, did he disappear? We cannot assert positively that he did. We have no complete list of the Strategi for the year. He does not come under the limelight, but there is no reason why we should not believe that he was quietly co-operating with Aristides in organising a Peloponnesian advance by land for the protection of Athens. We are misled by modern party-government:

We cannot be too careful to avoid corrupting our vision of the inner history of the ancient State by misleading analogies from modern politics. . . . It is reasonable to conclude that the Athenian policy of 479 was the policy still of Themistocles, even if the hands chiefly charged with its execution were those of Aristides and Xanthippus.

We have taken leave throughout to spell the Greek names in the pre-Grobian fashion. Dr. Macan would desire to follow the lead of Browning, who writes Athenai, Thonkudides, Slugian, not to mention utterly erroneous forms like Peiraios, Aigispolamoi. But Dr. Macan stops so far short of this that we have ventured to employ the old-fashioned transliteration. We think forms like Thermopylae, Aischylos quite indefensible, as being neither Greek nor Latin, and we look on them as blots on charming essays.

But this is a work which calls for the broad bounds of a Quarterly Review. We have space for no more detail, though the material is abundant. We especially commend to our readers the editor's criticism of the Herodotean account of the Battle of Plataea, in which he finds no less than twenty cruces (pp. 367 ff.), and his enumeration of the chief shortcomings of Herodotus as a historian (pp. 406 ff.).

The textual criticism of Herodotus is a simple matter, turning chiefly on the choice between dialectic forms. Dr. Macan has availed himself of the best authorities, and used them with careful discrimination. Seldom does he admit a conjectural emendation, but of course in VII. 96 he gives φρίξουσι for φρίξουσι. The spars of the wrecked vessels after Salamis were carried in great quantities to the strip of shore called Colias, on the coast of Attica. Thus was accomplished an ancient prophecy of an Athenian soothsayer, Lysistratus:

Colian dames shall cook their cakes with the oars from the wreckage
This is much better and more oracular than with φρίξουσι, translated by Rawlinson:

Then shall the sight of the oars fill Colian dames with amazement.

Dr. Macan is a most generous critic of the work of his fellow labourers. Among those whom he delights to honour some have made bad blunders. For instance Stein, who, however, has done much good work for Herodotus, on I, 155 makes an error of planetary magnitude. In the phrase κεφαλῇ ἀναμάξας φέρω—"I now bear the forfeit" (lit. "I wipe off on my own head")—he takes the participles, not from ἀναμάσσω, but from an unheard-of and utterly impossible ἀναμάγω which he supposes to mean coacervo. Now this is a monstrous form, conflicting with the "royal rule" of Scaliger, that a verb cannot be compounded with any part of speech but a preposition without undergoing a change of form. This is the reason, as Donaldson pointed out, why "telegram" is a barbarous formation. The word implies τηλεγράφω, a barbarism. The right form, τηλεγραφέω, would give τηλεγράφημα, and in English "telegrapheme." However, we do not grudge Dr. Stein the high honour which he has received in being coupled with van Herwerden and Holder in the dedication of Vol. I. Vol. II. is dedicated to three Irishmen—Mahaffy, Butcher and Bury, by Dr. Macan, himself an Irishman. It is an enviable distinction for any scholar, however eminent, to be associated with a work of such wide compass, accurate scholarship, and vast learning.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS

Memories of Eight Parliaments. By HENRY W. LUCY.
(William Heinemann, 8s. 6d. net.)

FEW men are better qualified to write of modern Parliamentary life than the author of this volume. For many years "Toby, M.P.," has, from his point of vantage in the Press gallery, watched the drama of debate. He has witnessed the breaking-up of an ancient tradition and the coming of a new order, the rise and fall of successive Ministries, the advent and the passing of many memorable figures. The scenes, indeed, change with an almost kaleidoscopic quickness. Even since the publication of this volume there have been not a few displacements in the political arena. A new Prime Minister presides over the destinies of Empire, and within the last few weeks death has claimed at least two statesmen of first-rate importance—the Duke of Devonshire and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman—while the veteran champion of philosophic Radicalism has sought refuge in the Peerage.

Mr. Lucy has a light and agreeable style, though there are occasional indications of careless writing. He tells us, for instance, that towards the close of the 1874 session a "glamour" seemed to fall upon the Prime Minister. "From the most skilful he became the most maladroit of Ministers," he adds. Truly a strange "glamour!" It is unusual, too, to refer to an individual as an "animosity" (p. 262). And what are we to make of the following estimate of the Labour members?—

Presumably, since they have been selected to represent them at Westminster, the flower of their respective flocks, they have in one session added appreciably to the esteem with which public opinion in these modern days regards the working man (p. 320).

Mr. Lucy contrives to disguise alike his prejudices and his predilections with an admirable success. He appears to admire Lord Courtney and Lord Rosebery with equal fervour, and he is generous in his praise of his political opponents. In matters of fact he is seldom at fault, but we must take leave to question the accuracy of the following statement:

It was Gladstone who, discerning in close companionship the ability of the young Lord of Dalmeny, nominated him as his successor. Few actions of the right honourable gentleman gave greater pleasure to Queen Victoria, with whom Lord Rosebery was a prime favourite.

Is this correct, however? We have it on the authority of Lord Morley that the day before Gladstone's resignation the Prime Minister had said that if the Queen asked his advice he should nominate Earl Spencer as his successor. "As it happened," adds Gladstone's biographer, "his advice was not sought." This statement seems curiously irreconcilable with Mr. Lucy's version.

One of the most interesting appreciations in the volume is that of Lord Randolph Churchill, with whom Mr. Lucy appears to have been on closely intimate terms. The phrase of the baffled ex-Chancellor, "I had forgotten Goschen," has now become historic, though Mr. Winston Churchill has thrown some doubts on its authenticity. We are glad, therefore, to have the facts from Mr. Lucy, who was himself responsible in the first instance for giving currency to the phrase:

... This may be a convenient place for stating my authority. It was Lord Randolph himself. "A little less than a week after I had written to Lord Salisbury resigning the Chancellorship," he said, in words of which I made a note at the time, "I was walking up St. James's Street, when I met—" (mentioning the name of a lady well-known in political and social circles). "She was driving, and stopped the carriage to speak to me. She asked how things were going on. I said I thought they were doing nicely. Hartington had refused to join them; and whom else could they get? 'Have you thought of Mr. Goschen?' she asked, in voice and manner that indicated she knew more than the innocent inquiry indicated. It all flashed on me in a moment. I saw the game was lost. As I confessed to her, I had forgotten Goschen."

Mr. Lucy is at best when writing of the froth and foam of Parliamentary life and of the oddities of character which are even yet to be found in our legislative assembly. He describes delightfully the vagaries of a Kenealy, a Biggar, an O'Gorman, and a Pyne. He has an interesting chapter on the method of ventilation adopted in the House of Commons, and in another he discusses the intricate subject of Parliamentary procedure. The book, if not of permanent value, is yet of interest as affording some welcome sidelights on the drama which is nightly enacted at St. Stephen's.

THE POSITIVIST PHILOSOPHER

National and Social Problems. By FREDERIC HARRISON.
(Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net.)

IN this book Mr. Frederic Harrison has collected various papers written by him on "burning questions" many years ago. Certain of the questions are still burning somewhat furiously, and the author has the satisfaction of remarking rather frequently, in his footnotes, that, in effect, "This has happened just as I told you." He writes of Egypt, Italy, Afghanistan, the Boer War, etc., in the section devoted to National Problems; of Industrial Co-operation, Trades-Unionism, Moral and Religious Socialism, in the section named Social Problems.

Mr. Harrison is always eloquent, whether he is writing of books or men. You would say that his style is that of a great orator; but he is not a great orator at all. There is, even in his early books, a tone and manner of rhetorical authority; no doubt his first sentences were at once reasonable and severely magisterial—just as his latest are. And since his utterances, though so plainly authoritative, so emphatic, have been so often disregarded, he has come to write more and more prophetically, and threateningly; for, unfortunately, our latter-day prophets never prophesy pleasant things. So in this present book he has written sombre denunciations of this and that iniquity, social and national, and has prefaced the whole with a chapter of lamentation in which he disclaims, with a rather excessive emphasis, any fellowship with other prophets. He seems, indeed, to favour the description of himself as a Conservative Revolutionist—with reservations, but his party is always a party of one; and we are tempted to say, after all, that it is hardly a matter of supreme importance by what term Mr. Harrison may choose to call himself as a political thinker and social reformer. It is his aim in the present volume to show the practical effect of his well-known system, the Philosophy of Common Sense, in moulding opinion on the great questions of Nations and of Society. He makes the mistake, surprising in so thoughtful a man, of identifying theology with religion, and calmly ruling out the influence of Christianity because theology has no call to meddle with earthly politics! Of the hope of the race he writes:

Humanity has sufficed to raise herself, by slow and certain stages, from the brutality of the bushman to the dignity of Shakespeare and Descartes—another statement to which we might very reasonably demur.

Mr. Harrison is of course handicapped by the necessity he is under of referring all questions to the adjudication of his Religion of Common Sense. Yet what he says is no more than any earnest and upright man would say—quite apart from the impulse of any religion, old or new—who is persuaded that things are ill done, whether in Egypt, or India, or at home. No one can deny the sincerity, the eloquent fervour, of Mr. Harrison's writings and addresses upon current topics; no one can fail to see that he has striven continually to preserve the national conscience from its modern hardening tendency. But this, we think, plainly comes from Mr. Harrison himself, not from his Positivism. It has needed no new religion to make him a prophet, and a properly lugubrious, though intensely earnest one. To say that he is an impressive one would be to set him beside his great contemporary Ruskin; and Mr. Harrison, with an integrity as manifest as Ruskin's, has not a thousandth part of Ruskin's real authority and essential importance. We do not want to make impertinent and ungracious comparisons. Mr. Harrison, who has known Ruskin well and loved him more, would not dream, we believe, of any comparison. But our point is this: that Ruskin gained infinitely in power and authority by reason of the intensity of his religious faith, while we cannot see that Mr. Harrison—in his present book at least, which is intended to show his system of philosophic religion in action—has gained aught from his faith, if faith it can be called, or that his readers gain either. And indeed it is not to be expected that the case should be otherwise. To what ideas is the Religion of Common Sense—which may not unjustly be termed the Religion of Commonplace—likely to give impulse and energy beyond those already within general apprehension? Renounce faith and you lose the impulse of faith. You cannot transfer the impulse from a living religion to a "philosophic system."

We do not wish to depreciate the merits of the present volume in making these distinctions or reservations. On the whole the chapters were very well worth reprinting; indeed, the freshness of several is rather surprising, and will doubtless be noticeable even to the "lightning reviewer" of the author's contempt.

THE ENGLISH GENTLEMAN

Dyott's Diary, 1783-1845. Edited by REGINALD W. JEFFERY, M.A. In Two Volumes. (Archibald Constable and Co., Ltd., 31s. 6d. net.)

THE Georgian period, with all its defects, had certain outstanding advantages. It bred, for instance, a race of gentlemen, the passing of whom has left our political and social life noticeably the poorer. These, too, had the defects of their qualities. They were frequently violent and arrogant, they drank deeply, they swore lustily. They had, at the most, but a nodding acquaintance with the arts. But they were men of an inflexible honesty of purpose, tenacious of their convictions, fired, moreover, with a deep and unquenchable loyalty to king and country. Their sincerity has never been called in question, and as for their administrative capacity—well, we have it on the authority of Gladstone (no very zealous apologist for the old order)—that England was never so well governed as in the years that immediately preceded the Reform Bill of 1832!

Of this breed was General William Dyott, the worthy scion of an ancient and honourable Lichfield family, and sometime aide-de-camp to his most Gracious Sovereign Majesty King George III. He was not a man of brilliant attainments. He lived for close upon eighty-four years, and it is not on record that he ever said a clever thing or ever did a particularly wise one. But throughout the whole of his long and not uneventful life he acted like a gentleman. Unfortunately, he wrote like one. His style, indeed, invites blasphemy. Here is a characteristic passage:

I was amazed and hurt in the extreme by the receipt of such a letter, feeling conscious, and which I now declare (and which I mean should be read, and I hope it will be believed, by my children when I am dead and gone), that it was ever my most anxious wish and desire to show the kindest affection, love, and attachment to my wife that it was possible; this from motives of real attachment to her.

To us his main—indeed, his only—interest consists in the fact that he kept a diary. In its original form this diary consisted of about 500,000 words, and extended over a period of sixty-four years. The copious extracts which form the material of these two portly volumes will, however, amply suffice for the purposes of the average reader.

William Dyott, second son of Richard Dyott, of Freeford Hall, Staffordshire, was born on April 17th, 1761. He was educated at Lichfield, Ashbourne, and Nottingham, and in 1781 he entered the Army as an ensign. Of his youth we hear little. He seems, however, to have been a man of convivial habits. "Got very drunk," "Got a good deal inebriated"—these are phrases which occur with an almost monotonous frequency on practically every page in the earlier portion of the Diary. In many of these carousals he enjoyed the company of Prince William, who was afterwards to become King William IV., and in November, 1788, we find him writing, in a strain of brooding melancholy, of his friend and patron:

Take him altogether, I think I never saw or heard of a finer character. He is, I will venture to say, from experience, as honourable a man as ever held a commission in the British service. He has a generous and noble spirit, and will, I am convinced, when an opportunity may offer, render an essential service to his king and country (Dyott, by the way, subsequently rescinded this opinion). I had the honour, I may say, of living with him for three months, and in that time one may be able to judge of a man's character. I believe I never shall spend three months in that way again, for such a time of dissipation, etc., etc., I cannot suppose possible to happen.

Dyott had a distinguished military career, serving in Nova Scotia, and afterwards in Grenada, whither his regiment had been despatched to assist in quelling a military insurrection. In a subsequent campaign he assisted at the siege of Alexandria under General Hutchinson. He married late in life, and with disastrous results. After bearing him three children, his wife's affections were suddenly transferred to a man named Dunne, with whom she eloped. Dyott bore this misfortune with a stoical resignation. No hint of reproach or bitterness can be detected in these pages, and when, many years later, the woman died, Dyott refers to his loss in a spirit of tender regret. The later years of his life were devoted to the pursuits of an English country gentleman. He shot occasionally—though he does not appear to have been a very keen sportsman—and farmed on an extensive scale. He was an enthusiastic politician, with unmistakable Tory sympathies. He watched the growing power of the democracy with mingled feelings of horror and distrust. He was bitterly opposed to Catholic emancipation, which he believed would induce "to the support of a religion we are taught by Holy Writ to protest against." He was an ardent Protectionist, and enjoyed for many years the friendship of Sir Robert Peel, whom he regarded as the champion of the landed interests. When his son contested Lichfield as a Conservative Dyott threw himself into the campaign with characteristic ardour. He appears to have discharged his duties as a magistrate in a conscientious spirit, though it may be safely assumed that his treatment of poachers would not err on the side of leniency. For literature he does not seem to have cared, and there is no positive evidence that he ever read a book in his life. He was fond of travel, and keenly enjoyed his occasional visits to town. He attended church regularly, though he would probably have disdained anything in the nature of religious enthusiasm. He was a kind and indulgent parent, betraying a pathetic fondness for his daughter Eleanor, who appears to have been one of the greatest friends and confidants of his declining years.

It remains to be said that Mr. Jeffery has performed his task as editor with scrupulous care, and his numerous footnotes will be found of great assistance. One is grateful for this portrait of the old general. He is typical of a class now unhappily extinct—a man with many limitations and innumerable prejudices, but a rugged, honest, and entirely loveable nature.

FOR SHAME, MR. SHAW!

It was with feelings of some trepidation that we attended the malinée of Mr. Bernard Shaw's new play at the Haymarket last week. We have for long been sincere admirers of Mr. Shaw's brilliant gifts, and we have in this journal from time to time emphasised our great appreciation of him as a writer of comedies. But on this occasion we had been warned by many competent judges that we were likely to find the pill of Getting Married rather a hard one to swallow. We were told, in effect, that we should probably find the first Act very amusing, the second Act rather less amusing, and the third Act a very serious bore. These anticipations were only partly realised; but, in justice to the prophets, we are bound to say that we did not give them a chance of allowing their prophecies to be completely fulfilled. We regret to say that we did not find even the first Act amusing. On the contrary it "got on our nerves," so to speak, from the very first. We "stuck it out" manfully for about twenty-five minutes, and then our courage failed us and we fled. The fact is, as Mr. Shaw himself has publicly stated, Getting Married is not a play at all, but a conversation, and, for the time being at any rate, we must confess we are "fed up" with the conversation of Mr. Bernard Shaw. We did not during our period of martyrdom retain sufficient control of our faculties to discover even so much as the name of one of the characters. We saw two ladies, a waiter, and a general. The waiter (Mr. Bernard Shaw would probably call him a butler, but we repeat that he is a waiter) talked in somewhat the same style as the waiter talked in Mr. Shaw's least successful comedy You Never Can Tell. His conversation seemed to us to be not only dull, but immoral, and we are beginning to be aware of new lights on Mr. Shaw's feelings concerning the censorship of plays. Frankly we do not think that the censorship should have passed the play. The waiter disguised as a butler told us, among other things, that his mother was very fond of men, and was in the habit of bringing them home at night. This remark was received with pleased merriment and giggling appreciation by the serried rows of respectable British matrons from the suburbs and elsewhere who thronged the theatre. We noticed with regret that these amiable women had in many cases brought their equally amiable offspring to the "feast of reason and flow of soul" provided for them by Mr. Shaw. We cannot think that these youthful people were edified. We wish we could think they were bored; but apparently they thought it all very amusing. After the waiter had retired from the scene we were presented to a lady and a general in full uniform. The lady was, of course, the typical young lady of the Shaw variety, who is much rarer than Mr. Shaw supposes. She evidently shared Mr. Shaw's own views about, among other things, the "filthy habit of smoking," and she publicly and shamelessly expressed her regret that the idiotic conventions of society precluded her from having babies without being under the necessity of living in the same house as "a horrid man who smelt of smoke." Our readers will perceive that Mr. Shaw has said all this before, and even the general repeated the old jokes which we find in Arms and the Man as to the superiority of cowardice over courage, and so on and so forth. These jokes of Mr. Shaw's can be made effective and amusing when they arise out of the action of a play, but in a play which is admittedly only a "conversation" they are both boring and irritating.

Last week we extended certain advice to Mr. R. J. Campbell, of the City Temple. We have come to the conclusion, like the young lady in one of Oscar Wilde's plays, The Ideal Husband, that the best thing to do with good advice is to pass it on to somebody else. Mr. Campbell has probably had enough of our advice by this time. We will therefore request him to pass it on to Mr. Shaw. The advice was "to stop preaching for two years, and during that time to read and listen and think and cultivate intellectual humility." Mr. Shaw is a very clever man, but he talks a great deal too much, and our duty to our readers will not allow us to invite them to go and be bored to death at the Haymarket Theatre. Readers of THE ACADEMY are not likely to be damaged either intellectually or morally by listening to the sparkling trivialities of Mr. Shaw. The general verdict on Mr. Shaw among people of higher intelligence may be summed up in some such words as the following—Mr. Shaw is a very able, brilliant, witty, and amusing writer. At one time we even thought that he was a deep thinker and that his pronouncements on social questions were entitled to a very respectful hearing. We have given him that hearing for a space of time extending over, at any rate, several years. Our opinion as to Mr. Shaw's ability, brilliancy, and wit remains unchanged, but we are unable to take the views of Mr. Shaw on social questions seriously, and we decline to believe that he takes them seriously himself, in spite of his repeated assurances to the contrary. Briefly, we prefer the wisdom of all the ages, to which we are the heirs, to the wisdom of Mr. Shaw. Readers of THE ACADEMY, we repeat, will not be damaged by Mr. Shaw's impertinent treatment of serious subjects, but it is far otherwise with the blameless British matrons and their young to whom we have referred in the earlier part of this article. They, taken as a whole, are not possessed of sufficient intellectual ability and have not sufficient sense of humour to appreciate Mr. Shaw's pyrotechnics at their true value. They gape and they giggle, and, returning to their fastnesses in Bayswater or Balham, they take steps to render unbearable the lives of their blameless and respectable husbands, and when remonstrated with justify themselves by references to "that brilliantly clever man, Mr. Bernard Shaw."

Mr. Shaw, in short, is beginning to make serious inroads on the British home, and if he had his own way he would break it up altogether. But the British home must not be broken up. We may make jokes about it, but we must respect it.

Mr. Bernard Shaw gave himself away completely in the preface to one of his plays, where he described himself with deadly accuracy. He said he was a prude and a person of almost old-maidish ideas. We don't profess to give his exact words, but that was their general sense. Mr. Shaw might have said more accurately quite old-maidish. We are sorry to have to say it, but it is our deliberate opinion that, for all his brilliant cleverness and ability, Mr. Shaw does not possess a masculine intellect. A vegetarian who never touches alcohol, who thinks smoking "a filthy habit," and who raises hysterical shrieks about cruelty because a mother visits her child with a well-merited and salutary smacking, is not the kind of man to whom this country is going for instruction in sociology or morality. Mr. Shaw will always be able to amuse and to stimulate us (at least, he always used to be able to do these things and Getting Married is probably only a temporary lapse); but the sooner he learns that he is not in a position to preach to us the better it will be for him. Of course, if he obstinately persists in his present courses and refuses to write any more delightful comedies like Man and Superman, Candida, and John Bull's Other Island, if, in short, he continues to preach and to substitute conversation for drama, he is doomed. He will become that most terrible of all things, a dangerous bore. We refuse to believe, however, that he will persist in his errors of judgment. He is too clever and too fond of popularity for that.

THE ENGAGING CRIMINAL*

DR. WILSON dedicates his book, "by permission," to

DR. HUGHLINGS JACKSON,
The founder of the Science of Neurology,
Physician and Philosopher, Leader of Thought and Research, honoured and beloved by all who know him.

We are willing to take Dr. John Hughlings Jackson on Dr. Wilson's estimate of him, but we could wish that nobody had founded the science of neurology. We say this in full knowledge of the broad facts which Dr. Wilson would no doubt have us recognise. For it seems to us that the neurologists—professional and lay—are becoming far too thick upon this fair earth of ours, and that, despite the excellent intention which is at the back of their propaganda, they do not altogether serve mankind in a satisfactory sense. In the Preface to the present work Dr. Wilson assures us that There are many burning questions, as education, marriage, and crime, which are in a chaotic condition, the subject of party strife; and yet there is only one way in which these difficulties can be met. That way is by bending to the laws of science, of biology, of philosophy, and psychology.

As the founder of the science of neurology Dr. Jackson would probably support Dr. Wilson in this statement. And yet it is a statement which does not appear to us to be generally true, and will not really bear examination. Dr. Wilson's book is literally alive with pictures of sensory nerve-cells, motor-cells, nerve-terminals, brain-lobes, and so on and so forth. And most interesting they are, just as the letterpress concerning them is interesting. But we doubt whether they have the least to do with what may be termed the burning part of the questions which Dr. Wilson perceives to be in a chaotic condition and the subjects of party strife. The scientists of the moment, not even excluding the popular scientists of the moment, are, it seems to us, quite too apt to imagine that the world is to be saved with the microscope and the scalpel, plus a sheaf of comparative statistics. They forget that the human race is a fairly old-established concern, and that in all probability it is doing worse for itself in this age of neurological science than it has been generally in the habit of doing for ages past. If we are to follow the strict scientists in their hope for mankind we shall be compelled to abandon the forces upon which we have hitherto depended—forces which are in the main of a spiritual nature—and set up in their places the thing called knowledge. Now, although it does not come to us from a scientific quarter, there can be no doubt that the adage about a little knowledge being a dangerous thing is well grounded in fact. When all is said, even to the length of Dr. Wilson's 300 closely-packed, highly interesting, and entertaining pages, one is compelled to the conclusion that the knowledge of the scientists continues to be little, and must always continue to be little. The old invincible mysteries remain for Dr. Wilson even as they remain for the merest of God's creatures who "musing in the furrow stands." Dr. Wilson himself would be the first to admit this much, though we do not suppose for a moment he would admit that the stock of knowledge which he lays before us with so generous and unstinted a hand is in essence of a dangerous and deleterious character.

Boiled down, Dr. Wilson's volume amounts simply to this: if a man's brain be not normal the man ceases to be a normal man: which, on the whole, is what we naturally expected. It has been common knowledge, time out of mind, that unfed children cannot be depended upon to flourish. Dr. Wilson proves, or rather brings statistics to show, that little boys of less than average normal weight are sometimes "bad boys." He brings also into high relief the desirability of suitable environment for the younger generation. We know not how many centuries ago some one remarked, Train up a child in the way it should go.

* Education, Personality, and Crime. By ALBERT WILSON, M.D. (Greening, 7s. 6d. net.)

We believe, for the credit of the race, that the large mass of mankind has a full and instinctive knowledge of these truisms, and is really engaged in doing the best it can in the circumstances. Pictures of the cortex of the brain, or the brains of murderers, are not going to help in any great measure. And as to the burning questions, education, marriage, and crime, the scientists certainly did not invent them, and they are quite incapable of settling them. Practically the only good tidings Dr. Wilson has to offer us is that every little boy and girl that's born into this world alive is in effect a normal human being, and this in spite of its parentage. Of course there are exceptions, but the exceptions are few, probably less than five per cent. Here, need one say, we have a direct denial of the principle of heredity so far as heredity may take us away from the normal. But as the scientists, and the scientists alone, set up that principle, there it is nothing very tremendous in their disposition to knock it down again. If from the beginning wicked persons had been compelled to produce wicked offspring, or one-legged persons one-legged offspring, the world would have been in a much worse pickle than it is at the present moment. The human babe is like the proverbial Scotchman. Catch him young and you may do anything with him, which is a principle of the most vital and comforting kind; though, of course, it is as old as the everlasting hills.

Apart from the scientific view of its own powers in the process of producing good men, there is naturally a great deal to be said for a book like the one before us. People who are sick of the ephemeral fiction of the time may turn to Dr. Wilson, and find refreshment combined with instruction. The work is full of wise saws and modern instances. There is plenty of predigested physiology, biology, and psychology, and a good deal of entertaining anecdote. The publishers, who should know, assure us on the cover that Dr. Wilson advances "some new and interesting facts and theories on the subject of criminals and education." They add

The book contains notes selected from the study of about two hundred ex-criminals. It also contains a very full and illustrated description of a murderer's brain. Education is treated in a way which will assist both teachers and parents. The remarkable phenomenon of dual personality is fully described and illustrated by cases.

All of which is exciting. We cordially recommend the volume to be read.

PRACTICAL SOCIALISM*

APART from theory, there is a general desire to know what are the real aims of Socialists in England, to find an answer to the baffling question "What is Socialism?" There is a vast number of books and pamphlets on Socialism, vague, bewildering, controversial, and contradictory, which in no way satisfy the practical inquirer. What is wanted is a plain and definite answer to the further and more searching question, "What does Socialism mean as a matter of practical business?" Writers who would tell us this must leave the theories of doctrinaires, and simply formulate and examine the known proposals of Socialist leaders and teachers. This is the object of Mr. Ellis Barker, in his comprehensive and exhaustive work. He says:

It does not suffice to study the doctrines of Socialism by themselves. In order to understand Socialism we must investigate its practical proposals.

To the same purpose Mr. Arnold-Forster has published, in a useful popular handbook, a series of articles contributed to the Standard. Although they show evidence of what we may term hasty gleaning, and certainly require some revision and rearrangement, still the political aspect of English Socialism and its chief proposals ("this being the Socialism that matters") are fairly grasped and criticised.

* British Socialism. By J. ELLIS BARKER. (Smith, Elder and Co., 10s. 6d. net.)

English Socialism of To-day. By the RIGHT HON. H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER, M.P. (Smith, Elder, and Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

Practical Socialism is based on this avowed doctrine :

That the Socialist State will arise by Natural Development, and it will handle business more efficiently than do Private Individuals.

In the last part of this proposition lies the root of the whole matter. The words "more efficiently" merely beg the question, which remains unproven. But those who believe this have drawn up definite programmes, which embody the actual schemes of Socialist Federations and others. The study of these is very important, for they clearly express the positive aims and intentions of Socialist men of business. They are therefore the concern of every voter in the country. It is unwise to neglect their consideration, indolent to simply ignore them.

We may divide these proposals into two classes—first, those which are quite impracticable, or, if attempted, likely to result in civil war or revolution ; secondly, those which, whether we think them advisable or not, are at any rate within the range of practical politics.

Among the first we enumerate :

Repudiation of the National Debt.

Nationalisation of all Land.

Abolition of the Regular Army.

Destruction of Private Property and Enterprise.

Abolition of Christianity.

We believe that a great number of intelligent people have but the haziest notion that proposals of this extravagant nature are made in sober business earnest. But they are. We can understand that it may seem well-nigh incredible, that business men can hold that a country could deliberately repudiate its just debts, abolish its standing Army, and yet continue to maintain its position in the commonwealth of nations. But they do. For your thorough-going Socialist has apparently little idea of such a commonwealth, or of the importance of international commercial relations.

That the abolition of Christianity is the wild hope of many Socialists will perhaps astonish those who are unfamiliar with Bax's "Religion of Socialism," where the abolition of Sunday is suggested "to root out the very memory of Christianity."

Not without cause do Mr. Barker and Mr. Arnold-Forster draw a parallel between the French Revolution and the schemes of modern British Socialists. The only reason why so many treat lightly the trend of Socialism is, either because they are ignorant of its real aims or, if they do hear of these proposals, they ignore them as merely impracticable, forgetful that the attempt to realise mistaken and impossible "ideals" may result, as before in history, in revolution.

A study of the "Socialist Catechism" and of the "Red Catechism" taught in Socialist "Sunday"-schools would open the eyes of many.

But we are not surprised at the general indifference displayed towards those Socialist proposals which are deemed impracticable. History affords similar parallels up to the very breaking of the storm. And meantime one serious fact remains. The seeds of a terrible and destroying discontent are being widely disseminated :

We are accused of preaching discontent and stirring up actual conflict (says Mr. Hyndman). We do preach discontent, and we mean to preach discontent, and we mean, if we can, to stir up actual conflict.

We preach the Gospel of Hatred (writes Mr. C. Leatham) because, in the circumstances, it seems the only righteous thing we can preach. . . . Those who talk about the "Gospel of Love," with Landlordism and Capitalism for its objects, want us to make our peace with iniquity.

The "good news" of hatred is news indeed ; and since Mr. Leatham's lecture, which has run to four editions, is entitled "The Class War," we agree with Mr. Arnold-Forster, that the qualification that "hatred of systems, not of men, is preached," may be taken for what it is worth, and that there is some justification for his comment "that Socialism as it is now being taught does involve the preaching of Civil War and the 'gospel' of Hate."

The second category of Socialist proposals, those which may be regarded as in some degree practicable, are ably criticised and discussed by Mr. Barker. Such questions as :

The Nationalisation of Railways.

Payment of Members of Parliament.

State Maintenance of all attending State Schools.

Universal Eight Hours Day.

Public Ownership of Hospitals, &c.

Disestablishment and Disendowment of State Churches.

Public Control of the Drink Traffic.

Insurance and Old-age Pensions.

These are at least matters which it is possible to discuss rationally, and which may be treated constitutionally and from the point of view of economic welfare. They may or may not be carried into effect. But each can be studied on its own merits, and the country can vote on each after special appeal.

In a thoughtful chapter, "Is Socialism Possible?" Mr. Barker points out that the universal philanthropy which some Socialists picture is based on the unattainable, the perfection of human nature :

The voluntary co-operation of all for the benefit of all presupposes the existence of wise, virtuous, and unselfish citizens.

Did not Plato found his ideal commonwealth upon perfectly wise and virtuous men ?

How do Socialists propose to meet the difficulty ?

Very simply. By bold assertions and prophecies. That which all religions and all philosophers have been unable to accomplish during 3,000 years, Socialists will effect as by the touch of a magician's wand, for "Socialism," they say, "will change human nature."

But

History teaches us that revolutions based on plunder, euphemistically called confiscation, expropriation, or Socialism, have indeed altered human nature, but they have altered it for the worse.

We are of those who believe that the real evolution of human progress has been in the direction of an escape from Socialism in any communistic form.

In a useful Appendix, Mr. Ellis Barker gives the official programmes of various Socialistic Federations, adding a capital Bibliography, which he has been well qualified to compile, having studied, he tells us, no less than a thousand books and pamphlets. We advise all who would know something of the real aims and proposals of British Socialists, all who wish to be in a position to differentiate true reform and progress from a policy thoroughly dangerous to the State, to read and digest one of the best books of reference on current Socialism which has so far been offered to the public. We do not think that the publishers make any over-statement of claim in describing Mr. Ellis Barker's work as a "compendium and almost an encyclopædia of British Socialism." It has the merit of being eminently practical.

P. S.

SYMBOLS

He was standing in a wild, bare country. Something about it seemed vaguely familiar ; the land rose and fell in dull and weary undulations, in a vast circle of dun ploughland and grey meadow, bounded by a dim horizon without promise or hope, dreary as a prison-wall. The infinite melancholy of an autumn evening brooded heavily over all the world, and the sky was hidden by livid clouds.

It all brought back to him some far-off memory, and yet he knew that he gazed on that sad plain for the first time. There was a deep and heavy silence over all—a silence unbroken by so much as the fluttering of a leaf. The trees seemed of a strange shape, and strange were the stunted thorns dotted about the broken field in which he stood. A little path at his feet, bordered by the thorn-bushes, wandered away to the left into the dim twilight ; it had about it some indefinable air of sympathy, as if it must lead one down into a world where all earthly things are forgotten and lost for ever.

He sat down beneath the bare, twisted boughs of a great tree, and watched the dreary land grow darker and yet darker ; he wondered half-consciously where he was and how he had come to that place, remembering faintly tales of like adventures.

A man passed by a familiar wall one day, and, opening a door before unnoticed, found himself in a new world of unsurmised and marvellous experiences. Another man shot an arrow farther than any of his friends and became the husband of the fairy. Yet this was not fairyland; these were rather the sad fields and unhappy groves of the underworld than the abode of endless pleasures and undying delights. And yet in all that he saw there was the promise of great wonder.

Only one thing was clear to him. He knew that he was Ambrose; that he had been driven from great and unspeakable joys into miserable exile and banishment. He had come from a far, far place by a hidden way, and darkness had closed about him, and bitter drink and deadly meat were given him, and all gladness was hidden from him. This was all he could remember, and now he was astray—he knew not how or why—in this wild, sad land, and the night descended dark upon him.

Suddenly there was, as it were, a cry, far away in the shadowy silence, and the thorn-bushes began to rustle before a shrilling wind that rose as the night came down. At this summons the heavy clouds broke up and dispersed, fleeting across the sky, and the pure heaven appeared with the last flush of the sunset dying from it; and there shone the silver light of the evening star. Ambrose's heart was drawn up to this light as he gazed: he saw that the star grew greater and greater, it advanced towards him from the air, its beams pierced his soul, as if they were the sound of a silver trumpet, an ocean of white splendour flowed over him: he dwelt within the star.

It was but for a moment: he was still sitting beneath the tree of the twisted branches. But the sky was now clear and filled with a great peace; the wind had fallen, and a more happy light shone on the great plain. Ambrose was thirsty, and then he saw that beside the tree there was a well, half hidden by the arching roots that rose above it. The water was still and shining, as though it were a mirror of black marble, and marking the brim was a great stone, on which were cut the letters:

FONS VITAE IMMORTALIS.

He rose, and bending over the well, put down his lips to drink; and his soul and body were filled as with a flood of joy. Now he knew that all his days of exile he had borne with pain and grief a heavy, weary body. There had been dolours in every limb and aching in every bone; his feet had dragged upon the ground, slowly, wearily, as the feet of those that go in chains. But dim, broken spectres, miserable shapes, and crooked images of the world had his eyes seen, for they were eyes blurred with sickness, darkened by the approach of death; now, indeed, he clearly beheld the shining vision of things immortal. He drank great draughts of the dark glittering water, drinking, it seemed, the light of the reflected stars; and he was filled with life and with light. Every sinew, every muscle, every particle of the deadly flesh shuddered and quickened in the communion of that well-water; the nerves and veins rejoiced together; all his being leapt with gladness, and as one finger touched another, as he still bent over the well, a spasm of exquisite pleasure quivered and thrilled through his body. His heart throbbed with bliss that was unendurable; sense and intellect and soul and spirit were, as it were, sublimed into one white flame of delight. And all the while it was known to him that these were but the least of the least of the pleasures of the kingdom, but the over-runnings and base tricklings of the great supernal cup.

He saw, without amazement, that though the sun had set the sky now began to flush and redden as if with the northern light. It was no longer the evening, no longer the time of the procession of the dusky night. The darkness, doubtless, had passed away in mortal hours while for an infinite moment he tasted immortal drink, and perhaps one drop of that water was endless life. But now it was the preparation for the day: he heard the words:

DIES VENIT DIES TUA

IN QUA REFLORENT OMNIA.

They were uttered within his heart, and he saw that all was being made ready for a great festival. Over everything there was a hush of expectation, and as he gazed he knew he was no longer in that weary land of dun ploughland and grey meadow, of the wild, bare trees and strange, stunted thorn-bushes. He was on a hillside lying on the verge of a great wood; beneath in the valley a brook sang faintly under the leaves of silvery willows, and beyond, far in the east, a vast wall of rounded mountain rose serene towards the sky. All about him was the green world of the leaves: odours of the summer night, deep in the mystic heart of the wood, odours of many flowers, and the cool breath rising from the singing stream mingled in his nostrils. The world whitened to the dawn; and then, as the light grew clear, the rose-clouds blossomed in the sky, and answering, the earth seemed to glitter with rose-red sparks and glints of flame. All the east became as a garden of roses, red flowers of living light shone over the mountain, and as the beams of the sun lit up the circle of the earth a bird's song began from a tree within the wood. Then were heard the modulations of a final and exultant ecstasy, the chant of liberation, a magistral in exilu; there was the melody of rejoicing trills, of unwearied glad reiterations, of notes ever-aspiring, prophesying the coming of the great feast, and singing the eternal antiphon.

As the song aspired into the heights, so there aspired suddenly before him the walls and pinnacles of a great church set upon a high hill. It was far off, and yet, as if it were close at hand, he saw all the delicate and wonderful imagery cut in its stones. The great door in the west was a miracle: every flower and leaf, every reed and fern were clustered in the work of the capitals, and in the round arch above, moulding within moulding showed all the beasts that God has made. He saw the rose-window, a maze of fretted tracery, the high lancets of the fair clerestory, the marvellous buttresses, set like angels about this holy house, whose pinnacles were as a place of many springing trees. And high above the vast, far-lifted vault of the roof rose up the spire, golden in the light. The bells were ringing for the feast; he heard from within the walls the roll and swell and triumph of the organ.

He knew not how he had taken his place in this great procession, how, surrounded by ministrants in white, he too bore his part in endless litanies. He knew not through what strange land they passed in their fervent and admirable order, following their banners and their symbols that glanced on high before them. But that land stood ever, it seemed, in a clear, still air crowned with golden sunlight; and so there were those that bore great torches of wax strangely and beautifully adorned with golden and vermilion ornaments. The delicate, smokeless flame of these tapers burned steadily in the still sunlight, and the glittering silver censers, as they rose and fell, tossed a pale cloud into the air. They delayed, now and again, by wayside shrines, giving thanks for unutterable compassions, and, advancing anew, the blessed company surged onward, moving to its unknown goal in the far blue mountains that rose beyond the plain. There were faces and shapes of awful beauty about him; he saw those in whose eyes were the undying lamps of heaven, about whose heads the golden hair was as an aureole; and there were they that above the girded vesture of white wore dyed garments, and, as they advanced, around their feet there was the likeness of dim flames.

The great white array had vanished, and he was alone. He was tracking a secret path that wound in and out through the thickets of a great forest. By solitary pools of still water, by great oaks, worlds of green leaves, by fountains and streams of water, by the bubbling, mossy sources of the brooks he followed this hidden way, now climbing and now descending, but still mounting upward, still passing, as he knew, farther and farther from all the habitations of men. Through the green boughs now he saw the shining sea-water; he saw the land of the old saints, all the divisions of the land that men had given to them for God ; he saw their churches, and it seemed as if he could hear very faintly the noise of the ringing of their holy bells. Then at last, when he had crossed the Old Road, and had gone by the Lightning Struck Land and the Fisherman's Well he found between the forest and the mountain a very ancient and little chapel ; and now he heard the bell of the saint ringing clearly and so sweetly that it was as it were the singing of angels. Within it was very dark, and there was silence. He knelt, and saw scarcely that the chapel was divided into two parts by a screen that rose up to the round roof. There was a glinting of shapes as if golden figures were painted on this screen, and through the joinings of the beams there streamed out thin needles of white splendour, as if within there was a light greater than that of the sun at noonday. And the flesh began to tremble, for all the place was filled with the odours of Paradise, and he heard the ringing of the Holy Bell, and the voices of a choir that outsang the fairy birds of Rhiannon, crying and proclaiming :

*Glory and praise to the Conqueror of Death :
To the Fountain of Life Unending.*

Nine times they sang this anthem, and the whole place was filled with glory. For a door in the screen had been opened, and there came forth an old man all shining white, on whose head was a gold crown. Before him went one who rang the bell ; on each side there were young men with torches. And in his hands he bore the Mystery of Mysteries wrapped about in veils of gold and of all colours, so that it might not be discerned ; and so he passed before the screen, and the light of heaven burst forth from that which he held. Then he entered in again by a door which was on the other side, and the Holy Things were hidden.

And Ambrose heard from within an awful voice, and the words :

Woe and great sorrow are on him, for he hath looked unworthily into the Tremendous Mysteries, and on the Secret Glory which is hidden from the Holy Angels.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

THE RIVER AND THE SEA

NORTHIN HILL rises hugely from the umbrageous miles and miles of Northin Plain. From afar it seems but a great hump, dominating rudely the prettiness of rolling meads and fragments of ancient forestry. It is sudden and very solitary to the north, black and forbidding, with none of the friendly beauty desired of man. But on the southern slopes, gentler and lavish in verdure, are spread the town and suburbs of Ammeter, so large and new and noisy that you forget there has been for many hundred years a small contented cluster of houses hardly worthy to be called a town, now absorbed and almost lost amid late and ugly accretions of mazy brick.

Round more than half the circuit of the hill the River Rothing flows shining. It is a barrier between the wildness of the hill and the soft luxuriance of the plain. Footing across these level leagues when the sun is sinking and smoking redly among the shaggy trees you will notice something strange and rare in the darkling magnificence. For it is a Faery Land that rises in front of you, with promise of peril and unavertable enchantment ; and once over the broad River you are engaged, surely, against subtle and potent legionaries of earth and air, who may not themselves pass the waters' guard, but are confined to the rocks, and hollows, and bogs, and mists that make the hillside fearful and wonderful.

Drowning heedlessly at evening on the hill-bank of the River I heard strange voices that might have been in the air or under the earth. I know not whence they came ; I only know they were not human.

"Are you tired of carrying all these ships and men, day and night, down to the Sea ?"

"No, for I hardly feel them, hardly more than birds."

"But it seemed that you sighed just now ?"

"Yes, I sighed—not because of the ships, but because of all this."

I looked and saw filth and waste heaving slowly along, the obscene refuse of a great, prosperous town.

"I am tired with carrying all this down to the Sea. It never ceases—coming down from Ammeter, more and more every day."

I saw how the filth and garbage washed against the reeds and broader rushes and lodged there, and made the lips of the water iridescent with evil slime.

"Thirty miles I carry this. Once I was clean and bright, and no great ships sailed up and down, and no burden like this was poured into me. Then, long ago, there came up boats from the Sea, and there was fighting, and men built their huts where they slew their foes."

"Was it then that you began to carry their offal down to the great Sea ?"

The evening birds called and answered now and then ; else unbroken was the profound silence and calm of the hour as the voice, that seemed part of the silence and calm, murmured again.

"Not then. I bore their war-galleys, and was made gay with their flags. Wine was poured into me when their warriors rowed away. I was fought for as a great possession. Once, by night, they floated upon me a great flaming bark, bearing the dead body of an ancient warrior and wise man ; they dragged the floating bier, as all one flame, down towards the great Sea, until the fire crept lower and touched me, and I put it out and covered all the burning up."

I thought of the free, unpolluted River of so long ago, every little wave a syllable in the praise of heroic strength and wisdom ; and I marvelled as I marked the sad, muddled waters. The voice went on :

"Sometimes men were tossed for me to hide, and I have hidden them ; and the bright stain of red—their blood—has spread in me and dimmed in a moment, and become invisible. And once, long ago, all day I had delighted in their shouting and clanging, and I knew there was great fighting ; and I wondered if they would cast the stained, wounded bodies to me, to wash and hide. When night fell there was still the crying and replying, more and more broken, until slowly it ceased ; for at night men sleep. But there were some who did not sleep, and when all was quiet they put out in a boat and rowed softly from the shore ; and I knew from the oars that struck me that the men were weary with fighting. Then there was noise of alarm from the land, and the men in the boat grew strong from fear ; and their leader, as he bent forward and pulled back, sang to me :

'Hasten, O River, towards the great Sea !'

And when I heard him I gathered my waters and sprang to his stroke. Behind there came another boat, with men eager for blood ; and they shouted as they broke through the darkness.

"But the singer in the first boat sang to me again :

'Hasten, O River, and I will pour wine to thee !'

And again I drew my short waves swiftly under his keel.

"Then the men in the boat that pursued ceased shouting, and put all their strength into speed ; and I tossed my waters back at them, and caused them to row uncertainly. And again the singer sang to me, but more slowly :

'Hasten, O River, and I will pour Gold and Pearls to thee !'

"But the dawn began to creep into the sky and over your head, brother Hill, and there came light upon my waters. The men in the first boat said no word when they saw it, but I felt a shudder in their oars ; and their leader, as he bent forward and tugged sharply back, cried again, but gasping :

'Hasten yet, O River, and I will make a Song of thee, which men shall sing for ever !'

Their oars quivered as they struck me, and the men in the following boat set up a sudden dreadful shout to see their foes within reach ; and they cast javelins, which fell short and wide and sank through me to the soft bottom, until one man's hand was stuck through to his oar. So the first boat began to lose way, and another man was struck through the neck as he bent forward; and he died without a cry.

"Then the pursuers drew furious against them and hacked madly at the remaining oarsmen, who pulled on helpless, being weaponless. And the leader, with none left to command, cried to me:

'Hide me, O River, and I will bless thee dying!' and sprang in, and I took his body down, nor once did it rise to them who raged and cast red steel after it, blood-thirsty. And I washed him clean of blood and sweat, and hid him under a great stone, safely from all his enemies. And when the flesh fell softly apart, the large bones still lay under the stone, with gold shining on the arms and wrists as my waters crept between."

"Many years past is that, O sister Rothing!"

"Many years! and now no more gallant bodies are cast into me, but this, and this, and this . . . ever and ever."

I saw the triple shudder pass over the River's breast.

"Day and night I take this evil load down to the Sea, swollen with tributary filth from the Lear and the Eppon; until one day the Sea itself will surely be filled, and the burden will come back with the tide. And all upon you will be cast, O Hill."

There was a long silence. The sun had gone, and the last trembling reflection of it. Cool gusts touched me from the Hill side, and struck against the trees overhead. Sighs seemed to labour up from the Sea, and become slowly, obscurely articulate.

"Fear not, weary Rothing, if your waters are so sick and confused with hateful burdens that it seems I shall be choked with them. All the Rivers in the world, carrying away the manifold impurities of men in all the world, cannot choke the Sea. I take all the impure waters and wash them, and cleanse the shores, and even the far inland towns."

There was silence a space, and then:

"I hear thee, O wise and ancient Sea. . . . But the men, the men, who do all this!"

The Sea answered, on a long sigh:

"The men, too, fall silently into a continual River, which flows down and is lost in a greater Sea than I."

The sound ceased like a faint air in heaven. Overhead was nothing but large trees and handfuls of bright stars among the quivering branches; and I lay thinking of that continual soiled stream flowing down to the great Sea that washes around our human shores, cleansing them of all mortality.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Notes on Scottish Song by Robert Burns. From an Interleaved Copy of the "Scot's Musical Museum." Edited by the late JAMES C. DICK. (Frowde, 10s. 6d. net.)

THIS little book has more weight than many much bulkier volumes. It not only vindicates Burns as a musical man, which is of small moment; it proves that he had an enthusiastic sense of the value and importance of folk-song, and was indeed the first literary god-father of that hitherto neglected study. It is strange that the legend should ever have arisen that Burns was unmusical. He played the fiddle, he danced, he sang with a harsh, strong voice; but he sang in tune, and he danced in time. Above all, he wrote dainty lyrics, which no unmusical person could do. He had excellent notions of harmonising folk-song, which might well be studied by the too self-obtruding editors of some late collections. Here are his directions for setting "When she came ben she bobbie":

Let the harmony of the bass at the stops be full and thin, and dropping through the rest of the air, and you will give the tune a noble and striking effect.

If it were only to vindicate Burns's musical sense these MS. notes were well worth printing. But when the "Museum" was published in 1787 there were only 130 Scottish melodies in print, and Burns came to the work with more knowledge of ballad and folk-song than any man living possessed. He caught and caged the oral tunes, set musicians to work upon writing them down, and mated them to new and lovelier words which grew from chance snatches and fragments of the lost or valueless traditional poetry. He set Herd and Stephen Clarke and others to work and wrote down songs himself from the voice of Kirsty Flint or comelier lassies. The editor has not shown the poet's discrimination when he says that he set songs to dance tunes "never before adapted to or associated with poetry." If he means traditional dance tunes these were always associated with poetry, although, as Burns writes:

They have outlived their original and perhaps many subsequent sets of verses.

The pipe and tabor were feeble instruments for the hum of a country dance, and a rousing ballad tune, sung with plenty of chorus and fal-de-lal, made a lustier music for the dancers. Moreover, Burns detected the fact that the modern melodies were often the directly begotten children of old airs. He points out that Mr. Marshall, butler to the Duke of Gordon, and the first composer of Strathspeys, took his three most celebrated pieces—"Huntley's Reel," "His Farewell," and "Miss Admiral Gordon's Reel"—from "The German Lairdie." He points out that "Lochaber" evidently came from "Lord Ronald," and Oswald's "Rosebud" from "Jockie's Gray Brecks." He did not know, and could hardly be expected to know, that most of the old ballads were not peculiar to Scotland, but were alive and vigorous in many other lands, as they are to this day. Indeed, it is still possible to find whole pieces in England now of which Burns only got broken fragments. At the same time, the broken fragment is often the speck of gold and the rest but brown quartz, for things that are old have often small value, or even none at all. Burns's vigorous prose makes the reader regret that he did not leave more of it. He thus apologises for the exclusive Jacobite nature of the music of Scotland:

Surely the gallant, though unfortunate, House of Stewart, the kings of our fathers for so many heroic ages, is a theme much more interesting than an obscure, beef-witted, insolent race of foreigners whom a conjuncture of circumstances kickt up into power and consequence.

His rude remark upon "The Gentle Swain" is one that literary editors of folk-song books must read with trembling:

To sing such a beautiful air to such damned verses is downright sodomy of common sense.

Burns certainly knew what he meant, and said it.

Les Chouans ou La Belagne en 1799. Par HONORÉ DE BALZAC. Préface de GUSTAVE LANSON. Illustrations de J. BLAKE GREENE. (Bell and Sons; "Les Classiques Français Illustrés," publiés sous la direction de Daniel O'Connor. 5s. net.)

SINCE it has been suggested in these pages that the two first volumes of this series are suitable reading for les ingénues, it should perhaps be noticed that the present volume, though more certainly a French classic, may not be considered particularly suitable. However, no honest collection of classics is suitable for that purpose, and Mr. Daniel O'Connor has made a good choice of "Les Chouans," as the first specimen in his collection, of the genius of Balzac. It was the earliest work acknowledged by the author and included in the Comédie Humaine, and may be read as an immediate introduction to the main section of the Comédie, that representing contemporary life. To the present pleasing edition M. Gustave Lanson contributes a useful and illuminating préface. His accuracy as regards the bibliography and biography of the story is guaranteed, because he strictly follows Lovenjoul's "Histoire des Œuvres de Balzac," and Cerfbeer and Christophe's "Répertoire de la Comédie Humaine," a book which in itself is delightful reading to all admirers of Balzac. In "Les Chouans" we are first introduced to some nine characters which will appear later, or have, so to speak, appeared earlier in their own lives, in scenes which were written later. Of these the chief is the police officer Corentin, the putative son of Fouché. He is now in 1799, the date when the story begins, only twenty-two years old, and haunts the Balzac stage in constant reappearances until 1840, when he had long been living in influential retirement under the name of Monsieur du Portail ("Les petits Bourgeois"). Though we do not quite understand the value of the fac-simile of Monsieur Lanson's autograph, with which his Preface is signed, his independent criticism is well worth reading. He remarks justly :

L'impression historique, l'impression de réalité sont intenses. . . . [With certain exceptions] tout le reste est d'une vérité puissante. Vérité symbolique : car tout est inventé. Cet épisode de la Chouannerie ne correspond à aucun événement réel. . . . [Balzac] a rapidement regardé la ville [Fougères] et ses environs, mais il les a bien vus. Il les rend en images nettes et saisissantes. Il nous fait voir ce pays fait à souhait pour la guerre civile ; ses routes enfoncées, ses champs bordés de haies et fermés d'échaliers. . . . Les personnages sont inventés, à l'exception de Mademoiselle de Verneuil, avec un sens merveilleux de la réalité.

This exception is the chief criticism made by Monsieur Lanson, with which we do not agree. We do not find the heroine, Mademoiselle de Verneuil, "une incohérente et invraisemblable amoureuse." To us, she is one of the great fascinations of the book, and we find her tally not only in Marion de Lorme, but in one of the realest and most captivating of frailties in fiction or history, Manon l'Escout. In "Les Chouans," as M. Lanson truly suggests, Balzac transplanted Scott in France, but Balzac is far truer in expressing female nature in all its developments, than Scott's environment allowed him to be. Scott considered himself forced by it to spoil one of the best of his stories, "St. Ronan's Well," in order to satisfy its prudery, and is, indeed, said to have suffered qualms of conscience for having related the story of Effie Deans at all. Though M. Lanson does not enter so far into the comparison between the two great Romanticists, it is surprising to find a Frenchman so little appreciative of the truth of Balzac's insistence, in the character of Mademoiselle de Verneuil, on the elements of caritas which remain in love excessive, or at any rate assume so well the part of devout self-sacrifice. Possibly M. Lanson intends to appeal especially ad populum Britanicum, and so cites a heroine celebrated by Victor Hugo as likely to be better known to his public than the subtler, but now less remembered, heroine of Prévost.

Sword and Blossom Poems. (Tokio : Hasegawa ; London : Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent, 3s. 6d.)

THIS dainty little book contains a selection of poems from the "Kokinshiu," a famous anthology of Japanese poems "new and old," which was compiled in the year 906 A.D. The translators (Shosard Kimara and Charlotte M. A. Peake) have added some more modern poems, and all are accompanied by charming illustrations by contemporary Japanese artists, which are very pretty and characteristic, and add greatly to the value of the little book. Most of the verses are melancholy and quiet in tone, expressive of "tenderness touched with sadness." Take the "Miserere" as an example :

Dear nightingale, take pity on the pain
Of love's despair that I have borne so long ;
Give back the silence to the world again,
Nor break my heart with sweetness of thy song.

Against the English translations is placed in some cases the original poems, which, unintelligible as they are to most readers, add to the picturesqueness of the pages.

A Holiday in the Happy Valley. By MAJOR T. R. SWINBURNE. (Smith, Elder and Co., 16s. net.)

A WELL produced volume. The print is good and clear, and the book includes twenty-four pretty coloured sketches, some of which are very graphic. The small map of Cashmir is just what is wanted.

In the first chapter we are given the details of a full outfit, from a collar to a cholera-belt, from a camp bed to a cartridge. Then follow fifty pages of breezy tale of travel by Continental trains, by an Austrian steamer, and by Indian rail and road till Srinagar is reached.

The holiday includes travel, sport, and social life away in Cashmir. It is told in admirable English wherever Major Swinburne allows himself to be serious. He has the appreciation of scenery, which his sketches show. He describes the flowers of Cashmir with knowledge and love, and we can almost pick them off the pages where he places them. A Cashmir paradise of birds he tells us of, and gives us a humorous tale of the crowning of the Hoopoe on page 218.

But there is rather too much detail everywhere. It gives one the impression of being a book for the author's own friends and for those who have never travelled.

Sport was distinctly unsuccessful. Major Swinburne shot one stag only (a Bara Singh). He made many efforts to kill a bear ; and in all his accounts of stalk or drive he betrays a keener interest in his human and scenic surroundings than in his quarry. All is told with a very keen sense of humour—we fear we must say with too keen a sense of humour. It is almost obtrusive. No single chance is lost of impressing on the reader Major Swinburne's own view of the humour of every situation. The fatal mistake is made, too, of interlarding nearly every page with native words—some familiar Indian words, some entirely strange Cashmiri. It is true that there is a dictionary of these mysteries at the end of the book, but it is quite likely that the reader won't find it till he finishes it. But there is also at the end of the book Appendix IV., the detailed cost of nine months' travel for two people. That will be very useful for those who wish to enjoy the charming holiday which Major Swinburne has described.

Secrets of the Past. By ALLEN UPWARD. (Owen and Co., 6s.)

MR. ALLEN UPWARD has made a speciality of romances dealing with what is usually known as Secret History. He has at least one gift which is absolutely necessary for success in this kind of work—he is convincing. In the present volume he goes further than he has gone before, and challenges more serious criticism, because, although he shapes his solutions to the various mysteries of his choice as romances and "fiction," he is quite eager that his work should be treated as a contribution to history. He explains his position and method in a "Foreword." After some rather harsh criticism of various historians he develops his plea for "backstairs" authority. His chief complaint is against the indiscriminating and whole-hearted adoration on the part of historians of the "contemporary document ;" and certainly he argues his case with considerable plausibility. Naturally enough when any intrigue or political crime is in question the official account would be garbled, and explanations would be offered which, while satisfactory for their purpose and to a certain extent true, would place the criminals in the best possible light. And, as Mr. Upward aptly remarks, the real political history of our own time is to be found not so much in the Times or "Hansard" as in the smoking-room conversation of West-end Clubs. Of course there is great need for discrimination here, too, as well as in the veneration of the contemporary document, and several grains of salt are necessary for the student of history who seeks the truth in the pages of such delightful gossips as Herodotus or the Sieur de Brantôme. Mr. Upward would probably reply that the same is true of Froide or even Freeman, and we must confess that we do not feel strong enough to contradict him.

The book, then, may be read from two standpoints. It may be regarded as a serious attempt to solve certain famous historical mysteries, or it may be read simply as a series of charming and exciting historical romances, the characters in which are real people. In either case we prophesy that the criticism of the reader will be favourable. Mr. Upward's range is wide—from the murder of Agrippina by Nero down to the mysterious tragedy in St. James's Palace during the night of May 30th, in the year 1810, when the Duke of Cumberland was nearly murdered and his valet Sellis was found dead with his throat cut. Among other subjects discussed are Darnley's murder, the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, the death of Pope Alexander VI., and the Man in the Iron Mask. The last two are perhaps the best in the book. In the former Mr. Upward weaves a most ingenious explanation of the circumstances leading up to the fall of the Borgias, and in the latter he solves—in our opinion at any rate—the famous mystery once and for all.

Pekin to Paris. By LUIGI BARZINI. Translated by L. P. DE CASTELVECCHIO. (Grant Richards, 16s. net.)

WHATEVER remarkable features there may have been about Prince Scipione Borghese's motor-car journey from Pekin to Paris, it is difficult to assign much credit to the car. Not that it did not achieve all that could reasonably have been expected of "a dumb vehicle," for, indeed, it showed itself extraordinarily versatile, "bounding like a panther" being but an everyday accomplishment. Yet, so far as the machine was concerned, the trip had broken down and ended in inglorious failure twenty times before its wheels passed to European soil. But what had a savour of the miraculous was the regularity with which, on each occasion when the car confessed itself beaten, salvation of the most unexpected character was at hand. It emerged from the steppes, the swamps, the forest or the rocks. Chinese coolies, Mongolian peasants, chance-met caravans, horses, oxen—whatever happened to be needed to extricate the baffled and defeated car from its latest dilemma, some of these were always at hand to supply. So the helpless machine was hauled out of mudholes, ferried across rivers, disentangled from among the timbers of bridges which its weight had broken, pushed laboriously where it refused to negotiate the roads of its own power, and, when broken, patched up to start anew by the thaumaturgic peasant-craftsmen of the wildernesses. The first quarter of the narrative is all pulling and hauling. The machine was, in the matter of self-propulsion, about on a par with the car of Juggernaut. Thenceforward, until the firm highways of Europe were reached, the trip was punctuated with approximately daily collapse, from which the party was only rescued by the intervention of the gods of the local countryside. As Prince Borghese himself admits, in a prefatory letter to this volume, the one thing above all others which the journey proved was that "it is impossible to go by motor-car from Pekin to Paris." Three men started with a car at one end, and they arrived, vastly to their credit, still in possession of the car at the other; but (except perhaps in crossing the Gobi Desert) for most of the journey a wheelbarrow would have been less of an impediment. But the trip afforded incident enough to make a sufficiently absorbing narrative, and Mr. Barzini has taken advantage of the possibilities. The illustrations are excellent, if a trifle monotonous; for, after all, a car stuck in the mud near Tomsk is not much unlike the same car stuck in the mud near Kazan; and we would willingly forego a few of the views of the car for some of the scenery of which we are told much, and shown nothing. The translator's work is admirably done.

The Automobilist Abroad. By FRANCIS MILTOUN. With Illustrations by Blanche McManus. (Brown, Langham, 16s. net.)

It is the belief of some publishers (especially in America) that a sufficiently sumptuous binding and plenty of illustrations, decorated end-papers, and an ornamental type-page will convert a bibliom into a real book; and in all except the substance of it this is a book of the best. It may be that many Americans meditating an automobile tour in Europe will think that this is just the book they will need as guide and friend, and they will burden their cabin luggage with it, read it laboriously in deck-chairs on board ship, and even carry it faithfully with them in their cars. But to English notions it had been more fitly clad as a shilling manual. Yet we may glean much useful information even about our own islands, as that "Goring is more of a metropolis than Streatley"—a point which, we confess, had hitherto escaped us. Nor can even the casual reader fail to be gratified by the author's evident familiarity with the French tongue. Such sentences as the following envelop one with a sense of being in polite company:

We hunted out a little café in the town, whose patron we knew, and prevailed upon his good wife to give us our lunch [why not déjeuner?] en famille, which she did, and did well. It was très bourgeois, but that was what we wanted.

Not improbably. For the rest—ἐν τέρπειν ἐπορεύθησαν σταθμὸν ἑνα: Xenophon had the trick of it better than Mr. Miltoun and Baedeker gives better reading. Miss McManus has before shown herself capable of doing charming work as an illustrator, but a gazetteer-roadbook (even when published at four dollars) must lack something as a source of inspiration.

FICTION

Sir Roger Delaney of Meath. By "HAL." (Simpkin, Marshall and Co., 6s.)

It is perhaps as well for the safety of his skin that the author of this bitter sketch of a "fine old Irish gentleman" has chosen to write anonymously—for the Irish as a race are quick to resent affronts against themselves. It does not, however, redound to the author's credit that he has not the courage of his opinions, and shoots from behind a wall in the dark. It is possible to regard this book in two ways. We may either take it quite seriously as a careful and accurate character-study of a most distasteful personality—and this is what we believe to be the author's desire—or we may treat it as a comedy of manners of somewhat questionable taste. In either case the book does not commend itself except in the consistency of its character-drawing.

On the one hand, true to himself as Sir Roger is throughout the book, we refuse absolutely to accept him. He exists, undoubtedly—"Hal" has created him; but he does not exist as a type of his class as "Hal" would have us believe. We can imagine an author with a private axe to grind carefully analysing or dissecting the character of some private enemy, and then exhibiting his less lovely traits to the eyes of his own little mutual admiration society. But the author then, if he is wise, sets up as a contrast the idealised portrait of himself or one of his friends. But "Hal" has not done this. He gives us Sir Roger alone, as an Irish gentleman who is not above cheating a peasant in a bargain over a few dozen eggs, or brutally insulting his wife and compromising his next door neighbour's sister—and he gives us no contrast. The rest of the characters are puppets. Are we then to understand that Sir Roger is typical of his class? Not all the "Hals" in the world would make us believe that, even if we were dependent entirely on novels for our acquaintance with the originals. And this is, happily, not the case. Let us get "Charles O'Malley" from the bookshelf and enjoy ourselves.

Thrice Captive. By Major ARTHUR GRIFFITHS. (F. V. White and Co., 6s.)

THIS volume has the appearance and price of a grown-up novel, but after reading it we must conclude that the author's primary intention was to satisfy the artistic demands of the young. As a boy's book "Thrice Captive" would pass. Its hero undergoes the necessary hardships; there is the proper amount of history and fighting; there is a ferocious villain, and the love-making is compressed into the smallest possible space. These probably complete the list of juvenile requirements in books of this character, and we are willing to credit "Thrice Captive" with their adequate supply. To the adult mind the lack of originality in the treatment both of the plot and the characters and the book's careless construction must appear as fatal blemishes. At best it is not to be compared with the stirring and ingenious romances of the late Mr Henty. We are sorry that we are unable to commend further the last book of an author who gave pleasure to many.

The People Downstairs. By EVA LATHBURY. (Alston Rivers, Ltd., 6s.)

It is evident that in Miss Eva Lathbury we have a novelist to be reckoned with. Alike in matter and in manner she stands resolutely aloof from her contemporaries. Her attitude is one of critical detachment, and there is no character in this novel with whom it could be predicated that the author has identified herself in the slightest degree. The title is but partially explanatory, since it covers only one-half of the story, which is concerned with the appeal of an unsuspected ancestry to a girl of errant and luxurious fancies. Alva, let it be said, is drawn to the life. So, too, is Griselda, a perfect example of the magnificently evolved feminine, and, in some respects Alva's counterpart. Miss Lathbury has proved less successful with her men, and it may be safely premised that in the delineation of male character she has worked within a more restricted area of observation. Her characters are apt to err on the side of over-complexity, though in the case of Anthony Glover it is easy to detect beneath the veneer of a too precocious cultivation the masked villain of transpontine melodrama. So do extremes meet—for there is little else in the novel that is likely to appeal to the reader avid of new sensations. The psychological interest predominates throughout, and the drama is less one of incident than of emotion. In the closing scene—a scene tense and vibrant with restrained passion—Miss Lathbury reaches the highest level of her art. "The People Downstairs" is not a book that is easily read, nor is it a book that will be readily forgotten. It emboldens us to anticipate an even greater achievement from the pen of the same author.

The Speculator. By OLIVE CHRISTIAN MALVERY. (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

MISS MALVERY'S talents are not exhibited to such advantage in her novel "The Speculator" as in her study of social conditions "The Soul Market." She has undoubted powers of description and the journalistic (using the word in its best sense) gift for creating a picture and an impression, but her characterisation is commonplace and her plot does not carry conviction. The story of "The Speculator" deals mainly with the adventures of Helen March, the wife of an English consul on the Arabian coast, who has been obliged to return to his official duties for pecuniary reasons, although he is warned by the oculist that he is risking the total loss of his eyesight by so doing. His wife and children are left behind, and Mrs. March conceives and carries out a plan of entering the money market as a stockbroker (!). She disguises herself as a man, takes the name of Otto Martini, engages offices, and, of course, succeeds up to a point. There is an abundance of incident, and some criticism of social misdoings (e.g., the chapter on a Covent Garden ball), but the reader always feels that the subject has been "got up" for the occasion; and in the case of the financial transactions described, the study is so obviously superficial as to be entirely unconvincing. "The Speculator" is, however, very light and easy reading, and if the primary absurdity of a wife and mother being able successfully to impersonate a man can be accepted by the credulous novel-reader, the book may serve to amuse and interest.

Julian Steele. By CONSTANTINE RALLI. (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)

THIS is a story of modern life, told with such melodramatic fury of language that we have found ourselves compelled at times to neglect the author's meaning owing to our admiration for his turbulent vocabulary. Apart from the stimulating spectacle of these verbal fireworks, we have not found very much entertainment in "Julian Steele."

The hero is a successful financier, and we must credit the author with some originality of conception in making his character decidedly weak. The heroine is mysterious—so mysterious in fact that we readily sympathised with the hero in his prompt acceptance of the apparent proofs of her infidelity. For villain there is a sinister monk, a splendidly improbable person, who wishes to win the hero and his gold for the Church of Rome, and employs a lady of the accepted adventuress type to that end. The book ends with madness and asterisks and sudden death, though, as is usually the case with unhappy endings in modern fiction, the intelligent reader can see no particular reason for this tragic snuffing-out of the principal characters.

DRAMA

LANVAL

It seems that there is a Middle World, and therein doth dwell one Triamour, whose brow is of a moony whiteness. This lady, having chanced across Lanval, a knight of the Court of King Arthur, conceives a pleasing passion for him, and would fain take him with her to her shadowy kingdom. The good knight, being at the moment temporarily embarrassed, is lured away; but as the lady has nothing substantial or alluring to show him in her Land of Phantasies, he naturally grows a trifle bored, and decides to leave. In other words, the old decent world which we all love recurs to him. "The while I was half sleeping," he says:

there was borne to me
A faint far clamour, like the distant call
Of hunters in the forest, and I saw
Long lordly lines of very noble forms
Passing beyond me: then my pleasure passed,
This dalliance was forgotten and I heard
In place of our sweet music the foul clang
Of brass in action, and the dance of steel
On shields opponent; then into my ears
Stole the sweet thunder of a thousand hooves
The hissing of the arrows and the shrill
Keen note of the wind-cutting spears. Again
I saw the light on lance-heads in the dawn;
Long Legions creeping from the morning mists;
The death haze standing on embattled ranks;
There is no music like the tread of hosts,
Nor any glamour that can match the sight
Of set battalions meeting in the field.

Lanval, need one say, stands not upon the order of his going, but goes at once. And being a man, of course, in due time and after sundry adventures of small consequence, he returns to the bewildering Triamour. The foregoing facts have impressed themselves so acutely upon the mind of T. E. Ellis—otherwise Lord Howard de Walden—that he has written a play about them, and the play has been produced at a couple of invitation matinées. We believe these matinées were entirely successful from the author's point of view. That is to say, they brought him an audience of more or less polite and cultivated people, and he has probably learnt a good deal in consequence. He will have observed, no doubt, that when all is said, the essential parts of a work for the stage are the dramatic essentials. He will have observed too that you can have an overplus even of dramatic essentials. And he will have observed that passions and states of being which are not broadly human have little power to move or interest people who go to the theatre. Such intellectual toys may look quite pretty in a book, but when you begin to expose them to the fierce illuminations of the limelight man the effect is not exactly what you might have expected. The much-vaunted ghost in Hamlet is practically the only stage spirit tolerable to the hard-headed theatre-goers of these shrewd islands. And even the ghost in Hamlet, no matter how so well enacted or how so deftly upholstered, is somehow one of those characters which the beholder has a tendency to skip, or, in other words, to put up with for the sake of the rest of the exhibition. Middle-worldism has really no interest for the hearty lunch-eating afternoon-tea drinking persons who fill the stalls when matinées are toward. The subject does not invite the commonalty, who, in point of fact, expect from the stage histories in which themselves might conceivably have taken part. And the best of us are not yet ripe for Middle-worldliness. So that, as drama in the sound sense, Lanval fails.

A perusal of what the young ladies who sell chocolate in the twilight of the entr'acte call the book of the words, however, leads us to conclude that while Lord Howard de Walden has not arrived at a ripeness of judgment which will enable him to write competent plays, he is nevertheless a poet of some considerable parts and a serious humanist who, if he be not deflected from himself, as it were, may one day produce something which will help us. There can be no question whatever that Lanval contains a proper sprinkling of good lines. Complaints are understood to have been made about Hamlet to the effect that it is very full of quotations. Whether Lanval will ever compass such a glory is a question which does not require answering. But here, at any rate, is quotable and creditable matter :

See Heaven as a place of perfect mail,
With all its angels armoured in delight.

I can accept defeat
And with some sorrow put my dreams away.

I am too old and must endure my days
In these grey places. Death were easier there,
For he comes laughing with the sun and dust.

There is a sweetness in the taste of power
Beyond all savours.

The usage of their days
Is but a hope that they shall pass unmarked.

These forests cramp the soul with silences,
God, for an empty brown stone-studded space,
And the faint seas beyond !

A priest of policy,
A sour disciple of the arts of State
In whom's no pleasure, gaiety, or wit,
But sullen strength.

But a king's no man,
His soul is swallowed in his offices.

Is it the privilege
Of kings to be deceived ?

We might continue at length, though unfortunately we might also spread before the reader a good deal of fustian and even rant by the same hand. It is sufficient, however, that Lord Howard de Walden says many good things, and says them in decent blank verse. Taken generally, one cannot doubt that Lanval is intended by its author for the stage rather than for the closet. It may be, of course, that without the assistance of the dramatic form T. E. Ellis finds himself at a loss to set down the thoughts that stir within him. We are of opinion, however, that if he must needs write dramatically he will find the dramatic episode much more suited to the proper expression of himself than the full drama. Of course the dramatic episode in its strict sense cannot be produced at the theatre. Hence no doubt it will not find favour in the eye of T. E. Ellis. But if he aspires to a literary reputation at all he will have to leave the full drama to other hands. In the effort to produce a poetical play most of the poets of our own time have failed. Mr. Binyon has failed, and Mr. Stephen Phillips has failed. How then shall T. E. Ellis hope to survive? The plain fact is that the creation of a living poetic drama requires the highest kind of intellectual and poetic and dramatic equipment. Shakespeare is enormous, because he possessed this equipment; the rest are feeble and ephemeral precisely in so far as they do not possess it. Luckily, however, a man may be a good poet, and even a good dramatic poet, without being able to write a play. Lord Howard de Walden belongs to this order of poets, and when he gets the glare and clatter of the proscenium out of his mind we shall indulge prospects for him.

It should be noted, in conclusion, that T. E. Ellis is infected with what one may term stage illusionism, almost to the point of humour. Some of his "stage directions" are really so exacting as to be almost ludicrous. For example, we read under Scene 2, "A glade in the forest. Rooks, and a few huge knotted trees." We suppose that Mr. Acton Bond, who looked after the life of poor Lanval at the invitation matinées, did manage to produce some rooks for this scene. But nobody saw them. Again :

As she touches his eyes there is darkness and confusion. A rush of wild music. The stage remains dark for some moments, then gradually lightens, but remains darker than before. . . . A horn is heard in the distance, then again nearer.

Which, of course, is fiddle-de-dee. When Shakespeare wanted dawns he did not look to the gas-man for them :

Night's candles are burnt out, and jocund day
Stands tip-toe on the misty mountain tops.

T. E. Ellis must learn to put these things, even down to rooks and faint horns, into his poetry.

CORRESPONDENCE

SUFFRAGITIS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As a mother of five daughters (ages ranging from fifteen to twenty-six) I write to thank you for the able and amusing exposure of the Suffragette follies and fallacies which appears in your current issue. It is surely about time that those among the women of England who have not been infected by the mad-dog epidemic of Suffragitis should lift up their voices and make it clear that they do not participate in its dangerous follies. It is, unfortunately, the case that the type of woman who is absolutely opposed to all this sort of thing is precisely the type that does not willingly indulge in any kind of public demonstration. They look on with amazement and distress at the antics of their misguided sisters, but it never occurs to them that the most effectual way of counteracting their unfortunate influence would be to organise counter demonstrations, to write to the newspapers, and, generally speaking, to make signs of public activity. The women of this country who disapprove of the Suffragettes and their methods are, I have no hesitation in saying, an enormous majority, and it is surely time that the views of this majority were heard. I lately came across the case of a mother who is actually bringing up one of her daughters to make speeches at public meetings on these and kindred subjects, and I had the mortification not long ago of attending a drawing-room meeting where the ludicrous spectacle was presented of a child still in her teens, addressing a company of people, composed for the greater part of men and women old enough to be her mothers and fathers, while the silly mother looked on with smiling approval. I felt heartily sorry for this poor young girl who was being thus victimised in order to gratify the foolish vanity of her mother. The Suffragist movement was originally initiated by a small company of "females of repellent aspect remotely connected with education." It spread rapidly among the elderly, the plain, and the disappointed of our sex, but it attracted no particular attention, and failed to make any impression on the general mass of public opinion. Whereupon the elderly, the plain, and the disappointed took counsel together and decided that in the interests of their sacred cause, it was necessary to invite the co-operation of the young, the attractive, and the hopeful. By insidiously flattering these charming young ladies, by pointing out to them that their intellectual abilities were no less remarkable than their good looks, they succeeded in entrapping them into the movement. Such articles as "Israel, and Winston, and Molony," should open the eyes of these amiable and foolish young people.

TWO NOTES IN CHAUCER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is with some diffidence that I venture to propose interpretation of two passages in Chaucer different from any with which I am so far acquainted. The first passage occurs in the Prologue 263 : "That rounded as a belle out of the presse." Professor Skeat—to whom our obligations are so many and so great—in his Note on 263, gives "rounded, assumed a round form; presse, the mould in which a bell is cast." What is said of rounded may be very true; but I ask, Will it fit the context? does a bell assume a round form out of the mould? It takes a round form in the mould surely! Further, so far as I have been able to ascertain, there is no evidence that "presse" was ever used of a bell-mould. We know that press is used of a book-case (hence press-mark), of a bed that shuts up (a press-bed), and of a cupboard, and the last seems the sense required here. The semi-cope was of such good stuff that when it was taken from the press (i.e., cupboard) and worn it fell bell-wise round the figure. One is aware that the structure of the line is a little against this interpretation—one would prefer that “as a belle” should not be interposed where it is; on the other hand, we have to allow to some extent for the exigencies of rhyme, and there is the further fact that we get a good sense, and are sure of the word “presse.” We give it a meaning which it is known to have, whereas it appears to be unknown in the sense of bell-mould.

The second passage about the interpretation of which I have doubts is Prologue 526: “He maked him a spiced conscience.” Hitherto the interpretation has proceeded on the supposition that “conscience” must be taken in its usual modern sense—and so all the efforts of commentators have been applied to the interpretation of the word “spiced,” with the result, as it seems, of entirely altering the character of the Persoun from what Chaucer intended it to be. Chaucer says:

He wayted after no pompe and reverence,
He maked him a spiced conscience.

Now surely it is a curious twist to turn from the former of these two lines and interpret the latter of something entirely different, which is what the usual explanation does. If anything be true it must be this: that the Persoun had a most scrupulous conscience. It would seem, then, that the interpretation of “conscience” must be reconsidered. The word occurs three times in the Prologue, including the present instance, and in the other places where it occurs the word has no moral significance at all (v. lines 142, 150). Why should it have some here? The sense surely is this: the Persoun cared for no pomp nor special marks of respect, nor did it hurt him if people did not show him the reverence which was his due. In a word, he wasn’t “touchy.” “Conscience” in this passage has the same sense that it has in 150—“and al was conscience and tendre herte”—that is, it means “feelings.” When the word is interpreted as it usually is, the two lines which immediately succeed are absurd:

But Cristes lore, and his apostles twelve,
He taughte, and first he folwed it himselfe.

If “Cristes lore” doesn’t teach a scrupulous conscience, what does it teach? The Persoun taught Criste’s lore, and followed it himself. The whole character as given by Chaucer shows the Christlike disposition of the Persoun, and that character, though it would be most scrupulous on all questions of conscience, would not be exacting on points of behaviour.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE LASH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I ask space to make a few comments on Mr. Gladstone’s reply to the question put to him by Mr. Swift MacNeill regarding the flogging sentences passed at the late Cardiff Assizes? The refusal of the Home Secretary to consider any of the said sentences on account of the confidence which he felt in the learned Judge who pronounced them seems to afford a strong argument for assimilating the law of England on this subject to that of Scotland. The Act of 1863 (passed “in a fit of panic,” to quote Mr. Asquith’s words, and in opposition to the Home Secretary of that day), under which these sentences were awarded, makes flogging an optional addition to the penal servitude of imprisonment which is also authorised. The addition or non-addition of flogging was evidently meant to be a matter of judicial discretion, depending presumably on the circumstances of each outrage and the prisoner’s previous character. But such a judicial discretion has rarely been exercised by any English Judge, the sentence of flogging having been passed by some Judges indiscriminately in all or almost all cases in which it was legal, while other Judges never resorted to it at all. And we now learn from the Home Secretary himself that he does not consider the indiscriminate manner in which such sentences appear to have been passed (embracing cases both of aggravation and extenuation, and in which the offender had no previous conviction against him) as any ground for reconsidering the sentences. The intention of the Legislature having therefore failed, I venture to suggest a change in the law which will place all parts of the United Kingdom on the same footing as regards the irrevocable punishment which is inflicted in so capricious a manner under the existing practice.

PROOF-READING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Some time ago Mr. Andrew Lang took Shelley to task in your columns for his carelessness with regard to the reading of his proofs. “Shelley, in short,” said Mr. Lang, “like other people, was passing weary of his proof-sheets; did not read all of them; and had no revise, or did not read it if he had.”

Does Mr. Lang read all his proofs? If he does, then I am afraid that, like Homer, even Mr. Lang sometimes nods. In the old edition of his “Lays and Lyrics of Old France” Mr. Lang has a sonnet on the death of Mirandola, in introducing which he gives a quotation from Thomas More’s “Life of Piers, Earl of Mirandola.” In the recent “new edition” of the work there is the same reference to More’s work. But More’s “Life” was that of “Pius, Earl of Mirandola,” not “Piers,” as Mr. Lang prints it.

I recently came on another erratum of Mr. Lang’s. In the Border Edition of “The Fair Maid of Perth,” Vol. II., Mr. Lang says that Adamson’s “poems, ‘The Muses’ Threnodie,’ were not published till 1774.” This was only a reprint of the first edition, which appeared in 1638.

“KEATS’S SONNET TO A CAT”

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is stated in your number of May 16th, at p. 793, under the above heading, that the “Sonnet to Vauxhall,” beginning “The cold, transparent ham is on my fork,” was written by J. H. Reynolds. I believe this to be a bad and needless guess. Surely it was written by Thomas Hood. Else why was it included in “Hood’s Own,” 1861, Series 1, p. 265? Was it not his “own”?

WALTER W. SKEAT.

THE BLUECOAT HOSPITAL AT LIVERPOOL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I be permitted to draw your attention to the enclosed circular? A private attempt (since nothing public seems possible) is being made to rescue for Liverpool one of its most beautiful buildings. There is, unfortunately, little doubt that, if such an attempt does not succeed, these buildings will be demolished, or perhaps, at best, turned into a warehouse. A few years ago their site was actually bought by the promoters of a devilish contrivance to carry people from Manchester to Liverpool in fifteen minutes; the terminus was to have been on this spot. Fortunately the project fell through, and the buildings were safe for a time. However, it might appear again, or some other equally ignoble destruction might threaten it at any moment.

We venture, then, to ask you to mention the matter in THE ACADEMY, feeling sure that a favourable word in such a place would bring us encouragement and possibly help.

LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE.

May 20, 1908.

[The circular to which our correspondent refers relates to the proposed destruction of the Bluecoat Hospital at Liverpool. Needless to say we are at one with Mr. Abercrombie in his resentment of and disgust at such a proposal.—ED.]

“THE TOP WITH A BIG T”

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I read with much interest your note on the children’s play at Claridge’s, and I particularly admired the skill with which you were able to extract sound philosophy from a mere “society gathering.” There was one sentence in your note, however, which appeared to me to be very cryptic, and as I am accustomed to take THE ACADEMY very seriously I cannot believe that the sentence in question does not contain some kind of hidden meaning. In this sentence you refer to those “who are content to live their lives according to their best lights, without troubling their heads for one instant about whether ‘Society’ from the Top (with a big T) approves of them or not.” What is the meaning of the expression “from the Top (with a big T)”?

I have discussed the subject with several of my friends, and have been unable to find a solution. May I ask you to be kind enough to enlighten us?

ARTHUR CRUICKSHANK.

[The words referred to by our correspondent have, as he has surmised, a hidden meaning—not, perhaps, so very much hidden to people in a certain set of society. Unfortunately our respect for and loyalty to the institutions of this country will not allow us to explain that meaning publicly. Mr. Cruickshank is recommended to make constant and sedulous inquiries among the "upper suckles." He will probably find some one to enlighten him.—ED.]

A PLEASING INCIDENT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As a convinced Nonconformist, and therefore not generally an admirer of THE ACADEMY, may I heartily congratulate you upon the spirit of Christian charity which permeates the note on your last week's issue on the subject of Mr. R. J. Campbell? It will, I am sure, be gratifying to many readers who have been puzzled by what appears to them the violence of your denunciations against Nonconformists to read the explanation of your motives. It seems to me to be an explanation which should appeal to all reasonable men. And while I shall continue to disagree with your views, I shall extend to them the same wide charity as you have shown to Mr. R. J. Campbell.

JAMES BARBER.

FRENCH NOVELISTS OF TO-DAY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your notice of my book, "French Novelists of To-day," in THE ACADEMY of May 9th, occurs the sentence, "As for M. Edouard Rod, he is, or at least he was, a Belgian." The Swiss, not Belgian, origin of Monsieur is of vital importance in the appreciation of his work as a novelist. Will you therefore permit me to call your reviewer's attention to the statement in my essay that he was born at Nyon, on the Lake of Geneva?

WINIFRED STEPHENS.

SWIFT'S COBBLER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the last paragraph of your always interesting "Life and Letters" you recall the case of Swift's cobbler who, on hearing that there was a doubt the text of the Three Heavenly Witnesses, at once jumped to the conclusion that there was nothing to forbid his getting drunk and beating his wife. Is not this the theory on which is based that wretched brochure "When it was Dark," which bears on its cover the enthusiastic commendation of the Bishop of London? The little tale assumes that, if disbelief in the Resurrection of Christ became general, honour among men and chastity among women would at once disappear. Surely no falsier and fouler libel on human nature could be uttered. It is a matter of less consequence, but still perhaps worthy of notice, that the admiring prelate did not observe that the Greek inscription would not have taken in a fairly intelligent schoolboy. Of course the salutary influence of Christianity and the Church on society has been inestimable, but this is no reason why we should assume that if it were now removed man would at once become a beast.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

WHAT TO DO WITH OUR GIRLS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I think if the writer of the Note on the "What to do with Our Girls" Exhibition had realised that its success will benefit a fund for training poor girls of gentle birth in such ways as will enable them to earn a living, the tone of his remarks might have been modified. The Bishop of London gave his blessing not to a mere commercial undertaking, but to a branch of the work of a guild of girls, which he founded, having for its object "to help those less fortunate than themselves."

Sir Hubert Von Herkomer AND PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey to the Editor of "Public Opinion," says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir,—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper, PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which would be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged, and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly. From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is, after all, not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you, with all my heart, continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

A BOOK FOR THE THOUGHTFUL.

EDUCATION, PERSONALITY, AND CRIME

By ALBERT WILSON, M.D.

With about 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

The Author makes a new departure in suggesting that degeneracy forms as distinct a class as insanity. As a scientific basis he gives a full analysis of the brain of a degenerate who was a murderer. There are many micro-photographs to prove his case. If later observers support this view it will form quite a novel feature not only in pathology, but also in sociology and in the medico-legal aspect of crime.

Education, Responsibility, and Empire-building each occupy a chapter, while the subject of multiple personality and the sub-ego receives special attention. The Author details one case, already published, which he watched for thirteen years, and also a second case recently brought under his notice, besides enumerating several other cases from various sources, both at home and abroad.

The Author's remarks on crime and criminals will cause much discussion and controversy amongst the experts, his theories on "multiple personality" alone being startling yet convincing.

"The volume is one which should be of use to every sociologist who wishes to be conversant with the medical aspect of the problem."—Truth.

"People who are sick of the ephemeral fiction of the time may turn to Dr. Wilson and find refreshment combined with instruction."—Academy.

MACMILLAN and CO., Ltd., London.

Sisley's

LATEST BOOKS INCLUDE SEVERAL SUCCESSES.
OF WHICH THE MOST NOTABLE ARE:—

Redemption.

By RENÉ BAZIN,
Author of "The Nun," etc.

René Bazin belongs to the newer and healthier school of French novelists whose works are replacing the "fleshy" type of romance too long in vogue across the Channel. He is admittedly in the very front rank of French novelists of to-day, and Messrs. Sisley have pleasure in presenting the English version of one of his most famous works, "De Toute Son Ame," under the title of "Redemption." It is a story of rare beauty, and has been specially translated by Dr. A. S. Rappaport, author of "The Curse of the Romanoffs," etc., who contributes a scholarly introduction to the book.

Third Edition in the Press. 6s.

The Land of Dreams.

By FREDERICK GRAVES

The author makes his bow to the public in the rôle of novelist, though his literary work is well known in other directions. This first novel of his is a work of singular charm, and the publishers issue it with special confidence. It is probably the most perfect novel of pathos that has appeared since "Ships that Pass in the Night."

Second Edition. 6s.

One Life and the Next.

By Mrs. IRWIN SMART

Psychic phenomena and psychic enquiry being the great cult of the moment, this novel, which deals with problems of the occult in a clever way, is particularly appropriate. "One Life and the Next" fascinates by its mystic setting, and will be laid down with regret. It will evoke much discussion. 6s.

Nor all your Tears.

By Mrs. MAUD H. YARDLEY,
Author of "Sinless."

"Sinless" was Mrs. Yardley's first novel, and, incidentally, the first work of fiction issued by Messrs. Sisley. It was an instantaneous success. The talented author has now produced her second novel, "Nor all your Tears," and it is proving a worthy successor to "Sinless." THE BYSTANDER says: "Mrs. Yardley is to be complimented on so notable a step forward towards higher honours in the field of fiction. She shows increasing dramatic power, has a pleasing style and a grip of art of characterisation. 'Nor all your Tears' is in its second edition already." Second Edition. 6s.

The Education of Eve.

By CYRIL W. SILVERSTON.

This is a charmingly told story which will appeal with especial force to all music lovers. T.P.'s WEEKLY says: "It is an exceptionally sympathetic and faithful study."

Destinies.

By HENRY NORMANBY.

This collection of weird and unusual stories stamps the author as a worthy successor of Edgar Allan Poe. Mr. Normanby's work is well known to magazine readers, but this is the first time his remarkable stories have been collected in one volume. 6s.

Servitude.

By IRENE OSGOOD,
Author of "To a Nun Confess'd."

We need say little regarding this talented author's first great success—"To a Nun Confess'd." It has run through numberless editions, and is still selling. In "Servitude" Irene Osgood has written a noteworthy romance, the scene of which is laid in Algeria. Besides its rich word-painting and its clever character-drawing, there is in "Servitude" a network of historical drama and many vivid scenes glowing with passion. Ready shortly. 6s.

Every reader of THE ACADEMY should ask at the nearest Library or Bookshop for these fine examples of modern fiction. Also write to us to-day for a copy of "Beautiful Books," sent post-free.

LIFE AND LETTERS

ON page 830 we publish a curious letter from Mr. George Bernard Shaw, together with Lord Alfred Douglas's reply thereto. A further letter from Mr. Shaw has reached us, but as it is too late for insertion in the present issue we propose to deal with it next week. We are also holding over till next week a third article about the Royal Academy Exhibition.

The Bill for the prevention of youthful cigarette-smoking now under consideration is surely a violent instance of a very violent injustice. It has always been one of the first principles of our glorious Constitution that the governed are in reality their own governors, that laws made without the consent of those whom they affect are null and void, that taxation (and a fortiori) penal enactments must be authorised by representation. A large number of clear-sighted, devoted, and enthusiastic women have recently had the courage and the logic to protest against the manner in which these principles have been systematically and persistently violated so far as they are concerned; and it seems likely, from the Prime Minister's pronouncement of a week or so ago, that their devotion and their energy will soon meet with due reward. All good citizens will congratulate these excellent and patriotic ladies; and we also owe them our thanks for placing on a firmer basis than ever the great Unwritten Doctrine on which the Commonwealth is really founded: Summa pestilentia, summa lex. The phrase has been variously rendered, but its meaning probably is that those who are ready to make themselves the greatest nuisances have the best chance of having their proposals accepted. Miss Molony is the most acute constitutionalist of our day.

This is all very well so far as the Suffragists are concerned; but what is the position of the boy of fifteen whose cigarette is snatched from him? People say that cigarette-smoking is bad for boys. They may say so, but have they proved their statement? The Dutch are a sturdy folk, and one remembers having seen a sketch of a little Dutchman of seven or eight trotting off cheerfully to school with his books under his arm and a fat cigar in his mouth. Besides, even if it were true that smoking is bad for boys, that is not the question. Many women do many things which are bad for them. It is bad for women to shout themselves hoarse at political meetings, to place themselves in such positions as are likely to expose them to insult, rough treatment, foul language, and gaol. It was bad for women to wear corsets of such ferocity that their livers were occasionally cut in two; it is bad for them to eat chocolates between meals; it is bad for them to write indecent novels and to read rubbishy novels; but in none of these cases has it been proposed to invoke the law. There would be a pretty outcry if any woman seen entering Blank's or Dash's (the famous tea-rooms) were liable to search and arrest; and yet the munching of sweet, sickly pastry at 5 p.m. is probably a greater crime against the laws of health than the boy's occasional whiff of non-nicotinus herbage.

And, above all, there is the great constitutional question—that of representation, or, to put the matter in a popular form—Votes for Boys. The suffragist females have pointed out the hardships under which they labour; they object, they say, to be classed with Paupers, Criminals, Lunatics, and Aliens. Good; but why should an intelligent lad of fifteen to twenty be placed in this horrible category? The ladies who wish to be represented in the High Court of Parliament say that it is ridiculous for that drunken, worthless, ignorant old wretch Hodge the labourer to have a vote, while the Lady of the Manor, his employer, a woman of high education and fine intelligence, has none. The argument is a very strong one; but how about the case of Simpson Major? Simpson is eighteen; he is familiar with the best work in four (or perhaps five) literatures; he can write much better verse in three of these languages than his own Head Master; he has an excellent knowledge of ancient and modern history; he has been trained to habits of rule both in the House and in the Playing Fields. And he has no vote; while the fat (and excessively unintelligent) old woman who keeps the public-house in the slum is to be made an arbiter of his destinies! If it be said that Simpson is not a property-holder, it may be replied, firstly, that he is to all intents a property-holder, since he must naturally have a very great interest in his father's estates, which he is to inherit; and secondly and conclusively, that we have definitely abandoned the theory of Representation of Property in favour of the Representation of the People. The injustice to Simpson in refusing him a vote is manifest and enormous: let him buy a Bell, and use it.

It may be objected that a boy, being under tutors and governors, is not fit to exercise the suffrage. This is nonsense; the boy is no more under the control of his masters than is many a farm-labourer under the control of his masters, the squire, the farmer, the parson, the preacher. All such objections as this are met by the fact of the secrecy of the ballot. The Doctor might indulge in harangues, in veiled threats, in prophecies that if the Sixth did not vote for Mr. Balfour the games would go down into red ruin; he could do no more. And to be courageous, to apply the basic principles of democracy fearlessly and logically, is there not a good deal to be said in favour of the extension of the franchise to Large Retriever Dogs, Black Cats, and Racehorses? In intelligence, in decency, in heroism even, many of these animals have surpassed the average man, woman, and child. Is it fair that the Drunkard who falls into the water should have a vote, while the Dog who picks him out has none? And, further, a wasp's nest is a much more creditable and ornamental piece of building than many a meeting-house; why should the good architects be disfranchised, while the bad architects are voting all over the country? The only difficulty would be to take the votes of these new citizens; but this problem is surely not beyond the wit of man.

"I present herewith three illustrations of Mr. Thomas Hardy's house at Dorchester. One of them represents Mrs. Thomas Hardy's two white cats and the other Mrs. Hardy's Cats' Cemetery in her garden. Meanwhile I am glad to note the keen enthusiasm with which Mr. Hardy's great drama, 'The Dynasts,' is now being received. Journals, both English and American, who were cold to the earlier volumes have now grown ecstatic." Thus Mr. Clement Shorter in The Sphere. With the literary part of this note we have no business at the moment. As regards the other part of it, Mr. Shorter is evidently disposed to emulate Mr. Frohman. He "presents," you will note, three illustrations of Mr. Thomas Hardy's house at Dorchester. One of them, it is true, represents Mrs. Hardy's two white cats and the other Mrs. Hardy's Cats' Cemetery in her garden. Neither of them, therefore, is an illustration of Mr. Hardy's house at all. However, Mr. Shorter was probably in a hurry when he penned these lines. Meanwhile we take it that The Sphere will shortly be "presenting" illustrations of Mr. Swinburne's guinea-pigs, Mr. Lang's white mice, and Mr. Meredith's agile gibbon. We are not aware that these gentlemen maintain such pets, but if they do not they ought to, if it were only with a view to accommodating the complacent camera of Mr. Shorter. It is really distressing to find a man who professes to be seriously interested in letters indulging in this kind of frivolity. Mrs. Hardy's cats are of no more importance to literature than Mr. Shorter's hat-box, and Mr. Shorter is quite aware of the fact. He must endeavour to restrain his tendency to the Daily Mirror mind.

A firm of publishers at Watford promises new editions of the poetical works of a Mr. William Nathan Stedman. We must confess that we are utterly ignorant of this gentleman's lucubrations. For aught we know to the contrary they may be very fine indeed, and we promise ourselves a dip into them when the new editions appear. On the titles they sound promising. One of the "works," called "The Future of Great Britain," is described as an epic in seven cantos; while among the dramatic works we find "The Duke's Daughter, a tragedy"; "The Man in the Moon, a satirical allegory"; "King Saul, a tragedy"; "His Majesty the King, a comedy"; and last, but not by any means least, "King Edward the Seventh, a tragedy." Mr. Stedman is evidently a bold dramatist. "King Edward the Seventh, a tragedy," is quite too previous, not to say a trifle ungenerous. But we do not think that Mr. Stedman wishes anybody any harm, for we find that one of his poems, called "The First Easter," is "dedicated, as a mark of manly affection and esteem, to the Dearest Old Gentleman in England." Which shows that our author has a kind heart. Another poet sends us an "epic poem in ten cantos and twenty rhapsodies," which he calls "The Epic of London." On the title-page of his work he describes himself as "Rowbotham, the Modern Homer." Mr. Rowbotham is scarcely Homer, modern or otherwise. But there is something in his book, and we shall notice it more fully in a future issue.

We print in our Correspondence column a letter on the subject of Women's Suffrage from a Mr. E. W. Hendy. Mr. Hendy accepts the epithet which we applied last week to his like. He describes himself as "one of the loose-witted male supporters of the woman-suffragist." The description exactly fits him. Our reason for printing his letter, in spite of the impudence of its tone, is that it is a perfect example of the state of mind of the male suffragette. Our readers will observe that Mr. Hendy indulges himself in the "ancient and fish-like" device almost invariably adopted by the aggrieved correspondent—he refers to the "young men on your staff." Further on he alludes to "the young lions" of THE ACADEMY. We have before now referred to the astonishing fact that the word "young" should be so constantly applied by stupid people as a term of reproach. Even if the writer of the article which Mr. Hendy disapproves of had been young, that would not in itself be anything against the article. He happens to be a middle-aged, married man and the father of a family. But that is neither here nor there; the age of a writer is not of any consequence to any one except himself, and Mr. Hendy may take it from us that we have no boys writing on THE ACADEMY. We merely refer to the subject because the use of the term "young" as a word of reproach betrays at once to the practised eye the nature of the intellectual equipment of Mr. Hendy. He uses it because he thinks it is the thing that any one who writes a "scathing" letter to an editor always does. He thinks it is "the thing to do." In other words, he is a person whose opinion on any subject whatsoever is worth absolutely nothing at all. We shall not waste the time of our readers by attempting to give Mr. Hendy's letter a detailed reply. If he has any sense he will find the answer to most of it in the notes which precede this one and in the article entitled "Socialism and Suffragitis," which appears on p. 831 of our current issue.

We will point to only one of the many absurdities of Mr. Hendy's letter. He solemnly condemns our phrase, "the gallantry which forbids tearing Molonies limb from limb," thereby proving himself to be destitute of the smallest glimmering of sense of humour; and he goes on to the old, old balderdash about men who do not shrink from "sentencing delicately nurtured women to solitary confinement for six weeks as common criminals." What in the name of common sense has "delicate nurture" got to do with the matter? If a delicately nurtured woman commits a murder she is hung, and if she breaks the law in any other way it is not customary among Judges and juries to inquire into the nature of the food and drink which she habitually consumes before visiting her with the penalties which attach to that breach of the law. In the case of those Suffragettes who, after every indulgence had been at first shown them, were finally sent to prison, it is notorious that they wished to go to prison, and raised shrill screams of rage against those kind-hearted people who endeavoured to save them from the consequences of their own folly and childish obstinacy. By the way, are the Suffragettes as a class delicately nurtured? Our impression was that on their release from prison the etiquette was for their friends to "stand" them luncheon at Mr. Miles's Vegetarian Restaurant, where they partake of nut cutlets, celery steak, and similar luxuries. If this is what Mr. Hendy calls "delicate nurture," we are not surprised that he is conscientiously and proudly pleased to call himself a loose-witted person.

There is a feature in the French Section of the Anglo-French Exhibition at Olympia which should really be a lesson to Englishmen. This is the "Collectivité André Délieux." Here is an instance of genuine public-spiritedness. M. André Délieux is a former Deputy of the French Chamber, and, we believe, an important personage at Boulogne. Having ascertained that the French ceramic exhibit was likely to be on a small scale, owing to lack of funds, and quite unworthy of one of the most interesting departments of modern French art, he has arranged, at a cost to himself of £12,000, for an elaborate show of French pottery-ware of all descriptions. M. Frantz Jourdain is the President of this "Collectivité," while the Vice-President is Taxile Doat, and M. Délieux's achievement would be worthy of all praise if it were merely for the fact that he is thus instrumental in presenting Taxile Doat to the general English public. Taxile Doat is one of the greatest craftsmen that have ever lived. Incidentally, he is the only living artist who has a work exhibited at the British Museum. Mention this to the average Londoner and he will probably deny it, which shows how little people know of the British Museum. Taxile Doat is of the race of Benvenuto Cellini, and there has been no such ceramist in France, or in the world, since Palissy. Like Rodin, he worked for years at the National Porcelain Factory at Sèvres. He is a Latin to the backbone, and his work has the quality of a Petrarch sonnet.

CIRCE'S ISLAND

"The isle itself lying low." (Homer.)

Like a hand-sheltered flame, white-cragged and low,
 Calm in the floating light, and endlessly
 Encircled by the unvintageable sea
 Is Circe's hill sweet-smelling, where to and fro
 She moves by her great ageless web aglow
 With serpent-coloured tinctures. Among trees
 Poplars for toil, and red-stemmed cypresses
 By one hoof-dented pool for funerals grow.
 Uncooled by any fine-spun flake of cloud
 The island glows like metal, and though the loud
 Sea-mews and chattering sea-crows scream and cry
 Beside the falling tide, there stirs no word
 In all her daedal woods, no bubbling cry
 Of laughter from a timbrel-throated bird.

M. JOURDAIN.

CORPUS CHRISTI

Come, dear heart !
 The fields are white to harvest : come and see
 As in a glass the timeless mystery
 Of love, whereby we feed
 On God, our Bread indeed.
 Torn by the sickles, see Him share the smart
 Of traving creation ; maimed, despised,
 Yet by true lovers the more dearly prized
 Because for us He lays his beauty down—
 Last toll paid by Perfection for our loss !
 Trace on these fields the everlasting Cross,
 And o'er the stricken sheaves the Immortal Victim's crown.
 From far horizons came a Voice that said,
 "Lo ! from the hand of Death take thou thy daily bread !"
 Then I, awakening, saw
 A splendour burning in the heart of things :
 The flame of living love, which lights the law
 Of mystic death that dowers the mystic birth.
 I knew the patient passion of the earth,
 Maternal, everlasting, whence there springs
 The Bread of Angels and the life of man.
 Now in each blade
 I, blind no longer, see
 The glory of God's growth ; know it to be An earnest of the immemorial plan.
 Yea, I have understood
 How all things are one great oblation made :
 He on our altars ; we on the world's Rood.
 Even as this corn,
 Earth-born,
 We are snatched from the sod ;
 Reaped, ground to grist,
 Crushed and tormented in the mills of God,
 And offered at Life's hands, a living Eucharist !

REVIEWS

A FEAST OF GOOD THINGS

The Cradle of the Deep. By SIR FREDERICK TREVES, Bart.
 (Smith, Elder, 12s. net.)

NEVER in all our experience have we found it so hard a task to write a review of any book as of this one—an equivocal statement, perhaps, at first sight. But the reason is simplicity itself : to write one must cease reading, and not to be reading "The Cradle of the Deep" when it lies open upon the table seems a woeful waste of time. We have read it from cover to cover—we have re-read it, and even as we write we are itching to read it again. A purist might grumble at instances of strange English, a certain vagueness as to the meaning of "may" and "might," or an almost Homeric use of the constant epithet, repetition of whole phrases, and other evidences of rapid writing. But these go for nothing in the pure delight of reading a volume which is not a guide, though it tells us all that a tourist needs to know—not a history, though the figures of history flash through its pages, not phantom-like, but living human beings. In this book are the ripple of comedy, the solemn tramp of tragedy, and the mighty swing of epic all in one. It is fascinating, absorbing, astonishing.

What is the secret of this charm, this holding power ? Other men have seen and known and loved the Spanish Main and the Islands of the West—and have written thereof. For four hundred years they have been the source of wonders and villainies and strange tales of adventure. They have been the battleground of nations ; for centuries the reek of battle has been wafted among them ; murder and sudden death, the black flag and the yellow, have been borne on their breezes, and scarce a single island of them all but has played its part in the whirligig of change. The footprints of history are trodden deep in these lands. Great towns have been founded—and blotted out. Great men have come and gone, and have left great deeds behind them. Both sea and land hold mighty dead, and mighty memories.

All this we know, and surely there is no schoolboy with soul so dead that has not rejoiced in the names of Drake and Frobisher, and the rest—who has not felt secret aspirations to a career of piracy. Was it not only in 1904 that an expedition set out from Southampton to seek a pirate's treasure-hoard ? The glamour is there, and Sir Frederick Treves has realised it for us, by a very simple means—he lets the story tell itself.

He has acknowledged the supremacy of its fascination ; he has allowed that fascination to take hold upon his own mind until every scene in the story was a reality—till all the forgotten details had arisen once more and filled the picture down to its least-considered corner. He has allowed his imagination to run riot among the scenes and the characters of his story, till in reading one is captured by the impression that the account is one of an eye-witness—of some one who has found the spring of eternal youth that Ponce de Leon sought in vain, and who has fought with Drake, suffered with Raleigh, raided with Morgan ; who, in fact, "had been, and seen," and acted through the drama of all three hundred years without ever losing his sense of humour.

That is the charm of the book. The personal note is never obtrusive. The brilliant, imaginative pictures are often enough fenced about with tangled chevaux-de-frise of "may," and "might," and "perhaps." But you feel instinctively that it was so, and that, from the 'purple-faced "carpenter" with his mouth full of nails' to Jenkins's dog, there is not a jot of the whole story that is not gospel. The story of the annexation of Trinidad by Lord Dudley is as fine a bit of comedy as we have read for many a long day—the pity is that it is too long for quotation in extenso :

It must have been a picture to impress the "salvage" : the peer recumbent in the silent forest, with his stockinged feet projecting from under his cloak, with the family banner held over his head by a yawning ensign, while the guard stood around, their figures bulging at every point with blocks of iron pyrites.

The description of the famous pitch lake of Trinidad, while it explodes the lurid romancing of many other writers, of whom Kingsley was not the least, is embodied in one of the most vivid figures possible :

The sensation that walking upon this substance gave was no other than that of treading upon the flank of some immense beast, some Titanic mammoth lying prostrate in a swamp. The surface was black ; it was dry and minutely wrinkled like an elephant's skin ; it was blood-warm ; it was soft, and yielded to the tread precisely as one would suppose that an acre of solid flesh would yield. The general impression was heightened by certain surface creases where the hide seemed to be turned in as it is in the folds behind an elephant's ears.

Moreover, the descriptions of Nevis as "a Quakeress in the company of Spanish dancers" shows the lively turn of phrase which greets us on every page.

And if humour—would that we could find room for one-hundredth part of the merry tales and sayings which crowd upon one another—if humour plays its part, the red story of the buccaneers finds lurid exposition here. The death of Teach is a tale of terror, terrifically told :

There was no time to fumble with pistols now. So they fought with cutlasses. . . . They chased each other about the deck, stumbling across dead bodies, knocking down snarling men, who, clutched together, were fighting with knives. Ever through the mirk could be seen the buccaneer's grinning teeth and evil eyes ; ever above the hubbub and scuffling rose his murderous war-cry. Both were wounded, both breathless.

At last Maynard, in defending himself from a terrific blow, had his sword-blade broken off at the hilt. Now was the pirate's chance. He aimed a slash at Maynard. It fell short, and only hacked a few of his fingers off, for as the blow fell one of the sloop's men brought down his cutlass upon the back of the buccaneer's red neck, making a horrible wound, which might have been done by an executioner's axe. Teach turned upon him and cut him to the deck.

For the moment the current of the fight changed. The decks were very slippery from blood. Teach kicked off his shoes so as to get a better hold of the planks. Half-a dozen of the sloop's men were against him now. He stood with his back to the bulwarks, a scarcely human figure. Panting horribly, he roared like a maddened bull. His dripping cutlass still held those he called dogs at bay. He had received twenty-five wounds, five of which were from bullets. Blood was streaming down his hairy chest. Blood-clots hung from his fantastic beard in place of the bows of ribbon. The muscles of his neck having been cut through, his head fell forward hideously. . . .

This is fighting !

Another sort of horror is the horrible pathos of the lazaretto at Barbados, and to this the author does no less justice. One shudders as one reads. But the crowning passage in the whole book is, to our way of thinking, the description of desolate St. Pierre de Martinique, with its tragedy of "ti Marie"—a figure of the author's own creation, called into being by him to play out the tragedy of destruction ; and as Aladdin summoned the genie by the power of an old lamp, so this pathetic figure is called up before our eyes from—an enamelled iron candlestick, which the author found among the ruins ! We do not remember to have encountered ever before a like feat of imagination, nor one which so impressed us with a sense of poignant reality.

Fascinating, absorbing, astonishing !—thus only can we attempt to describe this book. In these days the West Indies are almost at our door. The busiest of us may at any time find himself able to make the swift journey thither in a short holiday. But we have not all such a wealth of imagination ; we do not all possess Sir Frederick Treves's "perspective glass" to see into the past withal. And even though we may be endowed with this wealth of imagination, it were little short of idiocy to undertake the journey without this book ; and though, again, we may never see these islands of romance—though we may never sail upon these pansy seas—we may see them here, and, meeting the writer half-way, we may witness in these pages the clash of empires and the strife of man and Nature, all in the quiet of our own homes. And lastly, let us say that of all the excellent photographs which illustrate the book—and they are not few—there is not one which fills a gap in the text. For too long we have been accustomed to picture-books with "letterpress" as an incidental accompaniment. This time the pictures are incidental. It is the book that matters.

PRIVATE PAPERS

Parerga. By CANON SHEEHAN. (Longmans, 7s. 6d. net.)

THERE appears to be a certain vogue for books of more or less desultory reflections and almost ostentatious avoidance of form and sequence. Native wood-notes wild are sounded from suspiciously urban corners, till sometimes we wonder whether there is not a little less Nature than—well, art—in this careful effusion. Mr. A. C. Benson is a master, or a victim, of this sort, and the author of the present volume is no unskilful craftsman of the same school.

For ourselves, we must confess that no recent work of the kind has afforded half the pure irradiation of delight that is flashed back from that singularly fine "familiar" book of the late Mr. Gissing's, "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft." That brief masterpiece, unaccountably neglected, is an almost perfect expression of a soul at rest and a mind at leisure. Wisely did the author decide that his reader should turn the last page with regret rather than with satiety. He saw well enough that a perfect work is necessarily a work that recognises limitations, and was better pleased to stir deeply than to cast widely.

Canon Sheehan's book has frequently reminded us of "Henry Ryecroft." He has adopted the same divisions, spring, summer, etc., but he has not constrained his soul to the same limitations. Had his book been half as long it would have been twice as good, provided, of course, he possesses the rare gift of patient and judicious elimination. There are many good things here, and the things that are not very good bear an apologetic appearance of having been dragged in, seeming almost to protest—"Really, it's not our fault ; we know we have no business here, but we were just lugged in willy-nilly. We feel our position very keenly. . . . Pray overlook us. It's all the showman's fault." So we are fain to pass by many pages of careful description—good enough, no doubt, in its way—and get to the more serious business of the book. It is doubly unfortunate that we should be reminded of Mr. Gissing's work, for that revealed a definite personality behind every thought, whereas "Parerga" bears evidence of no such unifying spirit. That is to say, Canon Sheehan's book lacks the personal charm which it is Mr. Gissing's chief and sufficient praise to share, though in lesser degree, with Lamb, De Quincey, and Montaigne.

These cavils uttered, then, we are happy to be able to say that we welcome the book. There is in it much to stimulate appreciation, to provoke debate, and to confirm disdain. We love a man who shares, and thereby confirms (as Carlyle said), our scorn as well as our love. Canon Sheehan has an admirable contempt of contemptible things. He does not scruple to denounce the licence of the day, and refers with hearty approval to the Jewish law forbidding persons under thirty years of age to read the Song of Solomon. He would have an Index for youths and maidens under thirty, and would promptly include Boccaccio, Montaigne, Rabelais, and Shakespeare. Further he writes :

There can be no greater proof of human insincerity and human inconsistency and human hypocrisy than to see such lavish and wholesale condemnation [is it so ?] poured out upon such writers as Flaubert, and Zola, and d'Annunzio, and Maupassant, whilst Chaucer and Shakespeare and Spenser are numbered amongst the classics.

Now we agree that there is a deplorable licence permitted to the intellectually immature and incompetent. But does Canon Sheehan seriously suppose that many young people will read Montaigne, Rabelais, or even Shakespeare for the sake of prurient pleasure, or that those reading them with a better purpose are likely to be contaminated by the incidental grossness? We ourselves, though we profoundly regret the current licence, would cheerfully contemplate the possibility of such contamination if fairly intelligent readers could only be induced to touch Shakespeare and Montaigne seriously; while as for Rabelais, the idea of youth on the hunt for indecency enduring what must needs appear the portentous dulness and perplexity of Gargantua and Pantagruel is (if our author will forgive us) almost grotesque. Why should they trouble, when X, Y, and Z, who are publishing novels all the year round, will give them, without the sad distraction of genius, the same indecency? And has it never occurred to Canon Sheehan that a prurient mind can gain more base satisfaction from the police-court and divorce-court cases, reported with such loving fidelity and fulness by half-a-dozen newspapers of "largest circulation"? We ourselves have ascribed the regrettable failure of the Tribune to the usual meagreness of its police reports.

Canon Sheehan, however, has an objection to the author of Hamlet based on another ground—indeed on a temperamental aversion—nay, more—racial:

I suppose it is again the Celtic temperament—dreamy, cloud-riding, spirituelle—that holds in aversion the strong, earthy, lusty English spirit, so fully embodied in Shakespeare.

He asks what it is more immediately that repels him in Shakespeare, and finds one valid reason why he cannot read him for pleasure is that he wrote for the stage, not for the closet. Another is found in the obscenity of the plays, which, he appears to think, forms Shakespeare's chief surety of immortality. More serious is his objection to the "exclusively human element" in the poet. He declares that "human nature in Shakespeare is not of the highest and holiest type," and asserts the absence of "abstractions," great principles, and heroic dealing with life's mysteries. He touches heedlessly that deadly explosive, the authorship of the plays, and finds no difficulty in imagining a Bacon or a Raleigh bringing to the theatre a manuscript composed (like Sir A. Helps's moral essays) in the intervals of business, and asking Shakespeare to introduce it in his name:

If the player (Shakespeare) were the author of the Shakespearian plays he had every motive to proclaim the fact.

This, we submit, is an entirely false contention. Had Shakespeare every motive to advertise his authorship? Suppose he lacked (living as he did before the twentieth century) our present general motive—the rank itch of notoriety! Suppose he simply didn't care whether the fact of his genius were "proclaimed" or not, by any mouth whosoever! To Canon Sheehan this seems impossible, as impossible as does the identification of the writer of Hamlet and the Sonnets, with the actor interested in the box-office and the purchase of houses. But to the Shakespeare we love to think of a Hamlet or Lear was no exhaustive outpouring; it was but the spray of a soul too great for such casual utterance—a soul magnificently incontinent—to which a play or a bargain in cattle were almost indifferent task-work. Hence the abundant carelessness, the perversity, found in almost every play, when to a smaller man the achievement of flawlessness were but a matter of consuming industry and egoism. Why should Shakespeare advertise and exploit himself? What should such a man do, who had communed with Iago and Desdemona, heard Ophelia's last words to herself, seen Cressida's falseness and Kent's loyalty, and watched the poor last fumbings of Lear, but go back to the homely earth, occupied with the blessed healing triviality of the day, until he should rejoin his kingdom of shadows? And again, may it not have been that his usual (though not invariable) silence concerning life's mysteries and the ways of Providence was caused by his overpowering sense of these mysteries, and that he simply refused—noblest perverseness imaginable!—to bring God in five acts to an "explanation" of Himself after the fashion of Mr. Shaw, refused to bring holiest of sacred things into the clamour of plays written, as Canon Sheehan asserts, for the stage?

We are sorry to have devoted so much of this review to mere dissent, and beg leave to assure the reader that, had the book been trivial or unworthy, we should have dismissed it "in few." We have dealt a little fully with the author's remarks on Shakespeare, which are at least frank and independent, if entirely wrong. But he has many pages of well-considered appreciation of Dante, Goethe, Carlyle, and Tennyson, to which the reader may confidently be recommended. Despite all criticism, it is a book that was well worth writing, and is decidedly worth reading.

THE APPRECIATION OF PARIS

Promenades dans Paris. By GEORGES CAIN. (E. Flammarion, 5f.)

Dumas' Paris. By FRANCIS MILTOUN. (Sisleys, Limited, 7s. 6d. net.)

THE people who have insisted in their different ways upon their affection for Paris are numerous—so numerous that with certain classes of Englishmen, including their women, it has become an involuntary and thoughtless method of speech to affirm their adoration of the French capital. Some of the people who do this are sincere, and even go further, and know why they are happy in Paris; some are happy in Paris without knowing why—which is better; and some, the majority, are not happy at all. But it has become an article of faith with these unfortunate last ones that in Paris they drink deep of the cup of pleasure, and they continue to proclaim this faith long after the overcharges at the large hotels, the overcrowding of the grand boulevard, and the overheating of the fashionable restaurants have combined to make them in truth regard their visits to Paris as a bore. Those who are happy in Paris do not want either of the elementary works here noticed to assist them in their appreciation—whether they go to Paris for pleasure of the highest or lowest form, they will not find therein anything to inform them. If they have archæological or literary vellâtes, they will know in all probability more than either book can tell them; and if they have no such propensities, neither book will interest them. But both may be recommended to the notice of that numerous class of visitors to Paris who seem to have no desires to satisfy which Paris can satisfy for them in a particularly successful manner; this being generally due to the limitations of their knowledge rather than to any default in what the city can provide. Those who go to Paris in May because they have been there before at the same date, who attend the Salon so as to compare the exhibition with the exhibition of the Royal Academy, who drop with fatigue in the attempt to inspect all the Italian pictures in the Louvre in one morning, who plod up and down the Boulevard des Capucines "seeing life," who squash into Colombin's to drink bad tea (it is bad tea), and who order nine courses for dinner at Voisin's in the belief that in this way they will capture the respect of the head-waiter (a belief which they feel in their hearts is an unstable one), and who ultimately find that they are not gay—it is to these persons we recommend whichever of the two books they prefer. We write in no spirit of superiority concerning this large crowd, with so many of whom we have travelled from Victoria to the Gare du Nord, and have abode in the unsatisfactory caravansaries of the Rue de Rivoli and its vicinity. They show their excellent sense in being wearied of the routine which they set themselves to carry out, but no other is possible to them if they are to maintain what they consider their self-respect. Within the circle indicated they are at home. They know their way, they know approximately what everything will cost them, and they know that such Frenchmen as they come across will understand them; they are not humiliated by having to show ignorance or surprise, and they sacrifice their aspirations towards a more interesting holiday to the preservation of this curious ideal of dignity. If any one laughs at them it will be behind their backs, and the security from overt ridicule they elevate in their conversation into happiness, vowing that there is no city like Paris. Nevertheless, they want to do more than it lies on the surface to do, while the formal plans of the tourist's guides do not appeal to them. They want to see some things for themselves.

M. Georges Cain, and to a lesser degree Mr. Francis Miltoun, have a message for those who want a few objects for spending a holiday in Paris. These books tell of a way in which totally new interests may be taken in Paris by persons who do not and cannot know Paris as a native or a lengthy sojourner may know her. They show how it is not necessary to be either deeply read, or highly instructed, or very French to extract from a comparatively limited acquaintance with the city a great deal of enjoyment unhampered by the attentions of a guide, and giving only so much time to their investigations as they wish to spare from other things. M. Georges Cain is the director of the Musée Carnavalet, the Historical Museum of the Municipality of Paris, and his interesting little book consists of a series of plans for walking about Paris in such a way that places possessing some well-known historical connection may be viewed en route. He is the least pedantic of instructors. There is hardly a word about architectural orders in his easily-written chapters. Historical tradition is handed on as tradition; thrice-told tales are much ignored, and pictures of very familiar scenes are omitted from a somewhat profuse collection of pretty or amusing illustrations. Not to be fatiguing has been the author's evident object, and he is apparently as anxious about our muscles as about our wits, for his promenades, taking each chapter as a scheme for one walk, can rarely exceed a mile and a half in length; that mile and a half may generally be counted as starting from some such central spot as the Tour de St. Jacques, and to see the objects to which he calls attention during the walk might easily occupy less than an hour. In this leisurely manner he introduces us to many of the most interesting buildings in Paris. Some claim notice because of their age, and the reminder which their structure gives us of the bloody times when Burgundians or Lorrainers fought openly with the Crown for supremacy. Some attract by their connection with tremendous dramas—the Hôtel de Sens, for example, at the corner of the Rue des Jardins, where la Reine Margot, divorced from Henry IV., witnessed the assassination of her lover on the pavement below her window; and the Hôtel d'Aubray, 12 Rue Charles V., where Madame de Brinvilliers planned her terrific crimes. Some have a literary association; they are the old houses of great writers—the places where Rabelais died, where Racine lived, and where Balzac and Dumas worked—or they are the scenes of famous episodes in fiction. And many of them appeal to the eye by their beauty. "Il y a, paraît-il, encore d'étonnants hôtels dans le Marais?" says the fashionable lady to the author in the beginning of the book, regretting at the same time that "les maudites couturières, et les modistes, et Ritz, et Rumpel . . . et mon jour" must prevent her from ever seeing these forgotten mansions. M. Cain shows us how near the Marais is, now that the Métropolitain has a station at St. Paul, and of all the little tours which he plans for his readers none will better repay performance than that which begins with a plunge behind the church of St. Gervais. In a moment, and with all the traffic of the Rue de Rivoli and the Rue St. Antoine roaring and humming above us, we are in an almost deserted quarter, where a struggling class fight quietly with poverty in streets still named after the precincts of a royal residence, and still preserving the gateways, the façades, and sometimes the entire structures of sixteenth and seventeenth century palaces. We strongly advise the English visitor who finds time hanging a little heavily on his hands to go out walking with M. Cain. And if he relishes what he sees, other books will help him to see more, for M. Cain's omissions are sometimes a little arbitrary. Why, for example, when he has brought us within a few yards of them upon one of his promenades, does he not insist upon our looking at the Hôtel Fieubet, at the south-east corner of the Rue du Petit-Musc, or, most charming of all, the Hôtel de Beauvais, in the Rue François Miron?

Mr. Francis Miltoun is not, like M. Cain, a scholar, an archæologist, or an authority on his subject; and as a literary performance his book is a very small affair. Its scope is ill-defined; much of its contents can only be described as stale; his writing, often pretentious and involved, is sometimes ungrammatical. How would he parse his second sentence?

Of the actual life of the people in the city of light and learning, from the times of Napoleon onward, one has to go to the fountain-head of written records, the acknowledged master-works in the language of the country itself, the reports and annuaires of various sociétés, commissions, and what not, and collect therefrom such information as he finds may suit his purpose.

And his proofs are carelessly corrected—for such misprints as "Sordonne," "St. Beauve," and "Theodore de Bauville" ought not to occur. The Paris of Dumas can mean either the Paris of Dumas's time—that is, Paris from the year 1822, when he arrived there, till the year 1870, when he died—or it can mean the Paris of his novels. Mr. Miltoun is sometimes writing with one scope in his mind's eye and sometimes with the other, and his jumbling methods of presentation do not always make clear what he would be at. He owns about the middle of the book that it is impossible to form a precise topographical itinerary of the scenes of Dumas's romances. This is true, but when he is treating the Paris of the novelist and not the Paris of the resident he does so without any plan whatever. There seems no reason why one quotation should be made more than another, why one historical reference should be given more than another, or why one illustration should be included more than another; and in what conceivable way Dumas's descriptions of the forest region around Crépy, of Calais, of Trouville, of Belle-Île, of Blois, and so on, can be held part of Dumas's Paris he does not trouble to explain. And yet we recommend the book to certain readers, because a perusal of it may stimulate them to walk the streets of Paris more intelligently, and so derive more genuine enjoyment from a stay in Paris than they now obtain; while the sale of English translations of Dumas's novels may be increased by the author's ardent admiration of the great romancer; and, next to an increase of their sale in the original language, this is as fine a thing in the cause of gaiety as can well happen. No one should read Mr. Miltoun's book if he knows Paris and Dumas, for its defaults will irritate him; but in a man who knows neither it may undoubtedly rouse a desire to these ends and furnish an object for many agreeable little peregrinations. It must be put to Mr. Miltoun's credit that his idea of seeing Paris from the point of view of a famous novelist is a happy one, as Paris is the scene of more splendid and readable novels than any other city. But Dumas was not altogether a good novelist to select—or we may regard him as too good—in that his supply of material is too profuse for assimilation. The history of France has been enacted in Paris, and Dumas's novels are written round the history of France from 1570 to 1790. To picture the Louvre, for example, as Dumas's kings and queens, heroes and heroines saw it is to picture it almost from the time when the old fortress of Philip Augustus was demolished by Francis I., through all the constructions and additions planned by Catherine de Medicis, Henry IV., Richelieu, and Louis XIV. That magnificent publication, "Paris à Travers les Ages" requires many large pages of print, pictures, and maps to explain the evolution of the Louvre, and no one can make us really understand what sort of a building Chicot, D'Artagnan, D'Harmental, and Maison-Rouge saw in their several generations without going over much of the same ground, a thing which it is impossible to do in any work written to serve as a handbook to the stroller. Mr. Miltoun saw the impossibility of living up to his title, but has not met the difficulty by putting any limitations upon himself. If he had chosen Victor Hugo or Balzac as the inspiration of his work he would have been essaying a more possible task; if he had restricted his efforts in accordance with some comprehensible design he would have made a more useful book under the guise of Dumas's Paris.

The fascinations of Paris are so varied and obvious that the fact of any one of ordinary capacity for enjoyment, in whatever direction his bent may be, being bored there is rather distressing. That there are many such people is due to an exaggerated idea of what ought to be seen and known before Paris can be said to have revealed herself. We have all heard reports of the enormities which occur in the early morning in the cafés of Montmartre, a name which Mr. Francis Miltoun tells us means Mount of Martyrs! Many people feel that it would be dangerous to venture into such places, and trusting implicitly to stories which are put into circulation by those who also have never been there, go to bed hours before they want to, thereby missing some unrefined amusement. In a similar way the idea is prevalent that to become familiar with old Paris, to understand the city well enough to prowl about its purlieus with an acquisitive mind, implies idiomatic knowledge of French, personal courage, and acquaintance with the literature, pictorial and scientific, of the subject. Of course it is not possible to be an archæologist without archæology, but it is in Paris quite easy to see the best examples of what the historian and antiquarian have to show us. And no better scheme for becoming familiar with these things can be recommended than the one Mr. Miltoun has suggested, though we are unable honestly to admire his book. Such romances as "Nôtre Dame" and "Le Petit Parisien," or any group of Dumas's stories should be chosen and the scenes walked over. Much will be found missing, and the usual books of reference will supply the gaps, while what is there will repay the trouble taken, if only because that trouble need be so little. The Rue Visconti and the Cour de Rouen are but fifty paces from the Boulevard St. Germain, and the Rue Venise, the Rue Vieille du Temple, the Rue des Francs Bourgeois, and the Place des Vosges are all, like the Marais, within a few yards of the Rue de Rivoli. Many visitors to Paris would feel the time well occupied if they spent an occasional hour in the older parts of Paris with the definite desire to inspect some of her beauties. They would find their pleasure in their tea or their apéritif increased by such rambling.

SPORT AND WAR

Fox-hunting Recollections. By SIR REGINALD GRAHAM. (Eveleigh Nash, 10s. net.)

The Condition of Hunters. By NIMROD. Edited by FRANK TOWNEND BARTON. (John Lane, 10s. net.)

The Story of the Guides. By COLONEL G. J. YOUNGHUSBAND. (Macmillan and Co., Ltd., 7s. 6d. net.)

THERE is always a difficulty in treating books upon Sport fairly, because the sportsman is seldom literary, and the man who drives a pen looks as impatiently upon the amateur who handles that unruly beast as does the knight of pigskin when he sees the penman mounted upon a noble but unappreciative Bucephalus. Here is Sir Reginald Graham, devoid of style almost to the point of indecency, cramming his pages with bald chronicles of old dog-foxes, found in the plantation, harried over the Snooksby Estate, and killed at Muffington Manour by the Fast Ladies, as he named his bitch pack. He drags in all the names of his fellow-riders, breakfast hosts, superlative dogs, and bony steeds; but, except a man have friends amongst these, the awkward pages will not bring them to him. And yet the enthusiasm, which cannot lure the meanest of the Muses to aid the writer's desolation, has something taking about it. One is inclined to believe the author to be a good M.F.H. just because Pegasus will have none of him, and he sighs impotently that paper cannot give the view Hulloas, which ring in his ears so delightfully. Except for a few anecdotes of hounds, who retrieve the brush and carry it to their masters, of Charles Kingsley, Carlyle's snappishness, and Mr. Henry Chaplin chasing, possibly, the ghost of Cobden, there is no interesting matter in the book. Yet is not fox-hunting itself, however feebly described, a subject of thrilling and entrancing interest? The love and passion of generations of observant, keen-facultied men has passed into it. The power, nerve, justice, swiftness, decision, determination, and good temper of the race has depended upon it, and even now, to some extent, does depend upon it, and that means, in brief, that most of English fame and power was graduated at that illiterate college. Yet Nimrod could write as well as ride, and few intelligent sons of Nimrod will be without his great opus now they can get it in a more perfect form. He hates trotting. It is bad for horses and dangerous. He disbelieves in summer grass, would arrange a short coat by management, and eschew clipping. He has wisdom in feed and fasting, and he is so positive about hot stables being good for condition that even his editor cries cave. The powers of mind and of pen carry the author easily through to the last thorough-pin and windfall, when his editor takes up the tale with split infinitive and veterinary soundness, and we end with Turner, filis, and his old illustrations pitifully reproduced, thus leaving the science of hunters with respect and regret. After all, are not Colonel Younghusband and all that he represents the result of this effort and study? The Guides and their story make up a book which sets even the pulses of the sedentary tapping. Besides, Colonel Younghusband can tell the story, not perfectly, perhaps, but well. The Guides were the up-to-date, reformed, reasoned corps. Sir Henry Lawrence tried sense in soldiering, and the usual result followed. He made history. There is no art so conservatively historical as the military, and none which is so often ruined by too much emphasis laid upon that fact. The scientific reformer is always the man to get the decorations, and the anti-reformer and the mere rigid historian share the regrets between them. Lumsden comes in for his meed in this book, and if chapter v. alone were written the book would be worth its cost, for the story of Dilawur Khan is a fine tale in itself.

Colonel Younghusband has abatements too. He should not write of "Roberts," even though he writes compliment. Living people are not thus shortened outside the limits of the mess. And where is Hodson of Hodson's Horse? He is, when all is said, the best name the Guides have to speak. He is the man who, with one lieutenant and a hundred Sepoys, took the Princes of Delhi from Humayoon Taj, from the midst of six thousand armed followers. He is barely mentioned, and in only three affairs does the chronicler allude to that splendid and knightly officer. It is true he calls him the far-famed leader of Light Horse and so on, but there have been persistent attempts made to vilify a man whose reforms, sense, valour and success set all the envious blockheads mad with chagrin, and whose prowess made many big people feel small. Consequently a man of the Guides might have been a little more generous towards the man of the Guides, if only in despite of detractors. When this little grumbling is said the reviewer would be censorious indeed who did not find the story of the Guides a delectable one, and its moral is that good sport is the nurse of just, wise, and righteous war. Since we cannot have the officers we want and are proud to produce without the whoops and clatter of sport, then let us aim at being a nation of foxhunters—from the Prime Minister Tally-ho-ing his Suffragettes to the heir of the cabbage-barrow mounted on his father's moke. And good hunting to them all!

"CAN YOU NOT MANAGE?"

IN last week's issue of THE ACADEMY we had occasion to notice a play of Mr. George Bernard Shaw entitled Getting Married. Our article was not flattering to Mr. Shaw's play, the reason being that Getting Married appeared to us to be an undesirable work. Mr. Shaw appears to have read the article, and on Monday morning we received from him by special messenger the following extraordinary epistle:

Dear Lord Alfred Douglas,—

Who on earth have you been handing over your dramatic criticism to? Your man, who must have been frightfully drunk, has achieved the following startling libel:

The waiter, disguised as a butler, told us, among other things, that his mother was very fond of men and was in the habit of bringing them home at night.

For that statement, which I need hardly say is pure invention, you will have Vedrenne and Barker, Frederick Harrison, and Holman Clark (the actor concerned) demanding damages from "The Academy" at the rate of about £2,500 apiece.

Can you not manage to volunteer in your next issue a withdrawal of the article? As a rule, I do not like asking an editor to throw his contributor over; but when the contributor throws over the editor so outrageously as in this case, I do not see what is to be done.

I feel rather in a difficulty about it, because I do not know who the writer is; and am afraid that he may turn out to be some unfortunate friend of mine. Anyhow, since ——— let ——— in for £—— damages and endless costs by a wild attack on ———, there has been nothing quite so reckless as this article.

You will see that the writer gives himself away hopelessly at the beginning by saying that he left the house at the end of twenty-five minutes. Later on he describes a scene which he did not wait for, and contrives to get both a libel and a flat mis-statement of fact into his reference. However, it is really this howler about the man's mother which makes the article entirely indefensible. As you may not have seen the play, I should explain that what actually does happen is that the greengrocer who is in charge of the wedding breakfast describes certain escapades of his sister-in-law, who ran away from home several times. He adds that the men "brought her home the same night, and no harm done." It is conceivable that a critic, if very drunk, might possibly have muddled this honestly in the way your man has done; but that does not make it any more defensible; and you can see how the gross coarseness of the blunder would affect a jury if the case came into Court.

I suggest that the best and friendliest thing to do is to state in your next issue that since the sentence above quoted is a misdescription, you feel bound to withdraw the whole article unreservedly. If you think well of this, or some equivalent course, you might let me have a line so that I may try and smooth matters.

Yours faithfully,

G. BERNARD SHAW.

It is with extreme regret that we print the foregoing, but we do so in the interests of what we conceive to be fair play in matters of criticism. Mr. Shaw is a dramatic author who has lately received a very large share of attention and praise. We ourselves have more than once expressed our high opinion of his powers and of some of his work. Yet the moment it becomes necessary to blame him he falls to charging our critic with drunkenness, and flings to the winds that sense of humour which has been the making of him. It was competent in Mr. Shaw to have "replied" to our criticism in two ways. He could have discussed his own view of the play in the columns of this or another suitable journal. Or he could have sent us a plain intimation that he considered our criticism a libel upon himself, and that he would take steps accordingly. Mr. Shaw has seen fit to take an oblique course in the matter. He, poor man, is not libelled at all; but he is afraid that Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker, Mr. Frederick Harrison, and Mr. Holman Clark—by the way, he does not mention the Haymarket call-boy—have been libelled, and may demand damages from THE ACADEMY at the rate of about £2,500 apiece. And, naturally, Mr. Shaw does not wish to see THE ACADEMY disbursing such handsome sums of money, even to his friends. So that, entirely in the interests of truth, righteousness, and peace, Mr. Shaw exclaims, "Can you not manage to volunteer [the italic is Mr. Shaw's] in your next issue a withdrawal of the article?"

THE ACADEMY can manage nothing of the kind. The vision of the enormous treasury which awaits Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker, Mr. Frederick Harrison, and Mr. Holman Clark when they demand their £2,500 apiece is devoid of terrors for us, and in any case we have yet to learn the smooth and oily art of volunteering under threat.

In reply to Mr. Bernard Shaw's letter, the Editor of THE ACADEMY has written to him in the appended terms:

Dear Mr. Bernard Shaw,—

I received your letter this morning with the greatest surprise. I strongly resent the accusation of being drunk which you bring against the writer of the article. It seems to me that it is characteristic of the feminine quality of your intellect, to which reference was made in the article, to make such an outrageous suggestion. As a matter of fact I wrote the article myself. If I misheard any particular sentence in the dialogue the error was, on your own showing, a very trifling one, and it is ludicrous to suggest that it is libellous. That part of the play which I heard simply teems with indecencies, and I should be delighted to go into the witness-box in any court and say so. You must be perfectly aware that I am not actuated by any malice towards you. You have had nothing but praise from "The Academy" during the whole time that I have edited it, and now on the first occasion when I find it compatible with my duty as a critic to find fault with you, you resort to the rather mean expedient of asking me to throw over a supposed contributor. I confess that I am surprised that a man of your intellectual attainments should exhibit such pettiness. You are at perfect liberty to take what action you choose in the matter. My solicitors are Messrs. Arthur Newton and Co., 23, Great Marlborough Street.

Yours faithfully,

ALFRED DOUGLAS.

From Mr. Shaw's attitude in the matter we may learn two things—namely, that persons who venture to offer adverse criticisms at the "Shavian" shrine are necessarily sufferers from alcoholic excess, and that Mr. Shaw the Socialist has such a profound contempt for the conventions that when he is admonished he must needs run squeaking in the direction of the law-courts. We have a pleasant picture of him holding on to the coat-tails of Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker and Mr. Holman Clark, and begging them for the love he bears THE ACADEMY not to demand their £2,500 apiece, but rather to allow us to manage to volunteer a withdrawal of the article. The Superman grins at us here with a vengeance.

SOCIALISM AND SUFFRAGITIS

LAST Sunday we had the pleasure of attending (for about ten minutes) a Suffragist meeting in one of our London parks. A middle-aged lady, with little or no neck, a raucous voice, and a face which presented all the appearance of having been recently sat upon, harangued a small crowd from a large van, while two other ladies of gaunt and melancholy aspect sat behind her and seemed to give promise of more talk to follow. The small crowd listened with more or less "respectful attention" to the not very inspiring address. At a given moment a gentleman among the audience interjected the word "Rubbish!" in a loud, firm voice, whereupon the lady in the van replied with sparkling readiness, "Here is a gentleman who is telling us his own name; I am glad to make your acquaintance, Mr. Rubbish." After hearing this brilliant repartee we were mentally reminded that the halfpenny papers had informed us that the Suffragettes had acquired the art of "holding their own at a public meeting," and we were duly impressed. Shortly afterwards another gentleman's feelings got the better of him and found expression. He ejaculated the word "Rot!" The lady with the bull-neck did not hesitate for a moment, turning sharply round in the direction of the voice, she said: "Here is another gentleman who is telling us his name, I am glad to make your acquaintance, Mr. Rot," or words to that effect. At this point in the proceedings we left murmuring to ourselves the words of a certain downtrodden, unemancipated woman who would undoubtedly have incurred the scorn and contempt of the "advanced" and enlightened females in the "Van of Progress":

Woman was made for man's delight;
Charm, O woman, be not afraid!
His shadow by day, his moon by night,
Woman was made.
Her strength with weakness is overlaid;
Meek compliances veil her might;
Him she stays, by whom she is stayed.
World-wide champion of truth and right,
Hope in gloom and in danger aid,
Tender and faithful, ruddy and white,
Woman was made.

We felt distressed to think that poor, dull, enslaved, unenlightened Christina Rossetti had not lived long enough to benefit by the modern discoveries as to the true mission of women in this rapidly improving world of ours.

No doubt we shall be reminded that kind hearts may beat beneath bull-necks and simple faith flourish behind raucous voices. We readily admit it; and, meditating on these things, we have been led to the conclusion that the Suffragette is a natural phenomenon that must not be brushed contemptuously aside. She has a meaning, and there must be a reason for her existence. Even the Suffragette is a woman; and, being a woman, whether she knows it or not she is engaged in the process of charming some one. In the face of universal disgust and reprobation from man she simply could not exist. It is men, therefore, who are responsible for the Suffragette. We have the sort of women we deserve. We deserve the Suffragette, and we have got her. Let us endeavour to be worthy of something better and we may lose her again; but it all depends on man. Suffragitis, the disease, is intimately connected with Socialism. Looked at carefully, they seem to be fundamentally the same. In both cases there is a violent and unreasoning revolt against the established order of things—the order of Nature, the order of God. Socialists in England have exhausted every species of argument; word by word, fallacy by fallacy, false conclusion by false conclusion, they have been answered and routed. There is not an argument they have advanced which has not been shown many times to be fallacious, not a conclusion they have come to which has not been, over and over again, proved to be erroneous. Doggedly and patiently they have been followed and answered on every point. But the Socialist, like the woman, is not guided by reason. He cares nothing for reason; he has a blind instinct that he is right, and to attain his ends he will as readily deceive himself as he will deceive others. He has, in short, a feminine intellect. We pointed it out last week in the case of Mr. Bernard Shaw, and Mr. Shaw undoubtedly has more brains than any of the other Socialists in this country. It is the Socialists then who are responsible for the Suffragettes, just as they are responsible for a certain class of literature of which Mr. Shaw's plays are the highest type and Mr. Chesterton's essays a very much lower one. We have been assured by a Socialist friend of ours that Mr. Chesterton is a great writer, and that a recent review in THE ACADEMY did not do him justice, and we were recommended to read a book by him called "Heretics." We picked it up and opened it by chance at a chapter called "Smart Novelists and the Smart Set." We have rarely read anything more patently foolish. It is foolish because it has obviously been written with a view to "charming" Socialists. The object of the chapter is to flatter the lower classes (we use the words in a perfectly inoffensive sense) by informing them that it is from the masses that all good things have come, and that gentlemen are not worth considering. Now if it be, as it undoubtedly is, foolish and snobbish for a man of birth to write or say that no good thing can come out of a man who is not of gentle birth, surely it is equally foolish and snobbish for a man of no birth to say that no good thing can come out of a gentleman. We shall not be at the pains of confuting Mr. Chesterton's ridiculous nonsense by quoting the names of all the great men who have been gentlemen. We might fill a dozen columns of this paper with poets and men of letters alone. He has spared us the trouble. In this very chapter in which he makes the foolish and snobbish attempt to belittle English gentlemen he names, with praiseworthy enthusiasm, Grenville, Raleigh, Essex, Philip Sydney, and Nelson. What were these men if they were not English gentlemen? We shall content ourselves with pointing out the positive and undeniable fact that by far the great majority of great English poets have been gentlemen by birth, and proud of it. The Socialists may not be "charmed" by hearing this home truth, but as we don't write to charm Socialists that will not trouble us. Mr. Chesterton concludes this monumentally silly chapter by a reference to Dickens. The last sentence runs as follows:

Dickens, the greatest of whose glories was that he could not describe a gentleman.

It would be just as sensible to say of a great pianist: He played Chopin and Beethoven superbly, he was unequalled as a performer of Brahms and Mendelssohn, but the greatest of his glories was that he was utterly unable to do anything at all with Bach. To such follies and insanities have Socialists brought us; they have called forth the "literature" of Mr. Chesterton, and they have created the Suffragette. To get rid of these things we must get rid of the Socialists. They are blighting and spoiling all that is fine and noble and lovely in this country. Their influence is everywhere, even the Church is infected with it. Some of those who possess the finest intellects and lead the saintliest lives among our clergy have been duped into acquiescence with and approval of a party one of whose avowed ends is the utter destruction of Christianity. It is a thing to make angels weep.

A. D.

BROAD AND "LONG"

WE have heard of a small boy who said that Edison invented the pornograph, and we have heard of a dignitary of the Church who said that a certain drunken squire's stories were as broad as they were long. Before us at the moment we have two volumes, both of them novels, and both of them published by Mr. John Long. We do not wish to suggest that Mr. John Long invented the pornograph, but we have reason for pointing out that the stories published by Mr. Long are beginning to be very broad indeed. The question as to how far a novelist in his pursuit of Art may go, and how far a publisher in his pursuit of money may go, is an old one. And, like most old questions, it is capable of being answered in quite a number of different ways. There are persons who will tell us that Art has nothing to do with morals and morals nothing to do with Art. On the other hand, there are persons who tell us, and tell us very wisely, that Art in its essence is that which makes for morality and that which is decent and of good report. For our own part we shall go the length of asserting that if Art is a thing apart from morality, it ought most certainly to be a thing apart from immorality; and that being so, it is our painful duty to tax Mr. John Long with the publication of undesirable books. In dealing with these difficult points, it has hitherto been customary to throw the chief blame upon the author or literary principal in an unpleasant venture. You put your author up and you admonish him pretty straightly. Meanwhile the publisher or commercial principal in the venture sat at home and rubbed his knuckles with glee, for that the money was rolling in. We have come to the conclusion, for reasons which we shall not now enlarge upon, that the publisher's turn has come round. Mr. Long publishes and sends to us in one week "Five Nights," by Victoria Cross, and "Keepers of the House," by Cosmo Hamilton. We do not wish exactly to put Mr. Cosmo Hamilton on the same bad eminence as Miss Victoria Cross. And Mr. Hamilton must not take what we may have to say about Miss Cross as personal to himself. But we assume that Mr. John Long publishes Mr. Hamilton's novel, that is to say, for precisely the same reason as he publishes the work of Miss Cross. Now let us look at this "Five Nights." From the point of view of the people who rush after Miss Cross's work it begins in the most chill and disappointing way:—

It was just striking three as I came up the companion-stairs on to the deck of the Collage City into the clear topaz light of a June morning in Alaska: light that had not failed through all the night, for in this far northern latitude the sun only just dips beneath the horizon at midnight for an hour, leaving all the earth and sky still bathed in limpid yellow light gently paling at that mystic time and glowing to its full glory again as the sun rises above the rim.

Our steamer had left the open sea and entered the Taku Inlet, and we were steaming very slowly up it, surrounded on every side by great glittering blocks of ice, flashing in the sunshine as they floated by on the buoyant blue water. How blue it was, the colouring of sea and sky! Both were so vividly blue, the note of each so deep, so intense, one seemed almost intoxicated with colour. I stepped to the vessel's side, then made my way forward and stood there; I, the lover of the East, dazzled by the beauty of the North! The marvellous picture before me was painted in but three colours—blue, gold, and white.

Our author proceeds in this cooling manner for many pages. You feel that she can see and that she can write with some skill, and we are pleased to give her credit accordingly. But after the first chapter—faugh! Miss Cross lets herself go, and there is probably not a single page which we could print in extenso in these columns. First in the name of Art, and then in the name of Love, Miss Cross deliberately overrides all the basic conventions with regard to the relationship between man and woman, and she does it in the most brazen, unblushing, and impudent manner. There can be no denying the cleverness of the thing, nor should we be disposed to deny to Miss Cross a considerable insight, a considerable knowledge, of human nature and of human passion. But we have no hesitation in pronouncing "Five Nights" to be a wicked and unregenerate book, and we say that Mr. John Long is exceedingly ill-advised in publishing it. We believe that if the police made a raid on Mr. Long's premises and confiscated such copies of this book as they might happen to find there they would be well within their function. Twenty years ago they would have done it, and, so far as we are aware, the law about these things has not been changed in those twenty years. The case of Mr. Cosmo Hamilton is happily not by any means such a bad one. Mr. Hamilton hangs the interest of his novel on an infinitely delicate question, albeit that the question would never arise among sane people. We believe that Mr. Hamilton could have written quite as good a novel, and "Keepers of the House" is a good novel, without the aid of his delicate interest. His method of solving the problem which he puts forward is the salesman's method. He has set forth his solution delicately, but he could have given us a more satisfactory and noble solution. In that case possibly Mr. John Long might not have set such store by the book, but it would have been a better book. Mr. Hamilton is further possessed of an unhappy knack of making his characters more or less recognisable. We do not say that this is improper, though it must be unpleasant for the persons concerned, some of whom are altogether innocent and well-meaning people who do not move in Mr. Hamilton's circle, and have never done him any harm. In the main, however, Mr. Hamilton is improving. He has a fuller sense of the capabilities of the fictional convention than used to be his wont. He writes crisply, brightly, and without unpleasant effort, and he eschews padding—for which mercies we should be profoundly grateful. Finally, we should like to say that in view of Mr. Long's position in the publishing trade it seems to us that he can well afford to dispense with his elegant pornographists. In any case, he might at once dispense with Miss Victoria Cross, and we see no reason why Mr. Hubert Wales should not follow. It is not good for a publishing house to get its imprimatur besmirched with the improprieties. There is a publishing house in London whose name once stood, rightly or wrongly, for objectionableness. That firm saw the error of its ways, and threw out its wicked authors. The result has been highly satisfactory from the point of view of mere pounds, shillings, and pence. Mr. John Long cannot be aware of what he is doing for himself. If he goes on at his present pace books with "John Long" on the title-page will be prejudged to be of a certain character. The public at large—and even the wickedest sections of the public at large—are still of a prudish disposition, and they will always remain of a prudish disposition, because such a disposition is essential to their own protection. Books like "Five Nights" may sell in a flaring sort of way for a season, but you cannot maintain the publishing business on them, inasmuch as they are rotten, and when you build on rottenness you are bound to come down. There is a common impression abroad that publishers do not possess souls. We try not to be of that way of thinking. We believe that Mr. Long has a soul, and that he believes himself that he has a soul. If he would save that soul in this world, let alone the next, he should bid a fond adieu to the publication of books of the "Five Nights" order.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THE SALONS

IT is generally recognised that, with few exceptions—so few that they may be counted on the fingers of one hand—the pictures at the Salon are, first and foremost, Salon pictures. My observation does not enable me to state whether, as a general rule, pictures exhibited at the London Academy are painted solely with a view to exhibition at the Academy, as is the case with the French Salons and the pictures exhibited there. What has always struck me at the Royal Academy is that in each room there is apparently one good picture, the work of an artist who is clearly on excellent terms with the Hanging Committee, and that the other pictures that immediately surround it have been selected and placed there not wholly because they are good pictures, but because they have just the qualities, or lack of qualities, which permit them to serve to perfection as repoussoirs—in other words, their mediocrity enhances the good or merely sensational qualities of the central masterpiece. This, no doubt, is an excellent system to adopt from the point of view of the Press critics, and of a section, at least, of the purchasing public. It should tend to keep up prices, especially if these are already unnaturally inflated, and no doubt that is an excellent thing in the long run for the artist's profession as a whole. Rising painters, or those who profess independent ideas, may feel somewhat aggrieved, but the remedy lies in the former climbing as quickly as may be to within the Hanging circle, while the latter, like all originally-minded people, have only themselves to thank if they miss the official recognition which they despise in one breath and clamour for in another. It is so easy in this world to be let alone on the condition of letting others alone. There is no lack of showrooms for painters or anybody else.

At the Salon this method of hanging is not so noticeable, but without any doubt the painter who wishes to have a success at the Salon starts in from the beginning with this idea mainly in his mind, that what is to inspire him are not the noblest principles of his art, but the special conditions of the Salon. He is painting in much the same way as a scene-painter; he must take into serious consideration the special lighting conditions of the Salon, just as the scene-painter has to remember all that the interposition of foot-lights between his work and the audience of a theatre means to the general effect. The Salon painter wants to produce something which will startle and attract even when surrounded by other pictures, the painters of which have just the same ambition. So he selects, if not always, at any rate on those special occasions when he wants to make a great Salon effort, enormous canvases and enormous subjects, gigantic anecdotes, faits divers treated at inordinate length and breadth, ghastly legends painted much larger than life, and making a shocking appeal to common imaginations which are sufficiently healthy to be only affected by the morbid when it is taken in draughts by the gallon. The need of outflaring everybody else has proved a terrible curse to the painter who habitually exhibits at the Salon. It explains why the Salon has, on the whole, been more baneful than profitable to French art. A Salon picture has a stamp of its own. This stamp extends even to the frame, for the frame is expected to help out the canvas with a blare and a blaze of its own. There are portraits by Bonnat (notably that exhibited by this painter at the Artistes Français this year of M. Daniel Guestier), which for tinselled noisiness suggest the external setting of a merry-go-round at a fair. Carolus Duran also sins in the respect of Dutch metal and brillantine. The painters of still life are not a whit better. Their rhododendrons are all "roaring-dand drums." The trail of the "Salon picture" is over them all. This is one of the first points to bear in mind in considering the psychology of the Paris Salons.

The French painters who habitually exhibit at these Salons have, however, an acknowledged inspiration which is not purely æsthetic. In France it is seldom that the painter does not pose as a seer, a prophet, a thinker. He is almost certain to have a theory, not only of Art, but of Life. He moves within, or without, the circle of tradition, but in either case he does so officially. He may, or may not, belong to a party or a school, but he is never without a uniform, a shibboleth, or a formula. He is for or against the government either of France or of the universe. Whatever his creed may be, he is the high priest of it. Sooner or later his widely ranging ideas seek expression in his pictures. For instance, there comes a moment—a psychological moment—in the lives of most, if not of all, French painters who have the run of the two Salons when they feel it incumbent on them to depict Our Lord either in a workman's blouse or a bowler-hat. Lhermitte, who went through this crisis a couple of years ago, is still only convalescent, for his group of a peasant mother seated in a field, suckling a child, with relatives looking on, has had a narrow escape of being a Holy Family. Other painters, whose names I have no wish to record, supply this year's Salons with examples of this theological and pathological symptom.

Theology at the Salons is of two sorts. It is either conservative or progressist. Progressist theology is the more official of the two. That is the nuance of the Republic. It carries with it eventually the Cross of the Legion of Honour, election to the Institute, and in the meanwhile orders to decorate provincial town-halls. I have never observed any Protestant manifestation at either Salon. Nor does Judaism obtrude. Neither the example of Rembrandt nor that of Mr. Rothenstein is repeated, at least to my knowledge. Jews are hung, of course, at both Salons (on the walls merely), but they do not attempt to proselytise, as in England. One of the most interesting pictures of the year at the Beaux Arts is that by M. Sarluis, "Florentin," the portrait of an Italian youth which might easily have been by one of the great Venetians, and proves M. Sarluis to be an artist in the highest acceptance of the word, inspired by those noble traditions which the modern dauber is at war with. No need to seek a psychological explanation of his work. He is, with Louis Anquetin, one of the few to whom the question of technique has presented itself in much the same way as it did to Titian, Reynolds, and Turner. The progressist theologian of the Paris Salons is mostly a bit of an Anarchist, but from the New Testament point of view and that of Herbert Spencer only. The divine workman, whom he loves to depict, gesticulates, but does not hit anybody in the eye. His ultimate apotheosis in a bowler-hat is tragic without being turbulent.

Of the conservative theologian there is hardly a trace left. A couple of years ago he was still in robust health. Enormous canvases, representing scenes from the lives of the saints, and destined for cathedrals and churches, figured regularly at the Artistes Français, not adding much, I am sorry to say, to the artistic value of the exhibition. All that is over now. The separation of Church and State has suppressed the ecclesiastical note of the Old Salon. At the Beaux Arts it had never been known. Cardinal Logue, who has recently been predicting the early dissolution of the British Empire, should note this writing on the wall. Dissolution, even more so than charity, may begin nearer home than his Eminence anticipates. The Church has been to all intents and purposes expelled from the Salon, which was formerly one of its strongholds. Not a Cardinal to be seen; only one poor little Bishop, looking very blue (name of Herrscher). It must be admitted that French ecclesiastical painting, like French ecclesiastical architecture of modern times, is quite hideous. It seems never to have escaped from the awful spell which Louis Philippe and the Romantics threw over it. For over half a century it has been dead, and its burial was imperative.

From theology the French painter sometimes turns to politics. He is, as a rule, a Socialist, with a primitive and pathetic admiration for the labourer. The dirtier the workman, the uglier, the more ill-shapen and uncouth, the more the political painter likes him. He tries with all his might to make us believe that a scavenger is the noblest work of God. It is to be noticed, however, that the French painter, when passing through this psychological crisis, is generally afflicted with a very wooden style, and that his colour is opaque and dull. There is something dunce-like about the whole performance, both from inside and out. One is conscious of an absence of humour, and it is evident that the painter cannot perceive that the depiction of scarecrows on an heroic scale is in any way ridiculous. This year Paul Renouard in his "Vision" has made a weak effort to arouse interest in the famous "Affaire." It is incredible that such a silly political pamphlet as is this badly-painted picture should have been submitted to the inspection of the public that frequents the Salon of the Beaux Arts, more especially as the President, M. Roll, thought proper to exclude M. Baffier's inoffensive medallion of General Mercier, after it had been accepted and placed. But there you have the true psychology of French painters when the political demon has seized hold of them.

No need to analyse the psychology of M. Jean Paul Laurens when he started in to stagger humanity with his great allegorical picture concerning (apparently) Beethoven. Jean Veber's "La Guingette," which is to be hung as a mural decoration at the Hotel de Ville, would disgrace, both for execution and conception, the pavement of the Old Brompton Road. That is all that can be said about this unique specimen of Salon humour from the psychological or any other point of view; but to conceive any idea of the psychological inspiration of Jean Paul Laurens' "Beethoven," which, like Veber's "Guingette," is genre (though not humorous genre), one must try to think of the nightmare that would result from an unsuccessful effort to digest at one go all the back-numbers of the Monde Illustré.

ROWLAND STRONG.

"THE THRESHOLD OF MUSIC"

A CHANGE has passed over the mental attitude of our countrymen with regard to music in the last ten or twenty years. It is a change which was experienced in more artistically-favoured countries a good deal earlier. Music has passed from the position of a highly-specialised subject, understood only by those who practise it, and more or less reserved for the entertainment of those who, without understanding it, can afford to pay for it, into a matter of common interest. Concerts are no longer the privilege of the few. The City clerk drops in to Queen's Hall to hear Beethoven; the daily paper is incomplete without a column on music; and a competitive festival arouses as much excitement in the provincial town as a by-election. It is obviously of no small importance to see in what direction this new interest tends, as well from the social and economic standpoint as from the artistic one. The question what kind of a force music can become in the life of a people has not been fully answered, because music in the sense in which we speak of it to-day—music as emotional expression through the medium of pure sounds in combination—has not yet had time to prove its influence upon the popular mind. Its possibilities can scarcely be grasped by its ardent followers. Within our own lifetime we have seen rules which were imagined to be the first principles of the art proved to be merely the leading-strings with which the child was being taught to walk; and in listening to modern compositions we are often inclined to think that the child's walk without leading-strings is none of the steadiest. Our music is very young; perhaps that is why it is so attractive. Will it be as interesting when it grows older? What place will it assume in social life; and, if it sinks deep into the affections of the people, what will be its outcome in habits of thought and manners?

These questions are suggested by the survey of the position of music which Mr. William Wallace gives us in his book, "The Threshold of Music" (Macmillan). The author's object is to trace the growth of the musical sense, incidentally to account for the extraordinarily rapid growth of the last two centuries, and from the story of the art to draw some deductions as to its future. He is a believer in its possibilities to the point of claiming that its "usefulness" is still to be made clear. He even seems to suggest that a "usefulness," hitherto unsuspected, that is outside the artistic usefulness as a means for the expression of beauty is to be discovered for music. But whether this be so or not, the mast to which he nails his colours is this:

I firmly believe the third part of music is yet to come forth, whereby its meaning is made clear and its ethics established under a new dispensation.

There is an exhilarating atmosphere of optimism about the preliminary chapter which encourages the reader to plunge into the historical survey which follows. Mr. Wallace has not much to say as to the origin of the musical sense. His own suggestion is the old one of mimicry. He shows the contradiction into which Darwin was led in asserting that:

Neither the enjoyment nor the capacity of producing musical notes are faculties of the least use to man in reference to his daily habits of life, while he attributed its origin to the necessity for "charming the opposite sex." Mr. Wallace does not mention Herbert Spencer's refutation of Darwin's doctrine or the controversy which Spencer's theory of music as arising from excited speech called forth. But to the reader impatient to arrive at conclusions affecting the art of to-day this is no great loss. He follows the author with unabated interest through the summary of the history of musical development which follows. We cannot always accept the author's judgments; for example, when he says that:

We cannot say that [Palestrina's] musical faculty was as delicate and responsive as that of Monteverde, we feel that he must have some definition of his own for the term "musical faculty." The ordinary definition as the power of appreciating beauty of sounds individually and in their relations to one another cannot be his unless he has accidentally reversed the two names, for this faculty Palestrina possessed in an extraordinary degree, and we can leave him that virtue without disparaging the daring spirit and the keen sense of dramatic appropriateness which made Monteverde's work a new gospel. With this must be placed the curious assumption of a later chapter that:

We have no means of knowing, till Bach's time, or even later, as some would insist, whether the musical idea was actually "heard" in the mind, as modern composers hear it, before it was committed to paper, or whether it was "worked out" by some rule-of-thumb method.

Our means of knowing is the same as with modern composition—by results. Much sixteenth-century music was obviously unheard by the composer, just as much modern orchestration can be identified as "paper" work, but if Mr. Wallace can convince us that the "Missa Papae Marcellae" was "worked out" by rule-of-thumb, then he will prove conclusively that mere theory can produce art of imperishable beauty. This is an instance, and there are others, where one feels that the author's generally sound and always fearless judgment is warped by certain small prejudices. The arrival of Monteverde on the scene calls forth a diatribe against "theorists" and "fumbling pedagogues," and retrograde influences—things which really count for so little nowadays that they are scarcely worth his powder. The phrase a "sound musical education" seems to cause him peculiar irritation, if we may judge from the number of times he repeats it in inverted commas. No one would grudge him the wasted ammunition if the habit of firing at such things did not detract from the author's position of authority. But it does. There is much that is valuable, for instance, in his estimate of the position of Haydn and Mozart, and yet the pages which are occupied with them are sufficiently coloured with this dislike of "sound musical education" to make their value considerably discounted by many readers.

In the final chapters the mental ingredients (if the term is admissible) which have led to the development of the musical sense are discussed in connection with history as it has been set forth. The contributions of "predisposition" heredity, the theory of "latency" are considered and weighed, and the rapid growth of technical achievement after the first principles of harmony had been arrived at empirically is accounted for. In the last few pages Mr. Wallace declares what he conceives to be the gospel of the new era of music which began with the death of Beethoven. He starts from the statement that:

If we take the men who have done the most to extend the art of music since 1830, we find that their technical equipment was of the most meagre description, and he goes on to say that :

Music had entered into the domain of man's thought, and was being sustained by men whose education in observing the other signs of cerebral activity brought them to inquire into the mysterious faculty with which they were endowed.

It is only to be wished that these conclusions had been worked out more fully ; perhaps a subsequent volume will deal with them. We could wish that some inference were drawn from a comparison between the music of our own day and that of Monteverde, the revolutionist of the seventeenth century. From such a comparison this lesson might be learnt : music is once more going through a period of receiving new life from without, that is, from other processes of mental activity, as Mr. Wallace would put it. To do so it must break down the barriers which surround it. We have passed the sonata form of Beethoven as Monteverde had passed the counterpoint of Palestrina, and there is no returning. But music will not relinquish any one of her attributes, and the great element of design which most gives her the power of self-contained expression will have its use in building the symphony of the future in that "third part of music" which Mr. Wallace so bravely proclaims.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The World that Never Was. By A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.
(Francis Griffiths, 6s. net.)

PERHAPS it was too much to expect that Mr. Adcock's book would be worthy of its title, but if he could not give us a genuinely imagined world he might at least have avoided paining us with one more of those ugly realms, half realistic and half distorted, which imitators of Lewis Carroll would have us believe are the modern equivalent of fairy-land. There is something not unchildlike in the idea of the posters coming to life every night, and stepping down from the walls ; but in his desire to be thoroughly modern Mr. Adcock has endowed his creatures with a spirit of vulgarity which we find only too natural in such commercial elves. Moreover, Mr. Adcock has committed the unpardonable offence of tampering with the old nursery legends for his own purposes. What would a sensible child think of a book that seeks to whitewash the moral character of Bluebeard, and discovers the lovely vision of the Sleeping Beauty in the advertisement of a hair-restorer ? In the face of this we are in danger of overlooking such minor errors as the introduction of a cruel aunt and much foolish talk about sweethearts. And Mr. Adcock makes use of the old, pitiful evasion of explaining away the story as a dream, not, we fear, because he is ashamed of it, but because he does not wish to put foolish ideas of fairies in the children's heads, and because Alice woke up at tea-time so many years ago. Of course the author has fallen into the fatal mistake of "writing down" to children—a mistake which fills the bookshops with undesirable rubbish every Christmas. But in view of the fact that he has done good work in other directions, we hope that in future he will confine himself to the easy task of pleasing the Olympians. For it is evident that he knows nothing of the artistic demands of childhood.

Frederic William Mailland. Two Lectures and a Bibliography. By A. L. SMITH, Balliol College, Oxford.
(The Clarendon Press, 1908.)

PROFESSOR MAITLAND'S position among scholars and historians is too well established to need the very elaborate eulogy which Mr. A. L. Smith gives us in these lectures. Does it add to a great scholar's reputation for a personal enthusiast almost to apologise lest he may be thought to have written an "over-valuation" and to defend himself by reference to the already published estimate of Professor Vinogradoff in the Historical Review ? We doubt it. Or by telling us that Lord Acton pronounced Maitland to be "the ablest historian in England while Stubbs, Gardiner, and Creighton were living" ? We are reminded of Acton and the paradoxical limitations self-imposed by the very profundity of his learning.

The bibliography of Maitland's writings is similar to that of Acton's—chiefly consisting of very learned contributions to reviews. Like Acton, his "lofty conception" of work to be done was too ideal for the shortness of life :

He could not carry on his "History of English Law" till the Year-books were all published. He could not carry back into Anglo-Saxon times his Domesday Studies till the material had been got into usable shape by the combined work of local experts. Once he thought this might take a century.

There may be sound reason in this, though it is perhaps a little like an engineer who might have contemplated Mont Cenis and been overwhelmed with reflections on the impossibility of his making a tunnel.

For all that Maitland in his generation accomplished much, and made a splendid contribution to projected work in "The History of English Law" (of the Angevin age) in conjunction with Sir F. Pollock, and in "Domesday Book and Beyond."

In reading these lectures we cannot escape the feeling that the present modern School of History is a little inebriated with the self-consciousness of personal advancement, that there is just a suspicion of ἡμεῖς τοὶ πατέρον. κ.τ.λ.

Mr. A. L. Smith is confident of Maitland's superiority to Gardiner, Freeman, Stubbs, and others. But why make the comparison ? Is not the advancement of historical criticism due to the development of the methods of such great masters ? Is it wise to depreciate Stubbs (pp. 48 and 49) because Maitland did not agree with some of his conclusions ?

Mr. A. L. Smith informs us that his panegyric of Professor Maitland is a "pious task." It is, but of the piety of the Oxford common room, which, while usually free from the charge of being a mutual admiration society, yet naïvely asks this curious question (p. 55) : "Is there a serious danger of an Oxford man being too ready to admire a Cambridge writer ?"

In view of Bädcker's "immortal words," quoted elsewhere by Mr. Smith, "Oxford and Cambridge both repay inspection. If time presses, Cambridge may be omitted ;" the risk might perhaps be ventured without temerity.

Cambridge no doubt possesses some sense of gratitude—and humour.

The Socialist Movement in England. By BROUGHAM VILLIERS. (T. Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.)

THE first part of this book adds little or nothing to the knowledge that can be acquired easily by any ordinary reader. Mr. Brougham Villiers' idea of the development of man is somewhat hazy. There is an occult reference to the "pre-social ages." Lost in doubt, as to what biological period, we could assign this remarkable condition of life, we stumble a little later on the cryptic statement, that "it is certain that the earliest pre-human founders of society had no very clear perception of what they were doing." This we can well believe, without presuming to discover under what form of life the "pre-human" Socialists were manifested. Emerging into more modern times, we find that Mr. Brougham Villiers' notions of tribal life are also vague, leading us to doubt his acquaintance with such works as Maine's "Village Communities," or even with Bishop Stubbs' account of the early Teutonic Mark System.

The sketch of early and later Victorian Socialism is, for the most part, merely a history of trade unionism and co-operation, by which "three million English men and women left Individualism behind for ever." As a consequent result of this phenomenon we arrive at "conscious Socialism in the eighties," because :

Between conscious Socialism and the unsocialistic organisations of the people there is a great gulf fixed.

We refrain from pressing the parallel. Mr. Villiers, however, reckons on the universal and constant Socialism of the Independent Labour Party, and, with astonishing assurance, on that of the Unionist party in and out of Parliament, assuming "with confidence" that ninety-nine Unionists out of a hundred would assent to an advanced Socialist programme (which he gives on p. 177) which includes the Nationalisation of Land and Mines. In common with many other theorists, he believes that in the "Downfall of Capitalism" and

The public ownership of the leading monopolies of an industrial system lies the sovereign remedy for all the evils of poverty.

We are bound to add that he writes pleasantly, well, and temperately, with much observation and appreciation of existing evils. But he is too optimistic, and, like all optimists, somewhat deficient in estimating the clear logic of facts. Hence his deductions are not convincing. He treats far too lightly the extravagant proposals of Socialism, and does not grasp his subject as a whole. The religious question he entirely ignores. He steers happily along in the glamour of a summer sea, oblivious of rocks and shoals, and other dangers, which he appears unable to realise.

The Autobiography of a Super-Tramp. By W. H. DAVIES. With a Preface by BERNARD SHAW. (A. C. Fifield, 6s.)

WHEN, a few years since, a modest volume of poems entitled "The Soul's Destroyer" appeared, the lover of poetry who was fortunate enough to read it was justified in thinking that a new planet had swum within his ken. The book was received with a chorus of discriminating praise, and speculation became rife as to the strange and fascinating personality that lurked behind the name of William H. Davies. We learned just enough to whet our curiosity. We learned, for instance, that the new poet was a one-legged man, who lived in a common lodging-house somewhere in Southwark, that he enjoyed the munificent pension of 8s. a week, and that (most wonderful of all!) he had contrived to publish his verses at his own expense. This sounded promising; but, like Oliver Twist, we wanted more. At length Mr. Davies has taken pity on our ignorance. He has told us the plain and unvarnished story of his life.

And a marvellous record it is! In these days incident, having deserted the region of fiction, is forced to fly to autobiography as to a welcome sanctuary. Certainly "The Autobiography of a Super-Tramp"—we like not the title, by the way, it is too slavishly Shavian!—contains enough adventure to fit out a dozen romances by (say) Mr. Rolf Boldrewood. Its author has tramped it up hill and down dale; he is equally at home on the highroads of America or in the slums of our English cities. He has known the agonies of starvation, and, by dint of considerable practice, has acquired the difficult art of begging. His companions have been thieves, vagrants, and mendicants. Not since Borrow (it seems safe to say) have we had a presentment so vivid, forceful, and intimate of the inner lives of these delightful people. And the strange thing about it all is that Mr. Davies himself appears to be a man with essentially domestic instincts, a lover of the fireside and the companionship of men and books. He has gone through the world weaving his wonderful experiences into song, and with an eye always on the end of wandering—the happy haven that awaits the tired voyager.

It is difficult—indeed, it is almost impossible—to quote from this volume, so full is every chapter of strange and exciting matter. But one incident in this Odyssey of a vagabond must not go unrecorded. The scene is America. Mr. Davies and a companion tramp had been found guilty of the crime of trespassing on a railroad. They were each fined five dollars by the Judge. Hot with indignation, Davies refused to disgorge a cent. The remainder must be told in his own words:

Judge Stevens looked at us steadily for a time, and then asked this astounding question—"Boys, how much are you prepared to pay?" Brum, who had very little sense of justice, and being such a good beggar, set very little value on money, asked the Judge if he would accept three dollars from each of us. If I had been alone at this time I would have paid nothing, but to save Brum from going to prison, who I knew would support me through all, I satisfied myself that, if the Judge approved of this amount, I would pay it without further comment. The Judge appeared to weigh the matter seriously, and then cried, with a magnanimity that was irresistible, "Pass over the dollars, boys; you shall have a chance this time."

As a record of a life lived in defiance of all the conventional rules of our modern civilisation this volume is of priceless value. Its freshness of outlook and spontaneity of expression, together with its entire freedom from cant, make it in every sense of the term a truly remarkable production. Mr. Shaw contributes a characteristic Preface.

Montreux. Painted by T. HARDWICKE LEWIS and MAY HARDWICKE LEWIS; described by FRANCIS GRIBBLE. (A. and C. Black, 7s. 6d. net.)

It is probable that the average Briton knows Switzerland as well as or better than he does Kensington Gardens. He, or she, has made holiday there, has assimilated what not of its semi-Cockney, semi-theatrical charm, and, having tasted the joys of cheap Continental travel, would fain be reminded of them in the sombre days when he is confined to the office-stool and the banality of the tram-ridden suburb. To such as these this book on Montreux, by J. Hardwicke Lewis and May Hardwicke Lewis, in picture, and Francis H. Gribble, in prose, will come as a veritable god-send. And, granting that the thing had to be done, it might have been much worse. The text deals quite lightly and brightly with the literary and historical associations of the northern shore of the Lake of Geneva, from Vevey to Villeneuve, and the pictures are as "pretty" as need be, although they lack atmosphere and artistic distinction. Still, Mr. Gribble tells us a deal about Bonivard the Prisoner of Chillon, the Pietists, Madame de Warens, and "Obermann," and one ought not to expect more. The book is entirely readable, and really does not worry one much.

FICTION

A King of Mars. By AVIS HEKKING. (John Long, 6s.)

It is unfortunate that Miss Hekking should begin her novel with a preface and a prologue. Both are unnecessary, for they only emphasise the laboured artificiality of the story that follows. Not that she writes badly, but the authoress has not convinced us that Mars was the natural sphere for the activities of her characters. Beylo, Amklu, Zarma, and Anayra might have lived in London or Ruritania, to judge by their language, which at times suggests Wardour Street and at others an eighteenth-century drawing-room. Anayra, the villain of the piece, succeeds so easily that the reader is amazed, and from being an unpopular prince he becomes King of Mars by means of an academic rebellion in which no blood is shed. Beylo, who is the mouthpiece of the story, is the slave of Zarma, with whom she is, of course, in love, and in his service she risks her life as often as it is necessary to keep the story going. Airships are inevitable in a story of this kind, for it is the accepted axiom that the unearthly spheres learn of earthly inventions and improve upon them. The people of Mars, according to Avis Hekking, know a great deal of this earth, and there are many references to our planet in the novel. These airships, we are given to understand, render battles unnecessary, even when the mysterious ammunition "the White Fire" is discarded because of its ferocious thoroughness. Thus everybody is conspiring against someone else, because everybody is too humane to employ the obvious method for the destruction of the enemy. In this odd atmosphere is the scene of "A King of Mars" laid, and even the multiplicity of familiar adventures does not excite the reader. In an imaginative story all the imagination should not be on the part of the reader. He rightly demands a certain amount of plausibility from the novelist, and the writer of "A King of Mars" does not provide it. Her style is better than her powers of invention.

The Splendid Coward. By HOUGHTON TOWNLEY. (Greening, 6s.)

MR. TOWNLEY is one of the few writers of sensational stories who know how to avoid the ridiculous and the extravagant, and his latest novel will add, undoubtedly, to this reputation. "The Splendid Coward" is, as its somewhat paradoxical title suggests, the story of apparent cowardice subsequently heroically justified. Dick Swinton, the hero, is the son of a clergyman and the grandson of an earl. His mother, Lady Mary Swinton, is a mixture of extreme worldliness and womanliness, and Mr. Townley is to be congratulated upon his skill in depicting the lights and the shadows in her character. She is the centre of all the trouble from the day she alters a couple of cheques drawn by her miserly father, the Earl of Herresford, to the last chapter, where her return after a somewhat illogical flight completes the story. Dick Swinton's adventures, following upon his mother's crime, give the author fine scope for his ability as a delineator of the melodramatic, and if the expected does happen eventually, it is delayed while surprises are sprung upon the reader by the author. A word is due to the character of the Reverend John Swinton, an ably-drawn portrait which is only slightly exaggerated for the purposes of the plot. Mr. Townley knows how to create real men and women—a somewhat unusual gift in a writer of sensational fiction, as he is described by his publishers—and for this reason he is likely to assume a leading position in the ranks of the writers who aim at pleasing the multitude. "The Splendid Coward" is one of the best stories of its kind we have seen this year. Mr. Townley is a frank melodramatist in prose, but he is successful, and because of that his latest book must be awarded more than ordinary praise.

Absolution. By CLARA VIEBIG. Translated from the German by H. RAAHANGE. (John Lane, 6s.)

IN noticing a book originally written in another language the reviewer is always in the difficult position of judging how far the translator has succeeded in interpreting the spirit of the author's work; and in the present instance, lacking a copy of the original, we cannot help feeling that something is wanting necessary to our comprehension of the author's aim in writing this powerful and terrible book. Mrs. Tiralla, her heroine, is young, beautiful, and married to a prosperous farmer many years her senior. This man, who is fond of his wife and by no means unamiable in an unintelligent way, she hates with a passion that amounts to physical repulsion, and in the first chapter of the book we find her simulating fear of imaginary rats in order that she may obtain the means by which to murder him. Her first attempt only ends in a narrow escape for her half-witted maid—an utterly repellent girl, whose character varies between brutish cunning and vacuous idiocy. Thereafter her hate pursues its course until it is increased to something like madness by force of her love for another man. We see her calling to her assistance a wretched schoolmaster who loves her and ruining him hopelessly; and by degrees her hatred tells on her unhappy husband, who is reduced, between drink and fear of murder, to a state of insanity. We hear her praying for the courage to kill him, and asking the little girl Rosa, who believes her to be an angel, to join in her prayer; we see her lust, we can use no milder word, for her lover Becker, and finally, when her husband commits suicide we see her standing by his body, the only calm person in that household of idiots and imbeciles.

We have said at the commencement of this notice that "Absolution" is written with power; we might almost have said that it is written with ferocity. In all her strange tale of hate and passion the author has never flinched, and the result is almost a little masterpiece of the ugly and the sordid. But, as we have hinted, we are troubled with the doubt that this may not have been the author's intention, that she may, in laying emphasis on the spiritual side of Mrs. Tiralla's character, have desired to show a deeper motive for her passions than vanity and lust. If this be so, we can only say that the translation before us has failed to convince us. "Absolution" is a book that should be read by all those who are strong of stomach.

The Magic of May. By "IOTA." (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.)

THIS is a rather improbable story told in so matter of fact a manner that it is but rarely that the thoughtful reader pauses to marvel. For instance, the stepfather who addresses his eight-year-old daughter as "You damned young rip!—you moon-struck ass!" made us stare; but we accepted without question the young officer who wins the V.C. while under the influence of a courage-provoking drug, and, after being reduced to the level of a field-beast by that potion, recovers himself and leads thereafter a simple and untainted life. And even when the other young officer who had discovered him in his beast-like period proved to be the early lover of his wife it only seemed pleasantly natural. As a matter of fact, in spite of a certain bluntness in the characterisation, "The Magic of May" is quite a pleasant book. The heroine, after being badly priggish as a child, develops into a sensible woman, and marries the wrong man only to find that he is the right one. And, though the book is too long and some of the characters are drawn only too successfully as bores, we followed her history with interest and enjoyment.

The New Galatea. By SAMUEL GORDON. (Greening, 6s.)

"THE NEW GALATEA" marks a revolt on the part of its author against the restrictions with which Puritanism has inflicted art in England. With such efforts every clean-minded person is bound to be in sympathy, and there is no reason why the situation of a wife who has married her husband on condition that the marriage should only be nominal should not be treated in fiction. But we have a right to expect that even a revolutionary novelist should portray real men and women, and this is exactly what Mr. Samuel Gordon has failed to do. His characters are queer aggregations of shreds and patches, and suggest a wide knowledge of the world of fiction rather than any study of real life. Moreover, Mr. Gordon has been at pains to tell his story with a delicacy that reminds us of Mr. Le Gallienne's soulful musings among petticoats, and we are of opinion that a little more plainness of speech and a little less dependence on suggestion would have made "The New Galatea" a cleaner book. If these strictures strike Mr. Gordon as being rather severe, we must remind him that he has aimed higher than the majority of contemporary writers are wont to do, and we are willing to admit that, in spite of its faults, "The New Galatea" is an interesting and stimulating novel.

The Forefront of the Battle. By ANDREW LORING. (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.)

MR. ANDREW LORING is a versatile experimentalist in the art of fiction. We recall a novel of his entitled "The Shadow of Divorce," which was full of a certain whimsical humour. In "The Forefront of the Battle" the humour is far to seek. The note of tragedy is struck, indeed, at the very outset, and the gloom intensifies as the story runs its course. The theme is by no means new in fiction. It is the ancient story of Uriah the Hittite, with some trifling modifications in the disposition of the principal characters. In this modern variant David appears as a Prime Minister. His name is Adrian Denison, and at the age of thirty-seven he had achieved a reputation which might have made Chatham weep with envy. The first chapter in the novel reveals the advent of a grave crisis in the political world. Wilson, a scatterbrained adventurer, had undertaken at his own risk an impossible expedition into the heart of Africa. The news has been received in England that he is in great danger, and the question arises as to whether the Government would be justified in despatching a relief force. Denison, who is in full possession of the facts of the case, maintains that the risk is too heavy. Suddenly there appears upon the scene Bathsheba. Evelyn Meredith is a young and beautiful girl who had contracted a secret and merely formal marriage with a young officer named Foxwell. With but the barest understanding of the situation, the extremity of Wilson appeals to her as the opportunity of her lover. She approaches Denison, and pleads anxiously for a "fighting chance" for Foxwell. The result will have been foreseen. Denison is captivated with the beauty of the fair suppliant, and the ancient mandate—"Set ye Uriah the Hittite in the forefront of the hottest battle" is cabled in a briefer and more convenient form. Uriah falls—only to rise again, however. He returns to England, a shattered and disfigured wreck, to find that his bride of a day has become the wife of the Prime Minister, who has by now assumed the title of Lord Stonehouse. Complications multiply, and there are many harrowing scenes. Evelyn had kept the story of her former marriage a secret from her husband, and its revelation is attended with unforeseen consequences. Foxwell, it must be said, behaves magnificently, and his death at a later stage of the narrative appears to provide the means for a satisfactory solution of the problem. It is followed, however, by the death of Evelyn's child, and the curtain falls on a stage of absolute blackness. The story is well told, and there are some fine dramatic moments, but the tension is at times almost too terrible. We would have even welcomed the vulgarity of a little comic relief.

Pedlar's Pack. By OLIVER ONIONS. (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.)

"PEDLAR'S PACK" consists of one long story and eleven short ones. The long story, "Thorgumbald," is based on an imaginary incident in the march of two companies of Chelsea Pensioners from the South of England to Carlisle. It is a vivid and powerful character-study, abounding in dramatic incidents. The other stories are of slighter build. They are, for the most part—what short stories should always be—dramatic presentations of single and detached incidents. Mr. Onions exhibits a wholly admirable disdain for the smoothly-rounded narrative. He demands from his readers a certain amount of intelligence and not a little imagination. Granted these, his book will prove a pure and unending delight. Such elements of complexity as the volume contains must be sought in the style, for Mr. Onions, as is the manner of your true romanticist, knows but little of the lights and shades of character. His villains are instantly recognisable; they bear the authentic stamp. And villainy stalks naked and unashamed through the pages of this book. Smuggling, larceny, murder, and piracy on the high seas—these are the stock-in-trade of Mr. Onions. Familiar wares—but in the hands of our author they have all the appearance of novelty; and the most jaded reader of tales of adventure need have no fear that he will be sent empty away. The period chosen is that of the American War of Independence, and there is a night watchman whose manner as a raconteur might well prove the envy of even Mr. Kipling or Mr. W. W. Jacobs. Two stories merit special commendation—"The Freeholders" and "Anderson," the latter of which is a triumph in the art of successful narrative. But the whole book abounds in those qualities which go to the heart of every real lover of romance—brisk dialogue and a certain breathlessness of incident which carries everything before it.

The Scarlet Runner. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON. (Methuen, 6s.)

WE believe that most, if not all, of these stories appeared in one of the monthly magazines, a fact which, no doubt, explains the accommodating regularity with which Christopher Race, the owner of a motor-car known as "The Scarlet Runner," manages to achieve an adventure a month for twelve months. So methodical is this arrangement that each of his thrilling experiences is labelled, and we have a February adventure with a suicide coming punctually on the heels of a January political plot, to be followed in turn by a March burglary, an April conspiracy, a May bomb, and so on until the series is neatly wound up with a little December romance. Naturally "The Scarlet Runner" plays the principal part in these motor-detective stories; in fact, it would seem that a pleasant-looking youth has only to drive slowly down the street in a red car to meet at once with strange and exciting adventures. The tales are ingenious, but nothing more. They are composed of well-worn material, dished up in the approved magazine fashion, and differ very little from the copiously illustrated stories which litter the table of every dentist's waiting-room. They are brightly told, and the presence of the red motor lends them a fictitious air of youth and sprightliness.

DRAMA

ON TWO FRENCH ACTRESSES

THE Shaftesbury Theatre is hospitable to foreign artists. After the terrors of the Sicilian actors and the horrors of the Grand-Guignol, we find two distinguished French companies lodged in this house.

M. Lugné-Poe, the originator of the Théâtre de l'Œuvre, who for several years past has been introducing to the Parisian public Ibsen, Maeterlinck, Bjornson, Hauptman, Verhaeren and Van Lerberghe, now presents his wife, Mme. Suzanne Després, in a repertoire of modern plays. It seems a pity that this repertoire has not been more intellectuel, more typical of his work, but I suppose M. Lugné-Poe was afraid of frightening the London playgoers. So only one Ibsen play was produced, the rest of the programme being composed of M. H. Bernstein's plays. The company was good, and M. Lugné-Poe himself quite remarkable in Maison de Poupée and in his clever characterisation of M. Lepic in M. Jules Renard's masterpiece, Poil de Carotte.

On the other hand, Mme. Bartet brought with her a repertoire of Dumas filis and Hervieu plays acted by well-known sociétaires or pensionnaires of the Comédie-Française such as MM. Baillet and J. Fenoux. Let us candidly admit, however painful to the French amour-propre it may be, that such poor interpreters of modern plays have rarely been seen in London before. I hear M. Fenoux plays Hernani beautifully, and M. Baillet proved himself absolutely charming in Marivaux's Jeu de l'Amour et du Hasard; but, dressed in the frock-coats of a modern comedy, they both seemed heavy, unnatural, and out of place. At that we must not be surprised, but thankful rather that they are so greatly influenced by the traditions and the mannerisms necessary to play the classics as to be unable to get rid of them when they appear in modern works. And, after all, the Comédie-Française sociétaires' first duty is to perpetuate the noble (or delightful) traditions of the immortal chefs d'œuvre committed to their care.

Never has a more striking example of two different schools of French dramatic art been submitted to the judgment of London playgoers. After Mme. Després comes Mme. Bartet, both stars of much brilliancy, whose repertoires present a contrast quite unusually remarkable, so that in the space of four weeks we have been watching with keen interest a literary contest—Bernstein v. Hervieu, and Ibsen v. the French Classicists. Apparently the result is quite negative. The enthusiasm was great for both teams. Each one of those two ladies has her partisans, and the fact that the one got four calls and the other one five matters really not at all.

Listen to Mme. Bartet in M. Hervieu's play, La Loi de l'Homme, a Comédie-Française actress in an Academician's drama. Now M. Hervieu's works are by no means simple and life-like. Following Angier and Dumas filis he believes in the pièce à thèse and struggles in its toils; several characters argue and exchange reasonable reasons with much cleverness and at considerable length; they talk about law, the rights of men and women, and even the much-suffering heroine, forgetting her grief, finds time to select good arguments with which to defend her cause, appealing to our intellect as much as to our heart. Such a problem-play may be interesting enough, even dramatic, very seldom moving, unless for some mysterious reason it suddenly falls into melodrama.

In the middle of all this, as on a pedestal, stands Mme. Bartet with her admirable technique, surrounded by unreal, uncharacteristic people, who deferentially give the cue in the argument.

Not so with Mme. Suzanne Després in a Bernstein play. La Rafale or Le Détour are mere faits-divers, incidents of everyday life handled on the stage by a skilful dramatist who does not try to moralise nor to preach; who does not try either to shake the social edifice or to alter men and their laws. He never appeals to our reason, he pleads to our heart; he does not attempt to prove, he tries to carry us away. His heroes are weak and human instead of being logical and consistent; they do not air their ideas, they express their feelings in colloquial French, following the impulse of their passion.

It is difficult to imagine Mme. Bartet impersonating one of M. Bernstein's heroines, whose intense vitality is so admirably expressed by Mme. Després.

In addition to Mme. Sarah Bernhardt, Mme. Granier, and Mme. Réjane—women whose personality is strong enough to appear unchanged, yet totally different in all the parts they create—there are several great actresses in France of lesser reputation in Europe, but of equal merit. They belong to one of two schools, the academic or the realistic (the latter being known as the intellectual among some people). Mme. Bartet is at the head of the academic school, Mme. Després at the head of the realistic school.*

From the minute she sets foot on the stage Mme. Bartet is the star, the heroine around whom is written the drama; we are not allowed to forget it. We see it in the golden curls of her hair, in her ever youthful face, in her general behaviour. When she is not actually talking, the wave of her hands, the elaborate gracefulness of her feet whisper it, and the respectful deference of the other characters proclaim it aloud. And when she talks we have no doubts left. It is the perfection of delivery; the words sound enchanting, ailés, and full of meaning; and how admirable the would-be indifferent way in which she gives the unimportant lines; what an adorable studied carelessness! Then comes the first speech; it is worked up with wonderful precision, divided into sections, harmonious, like a symphony with an opening allegro, an andante full of sad reminiscences, and a passionate finale ending in an amazing crescendo. It is all beautiful, classical, expected, yet unexpectedly perfect; we sigh with joy. Every word has been given with the right intonation; the right gesture plays the accompaniment; not a single note is out of tune; the voice is splendid, broken, or sonorous, filled with joy or heavy with ecstasy, and the sob has come just at the right bar. How wonderful it is! And such is the power of stars that not only are we lost deep in admiration, but even moved, in spite of the artificiality of the means employed.

Such is the result of Mme. Bartet's technique. She is the perfection of artificiality and perfection itself in every part she undertakes to play. She never makes a mistake and never disappoints us. Of that we are sure. Years of Comédie-Française training have taught her to be unerring. Parisians call her "La Divine," and divine indeed is her talent. She can be sweet, strong, melancholy, passionate, subtle, simple, tragic. She can even be natural according to the rules of theatrical conventionality. So she is the quintessence of refined acting.

Mme. Després is just the opposite. She does not make a sensational entrée, she makes her appearance quietly, and does not pose as a central figure. She sits in a corner, hardly noticeable at all till—till her pathetic voice, her fascinating simplicity, her placid charm take you. You forget she is playing a character. You feel you are in presence of a living person, of a very human woman, who is going to smile or to cry in spite of the audience. You are interested, moved, and, as the play goes on, you remember things you have seen and heard—a familiar gesture, the echo of a cherished voice, a vaguely-remembered intonation. Then suddenly she takes you by storm in a passionate scene. You recognise real anger, despair, love, and you listen breathlessly, forgetting the ugly decorations of the Shaftesbury Theatre. She is really so wonderfully true to life that one does not realise how wonderful she is.

Which is the most valuable of these two talents is not for me to decide. Perhaps it is only a matter of taste. Anyhow, they were fully illustrated by two performances, that of Mme. Bartet in Silvia of Le Jeu de l'Amour et du Hasard, that of Mme. Després in Norah of Maison de Poupée. The two characters fitted the two actresses uncommonly well. Marivaux's refined feelings and polished periods afforded Mme. Bartet ample opportunity for her polished and refined talent, while Ibsen's simplicity showed off Mme. Després' simple methods to perfection.

Mme. Bartet shines more brilliantly, but Mme. Després charms us more; the one fills us with admiration, the other with emotion. We cannot forget the former's cleverness, but we have more sympathy with the latter's feelings. This one is the perfection of acting, but that one is life itself; or, quoting La Bruyère, shall I say that Mme. Després paints women as they are, while Mme. Bartet paints them as they ought to be?

CORRESPONDENCE

THE TERCENTENARY OF MILTON

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—December 9th next will be the 300th anniversary of the birth of Milton.

The Council of the British Academy, feeling that the day should not be allowed to pass without due observance, have decided to organise a commemoration of the tercentenary.

They believe that they will be acting in accordance with common sentiment, and they are confirmed in this view by a letter which was recently addressed to them by the Lord Mayor, the Chairman of the London County Council, the Vice-Chancellors of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and London, the Master of Christ's College, Cambridge (Milton's college), the High Master of St. Paul's School (Milton's school), and Mr. H. A. Harben on behalf of the trustees of Milton's cottage at Chalfont St. Giles.

In this letter the signatories remark that "It might be felt that London, Milton's birthplace, so intimately associated with his life and work, should take the lead in promoting such a movement. But the event is one of national importance rather than of local interest, and its celebration should be entrusted to a representative body competent to ensure that it shall be carried out in a fitting and dignified manner."

The details of the programme of the celebration will be duly announced, but the special reason for addressing this letter to you at this early date is in order to commend the due observance of the tercentenary to the attention of the educational authorities of English-speaking countries. Those who are directly concerned in education will be best able to decide on the various ways in which this suggestion can be carried out.

E. MAUNDE THOMPSON, President of the British Academy.

THOMAS MORE AND THE "UTOPIA"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to an article in your paper (May 16th) in which an anonymous writer reviews my edition of the "Utopia," and, while admitting that it is a "very good school edition," pours out the vials of his indignation on me for holding views different from his own on the subject of "More and the Reformation," and uses not a few expressions of contempt, some of which seem to me to transgress the bounds of such courtesy as is due from a critic (even on a subject exciting odium ecclesiasticum) towards a writer no less earnest in the search for truth than any of his reviewers. I have no intention to bandy such words as "impertinent" and "disgusting" with an anonymous critic. Nor am I here concerned to defend my view of More's character, and of his attitude towards the Reformation. It is a view which, I think, would commend itself to all unprejudiced Englishmen and Englishwomen. I hold no brief for Protestantism. In such matters I am "Nullius addictus jurare in verba magistri," and am quite ready to acknowledge my mistake if my views can be proved to be inconsistent with the principles that I hold as a Christian and as an Englishman; but contemptuous and discourteous language seems to me to be out of place in such discussions. If I have expressed my conviction that More probably "felt a longing for the light of a truer Christianity" than that which the Roman Church afforded him—if I have not surrendered myself to the guidance of Roman Catholic biographies, and have preferred Seebohm's "Oxford Reformers" to any "illuminating little volume" in "The Saints" series—if I do not feel inclined to accept descriptions of Roman Catholicism as "the sole religion of the country," and as "truth absolute and immutable," nor descriptions of the Reformation as a "virulent disease," and an "invading monster," there seems, nevertheless, to be no good reason why an anonymous reviewer should consider himself entitled to use contemptuous expressions towards one who happens to view such matters from a standpoint other than his own.

* It is interesting to note that Mme. Simone Le Bargy alone has lighted on the happy mean between the two. Mme. Jane Hading, once so greatly admired at the Coronet Theatre, is the most admirable and worst example of the academic actress spoilt by provincial and foreign tours, with her exaggerated mannerisms, her inapposite tricks, her obvious artificiality, all the technical qualities of the academic school turned into positive defects—an extreme perfection overdone to the point of extreme imperfection.

H. B. COTTERILL.

Villa Chenevière, Vevey, May 19, 1908.

[The writer of the article replies :

SIR,—Of course, I was an anonymous critic : it is the practice of THE ACADEMY that reviews should be unsigned. But I dislike anonymity in controversy, and therefore beg your permission to sign this reply with my name.

Mr. Cotterill's letter shows that he is (what I did not suspect from his book) a careless reader. I used no expression of contempt towards him. What I did say was that he was well intentioned but inadequately enlightened. I regret that he should now compel me to doubt his title to the former term. A well-intentioned student of a subject to which there are notoriously two sides would surely be careful to make himself acquainted with both. Mr. Cotterill prefers to rely solely on Protestant writings concerning Thomas More. To study the question from Thomas More's own side would be, it appears, to "surrender himself to Roman Catholic biographies." I do not complain of him for reading Seebohm; but had he read Nisard and Bridgett and Bremond too, he would have understood the subject better.

On the points at issue it is clear that Mr. Cotterill and I would never agree, and after expressing my views in the article referred to, I do not feel justified in asking for space in which to repeat them. But I must add a word on the two strong epithets which have, not unnaturally, roused Mr. Cotterill to protest. I regarded his assurance that More was not jesting when he made Hythloday invoke the teaching of Christ as an impertinent assurance. I regard it so still. I should equally regard as impertinent the assurance that Ridley or Latimer was in earnest when he invoked the teaching of his Master. It is not a question of Catholicism or Protestantism, but of the good faith of a man who died for his faith. And the fact that More was not jesting is regarded by Mr. Cotterill as proof that "More did, in spite of all the husks of mediæval superstition which cased him in, feel in his heart the longings for the light of a truer Christianity." I found that sentence "disgusting." It disgusts me still. It conveys the insidious implications that the "light of a truer Christianity" was to be found in Protestantism alone, and that More was secretly on the side of Protestantism. I need say no more.

If, by the way, Mr. Cotterill reads M. Bremond's book in the English edition he will find that I had the honour of being the translator. Let me assure him that I have no private end to gain in recommending it to his attention. I have not the acquaintance of M. Bremond, and was paid in full for the work on its publication.

"KEATS'S SONNET TO A CAT"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My authorities for ascribing the authorship of the "Sonnet to Vauxhall" to John Hamilton Reynolds are—(1) the Table of Contents of "Hood's Comic Annual, 1830," in which the author is stated to be "Edward Herbert Esq.," and (2) Dr. Richard Garnett's memoir of Reynolds in the "Dictionary of National Biography," where Reynolds is described as having contributed to the London Magazine under the signature of Edward Herbert. How the "Sonnet to Vauxhall" became included in "Hood's Own" thirty years after its appearance in the "Comic Annual" I cannot tell. It is well known that Reynolds assisted Hood in writing the "Odes and Addresses to Celebrated Persons," and at this distance of time it is difficult to assign the portion belonging to each contributor.

If the "Sonnet to Vauxhall" was not written by Reynolds, but by Hood, is it not possible that the "Sonnet to a Cat," looking to Hood's love of mystification, was also by Hood?

The date of the "Sonnet to a Cat" is put, on the authority of Woodhouse's "Commonplace Book," as January 16th, 1818. The poem must have been well known to the Keats circle, and it is inconceivable that it should have remained unpublished until 1830, or nine years after Keats's death, and then to have appeared in such uncongenial surroundings as "Hood's Comic Annual, 1830."

I may observe that the "Sonnet to a Cat" is not included in the collected edition of the poetical works of Keats, edited, with a critical memoir, by William Michael Rossetti, illustrated by Thomas Seecombe, published by Ward, Lock and Co. without date.

TO SAVE THE BIRDS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is sincerely to be hoped that the Select Committee to which Lord Avebury's "Importation of Plumage Prohibition Bill" has been referred by the House of Lords will realise the need of prompt as well as stringent legislation, if whole species of beautiful birds are to be saved from destruction.

It has been suggested that foreign Governments should first be consulted. If other countries are willing to assist us by taking joint action, so much the better; but such official communications are apt to be dilatory, and meantime the insensate slaughter will go on. There is no reason why this country should not at once legislate for herself, and thus set a much-needed example which is likely to be followed elsewhere.

For many years the Humanitarian League has been calling attention to this matter, and has long had in circulation a Bill similar in principle to that which has just been read a second time in the Upper House.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As one of the "loose-witted male supporters or victims" of the Woman Suffragist, may I crave leave, however unworthily, to give expression to "the authentic law," which, as you so wisely remark, "insists upon correction," the correction, for instance, of the terminologically inexact conclusions of some of the young men on your staff, who walk delicately hand-in-hand with Nature, and are the pale-mouthed projects of "the Natural Order of Things"?

Let us consider the sweet unreasonableness of these ladies. After some five thousand years of silken civilisation, man, nobly typified by one of your young lions, has discovered that woman is "charming and amusing to a degree, but not really to be trusted." He has arrived at that high pitch of "gallantry which forbids the tearing of Molonies limb from limb," but does not shrink from sentencing delicately-nurtured women to solitary confinement for six weeks as common criminals on a diet of skilly and bad vegetables. And yet these illogical and emotional women are not satisfied. They dare to doubt the "gallantry" of the men who, though they "sprawl in noble rage in admiration for this fairest of God's creatures," pay her half a man's wage for doing a man's work; who have set up one code of social purity for her and another for themselves; they dare to doubt the gallantry of budding Cabinet Ministers, who meet their demand for political freedom with the playful badinage of the innuendo; of the hooligan who replies to their arguments with the delicate irony of the rotten egg. In fine, after having for some fifty years proved themselves the equal, and at times the superior, of man in the strife of the Tripos and the schools; after having been allowed to join in his muddle-headed deliberations on School Boards, Education Committees, and Municipal Councils, these women have the effrontery to hint that man, in his wisdom, cannot legislate for them, and that their opinion at the polls upon such questions as education, sweated labour, housing of the working classes, married women's labour, or licensing reform may be quite as valuable as his! ὅτι οὐκ ἀνδρῶν καὶ κόρρων ἄλλο γυναικῶν!

Sensible people will not allow their sense of justice to be deadened by the din of one dinner-bell or blinded to the true inwardness of the question even by the summer-lightning humour of THE ACADEMY. The strength of the movement is evidenced by the gradual awakening of thousands of thinking, level-headed, men and women to the righteousness of woman's demand for the opportunity to express her individuality. The cause of Women's Suffrage is too well grounded upon logic and justice to suffer permanent injury from the occasional extravagances of its sometimes too-exuberant supporters or opponents.

TWO NOTES IN CHAUCER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Please excuse me from discussing the former of Mr. Ellershaw's notes at present.

As regards the latter, every one must see at once that, in order to make a point against me, my critic has not hesitated to alter the text. He has turned a negative sentence into an affirmative one; and, of course, this makes all the difference. He tells us that Chaucer says:

He wayted after no pompe and reverence,
He maked him a spyced conscience.—(525, 6).

But Chaucer says precisely the contrary—viz., "He maked him"—i.e., "Nor made for himself," not "He maked him." It means "He did not make."

Before we can discuss the matter further, I must ask my critic why he has made this alteration. I can find no authority for it at present.

CORRECTIONS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I must thank you for inserting last week my letter suggesting interpretations of two passages in Chaucer's Prologue. Will you allow me to correct a misprint or two? The heading should have "on," not "in;" and twice in the quotation of the line, "He maked him a spyced conscience," "He" is printed for "Ne." In the sentence "Why should it have some here?" for "some" read "any."

THE ANTIQUITIES OF THE LAND'S END DISTRICT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have recently visited nearly all the ancient monuments in the Land's End district of Cornwall, many of them in very inaccessible corners of the county. I regret to say that they sadly need attention with a view to preservation. Many of them are becoming quite buried and dilapidated, and in a few years will disappear altogether. They are all of immense archaeological value, many being of inestimable prehistoric interest. I venture to assert, without fear of contradiction, that no part of England possesses such a wealth of antiquarian remains within so small a portion of earth surface. Surely it is not asking the nation too much to preserve, even at some considerable cost, those that are left for the benefit of our successors, who will probably value them much more than we seem to do.

A glance at the Ordnance Map of Penzance, sheets 351 and 358, shows an extraordinary number of ancient British villages, cromlechs, stone circles, logan rocks, barrows, hut circles, giant's rocks, quoits, earthen or walled castles, sacred wells, chapels and crosses. I have closely inspected nearly all of these from Land's End to St. Ives, from Cape Cornwall to Lelant and Penzance, and can only tell a sad tale. In the first place many of the stone circles, so marked on the Ordnance Map, have ceased to be. In vain have I searched for some of the logan stones and menhirs. They have long ago been used up for gate-posts or building purposes. The stones in the ancient chapels are rapidly disappearing one by one. The "ancient British villages," as they are called, are without exception simply buried beneath masses of destructive briars and fern. The beehive huts are similarly overgrown and almost undiscernible. Even locally I have had, in many instances, much difficulty in finding them. The neighbouring farmers are forgetting their existence, and labourers living close by, perhaps purposely, don't know where they are. These priceless relics of the past history of our country should, in my humble opinion, be preserved from vandalism, the predatory attacks of those ignorant of their value, and the levelling friction of wind, rain, and storm. A few of the prominent ancient monuments in the more accessible spots are more or less preserved (such as the Logan Stone, Lanyon Quoit, the Nine Maidens, the Blind Fiddler, and, speaking generally, the churchyard Celtic crosses), but the historic and pre-historic relics in the out-of-the-way and wild parts of Penwith, of quite equal value and importance, are allowed to go to destruction or have already gone.

The remarkably fine ancient British village of Chysauter is so buried up with ruinous vegetation as to be difficult to find. The beehive hut near Crows-an-wra—the most perfect specimen remaining—may well be taken for a heap of stones collected from the surface of the field whence it rises, overrun as it is with rank vegetation and actually having trees of a fair size growing out of its walls. Tree-roots, in the natural process of growth, are deadly enemies of ancient buildings. The "Ancient British Village" near by is similarly hidden with bramble and fern. The very interesting old chapels fare no better. Chapel Downs, in Sancreed parish, once protected with iron railings by a late Rector not so many years ago, is now most dilapidated and the railings are in fragments. Chapel Uny, in the same parish, is practically non-existent; and the Well of the Saint has now only two stones remaining showing any traces of carving. Bosence Chapel, also in Sancreed parish, is a rank mass of unkempt vegetation in the corner of a field, and was difficult to find. The ancient dwellings of Bollowall, near Carn Gluze, at St. Just, are similarly dilapidated; most of the stones are already gone, and in a short time will be filled up and obliterated with debris from the neighbouring mine. It is common knowledge that some of the most ancient carved bench-ends have gone to make pigsty-doors and other articles of domestic use.

St. Helen's Oratory, Cape Cornwall, is also already nearly non-existent, and so I might go on—the facts are all more or less equally painfully monotonous. I merely have mentioned a few concrete instances and probably many of your readers could give more.

Now the parsons of Cornwall, even if they be not all antiquarians, are all keenly desirous of preserving these ancient monuments of past civilisation, which are certainly not of parochial but quite national interest, but they lack funds. Many of them are poor men and can do nothing at all. I have in my travels through the Land's End district of Cornwall more than once been asked how to preserve these monuments—whether it were better to scrape or recut rich Celtic crosses; whether to paint or distemper old fonts; how best to preserve old tracery on arches, windows, and tombs. I was glad to find such a genuinely active spirit of preservation abroad, for it shows the keenness of the clergy in the district to aid in the preservation of the memorials of the past, of which they are tenants for life. Still, it always struck me that such queries should not require to be put. The nation should have rendered such questions unnecessary.

The clergy of Cornwall, I feel sure, will welcome any way that leads to the preservation of their monuments, and aid any system that may be inaugurated to effect that end. The spirit, truly, is willing, but the pocket is empty. As it is, most of the fine old Celtic crosses in the churchyards have been placed there—rescued from serving other purposes, such as brook-bridges, stepping-stones, gate-posts through the local parson's energies. These deliverances should be a national matter, and not left to the haphazard knowledge or ability of even a zealous set of men who have much else to do in other directions. The nation should awake to its responsibilities, and take over the care of all these ancient monuments and remains, when perhaps sign-posts and fences will indicate where many of them are to be found.

Local antiquarian societies do what they can, but their funds, naturally, are very limited, and quite inadequate to cope with the pressing and urgent necessities of the case.

THE HISTORY OF TWENTY-FIVE YEARS, 1856-1880.

By Sir SPENCER WALPOLE, K.C.B.
Vols. III. and IV., 1870-1880.
8vo, 21s. net (inland postage 7d.).

STANDARD.

"It would be impossible to name any book which gives in more ordered sequence and with more balanced judgment a luminous and well-informed summary of the policy of the British Government at a time when a single false step might have plunged the nation into the calamity of war."

ROCK-CLIMBING IN SKYE.

Author of "Rock-Climbing in North Wales."
With 30 Collotype Plates, 9 Line Diagrams, and a Map, 8vo, 21s. net (inland postage 5d.).

SHEFFIELD INDEPENDENT.

"This is an ably written and a beautifully illustrated book. It is the work of an enthusiast, who declares, in common with many other climbers, he prefers Skye to Switzerland. It is a hearty and sincere tribute to the stern splendours of these savage peaks of the Coolin, and a most worthy addition to the literature of a clean, bracing, fascinating, and intensely manly British sport."

CRITICAL ESSAYS OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

Crown 8v.,
5s. net each.

Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by J. E. SPINGARN, Vol. I. 1605-1650. Vol. II. 1650-1685.

Academy.—"A word of praise must be added for Mr. Spingarn's learned, interesting and useful notes. He has selected his material with judgment and illustrated it with knowledge and care, and his book has a high value."

COLERIDGE'S BIOGRAPHIA LITERARIA AND AESTHETICAL ESSAYS

Crown 8vo,
8s. net.

By J. SHAWCROSS. 2 Vols.

Academy.—"An admirable edition, with an excellent introduction and notes. . . . It is not needful to say that there are treasures on every page."

Nation.—"The 'Biographia Literaria' cannot be neglected by any student of literature. . . . Mr. Shawcross is to be congratulated on the production of this sound and workmanlike edition. It contains everything that is necessary to a profitable study of the text."

COLERIDGE'S LITERARY CRITICISM

Fcap. 8vo,
2s. 6d. net.

With an Introduction by J. W. MACKAIL.

[New Volume Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry.]

Academy.—"Lo here, a little volume, but great book!" It would be hard to name a modern book containing more sound, vital criticism than is held between the covers of this selection. Professor Mackail has provided a brief, pregnant introduction, clear and admirably phrased."

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF SIR HENRY WOTTON

Two Vols.,
25s. net.

By LOGAN PEARSALL SMITH.

The Academy.—"A comprehensive and scholarly contribution to the European history of the early seventeenth century. . . . A memoir which, for sheer industry and thoroughness of research, can successfully challenge comparison with any similar work in our literature. . . . Of Mr. Pearsall Smith's labours it is impossible to speak except in terms of the highest praise, and we owe him thanks for the publication of so many of Wotton's letters. In an age when the art of letter-writing was held in some esteem these letters and despatches, by virtue of their fluent and graceful style, occupy an unchallenged supremacy. To the student of history their value is of the utmost importance."

THE SHAKESPEARE APOCRYPHA

Crown 8vo,
5s. net.
On India Paper,
7s. 6d. net.

Being a Collection of Fourteen Plays, which have been ascribed to Shakespeare. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Bibliography, by C. F. TUCKER-BROOKE.

Daily Telegraph.—"No one who wishes to understand the position of Shakespeare amongst his contemporaries can afford to neglect so useful a volume as 'The Shakespeare Apocrypha.'"

OXFORD LIBRARY OF TRANSLATIONS TACITUS DIALOGUS AGRICOLA AND GERMANIA

Extra fcap. 8vo,
3s. 6d. net.

Translated by W. HAMILTON FYFE.

Aberdeen Free Press.—"So far as English idiom permits, Mr. Fyfe's rendering is a striking success. Not only is it accurate and readable, but it also retains to a great extent the peculiar felicities of the original. . . . The caustic sayings of Tacitus lose nothing in their English dress. . . . The renderings of special expressions are often singularly happy."

IN THE PRESS.

VIRGIL. Translated into English Prose by JOHN JACKSON.

HESIOD. Translated by A. W. MAIR.

STATIUS SILVAE. Translated by D. A. SLATER.

THE WORKS OF ARISTOTLE

8vo,
3s. 6d. net.

Translated into English under the editorship of J. A. SMITH and W. D. ROSS.

Part I. THE PARVA NATURALIA. By J. S. BEARE and G. R. T. ROSS.

Athenaeum.—"The editors were fortunate in securing so capable a scholar as Professor Beare to undertake the greater part of the 'Parva Naturalia'; and if the rest of the series maintains the high level reached by the translators of the present section, the success of the scheme may be predicted with confidence."

Part II. DE LINEIS INSECVABILIBUS. By H. H. JOACHIM.

Athenaeum.—"The task of the translator in attempting to extract continuous sense from a document of this kind—written for the most part in harsh and compressed language, and dealing with a subject both abstruse and dry—is no light one. . . . Mr. Joachim shows a sound and independent judgment, and makes a number of valuable contributions to the study of the text."

ENGLISH SOCIETY IN THE ELEVENTH CENTURY

8vo,
16s. net.

Essays in English Mediaeval History. By Dr. PAUL VINOGRADOFF.

Morning Post.—"Historical scholars will unite in welcoming the promised appearance of the present series of essays, which is largely a study of the great Doomsday record, although, of course, it appeals to many collateral sources. . . . The constant reference alike to Romanised and to Northern parallels is one of the most illuminating features of this important work, on which we congratulate alike the University of Oxford and the growing body of historical students who are interested in the question with which Professor Vinogradoff deals."

A HISTORY OF THE PENINSULAR WAR

8vo,
14s. net.
each.

By CHARLES OMAN.

Vol. III. (Sept. 1809-Dec. 1810): OCANA—CADIZ—BUSSACO—TORRES VEDRAS. With 14 Maps and 5 Photographs and other Illustrations.

Already published: Vol. I. 1807-1809, to CORUNNA Vol. II. 1809, to TALAVERA.

Athenaeum.—"Mr. Oman's work is marked with a thoroughness of detail that is unhappily far from common in these days of text-books and popular compendiums. . . . This work is marked by a scholarly eagerness to make use of every available source."

BONAPARTISM

8vo,
2s. 6d. net.

Six Lectures delivered in the University of London. By H. A. L. FISHER.

Athenaeum.—"Deftness of touch and a happy choice of illustrative details are among the attractions of this volume, and scholars will feel instinctively that stores of learning are held in reserve which would suffice to make a bulky tome."

CATALOGUE OF THE COINS IN THE INDIAN MUSEUM, CALCUTTA

Including the Cabinet of the Asiatic Society of Bengal.
Royal 8vo,
40s. net.

Vol. III. MUGHAL EMPERORS OF INDIA.

By H. NELSON WRIGHT.

Previously published: Vol. I. By VINCENT A. SMITH. 30s. net; or separately, Part I. THE EARLY FOREIGN DYNASTIES AND THE GUPTAS. 15s. net. Part II. ANCIENT COINS OF INDIAN TYPES, 6s. net. Part III. PERSIAN, MEDIAEVAL, SOUTH INDIAN, AND MISCELLANEOUS COINS, 10s. 6d. net. Vol. II. Part I. THE SULTANS OF DELHI. Part II. CONTEMPORARY DYNASTIES IN INDIA, by H. NELSON WRIGHT, with 25 plates, 30s. net. (The first section of Part II. by Sir JAMES BOURDILLON.) (Published for the Trustees of the Indian Museum.)

Academy (Vol. II.).—"Will be of great value to seekers after first-hand data, whether for the study of Indian history or of Indian metrology. For the latter especially, this cabinet, with its large number of good specimens showing but little wear, is especially useful, and the simplicity of arrangement, together with the thoroughness of Mr. Wright's brief introduction to each section, makes this volume easy to handle, and far more attractive than we should have thought a catalogue of such monotonous coins could be. . . . In all points of real importance the catalogue is all a catalogue should be."

THE EARLY HISTORY OF INDIA

From 600 B.C. to the Muhammadan Conquest. Including the Invasion of Alexander the Great

8vo,
14s. net.

By V. A. SMITH. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. With Maps, Plans, and other Illustrations.

Nation.—"We heartily welcome a revised and enlarged edition of Mr. Vincent Smith's 'Early History of India.' . . . The work has already become the recognised text-book for all students of Indian history, and is one of the most remarkable productions of Anglo-Indian scholarship. The extreme difficulty makes Mr. Vincent Smith's success all the more notable."

THE IMPERIAL GAZETTEER OF INDIA NEW EDITION

8vo,
6s. net.
Morocco back,
7s. 6d. net.

Now Ready. Vol. II. HISTORICAL. Completing the Four Volumes of THE INDIAN EMPIRE.

Nature.—"The Gazetteer, which is issued in excellent form, and at a most moderate price, should be in the hands of all who are interested in the fortunes of India. It should remain for many years the most authoritative source of information regarding our great Eastern Empire. The Government of India and its official editors and contributors are to be congratulated on the completion of a work of national importance."

ANCIENT BRITAIN AND THE INVASIONS OF JULIUS CAESAR

8vo,
21s. net.

By T. RICE HOLMES.
With 44 Illustrations and 3 Maps.

Academy.—"The same thoroughness is as evident in this absorbing book as in the everyday work which has made for Dr. Holmes so many friends. . . . The mass of material that he has accumulated is not thrown before us in chaotic heaps; it is arranged docketed, labelled, with an almost terrifying precision; it all leads to something; and it is abundantly plain that the author has not rushed into his work, but that the building of it did not begin till the scaffolding was complete. Thus this work is not only epoch-making, but it is a book as well—an epoch-making book."

JUNE 6, 1908

"SCORPIO."

A book of forty-seven sonnets—Shakespearean in form—pronounced by an American critic as possessing "A Juvenalian gift of satire and a magnificent invective, as mordant as it is tremendous." Another has said of these sonnets: "Their form is classic. They are gems. Rich gems—rubies." Shakespeare lovers who have been as disgusted as this new Southern satirist at G. B. Shaw's comments thereon will see the latter handled "without gloves" therein.

ADAM CAST FORTH.

A Drama Founded on a Legend of Adam and Eve.

"Its spacious imaginings move in a world as austere in its lines as the desert itself. But like the desert they have grandeur, and at rare intervals a green oasis. In the latter scenes, especially, there come passages of a simple human beauty, like herbage round a spring in a bare land. We had expected magnificence from Mr. Doughty, but we do not know whether his moments of tenderness are not more impressive than his heroics. He has written a noble poem which will be welcomed by all who are worthy of an art that makes no concession to popularity."—Spectator.

LIFE AND LETTERS

We note with the deepest regret that Marlborough House continues to permit itself to be used as a stalking-horse for the noble house of Harmsworth. In the Daily Mail of Saturday last there appeared a large advertisement of the "Children's Encyclopædia," wherein we were assured that:

The welcome accorded to the "Children's Encyclopædia" by the Royal Children at Marlborough House is echoed in every home in the land where the future of the children is valued at more than $\frac{1}{4}$ d. a day.

We have been at the trouble to make search among the advertisements of the more reputable patent medicine vendors, and we fail to find there the smallest suggestion of recommendation from Marlborough House. Of course this is as it should be. For what reasons other, perhaps, than those of charity Marlborough House should go out of its way to help Carmelite House to sevenpences over a work which it is charitable to liken to a patent medicine passes our comprehension. We do not suppose for a moment that Marlborough House has knowledge of the flagrant manner in which its good name is being exploited by the publishers of this so-called encyclopædia. We have already expressed our opinion as to the value of the first number of the work. The sixth number—which is before us—bears evidence of much more careful editing than was bestowed upon No. 1. But the trail of the Carmelite is still over it all. And we are of opinion that a child had almost as well remain ignorant as derive its knowledge from such a quarter. In any case it is pathetic to imagine that the "Royal Children" are so put to it for suitable educational facilities that they must needs be brought up on a publication of this sort. And, in spite of Carmelite House's assertion to the contrary, we believe that it is precisely in those homes in the land where the future of the children is valued at more than a $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a day that the "Children's Encyclopædia" will in no circumstances be found.

Meanwhile it may be profitable for us to glance at the kind of fare which is being provided by the Harmsworths for households in which the future of the children is valued at not more than the aforesaid $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per day. For a penny, that is to say two days' future money, we have purchased Puck, "the new coloured humorous paper," which, however, happens to be in its eighth volume and its 202nd issue. It is a journal intended for children who can read, and no doubt Carmelite House intends it as a sort of finishing course after the Encyclopædia. We are not aware that Puck has been welcomed by the Royal children. In any case we can describe it only as an exceedingly vulgar publication containing a number of brutally ugly pictures and much foolish and futile writing. The Editor's view of what is suitable for the entertainment of children may be judged from the appended legend which appears under quite stupid drawings. (1) "Jilted for a silly-looking soldier like Tommy Atkins," said Jack Tar. 'Ah, ah! My heart is broken. I must win her back, my little Dolly Dimple!' (2) So Jack Tar mounted the sink and turned the tap on. 'Oh, horror!' gasped Dolly Dimple. 'I shall get my new frock wet, and mamma told me to be so careful.' (3) Then Jack Tar came along on the toy ark and rescued Dolly, but left Tommy food for the tiddlers." In another place we read, "Prythee, fayre lady, wilt thou permit me to take thine arm and arouse pangs of jealousy in the bosom of yonder wench? She has turned a deaf dear to the pipings of her faithful swain." And the whole letterpress is sprinkled with "Tee-hees," "Tee-hee-hoos," "Dot him one," "Hellup," "Great Grape-nuts," and similar exclamatory elegances.

It is to be presumed that in homes where the future of the children is valued at more than a $\frac{1}{4}$ d. a day Puck could not possibly enter. On the other hand, we know that the heart of childhood is desperately inclined to the prohibited article, and literary and artistic contraband is its especial delight. The Carmelite House authorities recognise this fault in the otherwise sweet nature of the immature, and naturally they must pander to it and make money out of it. If the politicians who were so zealous to abolish religious instruction from our State schools, and who are so careful of the childhood of the country that they will not allow a small boy to fetch a pint of beer for his father's dinner were to bring in a Bill to prohibit the sale and circulation of nefarious journals for children they would be rendering the country something of a service. Carmelite House issues a journal of the Puck order on each day of the week with the exception of Sunday. We have no hesitation in asserting that any child who gets hold of these journals is more than likely to be deeply injured by them, and that in the main they seem conceived utterly to stultify the real purposes of education, whether secular or otherwise. The brains of the country are of quite as much importance to it as its brawn and health. Puck and similar organs may be depended upon to fribble away the wits of childhood, and to weaken both the intellect and the character. Persons engaged in such an undesirable work are a good deal more dangerous to the State than the next burglar.

With reference to a letter on the subject of Christianity and Socialism which we print in our Correspondence columns, we are sorry to have to contradict Mr. Paine quite flatly on a point of fact. The vast majority of Socialists are atheists and Freethinkers, and the destruction of Christianity is one of the avowed aims of the vast majority of Socialists. Let Mr. Paine read Bax's "Religion of Socialism," let him study the "Socialist Catechism," and the "Red Catechism" taught in Socialist Sunday-schools. We will undertake that his eyes will be opened. It is quite true that the particular branch of Socialist propaganda with which Mr. Paine is associated is Christian. We refer of course to the Christian Social Union. The members of that Union are a small minority of Socialists; they are estimable people for whom we have respect, but while they fondly imagine that they are leavening the big lump of wickedness which is called Socialism they are in reality being made the tools of unscrupulous men. The whole trend of Socialism, not only in England, but in France, in Italy, and in Spain, is, and always has been, violently anti-Christian. As to the "scheme for taking land and capital out of private hands and transferring it to the public," it has been examined and exhaustively discussed by the ablest intellects of our times. It has been proved conclusively to be a false and mischievous fallacy. Intellectually it is as disreputable as the theory that the earth is flat. Mr. Mallock has pulverised it in "A Critical Examination of Socialism," and we can also refer Mr. Paine and others concerned to Mr. J. Ellis Barker's "British Socialism," and Mr. Arnold-Forster's "English Socialism of To-day," books all recently reviewed in THE ACADEMY. The subject is almost as old as the hills, and we are merely mentioning the most recent and modern exposures of Socialism.

The Observer, commenting on the oddities of the Pekin Board of Astronomy, which explains an epidemic of fires by a supposed descent of the God of Fire on earth, and beats tom-toms at an eclipse to scare away the dragon which is about to swallow up the sun or the moon, says :

It is not necessary to think that they really believe in the dragon, any more than that the students of the Middle Ages were really engaged in the quest of the Philosopher's Stone.

The Observer implies, evidently, that the quest of the Philosopher's Stone was a crazy and chimerical pursuit. But why? The writer has advanced beyond the old stage of thought which seemed to believe that everybody who lived in the Middle Ages was mad, or bad, or stupid—or all three at once; and one cannot but be grateful that this pestilent nonsense about the most wonderful period in human history is getting less common of utterance. But the assumption that there is some radical absurdity in the theory of alchemy is quite curious; the fact being that the alchemists were, theoretically, in advance of all but the most modern science. It is doubtful, indeed, whether modern science has even yet taken up its stand firmly on the ground that they occupied by ancient right.

Ten years ago—five years ago, perhaps—the student of chemistry would have been taught the doctrine of primitive and immutable elements, and, gold being such an element, it was clear that people who sought the art of making gold were idiots. But this doctrine is now an obsolete heresy; the mutatio rerum is a firmly-established truth; the electron, or force taking shape in many substances, has replaced the old "elemental" theory. It is curious to note, by the way, that Law, the English follower of Böhme, anticipated on his own lines, and without any traces of alchemical knowledge, this new-old doctrine. He spoke of a world that was originally plastic, and "fluid," subject to the will of the parens proloplastus. In consequence of a certain cosmic disaster this fluid world was hardened and degraded into its present state. It may be, then, that the making of gold was but the by-work, the accident, of a more transcendent operation, and if this were so, if the particular were put for the universal by some of the alchemical writers, we could better understand the strange air of rapture and ecstasy which pervades their works; we could understand their fervent disclaimer of any worldly motives. In itself the making of gold is no more wonderful than the making of diamonds, it is a quite possible item of intelligence in to-morrow's morning paper; but certain of the alchemical adepts speak the language of men who have entered into the glories and delights of Paradise.

It is not long since we drew attention in these columns to the differentia of "the modern spirit"—its utter inability to construct or to comprehend the simplest of syllogisms, its entire readiness to draw the most absurd conclusions from the most irrelevant premises. The instance we offered was a strong one, coming as it did from the "Great Philosopher" Herbert Spencer; it was the green tree of irrationality. Here is the dry wood of the same forest, as exemplified in the Westminster Gazette. It occurs, very appropriately, in a review of some treatise on "Modernism :

We hear occasionally of "Catholic Truth," which requires the efforts and subscriptions of a society to make it true. Such a conception is absurd. Truth cannot be sectarian. We might as well talk of Protestant Mathematics or Jewish Euclid.

From this passage we gather, firstly, that the truth needs no defence and no demonstration, from which it follows that the foundation of, say, an "English Historical Society," with a president, a committee, subscriptions, publications, and, possibly, a monthly organ would be absurd. History is the Truth about past events; therefore it would be ridiculous to make any efforts to clear up doubtful points, to elucidate complicated transactions, to defend sober and scholarly historical positions from the attacks of the cranks and maniacs who have discovered that Bacon wrote the whole literature of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, and that the Anglo-Saxons are the Lost Tribes of Israel. And, in the same way, medical writers are to beware of forming any organisation with a view to convincing people of the danger of sleeping ten in a room, of drinking infected water, of smoking green tea, of injecting morphia three times a day, and of believing in quack "Powders to cure Cancer." All these are heresies against the Truth of Medicine and Hygiene, therefore, no efforts, or subscriptions, or speeches, or pamphlets are needed to defend the Truth in question. It would thus be highly ridiculous for a doctor to fight the delusions and absurdities of "Christian Science" with all the knowledge and all the energy at his command.

And "Truth cannot be sectarian." If this means anything, it means that it is not possible to imagine the existence of a difference of opinion on any possible subject; that every "fact" of the universe must be absolutely clear and certain, and that from each of such facts there is only one conceivable deduction. It is difficult to believe that any man in his sober senses can have deliberately emitted such a proposition as this; yet, there it stands, and, considering all things, it is perhaps the most false statement that has ever been made since the world was "a fluid haze of light." Nevertheless, the writer's meaning is plain, for he goes on to say that one might as well talk of "Protestant Mathematics or Jewish Euclid;" whence it follows that this "modernist" reviewer believes that the propositions of religious truth are exactly analogous to the propositions of mathematical truth. Et homo factus est is as clear, self-evident, and certain as Two and two make four; Et resurrexit tertia die is a proposition as demonstrable as The angles at the base of an isosceles triangle are equal. Now, it is highly unlikely that there has been any radical alteration in the constitution of the human brain in the course of ages; yet here we have a grown man, of some education, endowed with a certain measure of literary facility, uttering propositions which would have proved a sure passport to the Rod and the Booby's Bench if they, or anything like unto them, had been advanced by an eight-year-old child in the twelfth century. The modern (or "modernist") spirit is certainly very curious.

The theatre just now is threatened by a wave of talk. Possibly the fashion may be traced to the brilliant plays of the late Mr. Oscar Wilde, who at any rate had an exquisite sense of the theatre. Then comes another Irishman, whose theatrical sense is obscured by a too great share of the national love of loquacity; and now we have Mr. Maurice Baring, who, in the presence of a most distinguished audience, produced a play called The Grey Stocking at the Royalty Theatre last week. Unhappily there was no sign of the play itself until late in the second Act, and even then the clever author seemed to be doing his best to strangle it at its belated birth. None the less, there were signs that Mr. Baring could, if he let nature alone, produce a play of real dramatic importance. As it was, what plot there was was almost suffocated by the torrents of quite ingenious talk put into the mouths of his "society" puppets. It was only fitting that the hero should be a Russian diplomatist. The reception was most cordial.

AT ST. NICHOLAS IN PRISIAC

On the altar-rail of St. Nicholas Church
Two little angels with wings of wood,
Each on the top of a slender perch
Stand in the stillness watching the Rood.

Little twin angels gowned in blue,
These are the words of a song for you :

"Praise ! praise ! for all days
To the man that made us with his hands ;
Many come from many lands
To gaze, gaze, and go their ways.

"Gloom, gloom has hidden his doom ;
Where he lies no man can tell.
Pray we a rose and a little bluebell,
Bloom, bloom about his tomb.

"In making us he praised the Lord,
Who made the man and made the tree,
And till the woodworm like a sword
Smites us to dust his prayer are we."

A. HUGH FISHER.

"AD EXTREMAS TENEBRAS"

I hear the lapping of the waves of death
In Stygian wells ;
I see the white-winged moths that bring the breath
Of asphodels.

I feel how steeply slopes toward the night
This awful track,
And see the narrowing disk of life and light
When I look back.

The flowers of Enna, falling from my hand,
Already die ;

I follow dumbly to the starless land
Too tired to sigh.

Yet if, O dread Aidoneus, one like me
May ask a boon,
I pray it may not be Persephone
Who meets me soon.

For in her heavy hair there still are gleams
Of former gold,
And in her sombre eyes lurk hopes and dreams
Of Springs untold.

She doth but winter in thy realms, O Dis,
Not nest with thee ;
Her regal mouth, still haunted by a kiss,
Would weary me.

But let there meet me one too poor for scorn,
Dim-eyed, and hoar,
Wan as Demeter when she sat forlorn
By Celeus' door.

And let Tiresias come who, shrinking, knows
A woman's heart,
To lead me where the Lethe coldest flows
And pitying yew its closest covert grows
Far off, apart.

MR. BIRRELL ON BROWNING

Browning. Selected Poems. With an Introduction by AUGUSTINE BIRRELL. Illustrated. (Jack, 2s. 6d. net.)

"PRAVE 'ORTS" are these of Mr. Birrell on Browning. There is something in him of the eternal fighter, and always in his best writing something brave and challenging. He enters upon contention blithely, and loves to champion an old cause or avow some impossible loyalty. Like Leslie Stephen, he is essentially a prose critic, and perhaps would cheerfully agree that what he says about poetry, as poetry, does not matter in the least. If he were to tell us that Shelley was no poet, and that Coleridge's fame is less secure than Southey's, we should not be in the least annoyed, so genial is he. He refuses to take himself very seriously (at least in criticism), and would only smile if we took him seriously. Yet there are few living essayists we read more readily or with more pleasure. As a critic of prose, as an interpreter of the prose mind (far be it from us to suggest any disparagement), he is stimulating and delightful. He has a share of the sound common sense of Johnson, whom he understands so well, the gusto of Hazlitt, whom he has served so well, and a humorous shrewdness that is purely his own. It is therefore an admirable arrangement whereby these hearty qualities are engaged in the appreciation of Browning, for we think that a prose critic can do fully as much for Browning as the most sensitive reporter of impressions or the most transcendental of philosophical critics. If you do not agree with Mr. Birrell (as is sometimes impossible), he is quite content to agree with himself. He will always have a reason for the faith that is in him, and if he does not convert you to his faith, he will certainly entertain you by his reason. You know that in the present volume, for example, he will not read any brilliant unveracities into the cruder and more cryptic utterances of his poet. He will say—yes, he does say in his Introduction :

Of Browning's philosophy we have perhaps heard enough. There is indeed a philosophy of life, a constant attitude of mind towards the world, a character and sentiment which we look for in poets and poetry, and if it is not there the poetry suffers. But philosophy in poetry is usually no great thing.

This is indeed to "give away" his poet, yet even Browning Societies will hardly quarrel with so good-humoured a betrayal.

The prose critic is the best for Browning because Browning, though he wrote uniquely and magnificently in verse, so often simply wrote prose as verse—wrote verse when he had prose in his heart. To put it more clearly and emphatically, much that Browning wrote in verse would have been written not merely more plainly, but more fittingly and perfectly in prose. We do not say that his subjects were incapable of verse, but it often seems that he dealt with them from a prose level. Such a selection as Mr. Birrell's for the most part avoids the prose level, and lures the reader from height to height. He has made the only wise selection by the "supremely selfish" plan of pleasing himself ; and we ourselves would be no less pleased if only he had omitted "Bishop Blougram's Apology," which, in spite of his championship, we still find tedious philosophy and (commonly) poor verse ; verse such as :

Of course you are remarking all this time
How narrowly and grossly I view life.

Some thirty of Mr. Birrell's three hundred pages are taken up with the voluble Bishop, which might well have been given to some of the songs, such as that lovely one beginning :

Heap cassia, sandal-buds and stripes
Of labdanum, and aloe balls—

the loveliness of which (as with so many true lyrics) is almost independent of the explicit meaning.

Mr. Birrell says nothing upon the obscurity with which Browning is so often charged. Wisely : for the charge is an idle and inconclusive one. The real defect of his work lies deeper than any mere verbal obscurity. The difficulty of expression is not invincible—at worst only irritating ; but too often it seems that Browning did not speak clearly because he did not think clearly, because his inspiration was faint and confused. We have been told often enough that platitude which has the beauty of sounding brass or tinkling cymbal is still but platitude, but we forget that platitude made tortuous and indistinct is also platitude still. Did Browning deceive himself ? At any rate, he has deceived others until the incoherencies and verbal tangles have been held to conceal mysteries which it is not lawful or possible for tongue to utter ; and the crying faults of the verse, the wilful and careless roughness, the almost incessant restlessness, the obvious contempt for words—all betraying a certain singular strain of intellectual vulgarity—have themselves been first pardoned, and then accepted as necessary to the genius of the poet. Even in the noble "Abt Vogler" you will find a line like this :

In sight ? Not half ! for it seemed, it was certain, to match man's birth.

In "James Lee's Wife :

For then, then, what would it matter to me
That I was the harsh ill-favoured one ?
We both should be like as pea to pea ;
It was ever so since the world begun ;
So let me proceed with my reverie.

How ill he writes when his inspiration is less perfect than in "Abt Vogler" every reader knows.

Never has there been so careless a craftsman with so great gifts. He had almost every gift which even a poet may be expected to have, and he had that special and peculiar gift, an individuality which was bound to impress itself upon his earliest as upon his latest work ; for he was never the "sedulous ape" of prose. But the gift needed to bring all others to full flower, gift of a passion for perfect expression of his conceptions and perfect form for his imaginations—this he had not, or had but intermittently and in uncertain measure ; though many another poet, with but a tithe of his prodigious intellectual endowment, has had sufficient of this consummate passion to bring him securely into the unassailable temple of immortality. Of their best work we may say, in Browning's own phrase (a phrase that at least shows his perception to have been clear and accurate, how flawed soever his practice) :

It is all triumphant art, but art in obedience to laws.

Time, who is himself a more consummate artist than any poet, and of an austerer judgment than any critic, is slowly casting many of the faultiest things into oblivion, lightening the craft to save it ; he will not cumber himself with anything but a man's best, and no urgent pleading will persuade him to pardon the unpardonable sin and preserve the flaws for the sake of the philosophy. Mr. Birrell himself frankly recognises this :

We must distinguish in Browning's case between poems and poems. Some wrecks are total, from others half the cargo may be saved. . . . A good fraction there must always be. You can never get rid of Browning at his best. There he will be in the thick of life, appearing in books, emerging in conversation, on the lips of lovers, in the sermons of divines, in moments of eager emotion, and in times of sorrow.

With this judicial pronouncement both sides may rest satisfied. It is no contemptible immortality. Surely it is much if, out of the enormous conglomeration of the collected poems, only some of the songs and shorter pieces be saved, and the giant confusion of the rest be left to curious and enthusiastic scholars. In another metaphor Browning is a continent in miniature, with crowded cities of men who love and wrangle, and die in the suburbs ; with hills and sudden mountain peaks ; with leagues of wild morass, lands broken and comfortless as those of Childe Roland's adventure, with here and there forests of fervid heat ; with unnavigable rivers and brackish inland seas. For some it will always be a fairy land, the more prized because perilous and bewildering to sense.

A ROYAL MANOR

The Royal Manor of Richmond. By MRS. A. G. BELL.
(George Bell and Sons, 7s. 6d. net.)

THE Royal Manor of Richmond has attracted a variety of writers during recent years, such as Sir John Evans, Mr. Beresford Chancellor, and Dr. Garnett ; but it has been left for Mrs. Arthur Bell to produce a thoroughly readable and entertaining volume of reasonable limits, attractively illustrated by her husband with ten plates in colour. One of these pictures, a Winter Sunrise in Richmond Park, is of exceptional merit. There is no strain after effective writing in these pages ; in fact, they strike us as being written with graceful ease. The passage relative to the winter aspect of the Great Park may be cited as an example :

Even more beautiful than its ordinary winter aspect is the Park when snow has fallen, and all is transformed and etherealised by the pure white covering in which everything is shrouded, when familiar objects are so changed that recognition is difficult, and the very deer seem to feel themselves at a loss as they roam about in search of food. To the poetic temperament the time of frost will indeed appeal with special force, but it is really at night, at every season of the year, when there is no light in earth or heaven but the pale light of stars, that Richmond Park excels itself in its romantic charm, for then to all its other attractions is added that of mystery. Through the darkness loom the huge forms of the forest trees, resembling the ogres of fairyland, isolated hawthorns, some of which even in bright sunshine look as if a curse had fallen upon them, so weird and distorted are their forms, seem to stretch out long fingers to clutch the unwary. Strange, too, and impressively solemn are the rare sounds that break the brooding silence, for now a stag gives vent to a roar of discontent, or a lonely hound, craving for companionship, utters a melancholy howl. Then, perhaps, a heron, on his way to his solitary fishing in the river near Sion House, calls to his mate ; a nightjar sounds his vibrating whirr, like that of a spinning-wheel, as he peers down from his lofty perch ; or an owl mournfully complains as he passes by with muffled flight, intent on his living prey—perhaps a young rabbit, or a little shrew that has lost its way in the long grass and betrays its presence by a plaintive cry.

The opening chapter is concerned with the ancient Manor House of Sheen, which had an interesting history of its own long before the time when it was transformed into a palace by Henry VII., who gave to it his own name of Richmond. During the latter years of his strenuous life Edward I. was more than once at Sheen. It was in the old manor house that he received the Commissioners from Scotland in 1305, after the unhappy execution in London of Sir William Wallace. It was here, too, that Edward III. often held his Court, entertaining distinguished foreigners on a magnificent scale. There are many memories associated with this peaceful riverside home in connection with his Queen Philippa and his beloved Black Prince, and it was here that the news of his death reached his widowed father a year before the King himself passed away. It was at Sheen also that Edward III. died his sorry death in 1377 :

Deserted by all his courtiers, and attended by but a single priest, whose presence did not deter his rapacious mistress from robbing her dying lover even of the rings upon his fingers.

Soon after the funeral a deputation of the leading citizens of London went down to Sheen to congratulate the child-king Richard II., then only ten years old, on his accession to the Throne. It is pleasant to be reminded that the boyhood of the youthful Sovereign caused him to forget his dignity in his delight, for he ran round the great hall eagerly embracing his guests and kissing them on both cheeks instead of waiting for them to do homage to him. On the following day Richard, robed in white and riding on a white horse, went forth from Sheen to make formal entry into his capital, attended by his four uncles and a great retinue of nobles. In his earlier, happy days, after his marriage in 1382 to Anne of Bohemia, Sheen was a favourite residence of both King and Queen. On the death of his Queen at Sheen, in 1394, Richard took a great dislike to his riverside residence, and, indeed, ordered that it should be at once completely destroyed. But he was apparently only partially obeyed, for Henry V. lived there for some time when Prince of Wales, and on his accession had the old buildings restored and made once more worthy of the name of palace. There he spent a brief but happy time with his young Queen, Catherine of France, whom he brought to England in 1421.

During the long minority of Henry VI., Sheen was almost deserted, and it was practically as a prisoner that this unfortunate King, declared insane by his physicians, was taken to Sheen in 1454. Edward IV. gave the estate of Sheen to his Queen, Elizabeth, in 1467 for her life, and it was here that Elizabeth, after the death of Edward, when waiting for the summons to the capital, received the tidings of the murder of her two young sons in the Tower. After Richard III. met the just reward of his many sins at the Battle of Bosworth, Henry VII., the second Earl of Richmond, in Yorkshire, determined to change its name to that of his hereditary estate, and speedily extended the buildings of Sheen Palace and added considerably to the pleasure-grounds. From this time forward Richmond—for its new name was rigidly enforced in all State papers—was closely bound up with the story of the Tudor dynasty, and was the scene of an infinite variety of national and important incidents. Just at the close of the fifteenth century the great pile of buildings was almost entirely destroyed by fire. Henry VII., however, at once set to work to have Richmond Palace rebuilt on a far larger and more majestic scale. The latest phase of Gothic architecture of the Tudor period was employed without any touch of classicism to interfere with the due development of the Tudor style, which was so essentially English. Until Cardinal Wolsey, in 1526, transferred to Henry VIII. his unfinished but grandly planned mansion of Hampton Court, the Palace of Richmond remained by far the noblest residence of either Henry VII. or his successor. The rebuilt Richmond was completed in time for the contract of marriage to take place, in 1501, between his eldest son, Prince Arthur, and Catherine of Aragon.

It was at Richmond that Henry VII. died; it was here that Henry VIII. spent his honeymoon with his first wife, and it was here that his first child—a son—was born, on New Year's Day, 1511. In attractively-written paragraphs, containing just a sufficiency of accurate historical information for a book of this character, Mrs. Bell proceeds to follow up the later history of the Royal Palace of Richmond, down to the time when Queen Caroline passed away, in 1737. For the next half-century Richmond remained deserted by the Royal Family, nor is there any record of either George IV. or William IV. ever living in the Palace, though they may have been there as children. By the time Queen Victoria came to the Throne many of the remaining portions of the grand old mansion, much of which had been deliberately demolished in the reign of Queen Anne, had been pulled down. In its palmy days the buildings of all kinds are said to have covered more than ten acres of ground. The small remnant of the old Palace still remaining has, however, been treated with respect by its successive tenants during the past seventy years.

In subsequent chapters interesting information is pleasantly set forth with regard to the royal lodge, the Old Deer Park, the Ferry, the bridge, the green, and the town with its churches and charities. A special section treats of the Great Park and its inhabitants, particularly the deer.

In the last two chapters there is much agreeable writing about Petersham, Ham House, and Kew and its memories. We can only say, in conclusion, that having read most, if not all, of the many topographical works that have been issued about the various interesting and historic sites and places within easy reach of London that have been issued during the last forty years, we have no hesitation in saying that Mrs. Bell is to be congratulated on having produced one of the very first rank.

WILLIAM COLLINS

The Poems of William Collins. Edited by CHRISTOPHER STONE. (Frowde, 2s. 6d. net.)

CRITICISM has given up the idea of cataclysms in literature, just as science has given up the idea of cataclysms in Nature. It sees developments not as sudden events which can be dated to a particular period and declared to have occurred at that period without warning or preparation. Changes in literature, as in the face of the earth, are now seen to be of slow growth. There are premonitions of them; the process goes on undiscovered by the critics of its own day, who, perhaps, are too busy preaching their own formulæ to watch the straws which indicate the change in the wind. Then, with a fictitious appearance of suddenness, the face of literature is changed, and not for many years, perhaps, is the truth made plain. When Voltaire visited England he laid the foundations of "Hernani" and the "Ballade à la Lune." And when the French Revolution came to affect English thought, it forced to the surface and gave free play to streams of effort and tendency that had been working silently, with no man seeing their significance and direction, for many years.

The case of William Collins is an instance of this. The romantics of a century ago honoured him, of course; but it is only lately that he has had his full share of attention, and that his full importance as a forerunner of the romantics has been recognised in criticism. The poet with whom he must always be coupled, Gray, has had a far greater vogue, won for him on the one hand among amateurs of poetry by his exquisite workmanship and his profound critical faculty, and on the other among la foule by what we may, perhaps, be permitted to call the B. W. Leader elements in a single one of his poems. Yet in spite of the much misjudged beauties of the famous Elegy (and really it is not Gray's fault that the weaker Academicians cannot let him alone when they want titles for their pictures), his place in the development of our poetry was not, perhaps, on the whole, so important as that of the much-less popular Collins. Nor is the melancholy collegian either so attractive or so significant a figure as the dashing, showy Winchester and Magdalen boy, with his love of fine clothes and fine airs, his teeming brain and indifferent perseverance, his wide but disordered knowledge, his sensitive, excitable nature which sank, under his own and others' fault, into the melancholia and the inertia in which, under the offensive protection of a sister who despised him, his last unhappy years were spent.

Had Collins left but the less valuable part of his own poetry, had the bulk of it survived without the gems which ensure him immortality, he would still have deserved commemoration among the English poets. Pope had stamped his overbearing genius on poetry, and Pope had died. In the silence that followed his death there was heard a new note. That note was inevitably affected by the approved song of the times; nevertheless it was a fearless note. The singer did not "stoop to moralise this song;" he did not care overmuch for "decency" or "simplicity" of expression. He had, as Hazlitt said, "that true vivida vis, that genuine inspiration, which alone can give birth to the highest efforts of poetry." He caught "rich glimpses of the bowers of paradise." He gave the rein to his luxuriant imagination, and, refusing to be bound by the prevailing mode, wrote, with courage and ardour, what he wanted to write. If his structure is loose, his metaphors violent, his workmanship sometimes rugged, and his diction obscure, he had at least the poetic fire, the enthusiasm, which his friends the Wartons were alone in those days in demanding. And the value to poetry of enthusiasm at such a period was immense.

It is quite possible, however, to be of considerable service to poetry and yet to be a dull or annoying poet. Happily, that cannot be said of Collins; and Mr.

Christopher Stone has not spent his time in scraping and arranging dead bones for the poetic museum. There are things in Collins's poetry, sometimes isolated, sometimes structural, which are so beautiful as to take the breath away. The "Ode to Pity" is not, as a complete poem, a thing of much beauty or interest. It has a good deal of the stiffness and demureness of the dead classic style about it. Yet it contains these lines :

Long, Pity, let the Nations view
Thy sky-worn Robes of tend'rest Blue,
And Eyes of dewy Light !

What images that evokes ! How much more it gives to the mind and the imagination than the mere meaning of the words conveys ! And perhaps that is Collins's greatest achievement of all : that he was the first to restore to our poetry what Henry Bataille calls "le langage indirect." His meaning is not confined to the meaning which his actual words express. He makes of a few words not a sentence or a sentiment, but a star towards which the mind and the imagination go travelling through heavens of beauty. And surely that is the test of the greatest poetry—not what it says, but the new world which it creates by saying it. Collins not seldom creates this magic world, and wraps his reader away with him by the enthusiasm which inspired his song, as if with verbal inspiration. Few poets can paint such gorgeous pictures as he ; the second movement of the "Ode on the Poetical Character," and the whole of the ode on "The Passions," with its superb close, show as glowing a fancy and as lofty a flight of poetic eloquence as can be found in any of our poets, except possibly Mr. Swinburne. And if his craftsmanship is sometimes rugged, Collins achieves more than once that rarest thing of all, a perfect simplicity instinct with the highest qualities of poetry :

How sleep the Brave, who sink to Rest,
By all their Country's Wishes blest !
When Spring, with dewy Fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallow'd Mold,
She there shall dress a sweeter Sod
Than Fancy's Feet have ever trod.

By Fairy Hands their Knell is rung,
By Forms unseen their Dirge is sung ;
Then Honour comes, a Pilgrim grey,
To bless the Turf that wraps their Clay,
And Freedom shall a-while repair,
To dwell a weeping Hermit there !

That indeed creates a new world. Without a trace of effort, without grandiloquence or display, it soars into the blue, and would be enough of itself to stamp its author a true poet. But finer still is the poem which, in spite of the obvious objections that have been levelled against it, we take leave to consider Collins's highest achievement and the best unrhymed lyric in the English language—better even than Champion's "Rose-cheeked Laura"—the "Ode to Evening :

If aught of Oaten Stop, or Pastoral Song,
May hope, chaste Eve, to soothe thy pensive Ear,
Like thy own solemn Springs,
Thy Springs, and dying Gales,
O Nymph reserv'd
For when thy folding Star arising shows
His paly Circlet, at his warning Lamp
The fragrant Hours, and Elves
Who slept in Flowers the Day,
And many a Nymph who wreaths her Brows with Sedge
And sheds the fresh'ning Dew, and lovelier still,
The Pensive Pleasures sweet
Prepare thy shadowy Car.
Then let me rove some wild and heathy Scene,
Or find some Ruin 'midst its dreary Dells,
Whose Walls more awful nod
By thy religious Gleams.
Or if chill blust'ring Winds, or driving Rain,
Prevent my willing Feet, be mine the Hut,
That from the Mountain's side
Views Wilds, and swelling Floods,
And Hamlets brown, and dim-discover'd Spires,
And hears their simple Bell, and marks o'er all Thy Dewy Fingers draw
The gradual dusky Veil.

It paints an earthly picture, which is yet not of earth ; it creates a mood and carries the reader away into the region of pure poetry ; it intoxicates him with the intoxication of the gods. And yet, how quiet, how natural it all is—how entirely free from bombast or affectation or false elevation or false sentiment ! When the famous Stoke Poges "Elegy" palls, the "Ode to Evening" seems still a mystery of delight. And, though Mr. Stone prints the ode from the only authoritative edition—that of 1746—the Dodsley version of it is so much better known and loved that we have ventured to quote from it above.

It only remains to say that Mr. Stone, who has given evidence in these columns already of his close study of Collins, has produced a complete and scholarly edition, with an admirable introduction. These are very pleasant green volumes that come from the publisher to Collins's University, and the latest will not be the least prized among them.

GOETHE'S LIFE

The Life of Goethe. By ALBERT BIELOCHOWSKY, Ph.D.
Vol. III. (London and New York : Putnam, 1908.)

THIS is the concluding volume of the late Professor Bielochowsky's "Life of Goethe," a work which makes every possible pretence to be monumental. It is no doubt the last word of German professorial criticism of the great poet. Its pomposity and ponderosity are extreme, and though it claims to throw light upon the obscurities of portions of Goethe's work, the style in which it is written is confused and obscure to a degree which is often very tiresome, and unfortunately the defects of the original text are in no way helped out by Mr. William Cooper's translation. Here is a specimen of badly-arranged sentences which we have rarely seen beaten in any translation from the German or any other language, and in a book devoted to the memory of such a master of flowing periods as was Goethe it is an act of literary lèse majesté :

The Elegie, that painful, yet sweet reflection of the wonderfully beautiful summer days. Was not its effect upon him a clear indication of the direction in which he should turn for self-preservation ? Thus, at the close of the year, we find him free from all thoughts of renunciation, and looking forward to the new year with anxious, but happy anticipation.

Nothing could be more hideous and irritating than this crash of 'shons, and that such English as this should be issued from Stanford University in the United States is no credit to that seat of learning. The lover of Goethe who is not blinded by national pride will not feel, we are convinced, that Professor Bielochowsky has drawn either a felicitous or truthful portrait of the author of "Faust." The concluding volume, it is true, contains less of the Professor's literary criticisms than did its predecessors, death having, sad to relate, stepped in to prevent the completion of the biography by the industrious hand that originally undertook it ; but the hands which have added the final chapters are, alas ! not a whit less heavy. In fact, it is no exaggeration to say that the added essays upon Goethe's standing as a philosopher and a man of letters by Professors Kalischer and Ziegler are so clumsily and obscurely written that they make the reader regret the comparatively lighter style of the late Professor Bielochowsky, whose fluent platitudes, irritating as they often were, were not so positively maddening as the illogical word-puzzles of his posthumous collaborators. We are spared, however, the professorial hole-picking in the art of Goethe considered as a poet, and in his conceptions as a thinker, which characterised the earlier volumes of Professor Bielochowsky's work, and were so curiously inconsistent with the theory simultaneously advanced that he was the greatest poet of all time—as if, in that case, the blue and red pencillings of German professors would not have been an intolerable impertinence. The final volume is a thunderous eulogy in the most approved modern German style, and Goethe emerges from it as a kind of Pan-Germanic demi-god, invested with intellectual and poetic powers which practically amounted to omniscience and omnipotence. In the present state of Germany, such a theory as this may give pleasure in popular and official circles, but it has neither historical fact nor critical reasonableness as a basis. When will the honest German critic be born who will stand forth in his simplicity and say that the second part of "Faust" is the radolage of a very old man of once brilliant intellect who had not known when to stop writing, and had long ago lost the thread of his first conceptions? This the poet himself practically admitted to be the case. But for the officious advice of his friends—notably of Schiller—he would have left "Faust" in its original state as a fragment. But it was an age of minute finish, and the German world was not as yet prepared for such Rodinesque surrender to the ineffable and the unfixable as Coleridge was to set the example of in "Christabel" and "Kubla Khan":

These Gretchen scenes, says Professor Ziegler, taken together form probably the greatest masterpiece of poetry every written. Infinite in their beauty and tenderness, they are at the same time so profoundly tragical that all the woes of mankind appear in the most narrow limits of the life of a girl of the common people. First, Faust's senses are inflamed at the sight of Gretchen. In the "Urfaust" (the first version of "Faust") we read: "A wondrous pretty maid is she, And something she's inflamed in me." Hardly has he seen her when he says to Mephistophiles, "Hear! thou must the girl for me procure." The potion has had its effect; he speaks like Jack Profligate, speaks almost like a Frenchman. . . . To Gretchen, the divining angel, after her return home, the air of the room feels sultry and close. As though prophesying her own future, she sings "Der König in Thule," that ballad of fidelity and parting. Then she finds the casket. "What the dickens is this thing?" exclaims the child of the common people; and she cannot take her eyes off its contents, for "Gold all doth lure, And gold procure all gladly! Alas! we poor!"

This is a fair specimen of the critical analysis which is to be found in this concluding volume of Bielochofsky's "Life of Goethe," and also of Mr. Cooper's method of translation. The wretched doggerel into which he converts Goethe's nervous and harmonious lines can only give a totally erroneous impression of the original text, and are unfair to the great reputation which this stodgy book is meant to honour. Goethe did not share his biographers' views as to the value of these "Gretchen scenes." "Wavering figures," "clouded vision," "fantastic idea," "foggy mist" were the terms in which he referred to them. In his correspondence with Schiller he spoke also of this "foggy, misty path" on which he had for a time felt forced "to stray about." He called the whole "a barbaric composition," and "caricatures" the scenes and figures which, according to Professor Ziegler, "appear to us to-day so serious and true to nature, not to say sacred." Schiller, who was just as classical as his friend, agreed with him as to the "barbaric nature of his treatment of the subject," and himself called the fable "harsh and formless." Professor Ziegler attributes this disdainful attitude towards "Faust" on the part of its author to the circumstance that Goethe had outgrown "Faust" and that "Faust" had outgrown Goethe. The first clause of this explanation is probable enough; the corollary is less obvious. Evidently Goethe as he grew older must have recognised the puerility and inexperience which are at the basis of the entire Gretchen incident—a simple fait divers which would have been possible only on the assumption that Faust's powers of seduction were as limited as those of an ordinary human lover. No real tragedy can ever arise from a situation which has its origin in magic. With all the riches in the world at his command, Faust could have made Gretchen, her mother, and her brother wealthy for life, even procuring for them the respect of the world which wealth commands, and if the principle of "Gold all doth lure, And gold procure" was to apply so absolutely to the pure soul of Gretchen there is no reason for its not having precisely the same force with her mother, her brother, her neighbours, and her judges. Faust's conduct is that of a seducer with limited means. The real moral might have been that neither wealth nor the enjoyment of feminine loveliness can give perfect happiness on earth, and in the long run Faust's soul might have been saved owing to the utter inability of Mephisto to fulfil his part of the bargain—namely, to make Faust happy in this life. Then the Gretchen incident, so far as its tragic conclusion is concerned, would have been supererogatory. Goethe no doubt recognised in later life that it was so, and the meaninglessness of the Gretchen scenes justify Schiller's epithets applied to the fable of "harsh and formless." Marlowe fell into no such mistake. His Doctor Faustus spends a few moments of delirious bliss with Helen of Greece, but in an earlier part of the drama, when Faustus, not having quite grasped the nature of his new powers, expresses the desire to have a wife, Mephistophiles introduces to him a she-devil, and promptly cures him of this too mundane ambition. The Gretchen tragedy was just fitted to inspire the feuilletonesque music of Gounod, and to become a popular opera. Goethe outgrew it, and, recognising that the vast edifice of "Faust," built upon sand, had collapsed, he saw no objection to treating it as a kind of scrap-heap, or, to use Professor Ziegler own words, to Thoughtlessly insert all sorts of irrelevant things in the "barbaric composition," and make it the depository for a number of Xenien, for which he could find no other place.

In this way, however, "Faust" became a treasure-house for many exquisite poems which, considered separately, are pearls of highest price, and suffice to make Goethe's fame immortal. Goethe's mania for generalisation and theorising which inspired his abortive scientific studies, and his fantastic philosophy, induced him to give to the first and fragmentary part of "Faust" a symbolic second and concluding part. A hopeless muddle of politics, religion, pseudo-science, and amateur philosophy, presented in allegorical and symbolic form, and occasionally relieved by exquisite lines and gem-like stanzas, are thus presented as a rational sequel to what was a frank and charming pol-pourri. Out of unintelligible muddle pretentious German critics have made an infinitely more monstrous muddle by reading into the second part of "Faust" a kind of résumé of all human thought and knowledge, "a picture of the world and mankind," the "human tragedy," the "drama of the human race," "the individual widened out to the universal human." "Such is 'Faust,'" says Professor Ziegler, "and such was Goethe." Such, alas! is his latest biographer.

A similar determination to make everything out of little, and something out of nothing, is revealed in Professor Kalischer's account of Goethe as a man of science. Goethe was undoubtedly (and in this respect he closely resembled the great Frenchman, for whom he professed so unbounded an admiration, Voltaire) a tireless stirrer-up of ideas. Most poets have been this, for to stir up ideas is one of the functions of the imaginative faculty. Thus Goethe's botanical speculations were part of his poetry, and had he recognised this and been less eager to play the rôle of an exact investigator he might have accomplished a much more useful work than he can actually be credited with. If we were to listen to the airy suggestions of Professor Kalischer we should be led to believe that Goethe had forecast most of the principles upon which modern biology is based. His theory of what he called the "metamorphose" of plants Professor Kalischer says may be identified with the modern (?) principle of transformism accepted by botanists; but surely it is going too far to imply that Goethe anticipated thereby the evolutionary theory of Darwin. Goethe's "metamorphose" amounted to no more than this, that he recognised all the appendages or lateral organs of the plant axis or stalk to be transformed or metamorphosed leaves, and we know that one of his own countrymen, Wolff, had already enunciated the same doctrine. Goethe, moreover, had no notion of the elementary organism, the cell. From Goethe the poet one might have expected to receive fruitful suggestions as to the psychology of plants, a subject admirably suited to his splendid imaginative receptivity, but Goethe the would-be man of science could not resist the vain temptation to measure himself with Linnæus. Perhaps in one of his letters, when he uses the phrase "conversed familiarly with the branches and tendrils of the grape-vines, which gave me good new ideas," he might have been dimly conscious of those powers of suggestion possessed by plants and immobile bodies generally, to a knowledge of which modern science is slowly opening its eyes. But the positive results achieved by Goethe as a scientific investigator matter little, and there is no need for German professors to magnify or distort them. Goethe's greatness rests upon much grander foundations. He is Germany's supreme artist—a great imaginative poet in word and deed, the one, with all its limitations, entirely admirable German of comparatively modern times. To appreciate the many-sided greatness of his splendid genius such a biography as that of the late Professor Bielowchowsky is too subjective (to employ the favourite German word). A far more useful and suggestive "Life" is that by Heinrich Düntzer, the excellent translation of which, by Mr. Thomas W. Lyster, has just been reissued in a half-crown edition by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY

[THIRD ARTICLE]

THE Royal Academy Exhibition of 1908 has now been open for a clear month. If one visits such exhibitions at all it is desirable that one should visit them twice or thrice. The shock of an initial visit is perhaps sufficient for most of us. But duty must be done. No critic of parts can profess to swallow the true inwardness of a matter of 1,000 painted canvases during the course of an hour's walk round the galleries. At least so we should have imagined. Hence we have called once more at Burlington House, and we have suffered accordingly. Our opinion of the show as set forward in former articles remains precisely what it was. The more closely one looks into the Exhibition the more pitiful does it seem. The masters not only fail to distinguish themselves, but, broadly speaking, they have treated us to spiritless failures or positive eyesores. The middling and minor men may be counted so many copyists, in the sense that they depend upon their supposed betters for inspiration and method. They have no souls to call their own. Their portraits are in the manner of Sargent and their general efforts in the manner of the mannerists. We do not desire to thrash dead horses or airily to condemn the thousand or so honest toilers in paint whose work looks down on us from these walls. But taking the Exhibition gallery by gallery we are forced to the conclusion that incapacity, wrongness, want of vision, dulness, and insincerity are its prevailing characteristics.

Great pictures being out of the question, we have taken the trouble to go round the galleries without catalogue and to note down the numbers of such pictures as may be considered worthy in intention or accomplishment, pictures in fact which one might hang upon one's walls for the pleasure of seeing them and without regard to their authorship or market value. In Gallery I. we find but a single work that is satisfying. The picture is numbered 22 and called "Poplars," the artist being a Mr. C. H. H. Burleigh. In Gallery II. we lighted upon Nos. 83, 102, 106, 123, and 136, which on reference to the catalogue turn out respectively to be "Bords de Rivière," by P. A. J. Dagnan-Bouveret, "The Flamingoes," by Edward Stott, "Hermia," by W. G. Simmonds, "Autumn," by James Wallace, and "Scenes of a Childhood," by E. J. Gregory. We must call particular attention to Mr. W. G. Simmonds's "Hermia," which is a fine piece of work and worth a wilderness of "Sentences of Death" and so forth. Gallery III. contains—nothing. In Gallery IV. there is "The Meeting-house," by Frank Craig, which, in spite of its tendency to be a little mechanical, is full of fundamental thought. And there is "Evening on the Sussex Downs," by Sir Ernest Waterlow, R.A., one of the few canvases by a Royal Academician which has merit. No. 279, "The Land-locked Bay," by Herbert Draper, is another reasonable picture in this gallery. In Room V. we find "Spring," by Christopher Williams, and "The Legend of our Lady of Boulogne." The "Spring" is admirable: "The Lady of Boulogne" we mention because the artist has set himself to do something without any sort of eye on the dealers, and he promises. Room VI. offers us "A Spring Morning," by Adrian Stokes, "Autumn Glory," by Frank T. Carter, "Autumn at Grez," by Thomas Gough, and "An Ocean Sunset," by W. Ayerst Ingram; while in Gallery VII. there is a picture called "Threading the Needle," by Cecil Jay. In the eighth Room there is nothing of note, unless we except "The Bathers," by George C. Haité, and "The Magic Pipe," by Eva Roos. In Gallery IX. we have "Spindrift," by Thomas Maybank, "The Fan Tree, Limpsfield," by W. G. Robb, and "Sunset at Southend," by Frederick J. Sang. "Springtime on the Hills," by Edward T. Jones, "Heat Haze," by Edward G. Du Val, "La Première Communion," by G. Sherwood Hunter, and "Deep in the Maze of Summer Woods," by R. Vicat Cole, in Gallery X., and "The Sandpit," by Edward L. Lawrenson in Gallery XI., are further performances which, slight though they may be, we should single out for praise. It is quite possible, of course, that we have missed other good and notable work, but we doubt it. We do not suggest that the men whose names we have mentioned represent the top of English art, or that they are the only contributors to the Royal Academy Exhibition who deserve well of the critics. But we assert that the works they exhibit are broadly the only works in this year's Exhibition that should be allowed to pass muster when one comes to talk about pictures. The plain fact is that if the broad-shouldered, genial Englishman is to paint for us with acceptance it is imperative upon him to forget all that the Royal Academy Exhibitions are likely to teach him. He must come to the present display for the express purpose of scoffing. If he remains to pray, so much the better. He must get out of his mind too the fatal idea that because Mr. So-and-So's piece of foolishness was sold at the private view for such-and-such a ponderable sum of money, Mr. So-and-So's canvas is worth a moment's consideration as work upon which one may properly base oneself. Of course this is a primary piece of advice and hackneyed. But it is, nevertheless, necessary to be said. Thirdly, the painter who wishes to draw improvement for himself out of the Royal Academy Exhibition will keep the catalogue well away from him and have nothing to do with names. There is too great a tendency on the part of people who imagine that they know about pictures to live and move under a sort of tyranny of cognomen. You will find that even persons who should know better will consider a canvas to be "pretty bad" until you read out of the catalogue to them the name of the artist. Then at once, as if by magic, their view changes, and they blush for not having observed at once that here was the handiwork of greatness. Leaving out the pronounced mannerists, whose productions are readily recognised by their glaring faults, there are few people who can distinguish at sight the work of this or that artist. Everybody pretends to possess such a gift, but if you try them without the catalogue, you will be astonished to find how little there is in it. Just as the play is the thing, so really is the picture. And if the Royal Academy were to abolish names and signatures the number of reputations that would melt into nothingness and the number of unconsidered persons who would be hailed for competent workers might astonish the Council. Anonymity has its disadvantages, but a season of it would probably do more for British Art than any amount of criticism. It might ruin a handful of decent elderly gentlemen who follow Art in the way that other decent elderly gentlemen follow fly-fishing; and it would certainly put the dealers and the judges and touts at their wits' end. But the world was not made for these gentry, and up to now they have had an excellent fat time. The Royal Academy Council would probably sooner part with its heart's blood than arrange an anonymous exhibition with a "signing" day at the end of it. Yet the thing clamours to be done.

THE SHAVING OF PATSHAW

PURSUING Mr. George Bernard Shaw's communications—pleasant and unpleasant—we received on May 28th, and again by special messenger, a second letter from the outraged playwright, which we reproduce herewith :

May 27, 1908.

Dear Lord Alfred Douglas,—

Thank goodness it was you, and not some poor devil whom it would have been your duty to sack. You MUST have been drunk—frightfully drunk, or in some equivalent condition; no normal man behaves like that. Now go right off to your solicitors, and show them my letter, and ask them whether they think the error a trifling one from the point of view of a British jury. Show them the article also. They need not consider me: I do not propose to take any action in the matter, and have only intervened to get you out of a scrape, leaving you to settle with yourself what you ought to do as regards your own honour. But the libel affects both the Haymarket Theatre (Harrison) and Vedrenne and Barker; and they are neither of them in any way disposed to take that dangerous sentence amiably. I feel pretty sure that your solicitors will advise you to admit the blunder and withdraw it. If they don't, change them.

Yours faithfully,

G. BERNARD SHAW.

It will be perceived that in the plenitude of his wrath Mr. Shaw is apt to forget his manners and to forget what is of far greater importance—namely, that you cannot catch old birds with draff. Although he took the best part of a week to meditate upon his awkward position, Mr. Shaw could think of nothing better in the way of argument than a rehearsal of his threats about libel actions and of his beautiful desire to help THE ACADEMY out of a tight corner. To Mr. Shaw's letter the Editor of THE ACADEMY replied as follows :

May 29, 1908.

Dear Mr. Bernard Shaw,—

Your letter is a piece of childish impertinence, but as it was evidently written in a fit of hysterical bad temper, I shall not count it against you. I am immensely amused by your professed desire to "get me out of a scrape." I do not consider that I am in any scrape at all, and I think you will find that I am a person who is very well able to look after himself without any assistance from you.

Yours faithfully,

ALFRED DOUGLAS.

Here, had it not been for Mr. Shaw's fatal itch for writing letters about nothing, the matter might have ended. But on June 1st we received from Mr. Shaw a third letter, which is appended :

May 31, 1908.

Dear Lord Alfred Douglas,—

I asked you for a friendly reparation: you have given me a savage revenge. However, perhaps it was the best way out. As you have owned up, we are satisfied; and the public will forgive you for the sake of your blazing boyishness.

There is always the question—Who is to edit the editor? Fortunately, in this case there are two Douglasses—A. D. the poet, and—shall I say?—the hereditary Douglas. Make A. D. the editor. It needs extraordinary conscientiousness, delicacy, and Catholicism to criticise unscrupulously, brutally, and free-thinkingly, as "The Academy" is trying to do, and, indeed, derives all its interest and value from doing. That hereditary Douglas, when he gets loose from A. D., is capable of wrecking a paper—even of wrecking himself. Most people are—hence the need for editors. Excuse my preaching; I am a born improver of occasions.

Sans rancune,

G. BERNARD SHAW.

So that, on the whole, we are pleased to be able to announce that the cool £10,000 which we were to have paid out to Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker, Frederick Harrison, and Holman Clark remains sweetly at our bankers. Neither have we found it necessary to change our solicitor, nor does THE ACADEMY find itself in the smallest need of a super-editor—at any rate in the guise of Mr. Shaw. "We are satisfied." So are we!

It will be noted that the Nietzsche of Bayswater begs us to excuse him for preaching. We will excuse him this once and preach a little ourselves. There is a public moral to be drawn from Mr. Shaw's extraordinary outburst; the which moral, we think, might read—Never be indiscreet. Mr. Shaw's indiscretions in the matter before us have been multitudinous. In the beginning he was indiscreet enough to take umbrage at a reasonable piece of reproof. Then he was indiscreet enough to conceive that the author of that reproof "must have been drunk." Then he was indiscreet enough to set his conception into writing, and to suggest—apparently without sounding them on the subject—that Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker and Frederick Harrison and Holman Clark would be indiscreet enough to ask THE ACADEMY for £10,000 just to please Mr. Shaw. He was indiscreet enough also to indicate to us that while he is quite willing to help the editor of a paper out of a scrape he is equally willing to help the "poor devil" of a dramatic critic out of a position—which is, of course, the finest Socialism. Help the people whom you cannot by any possibility help, and kick soundly the people whom you can kick. There has been nothing so unseemly as Mr. Shaw's elegant talk about "the sack" for a dramatic critic since Herodias desired the head of John the Baptist. A person of Mr. Shaw's literary standing should be above these things. No editor in his senses would discharge a critic at the behest of an outside person, however ponderous or however mighty. On the other hand, outside persons of eminence cannot be too careful. In certain offices their complaints might make a difference. We believe that some of these eminent persons have knowledge of this risk and pen their semi-private communications accordingly. There are critics of position in London who dare not say the truth about anything unless it happens to be very good, merely because they know that their editors are apt to be swayed by the subtle letters of outside eminence. The business of all persons who feel themselves to be hurt by the criticisms of any journal is with that journal, and not with persons who happen to be employed on it. If Mr. Shaw will bear this in mind for the rest of his life he will be so much nearer the superman of his ideals.

Finally we are pleased to reciprocate the sentiment which Mr. Shaw embodies in the phrase "sans rancune." We have no reason to bear him malice; quite the contrary.

THE HIDDEN MYSTERY

THE late Ambrose Meyrick, much of whose work remains unpublished, once wrote a curious article entitled "The Hidden Mystery," which attracted a certain amount of notice, for accidental rather than essential reasons. This article appeared in the pages of a most respectable magazine, a magazine of classic fame which had settled the business of many a young poet far away back in the 'thirties and 'forties. The editor, it is supposed, was attracted by Meyrick's style, and, as it proved afterwards, could not have had any very clear understanding of the subject-matter. The magazine in question has, unfortunately, long gone the way of many worthy fellows; it consistently refused to compete with the new order of "snaps" and "bits" and photographic blurs. Consequently Meyrick's essay remains more or less inaccessible, and I have thought that readers of THE ACADEMY might be interested in a brief résumé of a singular argument. I believe Meyrick had originally called his study "A Meditation on an Old Print," for the text that he had chosen was the strange, the almost complete, blindness as to the beauty of Gothic art that prevailed during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. He showed that even the trained draughtsmen of that period, with, say, Lincoln Cathedral before their eyes, great and magnificent, a very miracle of splendour, were quite unable to draw it correctly, to give any true idea of the real nature of the Gothic mouldings or tracery, or, indeed, of the effect of a Gothic building in gross and mere bulk:

The print that I am looking at [he writes] has indeed some sort of relation to the Cathedral. There is a nave, there is a choir, and there are the towers. I daresay that if one counted the windows one would find that the number was correct. But there is no true likeness. Stand a little distance away so that you are not disturbed by the detail; you will perceive, I think, that the picture is an odd sort of parody of the building. If a clever boy had some wooden bricks and made a model of the Cathedral with them, then the engraving might very well be a picture of that. And if you draw near, then you see how monstrously the artist misrepresented the great work before him. If the delineation seen in mere mass is a distortion; in little, in detail, in such matters as mouldings and curves and traceries, it is almost incredibly false. It is hard to believe that the artist was not a Chinaman or a Hindoo drawing a cathedral from an Englishman's description. And it is interesting to note at the same time that these bald cusps, these cheap-looking pillars, these cast-iron piers and arches (in the View of the Interior) have very much the effect that is produced by so many of the pieces of the Gothic revival. There is a church in Derby, of which the tracery of the windows is actually of cast-iron, and the result to the eye is very similar to the offence of the old print.

The essay went on to quote from Smollett's denunciation of York Minster as a masterpiece of folly in stone, from Washington Irving's shamefaced admiration for the "barbarisms" of Westminster Abbey. It called many other witnesses to testify to the very singular fact that for more than two centuries men were surrounded by wonderful buildings which they were absolutely unable to see in any true sense of the word. Meyrick also showed that, to a great extent, the same principle prevailed in the regions of literature and painting. He quoted Dr. Johnson's dictum as to Pope's "poetry," his criticism of "Lycidas," pointing out the extreme shrewdness, sagacity, and honesty of Johnson's character; and yet the Lexicographer thought that "Lycidas" was something very near akin to rubbish, and that Pope's admirably clever verse was poetry in its most absolute, perfect, and final form. And in painting were not Giotto, Cimabue, and Botticelli regarded as semi-barbarians? At the same time the essay went on to show that it would never do to say that the eighteenth century was deficient in the sense of art:

In that art which is of all the arts most pure and exalted, which, above all, is freed from the errors and muddy confusions of the logical understanding, this age of Smollett and Johnson attained the greatest and sublimest heights. Literature, if it is fine literature, speaks ultimately no doubt to the soul, but by necessity it expresses itself through and by the logical sense: it must be capable of logical analysis. An incantation, which does address the pneuma (or rather, perhaps, the psyche) directly is not literature. Painting, again, if it be great painting, makes its appeal by a magical arrangement of line and colour. Here, again, the summons doubtless sounds to some mysterious inner habitant; but, again, painting must be the likeness of something, of some form or forms which are capable of logical description; and by the same law, though the Venus of the Louvre is not beautiful because of its anatomical excellence, yet sculpture cannot refuse to be judged by the laws of anatomy. But music alone moves in its own world of pure beauty; and though we are compelled to use the language of the intellect when we speak of it, though we talk of "a musical idea," this is mere poverty of speech, since the sphere of music and the sphere of the intellectus are apart and not interdependent. In this most pure art, then, the eighteenth century has excelled every age. Let us remember that the days of the early Georges were the days of Pergolesi, Handel, and of John Sebastian Bach. This was no time of artistic inhibition; the world may be glad when it has equalled the work of these men, and of many others of that time who made music as easily and as sweetly as the Elizabethans made verses.

Then Meyrick went on to speak of the great painters that adorned the period of Johnson; and even in architecture St. Mary-le-Strand was, after its kind, very near to perfection, while one judged the majesty of St. Paul's by the feeble, barbarous, hideous exercises in the same genre that our own days have perpetrated. "Such," he says, "as that ugly joss-house known as the Brompton Oratory:"

Compare, too, the house that a wealthy Manchester man would get built for himself c. 1860 with many a dull street in Bloomsbury built c. 1760. Rather dingy and uninspired are these streets, but they are neither vulgar, flatulent, nor maniacal. They will hardly enchant any man, but they will never fill him with disgust and horror and contempt, they will never fill his heart with a wild desire to escape to the architectural civilisation (by comparison) of a central African village of beehive huts.

But then, on the other hand, the essay continued, How are we to estimate the attitude of the period towards Nature, the visible universe generally? Clearly, the Augustans and their successors looked on the world as men blinded, stupefied, utterly befogged. Meyrick noted how the trees and streams of that spiritual man Berkeley were taken out of Plato's "Dialogues," while the "poets" went to Hampton Court Gardens and to the famous Maze for Nature. They called a wood a "bosky shade," and Johnson and Boswell, who had but a lukewarm relish for the beauties of Greenwich Park, were interested in the wild Hebrides as one is interested in grotesque oddities from the South Sea Islands. Then—to take another region of the soul—nearly all of these men, most of them acute and intelligent in a high degree, were firmly convinced that the blessings of the "Reformation" were so clear, palpable, and certain that there was no room for argument on the matter. Warton, certainly, had hinted that the Reformation had not had the best effect on the Arts, Johnson (probably for sport) had taken the unpopular side in occasional conversations with Boswell; but in the general opinion of the cultured the debate was as clear as the addition of two and two: "Popery" was wholly wrong, "Protestantism" was wholly right.

It seemed, then, to follow from all these instances that whole generations of men, no more stupid or ignorant than their ancestors or successors, might be absolutely blinded as to matters that were, literally and physically, before their eyes; there could hardly be more conspicuous objects than Lincoln Cathedral, a forest, or a mountain, or a Botticelli; and, in the region of literature, there could scarcely be a more potent evocation of beauty than that of "Lycidas." And many of the men thus blind were of very exceptional ability and acuteness on other points, and even on points of art. It was as if a man walking in a wood admired the loveliness of the oak trees, and at the same time wondered why an all-wise Creator had fashioned the grotesque ugliness of ash and beech and yew:

And so, since intelligent and thoughtful men were obviously blind as to the clear and manifest beauty displayed in Visible Nature, Gothic Architecture, Elizabethan and Caroline poetry, Catholic Ritual, etc., etc. . . . is it not at least highly probable that men no less intelligent, no less thoughtful, are at the present moment blind as to certain matters which may not be so obvious—which, it should rather be said, seem to us not so obvious? Is it not possible that while we look down on the Augustans with pitying superiority, we ourselves may be sunken in darkness as to certain things even more vital, more important than literature and painting? This may be difficult to realise: to us Dryden's "improvements" on Chaucer seem incredible, and Smollett's desire to replace York Minster by a neat Grecian room appears pure imbecility—but, after all, Que savons nous? Unless we take up the position that we have attained to final and absolute and universal perfection; that we have surpassed all the wisdom of the wise, all the art of the ages, all the visions of the seers; that compared with us all precedent humanity is, in all things, as a schoolboy in the multiplication-table to Sir Isaac Newton; that the supreme goal has been attained, the race won for ever—unless we take up this highly ridiculous and impossible position, we must confess that there is at least a great probability that we in our turn are blind to many sights, deaf to many sounds, ignorant of many wonders, nescient of many mysteries.

The essay shows the probability of this thesis by many analogies drawn from things of the mind and from things of matter. It instances the laws of logical science, latent in men's thought from the very beginning, and yet not clearly perceived or demonstrated till the day of Aristotle. Here was a mystery or magistry that had been visible and yet invisible for countless ages, that had been before the intellectual eyes of myriads day after day, hour after hour. The veriest savage who used stone arrows to shoot prehistoric game must have been familiar with "Barbara" and "Celarent," and yet he knew it not, though he won his dinner and preserved his life by this knowledge that was concealed from himself. The analogies were indeed innumerable. How many apples had fallen to the ground before the law of gravitation was enunciated? How often had the power of steam been perceived before the obvious application was disclosed? And man had gazed at the earth and sky, at the clouds and the woods, the seas and the rivers for innumerable ages before the mystery and the beauty of the world were really manifested in the work of Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Turner.

At this point Meyrick paused for a while in his main argument to follow a curious byway of thought. How far, he asked, were we to suppose that much that was not expressed was still felt and experienced—suppressed perhaps out of deference to convention, or from fear of consequences? Here was an obscure point which seemed to invite endless inquiry, on which it was impossible to dogmatise. For instance, you might investigate the marriage customs of some race more or less primitive, you might satisfy yourself that to all intents and purposes marriage and giving in marriage in the race in question were as prosaic, as much a matter of business as pig-dealing in Wiltshire; and yet from the heart of this tribe of chafferers in women there might surge up a song that expressed all the mystic passion of love. "Sometimes, perhaps, they simply bargain for a snug homestead, for well-roofed barns and a pot that shall always have enough of common food within it; and, amazed, they find themselves denizens of Paradise, partakers of magic food and enchanted drink." In a sense, the courtship of Portia by Bassanio was a squalid fortune-hunt, and yet there were lines that spoke nobly of the latens deitas. Perhaps there were many men of the eighteenth century who were thrilled to the heart by the ineffable mystery and beauty of the Gothic work, but they were ashamed to make the confession, to write themselves down as lovers of ignorance and barbarism in art. It was odd, by the way, to note that a sham love, a sham appreciation of the Gothic was a worse foe than blank ignorance and contempt; nothing could have concealed or depraved the true mystery so effectually as the fooleries of Horace Walpole, nothing could make sensible people long for a square meeting-house with square windows so effectually as the ghastly modern parodies of Pointed architecture which had been sown broadcast over England. And the "restorers" had done more harm to the work that they professed to love than all the villainies and wreckings and profanations of "Reformers" and Puritans, than all the centuries of contempt, and whitewash, and neglect. Here Meyrick has pencilled a brief note on the margin of the article:

Qy. I wonder whether this is not more important than it appeared to me when I wrote this essay. For instance, is there not some analogy between "Walpole Gothic" and the work of certain erotic poets?

Proceeding in the main argument, Meyrick argues that it is hardly conceivable that the heart of man had remained cold to the great sacrament of the world till 1790; the glory of dawn and sunset, the terror and splendour of mountains and seas, the shadow of the woods in summer, the incantation of scented nights could not have been wholly without witnesses. No doubt there were hints of this universal mystery written in Hebrew and Greek and Latin; still, they were but hints, and the full expression—or, rather, the approximately full expression—had been reserved to a late day:

And yet; how many men and women must have felt all this—all that Coleridge and Wordsworth, Keats and Tennyson have written—and have lacked words or courage to express it. I wonder how much treasure we have lost, how much treasure we lose daily from this lack of courage, from this fear of telling the great and incredible dreams which apparently contradict sense and experience, science and convention; reason itself; and yet are perfect wisdom, perfect beauty. Tertullian's Credo quia impossibile is not merely sound theology; it is the basis of all true sapience, of Life and of Art alike. The Knight Errant's adventure of the Magic Boat without oar or sails is but the type of all true thinking, of the only adventure of life that is worth experiencing. In the Eastern Tale Joudar was assailed by all sorts of terrible phantoms, by wild beasts and armed men, who threatened him; and his quest was hopeless if once he forgot that these things were phantoms. Last of all came the appearance of his own mother pleading with him; her, too, he was to neglect and pass by. Here be symbols for them that can understand.

So the essay moves to its extraordinary conclusion, the high probability of a universal, or all but universal "ignorance" or "blindness" being, in the writer's opinion, established by the arguments that have been indicated; Meyrick urges that all manner of mysteries, splendours, beauties, delights may be—nay are—present to us, before our eyes, heard with our ears, sensibly and physically apprehended by us—and yet the Object or Objects which we see and apprehend after a certain sort are strangely withheld from us: we behold and see not, hear the Nuptial Song of R. Eleazar as savages would hear the symphonies of Beethoven, lay hands upon incredible treasures after the fashion of thieves who throw precious antique work into the melting-pot; and read at last the Great Incantation by which the worlds were made as a Recipe in the Cookery Book:

We may be sure of this, at all events, that the matter of the great work (to use the terms of the spagyric art) is no strange rarity hidden in some most secret corner of the world, or in some concealed corner of the mind. Though it be secret, yet it is everywhere seen, though it be occult, yet it is not to be sought amongst "Occultists." It is rather, to quote the alchemists again, the most common thing in all the wide world, and though it be hidden from all, yet no man is ignorant of it, no man can fail to be possessed of it, and, being possessed of it, truly to comprehend it if light be given him. It is everywhere spoken of, yet everywhere ignored, everywhere it is worshipped, and everywhere defiled, everywhere it is sought, and they that seek turn their faces away from it. They dig for it deep in the earth, and in digging trample it under foot; they would place it in a shrine, and they cast it forth into the mire; they strive to make them vestments for a high service, and appear in foul rags and wretched nakedness. In one place chiefly the word of it may be learnt, and in this place least of all does any one hope to behold it. But he who holds this treasure has conquered the world. It is given to the simple.

The article appeared, as has been said, in a magazine of the highest respectability; it was a good deal noticed and commented on as "a passionate and eloquent appeal for the appreciation of beauty in common things." It was only some year or two later, when Meyrick had published his first story, the "Rosa Mundi," that people began to put two and two together, and it was generally felt that his ideas were "not quite nice." It must not be supposed that the theory of the essay was at all understood, but in certain instances there were i's in the article and dots in the romance, and the most unpleasant conclusions were drawn.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

THE CHELSEA PAGEANT

HISTORIC ground—the phrase is one that we have heard much of late, and it means much or little precisely in the degree in which one realises what "history" means. The "histories" which were inflicted on us at school were one thing; the history that we feel is another. It is possible to repeat with mathematical accuracy every "date" in English history, from Julius Cæsar to the South African war, without possessing the smallest appreciation of history. It is equally possible to have a real and intimate knowledge of the processes of national development without feeling any of the glamour of the past. Our school histories were no doubt accurate, and some of them were written by very learned and worthy men. Their advance was orderly and definite, their instructional value was generally nil. Alarums and excursions, wars and rumours of wars, clashed and sounded in empty space, like the Wild Huntsman's hounds, coming from nowhere, tending nowhither, over our heads in the darkness of uncomprehending night. Men and women of flesh and blood had no part or lot in such history. If our history was illustrated at all, it was by jejune cuts of "a knight of the period," or "Richard II., from his tomb," or something of the kind. And even with such poor material at our command how eagerly we seized upon anything, such as Richard II.'s little forked beard or Henry IV.'s turban and liripipe, to ascribe some human individuality to these ghosts of a rather dull play.

To me the revelation of history first came in other lands, and it was not till long afterwards that I realised how closely history is always bound up in individual minds with its individual figures, and with the background of their lives. For, standing upon the uppermost step of the Propylæa, on the Acropolis of Athens, I saw the setting sun shine blood-red upon the Bay of Salamis; and suddenly fancy filled the bay with huddled Greek ships, waiting for the friendly shelter of night. Soon it would be dark enough for the schoolmaster's cock-boat to slip to and fro between fleet and fleet, and the Persian Armada would close in; and Themistocles, even while he girded against the gibes of the Corinthians, would be waiting for the dawn to see his purpose accomplished. And in the whirl and press of battle, it was the god-sent messenger who stayed Adeimantos, the ruthless bravery of Artemisia—the incidents, and not the whole—that came as vivid pictures before my eyes. The larger issue was not forgotten, but all the better realised, for that the struggle had become for the first time an affair of human beings, not merely of states and nations.

The plain fact is that we cannot care for history except so far as we can visualise both its theatre and its actors. To reap its full meed of memory a name must have its local habitation. While we forget Lucy Price, we remember Nell Gwynn, because she was Nell of Drury Lane. Thames bargemen remember St. Thomas to this day—at Lambeth, and nowhere else; to most of us Canterbury suggests immediately St. Thomas's martyrdom and Chaucer's Pilgrims. The fame of this, that, and the other place rests not so much on the deeds that have been done thereat, but on the men and women who have done or suffered those deeds, and the most earnest historian of great issues will turn aside to sketch a character—to portray an individual.

So, then, nor places, nor people, nor deeds by themselves make history, but the intimate association of all three. Call it parochialism if you will; there is such a thing as an over-large imperialism, the imperialism of little Johnny-head-in-air.

Chelsea offers us a pageant, and surely no other corner of London's world has a more intimate call upon our interest. The name conjures up, even to those outside the charmed circle of Mr. Quinn and the half-dozen enthusiasts to whom knowledge is allowed by the "booklet" of the promoters, visions of a kaleidoscopic past. Much remains of the old setting. Chelsea Hospital, Chelsea Old Church, and Ranelagh, the scene of the pageant itself—these are not yet modernised out of all knowledge. And if More and Henry VIII. have faded from local tradition in a great degree, the shades of Charles II. and Nell Gwynn still jostle those of Pope and Gay, Addison and Steele, in the memories of the uninformed. Doggett's Coat and Badge are a reality to the watermen of to-day, and the "poor soldiers, broke in our wars," may still read "Condidit Carolus Secundus" on the walls of their haven of rest. The incidents of Chelsea's history are all quiet, sober, even domestic; but they present to us, in a pleasant setting, the human side of personages great in the history of an outer world, and their value lies therein.

The "episodes" of this pageant are to be eight in number. They range from the invasion of Julius Cæsar to a Venetian fête in Ranelagh Gardens, and, with the exception of the episode of the foundation of the Hospital (which will be presented in the Hospital grounds), they will be played in Ranelagh Gardens. There is a great gap in the sequence of the scenes, for Chelsea was a very unobtrusive village in its younger days; and perhaps it is a pity that Julius Cæsar should have been dragged in by the heels, as it were, with the over-confident assertion that "it is sufficient to say that the Ford of Chelsea is now generally accepted as the ford referred to by Cæsar in his account" of the crossing of the Thames. As a matter of fact, it is to be feared that the reverse is the case, and that Chelsea's claim to the distinction is now generally rejected. Certainly, at any rate, the evidence on behalf either of Brentford or Halliford is better than that which Chelsea can show. But even so apparently important a point as this is not vital. The fact to be driven home is that Cæsar crossed the Thames; whether he did so at Chelsea, or Brentford, or Hampton, or Halliford matters little, and at least there was for centuries a ford at Chelsea. Cæsar's vivid picture of horse and foot surging across the staked ford together, winning their way past the pointed stakes into the heart of the dismayed troops of Cassivelaunus, is given a locale and a setting in common talk, and history lives again. The exactitudes can come later.

The gap of eight centuries which intervenes between this scene and that of the "synod" called by Offa apparently left Chelsea undisturbed by events into which any of the personages of history can be brought. It is perhaps excusable on dramatic grounds to invest a prelate to whom has been attributed a disposition passive to the point of weakness, with a distinctly fiery nature. But neither does it appear that "Hibbert" is a seemly form for the name Higbert, nor is it plain on what grounds the tradition which makes Ealdulf the first Archbishop of Lichfield is rejected. And as for Peter's Pence, must we believe that Offa's gift had no precedent? What of Ina of Wessex and his offerings?

Again a leap, this time of about seven hundred years, and we are regaled with an interlude commemorative of the lordship of Sir Reginald Bray. From this point onwards Chelsea begins to "realise itself" in earnest. Naturally, in the sixteenth century Sir Thomas More and his family form the centre of the principal episode. Erasmus and Holbein figure among the characters, but we miss Dean Colet, who surely deserves a place, both by virtue of his name and of his friendships. The two scenes, of More's elevation and of his fall, form a good dramatic contrast, and, it is to be anticipated, will form the strongest episode in the pageant, whose chief weakness as a whole lies in a lack of dramatic force.

The days of Charles II. are a pageant in themselves, and most of the figures in the episode of the founding of the Hospital are familiar enough. And the localised folk tale of Nell Gwynn and the handkerchief, though it has its analogy in almost every tongue on earth, is none the less a bit of old Chelsea that it would have been sacrilege to overlook. As written, so also acted legend is the salt of history—and is generally quite as true and much more important.

The promoters of the pageant have disarmed criticism by a frank avowal of their inability to present every episode in Chelsea history that was worthy of presentation. But very sadly indeed we miss the "Physick Garden." Perhaps the Committee owe Sir Hans Sloane a grudge for having pulled down More's house. But we look in vain for the meeting of Sloane and Linnæus; for the visit of Sir Henry Goodriche, bearing in triumph the first Ribston pippin that ever grew on English soil; or for any hint that Chelsea could boast a greenhouse over which only that at Oxford could claim seniority. But we must not grumble; there are good things in plenty in the pageant as it stands. And if the estimate of history suggested in this article is correct, we may safely anticipate that the personages whom the authors have caused to step out of the pages of history into the glare of modern day will bring with them sympathy with, and understanding of the men and women of the long past days such as come from no mere reading. Life is not in the library, but in the fields and in the haunts of men.

If the Chelsea pageant is not the success that the spirit of its conception promises, it will be a matter for wonder as much as for regret. For one factor alone seems uncertain, and nothing can clear up the doubt beforehand. Queen Elizabeth had the "Queen's Elms" for royal shelter when she visited Chelsea. Let us hope that we shall not all need elms of our own when we go to see Queen Elizabeth there.

FREEMASONRY AND THE SCHOOLS

THE Correspondant of Paris publishes an article by M. de la Guillonière upon the class-books used in the primary schools in France. It exposes by documentary evidence the false pretence of scientific impartiality put forth by its authors, and shows the steps by which the gradual dechristianisation of France is being accomplished under the auspices of the French Lodges. The first attempts of the Freethinkers to corrupt the minds of school-children was in 1880. Previous to this date the school-books set forth the duty of mankind towards God, but in the edition of the Children's Grammar adopted in 1882, M. de la Guillonière says:

Instead of the verses upon the "Goodness of God" which appeared in previous editions, there was substituted a poem upon "The Donkey's Flower, the Thistle." The Creator was replaced by Jupiter, and Chateaubriand's "Hymn to the Eternal" gave place to "A melodious hymn."

In 1890 further progress was made, the Masonic Lodges had declared open war against Christian doctrine and offered a prize for the composition of a lay manual of morals, the use of which should be obligatory in all the schools throughout France, in opposition to the Catholic Catechism. This offer, however, did not produce any work which could be publicly avowed and adopted, so another method was tried. A series of classical text-books was introduced into the schools which were quite free from any religious taint. On the 30th of March, 1904, the heads of the Lodges congratulated themselves upon their success in the schools:

It is enough (they said) to mention the late works of Hervé, Aulard, and Bayet to show that the school-books now used are written in a scientific and rationalist spirit.

Among the works which were thus praised by the avowed enemies of the Christian religion the Correspondant refers especially to the "Manual of Civic Morals" of M. Bayet, of which more than 60,000 copies were used by children from six to thirteen years of age:

We do not think (says M. de la Guillonière) that it would be possible to bring together in the same number of lessons more direct attacks against God and His ministers, calumnies against Catholics, inversions of historic truth, and hatred of France, and to display at the same time so much spurious science.

This is the "scientific and impartial system of education" which is provided by the French Government.

In one lesson the pupils are taught to distinguish between things which can be known and others which cannot ever be known. In the second category are classed statements which cannot be scientifically proved:

For instance, we know that men die, but we do not know scientifically what becomes of them after their death.

The same formula is repeated on the question of our knowing whether after death there is or is not another life.

Further (the Manual says), we do not know scientifically whether God exists, or whether He does not. Finally, all these things are classed under one word, "the unknowable," which especially includes the existence of God.

Can it be surprising that a generation of French children who have been educated upon principles such as these, have become atheists or at least sceptics and haters of religion? It is the logical result of that system of secular education which Mr. Reginald McKenna was so anxious to introduce into the public schools of England.

SHORTER REVIEWS

India's Saint and the Viceroy. By S. S. THORBURN (Edinburgh and London: W. Blackwood and Sons.)

"THEY understood" (v. p. 266)—it is more than we do! Words fail us to describe our mystification after wandering for hours (or is it days?) in Mr. S. S. Thorburn's Indian maze, and we must borrow without permission from Alice in Wonderland's vocabulary. "Curiouser and Curiouser," remarked Alice—and "Curiouser and Curiouser and Curiouser" do we, of the "Viceroy," the "Viceroy's" daughter, and the "India's Saint" (?) of Mr. Thorburn's imagination.

With the dedication of his book to Christian Scientists, etc., the puzzle begins; for after reading towards the end of the story (pp. 291 seq.) how the hero (or, rather, one of the heroes, because Mr. Thorburn has elected to have two, the "Saint," Mr. Cosmo Sorel, and Colonel Angus Hamilton) performs a miracle of a most positive kind, parodying, if one can so use the word, one of our Lord's miracles recounted in the Gospels—after reading this we observe, with fresh wonder, that Mr. Thorburn in the dedication takes care to remark that he does not believe in the Christian Scientist claim to possession of spiritual power over physical disease!

If the author only wished to air his views on Christian Science, pp. 197 and 220, together with the Preface, would have sufficed. If he has desired to give John Bull at home an idea of how Viceroys reign representatively for him in India, we think even Paget, M.P., might have succeeded better. Where on earth has he picked his model for a Viceroy—the impossible "Lord Eskmore," whose only idea is to pose as India's God to the Indians—absorbed in the contemplation of his family's importance (of which, by the way, without any warning whatever, the "Saint" Sorel suddenly claims to be the head and missing heir to title, and is accepted without demur or proof as such by the credulous Viceroy!)—and discussing openly before his still more impossible daughter, Lady Beatrice, the most important and (should be) confidential dispatches relating to frontier wars, etc.? "Lady Beatrice," who alternates between her "Saint" and—as the author calls him—"her other lover," Colonel Hamilton, has that coyness of manner which we are in the habit of attributing to the 'Arriets of Margate (cp. pp. 232-3), and as to Mr. Cosmo Sorel, the millionaire Christian Scientist!—again words fail us, and again "Curiouser, Curiouser," is all we can murmur.

Mr. Thorburn's experience in officialdom in India enables him to describe admirably the kind of Circumlocution Office dispatch which distracts hard-working Indian civilians in their districts, but he goes out of his way to find fault invariably with the Indian Government in everything it does. He says one or two apt things regarding the mixed racial problems of India—(p. 57) "The Eurasians are 'the coffee-cream derelicts of miscegenation in India';" (p. 170) "What's a name in this land of mixed pickles?" and again (p. 63), Sorel "as an Englishman of fabulous wealth was also a phenomenon as rare as a contented Babu in Bengal!" One scarcely needs to have been in Bengal to appreciate the pithiness of this simile!

There is, too, a rather good description of a big polo match (pp. 77 seq.). These and a few more such sprinklings alone save the book from immediate condemnation, in our judgment, and we fear Mr. Thorburn, like his "Saint" of India on p. 165, will "be pained at the perception of the fact" that we are not "spiritually-minded," or, at any rate, not sufficiently so to feel anything else save thankful to have emerged at last out of this meaningless maze.

The Indian Countryside. By PERCIVAL O'CONNOR. (Brown, Langham and Co.)

THIS is a quiet, continuous "babbling of brooks and streams"—or their Indian equivalents, native tanks and wells. Mr. O'Connor says nothing very striking or new—his is a simple "calendar and diary" of camp-life and riding through the central districts of Upper Hindostan. The book is quite pleasant reading, and good print and some pleasing photographs make up for a good deal of discursiveness. The author, too, has the great merit not always to be found with Anglo-Indians, of not finding fault with all that is Indian and not Anglo, and he is evidently full of sympathy for the really hard-working and most patient "Ram Bux," the native peasantry, who are only too often the "bondslaves" of the native moneylenders.

Prome et Samara. Par GÉNÉRAL L. DE BEYLIÉ. (Paris: Leroux, n.p.)

GENERAL DE BEYLIÉ presents, both in his individuality and in his work, a type of archæologist peculiarly French. We can hardly imagine an Englishman of his profession and of his temperament spending a leave all too short in a breathless dash from home to Burma and from Burma to Mesopotamia in search of material for a peculiarly abstruse phrase of Asiatic architectural development. Nor, if we were so fortunate as to discover that we owned such a compatriot, should we expect to find in him a bubbling spring of humour and a broad sense of human sympathy. Indeed, we doubt whether such a combination of qualities would be possible in any but a Frenchman, least of all in conjunction with those delightful touches of naïveté and of domestic sentiment which are betrayed in the work of this genial gentleman.

There are many works upon archæology in many languages which impress us with a sense of the patience and erudition of their authors; many which rouse in us a fighting instinct, driving us to an emphasis of dissent perhaps disproportionate to their value; some convincing to the point of forcing us to the abdication of all independent opinion; but few, too few, are those which give us joy of the personality of the author. Honestly, after reading this book, we desire most ardently the acquaintance of M. de Beylié. We feel sure that the generous tribute that he pays in these pages to the courtesy of British officials in India and Burma would be heartily reciprocated by those who had the pleasure of being of service to the soldier-archæologist.

If it be thought that this reference to an author's personality is out of place in a review of his work, we would recommend objectors to turn to that work for themselves, and to realise in doing so to how great an extent the opinions of the author gain, if not in weight, at all events in interest, by reason of the personal element which is introduced into the form of their presentation.

The paper is divided into three sections. The first is a diary of the journey, and, naturally, it is in this section that the writer is revealed to us. The two last sections deal with his researches—architectural for the most part—in Burma and Mesopotamia respectively. A passage or two, quoted from the first part, will, we think, whet the appetite for more:

6 janvier, Calcutta. Ville banale: hôtels médiocres, aucune distraction le soir. Je me hâte de retenir ma place sur le paquebot de Rangoon. De jeunes artistes français donnent un concert à mon hôtel. Je cause avec le basson: "êtes vous content?"—"Oh oui, mais une chose me chiffonne: quand nous jouons de la musique classique, les Anglais causent à haute voix et on ne nous entend pas. En revanche, lorsque nous jouons de la musique légère et connue, les spectateurs nous accompagnent en sifflant et en frappant le pied. C'est agaçant!"

On the same page is a good story:

A . . . Khan, musulman richissime de Bombay, dernier descendant du célèbre roi des Assassins . . . est sujet anglais; il reçoit de l'argent de tous ses partisans, qui le considèrent comme un être surnaturel. Dernièrement il fut très étonné de ne pas recevoir le subside annuel de ses coreligionnaires de Zanzibar. Il leur fit l'observation et ceux-ci répondirent qu'ils avaient confié leurs cotisations à la mer. "Vous avez bien fait, leur dit-il, et l'argent m'est effectivement arrivé, seulement j'ignorais qui me l'avait envoyé. Désormais confiez, je vous prie, vos subsides à la poste, de cette façon vous serez en possession d'un reçu et moi-même j'aurai la preuve que l'argent vient bien de vous."

One more charming remark:

Nous jetons l'ancre devant Bassorah. On nous met en quarantaine sous prétexte que la peste règne aux Indes. Elle y règne, en effet, mais elle règne aussi en Mésopotamie, et l'on s'explique difficilement pourquoi les autorités locales prennent tant de précautions contre la peste indienne lorsqu'ils sont déjà en possession de la peste mésopotamienne. Affaire de goût.

The two monographs upon the excavations undertaken by General de Beylié at Prome, and upon his researches into the sources of Abassid architecture are careful and conscientious records of workmanlike research, and are profusely illustrated by excellent photographs. The extreme rapidity of the author's movements have prevented him from doing much more than to provide the material for more leisured workers, but it is certainly to him that is due the indication of the lines upon which useful work can be pursued. And any step towards clearing up the vexed question of the interplay of artistic—and especially of architectural—influences between the races of nearer and further Asia is a step taken in so little frequented a path as to be practically pioneer work. General de Beylié's temperament and intellectual calibre seem especially to fit him for the rapid transitions from one aspect to another of these developments, which alone can result in an effectual comparison of their inter-relation. Though, as he himself modestly admits, this publication scarcely attains to the dimensions of a "book," it is one which no one engaged in the study of Asiatic art can afford to neglect.

The Life and Times of Nicholas Ferrar. By H. P. K. SKIPTON. (Mowbray and Co., 3s. 6d.)

EVERYONE knows something of Nicholas Ferrar and Little Gidding. The subject after being lost sight of for several years was brought again into favour by that wonderful and delightful work "John Inglesant." Since then there has been a considerable variety of writing upon this fascinating subject. The late Bishop Creighton supplied a convenient summary of the Life and Times of Nicholas Ferrar in the "Dictionary of National Biography." Mr. Cyril Davenport published a monograph in 1896 upon the "Little Gidding Bindings." Captain Acland brought out an excellent sketch of "Little Gidding and its Inmates," through the S.P.C.K., in 1903. There have also appeared in recent years various magazine articles of some merit, and occasionally supplying new material. No excuse, however, is necessary for producing a fresh book upon a subject so peculiarly fascinating to Church-folk, and, indeed, to all who can appreciate a devout and exemplary life, in times of great difficulty, on unusual lines. We have therefore no hesitation in cordially commending the two hundred pages of Mr. Skipton's work. Herein he gathers together almost all that is known of Nicholas Ferrar—his upbringing, his Wanderjahre, his connection with the Virginia Company, his establishment of the "Armenian Nunnery" at Little Gidding in 1624-6, the rule of life for this little community, his friendships and visitors, his last years, and the dark days at Little Gidding from 1641-1647, when the political and anti-religious storm which was then darkening the country raged with Puritan malevolence around this innocent sanctuary. The last words of this well-written, well-illustrated, and attractive-looking book are amply justified, wherein Mr. Skipton writes :

The Church will now and always inscribe high in her roll of those who, by their example, have moulded her polity and practice, and by their personal holiness have impelled her in the paths of spiritual progress, the name of Nicholas Ferrar.

In and Around the Isle of Purbeck. By IDA WOODWARD. With Thirty-six Plates in colour by J. W. G. BOND. (John Lane, 21s. net.)

Books of coloured illustrations of English scenery are multiplying at a prodigious rate. This volume as to the south-east corner of Dorset is not one of the best—and certainly not one of the worst—of its sort. We suppose that in all such cases the pictures are first painted, and then some one is found to write the descriptive letterpress. At any rate, in this instance, as in most of the like cases, the coloured plates are the most attractive part of the volume, and for their sake the carelessness and insufficiency of the text may be pardoned. Those who love this charming part of Dorsetshire will be glad to have so many pleasant pictures of its richly varied landscapes and interesting remains. The seaboard of the Isle of Purbeck is second to none of like extent throughout the whole coast-line of England in its remarkable diversity, brightness of colouring, and occasional grandeur. Mr. Bond is to be congratulated on the pictures he gives us of the Purbeck Hills from Poole Harbour, of Chapman's Pool, of Kimmeridge Bay, of Poole Harbour from Grange Hill, of Poole Harbour from Rempston Heath, and of Studland Bay. Contrariwise, he has failed to reproduce the remarkable colourings and dignified effects of Worbarrow Bay, which is, to our mind, by far the finest bit of coast scenery throughout the whole of the southern sea-board of England until the Lizard is reached. Nor do the smaller pictures of St. Aldhelm's Head or of the Dancing Ledge, Langton Matravers, yield much satisfaction. There is, too, occasional disappointment in connection with the reproductions of buildings ; this is notably the case with the highly attractive old manor house of Godlingston, whilst the still older house of Barneston is painted from its least attractive side. Taken, however, as a whole, this bright group of Purbeck pictures has a distinct value of its own, and cannot fail to act as a pleasurable stay to the memory of those who are occasional visitors to Swanage, Studland, or Corfe Castle.

The letterpress contains a great deal of diligently compiled material, but will probably prove unsatisfying to well-informed persons or to careful readers who desire to know much of this singularly interesting historic district, which abounds in a great variety of archæological remains. The "Forest" story of the Isle of Purbeck—it was all under forest law in the time of King John—is almost wholly neglected, and no effort has been made to give any accurate or original information as to the quarrying and early wide use of Purbeck marble. There are several blunders in the architectural accounts and suggested dates of the churches of Studland, Worth, Matravers, and Swanage, as well as of the manor houses of Godlingston and Barneston. The true history of the Isle of Purbeck, a most fascinating subject, yet remains to be written.

FICTION

Mr. Crewe's Career. By WINSTON CHURCHILL. (Macmillan and Co., 6s.)

WE shall be greatly surprised if Mr. Winston Churchill's latest novel does not have the effect of seriously offending many—if not the majority—of his fellow-countrymen. Let it be said at once that it is a novel of extraordinary power, a novel written with an incisive force and directness that is rare in contemporary fiction. Unlike "The Metropolis," it is not a mere magnified tract. It is, on the contrary, a genuine work of art, a work planned on an almost epic scale, every character in which is impressed with an unmistakable individuality. For this very reason it is likely to be the deadlier in its effect. Dedicated to "the men who in every State of the Union are engaged in the struggle for purer politics," this book is a scathing and unsparring indictment of American political methods. Mr. Churchill writes with a restrained fury, and with something of the fervour of the prophet, as he unfolds this sordid drama of fraud, misgovernment, and chicanery. The picture is appalling in its verisimilitude. We see votes bought and sold, honour held but lightly, and justice prostituted at the bidding of a powerful and unscrupulous interest. The Mr. Crewe who gives his name to the title—he is very far indeed from being the hero—is a Fool, with a monumental F. He is the sort of man, in fact, of whom the short-sighted and the flatterer are apt to remark that he is very far indeed from being a fool. We meet him first as an aspirant for Congress ; we leave him as an unsuccessful candidate for the Senate. He has allied himself with the forces of Reform, and has been hopelessly beaten by the stronger and abler forces of Reaction. But the real interest of the story lies with Austen Vane, who is evidently meant to typify a new spirit in American politics—a spirit that may yet cleanse the Augean stables of corruption. To us he stands for an America that is not yet born, but if Mr. Churchill is able to discern on the political horizon a cloud no bigger than a man's hand, we wish him joy of his discovery. The book, it should be said, has a very real human interest, and in Victoria Flint the author has created a character of unforgettable charm. But for us its chief attraction lies in the presentment of a struggle between two opposing schools of politics, which is seen in these pages as an aspect of the eternal duel between right and wrong. The possible effect of such a book can be only dimly surmised—it may be that the warning has come too late—but Mr. Churchill is to be heartily congratulated on his candour, courage, and public spirit ; congratulated, too, on the production of one of the most engrossing novels that have been written for some considerable time.

The Little God's Drum. By RALPH STRAUS. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)

THERE is a spurious air of cleverness about "The Little God's Drum" which raises the expectations of the hopeful reader and lures him on from page to page in the fond belief that sooner or later some sparkling witticism will meet his eye. But he is doomed to disappointment. All through the book the author strains after a brilliancy to which, alas ! he never attains, but so infectious are his optimistic efforts that the reader plods on to the bitter end, through dialogue which just falls short of being witty and which does not pretend to be natural, only to realise as he reads the last tame sentence that he has been betrayed into a careful perusal of a very ordinary work. The one redeeming feature in the book is the character of Tony Wrynge. He alone is allowed to be natural and to speak with the tongue of a mere man instead of emitting laboured and pointless epigrams.

Young Lord Stranleigh. By ROBERT BARR. (Ward Lock, 6s.)

ALL Mr. Barr's books are readable, and "Young Lord Stranleigh" is no exception to the rule. The plot is both ingenious and satisfactory. Lord Stranleigh, an apparently rather simple-minded and inane young flâneur, purchases a goldmine, which brings him into contact with a particularly repulsive Hebrew financier, who seems endowed with superhuman ingenuity. He not only reduces this astute person to utter confusion, but crowns his career by sauntering into the Bank of England at a moment of financial crisis and, by the timely present of a few large bars of gold, saving the fortunes of his country. It is a pity that this knight-errant is not more prepossessing. By way of emphasising his aristocratic demeanour Mr. Barr has made him consistently and offensively insolent to every one with whom he comes in contact. It is difficult to understand why he is not knocked down and disabled long before his plans are perfected. We can only imagine that he is saved by a "singularly winning smile," which is mentioned as one of his attributes.

The Watcher of the Plains. By RIDGWELL CULLUM. (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)

ONLY a daring writer like Mr. Cullum would have shed so much blood to bring his hero and heroine together. All the trouble arises from the fact that Nevil Steyne is unreasonable enough to covet the whole of his father's fortune instead of a half-share, and when Colonel Raynor, his brother, writes to say that he is coming to hand over his share Nevil plots with the Indians for the murder of the colonel, his wife and child, thus leaving his way clear to the estates. The party duly encounters the red men, and, with gruesome detail, Mr. Cullum tells of the shooting of Mrs. Raynor by her husband and his attempt to perform the same service for Marjorie. She escapes, however, and is heroically rescued from an Indian chief by Seth, who is clearly destined to be her husband. After the murders have been got rid of, Mr. Cullum becomes more interesting, and the freshness with which he depicts the characters of an American farm makes very enjoyable reading. Nevil Steyne, however, is a somewhat incomprehensible figure, for he does not stir from the neighbourhood when he has accomplished his desire. How Seth proved Marjorie's title to her father's estate, how she went to England and came back again, together with a full account of the love-making, which was principally on the girl's side, all these things are faithfully described by the author, whose book is, perhaps, the more readable because it is obviously so unsophisticated. Stories about Red Indians will always have a fascination for some people, and "The Watchers of the Plains" may achieve popularity for this reason. It must be said, however, that Mr. Cullum writes better when dealing with "white folk," and if he had given us more little character sketches, such as "Rube" and "Ma," we should have been able to rank his production higher.

Corry Thorndike. By WINIFRED CRISPE. (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)

STARTING with a rather unpleasant theme, Miss Crispe has developed her story most pleasantly. A mariage de convenance of a more than usually sordid kind becomes a real marriage of love, after a conflict between two very proud natures, the stages of which are clearly and reasonably shown.

In the beginning Sir Eden Gresham is involved in an intrigue with Mrs. Vanderberg, and people are talking. Vanderberg is coming home, and before gossip can reach his ears something must be done to prove its falsity when he begins to suspect the truth. So Mrs. Vanderberg hits on a most ingenious plan to save her name. Sir Eden must become engaged to be married—must, in fact, be married almost immediately. There is a girl eminently suitable—she is indeed already in love with Sir Eden, and one of Mrs. Vanderberg's greatest friends. For a time Eden hesitates; he does not want to be married; but at last he agrees on condition that Judith knows the real truth, and consents with that knowledge. If Mrs. Vanderberg will arrange everything on these lines he will make the sacrifice. Mrs. Vanderberg promises to explain everything to Judith; but of course she does not, and Judith only learns the truth after marriage. Her husband, however, believes that she knows, and despises her accordingly. Consequently he rejects her love at the first, and when he begins to love her in his turn her pride has been hurt too much, and knowing now why he has married her, she will not believe in his sincerity. Happily for both, Miss Crispe has given them a guardian angel, Corry Thorndike. The latter is rather an idealised character; but, in spite of his somewhat abnormal virtues, Miss Crispe succeeds in keeping him within the bounds of possibility if not of probability. How he succeeds in bringing husband and wife together may be learnt from the book. The reader will be rewarded with an interesting study of emotions and will not regret the time spent, but will follow keenly the struggle on both sides between pride and love.

The Wild Widow. By GERTIE DE S. WENTWORTH-JAMES. (Werner Laurie, 6s.)

WE see, on glancing at the modest advertisement on the cover of "The Wild Widow," that "the situations are poignant and a most astounding surprise is revealed in the last chapter." If poignant were another word for vulgar we should cordially endorse the statement, but on referring to the dictionary we find that the word signifies "sharp or penetrating." We cannot see anything either sharp or penetrating in the shady and commonplace adventures of the unscrupulous widow, who, of course, is only a widow in the eyes of the company which has been unfortunate enough to insure her husband's life. As to the "astounding surprise," it was unfortunately "revealed" to us at the end of the third chapter instead of in the last. The principal characters are the widow, who possesses "a beautiful waist with a natural frontal dip," a maiden with "straying Empire curls," a gentleman with an "unmoral mouth," and "a nice man." Every page is beautifully adorned with italics and many familiar French idioms are skilfully introduced into the dialogue.

DRAMA

"LINKS" AT THE STAGE SOCIETY

IT is now some years since this Society produced The Good Hope, by the Dutch playwright Herman Heijermans, which made so great an impression both then and later when Miss Ellen Terry took it on tour. Links is by the same author. It has much of the same pessimistic view of life; there is the same tragic feeling pervading the whole play; men and women, as Mr. Heijermans sees them, are either avaricious and self-seeking and unscrupulous, or else the victims of such greed. Consequently last Monday afternoon there were many present who found the play too harsh and too unsympathetic; but all the more should we be grateful to the Stage Society for producing works which make so limited an appeal.

Links is by no means a perfect play; there were times when we could not but feel that an unnecessary amount of detail was standing between us and the main issue, and there was at least one character whose importance in the scheme was practically nil. Furthermore really important matters seemed at the moment to be less important than they subsequently turned out to be. All this may be intentional on the part of the author, and it may be that the feeling of power and vividness which pervaded the whole performance was due to methods which seem at first sight to be more irritating than necessary.

The plot deals with the disappointments of Pancras Duif, who from very humble beginnings has built up an enormous business. He has been a widower for many years, and his children have not turned out to be very satisfactory—in fact, in a way it is the story of Lear without a Cordelia. Two of the sons have shown their real characters for some time, and now, during Pancras's illness the eldest son, Henk, has managed to seize the management of the business; and so Pancras turns his thoughts to matrimony and wishes to marry his very interesting housekeeper. The family are, of course, up in arms, and are able, through their gross unscrupulousness, to find out from their father's papers things about the proposed wife which make it easy to get rid of her. The old man, when the play ends, is bereft of everything that could make life possible to him.

The characters of all the principal persons are most marvellously well drawn; and Pancras himself, a light-hearted, hard-working, and sincere old man, is particularly lifelike. The part was admirably played by Mr. J. Fisher White. No less admirable was Mr. Edmund Gwenn as the old man's brother, Hein, who, without joining in the conspiracy, is anxious to prevent Pancras or any one else from getting married. The three contemptible sons were played by Mr. Hubert Harben, Mr. Robert Atkins, and Mr. Leon Quatemaine; and three remarkable studies in villainy they certainly were, but one could not help wondering if one old man was likely to be the father of three such dissimilar villains. Miss Edyth Latimer was singularly unequal as Marianne, the housekeeper. On the whole it was a fine restrained performance that was marred by a melodramatic passage, which, however, was greeted with great applause. How often does the "purple patch" ruin a work of art! There was plenty of good acting besides, though the actor who took the part of a brain specialist gave it much too farcical an aspect.

"NAN"

It is a pity that more people did not realise that Mr. Masefield's tragedy was going into the bill of the Vedrenne-Barker matinées at the Haymarket. The play made a sensation when it was performed before the Pioneers, and certainly the small attendance on Tuesday afternoon was largely due to the inability of the management to make the production more widely known in the time at their disposal. The play is a reasonably fine one. It has some of the forcefulness which is essential to tragedy. The mere circumstances of the story are sordid and horrible. Nan Hardwicke's father has been hanged for sheepstealing, and she is living with her aunt, Mrs. Pargetter, who takes a fiend's delight in making her life miserable; her cousin Jenny creeps into her confidence to learn her lover's name; Dick, her lover, is falsehearted, and shames her before all her friends, leaving her, at the aunt's instigation, for Jenny. Then in the last Act an officer comes from London to say that Nan's father was hanged by mistake, and to bring £50, which is a small fortune, as compensation for Nan's loss. Dick immediately makes love to her, and she, outraged by his meanness, kills him, and goes out to drown herself in the Severn. The only person who has not treated her with almost inhuman brutality is an old fiddler, half-witted with age and sorrow. Under Mr. Masefield's treatment the play is neither sordid nor horrible. The meanness of Dick and the Pargetters is shown unflinchingly, but you are overwhelmed not by their meanness, but by the greatness and beauty of Nan, which is like a flame amid black darkness. And more than that. Just as in Nan's exaltation she is brought in touch with the mystery of life, which is all that the half-witted fiddler can see, so in witnessing the triumph which is Nan's withdrawal from life, you are brought in touch with the simple greatness of life, and the flame of beauty which burns inextinguishably in the blackest environment. The powers of evil and the powers of good are in conflict; evil at first seems suffocating and dominant; you can hardly bear its cruelty and strength. But slowly you are shown things at their proper value, and you feel all Nature and life is supporting Nan, and at last you feel not hatred but a profound pity for the poor mean creatures who are nearer death than life, though Nan has gone away to die, and they possess her money, and have apparently won their little victory.

Miss Lillah McCarthy played Nan. It is the best piece of work which she has yet done. Her performance left little to be desired; it was in the first Act astonishingly good, but in the love-scene in the second Act greater simplicity would have been more effective, and in the last Act there was not enough spiritual exaltation. She did not make Nan sufficiently subordinate to the old fiddler, whose truth she was for the first time seeing. Mr. Hignett played Gaffer Pearce, the old fiddler, very well, except that at times he emphasised the old man's senility unnecessarily, and became a little restless and at times inaudible in consequence. But he felt the poetry of the old man's utterances. Miss Mary Jerrold played the mean little friend, Jenny, almost perfectly. In some ways it was the most finished performance in the play. Nothing could have been better than the way she brought out Jenny's terror as Nan shows her her own little snake's soul. Miss Jerrold should do great things. The rest of the company played well, especially Mr. Hodges as William Pargetter and Mr. Anson in the difficult part of Dick.

CORRESPONDENCE

SOCIALISM VERSUS CHRISTIANITY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I notice that a writer in your last week's issue asserts that the Socialist party has for one of its avowed aims the destruction of the Christian religion. I have been acquainted with Socialists now for the last three or four years, and have for about a year been one myself. I can therefore confidently assert that he is completely mistaken. It is only necessary to read the Socialist literature, the constitutional basis of Socialist societies, to talk to those who hold Socialist views, to find that, with hardly any exception, Christianity has just as much or as little to do with Socialism as it has to do with the cut-and-dried schemes of any other political party. If Socialists really did aim at the abolition of Christianity its opponents could well afford to leave it alone, for it would certainly accomplish its own destruction. Socialism is a scheme for taking land and capital out of private hands and transferring it to the public. It believes that by so doing only will the very glaring evils that oppress society be remedied. What Socialism does aim at is the abolition of capitalism—that is, wealth used to exploit and not to benefit human beings. As such it has attracted, and will continue to attract, many noble and fine spirits whose one object is the uplifting of their fellow-creatures.

W. H. PAINE, Curate of St. Mary's, Primrose Hill.

SOCIALISM AND SUFFRAGITIS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The splendid boiling-down of unsubstantiated opinion in your article of comparison between Suffragettes and Socialists is, to any one whose experience warrants them to speak with knowledge, highly amusing.

No person, for instance, would for one minute suppose the several Societies now engaged in advocating for the franchise to include on an equal qualification with men, women, to be pro-Socialists, if he or she had any personal knowledge of the movement with which to be able to form anything like a correct idea of the general opinion of the members of such Societies.

This knowledge I claim to have, and I think that as an active worker in the cause I can speak, not perhaps with as much authority as some of my co-workers, but with a knowledge greater by far than any outsider.

In accordance with the general attitude of the Socialists as a whole, without distinction of this branch or that branch, they have shown themselves incapable, or at any rate unwilling, to co-operate with any movement which is but a "half-way house" to any reform which in its final or extreme stage they themselves may advocate.

Consequently, therefore, the Socialists have been one of the most bitter of the opponents of what has come to be known as "Limited Suffrage."

It is true that we have amongst the speakers of our movement several well-known Socialists who have been far-seeing enough to grasp the fact that a movement which advocated a more liberal representation to women than to men was as unjust as the state of the franchise at the present time, and doomed to failure. It is also true that a very large number of the leaders and of the members as a whole are in favour of citizen franchise, but the composition of the societies is, so far as Socialists are concerned, numerically inconsiderable, and their numbers are far and away less than the support of either the Liberals or Conservatives in our ranks.

To those who have been favoured with a privilege enjoyed by few, Socialism is the spreading of that favour to the many, and those who advocate either that a privilege shall be abolished or that it shall become less of a monopoly are therefore Socialists, and, if this is the case, then your article is correct—women's franchise is Socialism, and its advocates are Socialists. But I repeat that Socialists, as a body, have opposed our movement, and our members and the members of the other Societies only contain a comparatively insignificant number of Socialists, and nothing but a very wide and absolutely incorrect definition of a Socialist could bring your article in any way into the line of fact.

H. MACKENZIE THEEDAM,
Men's League for Women's Suffrage.

34, Amwell Street, E.C., May 30, 1908.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As a Socialist I was charmed—that, as a man, being my principal function—by being credited with a feminine intellect, in the first quarter of the second column of the article "Socialism and Suffragitis," in the current issue of your gay periodical. And I have the true "blind instinct" that I am right in being charmed. To care nothing for reason—that were freedom indeed. A freedom I have at present in small measure; but I hope by the passage of years to attain to the finer verve, and share the upper strata with your contributor "A. D." He is more joyous and airier far than I. He is not even bound by fact. And for his arguments—well, were I not free from the grosser forms of logical restraint, I would credit "A. D." with female sex and incipient Socialism. I began his article at the end—as ladies begin novels—the method having some piquancy. One discovers the basic theme right away. In this case, for instance, one finds that "all that is fine and noble and lovely in this country" is being blighted and spoilt—which, as a Socialist, I cannot deny. Who are to blame? We are—I am—in part, it seems. Indeed? Really, I had no. . . . But read on. We—I—"have called forth the literature of Mr. Chesterton," and have "created the Suffragette."

Then half a column about Mr. Chesterton. Now Mr. Chesterton has recently, and at some length, explained that he is not a Socialist. It seemed obvious enough to us—to me. Why he did it I can't think—and out of his regular beat, too. So I will not bother any more about him. But the Suffragette, for whom I—we—are responsible (it is reiterated, "It is the Socialists, then, who are responsible for the Suffragettes")—what of her? Read back a little further. "Her disease is intimately connected with Socialism." Yes, yes; read on—back. "It is men, therefore, who are responsible for the Suffragette." But "A. D." said Socialists. Is "man" synonymous with Socialist? All men? Assuredly no; for that is a commonplace. But how are men responsible? Read on—back. Ha! a syllogism; because "even the Suffragette is a woman, and, being a woman, whether she knows it or not, she is engaged in the process of charming some one" (authority for this statement being found in the lines of Christina Rossetti beginning, "Woman was made for man's delight;" excellent lines!); and because "In the face of universal disgust and reprobation from man she simply could not exist. It is men, therefore, who are responsible for the Suffragette." Which really is not a commonplace. And so I am, Sir, your still charmed reader and confirmed subscriber,

A. B.

PS.—If you have room? Just to say that the instances of Suffragette repartee are really great. In the species shown the genus is foreshadowed—giving me huge joy. My disgust I share with "A. D."—without lessening its volume.

[We confess that we are unable to make head or tail of A. B.'s letter. In the words of the "Bab Ballads," "it is pretty, but we don't know what it means." Perhaps some of our readers may be more successful than we have been in deciphering "A. B." In any case, as "a charmed reader and confirmed subscriber," he is welcome to the space which his letter occupies.—ED.]

THE EVENING SUN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I read with considerable amusement your rapier-like stabbing of the New York "Stabber," the Evening Sun, in your issue of May 2nd. A word concerning this little sheet and its dam, the Sun—a morning paper—may not be inappropriate coming from a resident of New York and "in the know." It is not surprising that the Sun should deride the claims of Upton Sinclair "to accuracy of any sort," since Mr. Sinclair in "The Jungle" showed up the rascality of the Chicago Beef Trust, and it is well known that the Sun is chief lackey to all Trusts.

I read the Sun for various reasons. First, because I like to see what the devil is doing in these parts. Second, to give the devil his due, the Sun is the best "put together" paper in New York. By this I mean the most symmetrically arranged as regards news, etc., and there is always a literary touch in every article that appears therein. At one time the Sun bore a legend on its margin "If you see it in the Sun it's so." That legend disappeared after its circulation had dwindled from a million a week, blazoned on bill-boards, to a size which it did not advertise. Thereupon, or some time thereafter, it got to be whispered about journalistic circles in New York, "If you see it in the Sun it's crow." The news that the Sun gives is true—it's another question whether the news will be allowed to get into its columns or not; but as to its leaders and political policy, the first are "colored," as Mr. District Attorney Jerome well says, and in both there is suppressio veri, not to say expressio falsi, which blot the otherwise learned and frequently witty articles. As for its political policy, it is the most treacherous back-stabber that ever appeared in New York journalism. Though a Democratic paper, it attempted to back for President of the United States General "Spoons" B. F. Butler, who was charged with stealing spoons in New Orleans during the Civil War. It again attempted to betray the Democracy by its long war on President Grover Cleveland. Both these treacheries were performed while the Sun was Democratic. When Bryan appeared the Sun turned coat and flopped over to the Republican side. But its diabolical nature—its taste for the blacking on the boot of a Trust magnate, and its spittle-licking tendency in the same gross quarter—forced it to its old trick of treachery and back-stabbing against the only President we have had worthy of the name—Bar Cleveland—since Lincoln; of course I mean Theodore Roosevelt, and I am a life-long Democrat who say it.

To show the esteem in which Mr. Upton Sinclair is held on this side by honest journalists, a magazine with a quarter of a million subscribers in Boston, Human Life, congratulates itself on having Mr. Sinclair as a regular subscriber thereto. The Sun is hardly worthy of a serious journal's notice, for whatever you see in its leaders is "either 'crow' or not so."

WHERE IS THE BEST ENGLISH SPOKEN?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A number of us Englishmen here in the Transvaal wish you, as an authority on the English language, please to tell us where the best English is spoken in the British Isles.

J. UGLOW.

Post Office, East Rand, Transvaal, May 6, 1908.

[We should not like to pretend to give an authoritative answer to this question, but our private conviction is that the best English is spoken on the west coast of Scotland and in parts of Ireland. It sounds paradoxical; but every one knows that the best French is spoken not in Paris, but in certain remote and old-fashioned provincial towns.—ED.]

SHAKESPEARE'S QUARTOS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the current number of the Library Mr. Greg questions the printed and accepted dates of certain Shakespeare quartos on various bibliographical grounds. I venture to think that stronger evidence is yet required, on the following grounds.

Mr. Pollard some time ago called attention in THE ACADEMY of June 2nd, 1906, to the fact that the quartos in question occur bound together in several collections, and drew the conclusion that Thomas Paviour bought up the "remainders" of some of them, printed a few more, and with some of his own "remainders" made a saleable volume; but he abandons this theory now in favour of Mr. Greg's, that they were all, in spite of the professed dates, reprinted by Paviour in 1619.

His argument is chiefly founded on the similarity of typography, and especially the device of three flowers which appears on all the titles with one exception. I do not think it is necessary for the moment to go very deeply into this; but I may remark in passing that it is not impossible that Roberts may not have got the device at Jones's sale, even if White did buy his business, since White himself never used the device. My main object is to point out that Mr. Greg's strongest argument—that as to the water-marks in the paper—fails entirely.

Mr. Greg alleges that the watermarks in all the quartos—both those professing to be printed in 1600 and those dated 1619—show the paper to belong to one batch; and since the wires get worn out within one year the paper must have been made about the same time, and it is impossible that Paviour could have got hold of the same batch of paper in 1619 that Roberts used in 1600. I venture to think, however, that if Mr. Greg carefully measures watermarks which appear to the eye to be identical he will find that they are not. To take the "Pot" mark marked "LM," for instance, the first I found in my copies that occurred in (1) "The Merchant of Venice," 1600; (2) "King Lear," 1608; and (3) "Merry Wives," 1619, the measurement of the base at the greatest breadth is in (1) 14mm., in (2) 15.5mm., in (3) 14.5mm.; and there are also variations in the form of the mark itself, which show that the paper in these editions did not come from the same wire.

CHURCH SCHOOLS' EMERGENCY LEAGUE (MANCHESTER CENTRE)

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The following resolutions were passed at a meeting of the Committee held at the Diocesan Chambers, Manchester, June 2nd, 1908:—

1. "The Committee, believing that neither the Bill of the Government nor that of the Bishop of St. Asaph affords a basis for a just settlement of the Education question, are of the opinion that both Bills should be withdrawn, or, failing withdrawal, that they should be strenuously opposed."

2. "The Committee cannot agree to any educational settlement which does not provide for the continuance, with full share of public funds, of all schools for which suitable buildings are provided by the Church of England and other religious bodies."

3. "The Committee are of opinion that in all single-school areas the parent should, as far as practicable, be afforded the choice of either denominational or undenominational religious instruction for his child, to be given by teachers duly qualified for that purpose, during school hours."

4. "The Committee consider that a settlement would best be secured, not by the uprooting of the existing system, but by such amendments of the Education Acts as may be necessary for the removal of all real grievances, both of Churchmen and Nonconformists."

5. "The Committee, while accepting the fullest public control over secular education and the expenditure of public money, can never submit to public control of religious instruction in Church Schools, nor accept teachers who may not be tested as to their qualifications to give that instruction."

6. "The Committee are of opinion that, in the event of a National Round-table Conference taking place, the representatives of the Church should be selected by the Consultative Committee of the National Society, which includes persons experienced in the management of Voluntary Schools from every Diocese."

T. E. CLEWORTH, Hon. Secretary.

MINSHEU, MABBE, NICOLETA

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In THE ACADEMY of February 8th, 1908, I drew attention to the "Modo Breve" of R. de Nicoleta (Bilboa, 1653) as apparently the first attempt at a Baskish Grammar, and the source of the information which was used by Sir T. Browne, the earliest of English Bascophiles. I am informed by Don J. M. de Bernaola, Presbytero, of Durango, in Biscaya, that Sorrarain may have been right in stating in his Bibliography that that author's name occurs as Micoleta in the records of the Church of Santiago at Bilbao (now Bilbao), where he lived. It appears that the house known as Mekolako Borda (the farmhouse of Mekola) was inhabited by a family named Nicola, which points to the possibility of a confusion having taken place about the initial of Nicoleta. It has not, I think, been pointed out that in the "Diálogo Primero," which Nicoleta took from the "Pleasant and Delightful Dialogues in Spanish," bound up with "A Dictionary in Spanish and English" (London, 1623), from the pen of John Minsheu, the words (on p. 29 of the third edition, published at Sevilla, in 1897, before I had seen the original manuscript in the British Museum):

Ay diçe nuestra Madre Çelestina que está corrupta la letra, dagoala letrea corumpiduric, que por dezir treze diçe tres. serren amayrugayti diñoala yrru.

come from p. 106 (really 108) of "The Spanish Bawd represented in Celestina," translated by James Mabbe (Diego Pudec-ser = may-be), and published in London in 1631. There the words are:

"Celest. Sonne the phrase is corrupted; they haue put three time (sic), in stead of thirteene." They occur on p. 159 of the edition of Dr. J. Fitzmaurice-Kelly (London, 1894). According to the valuable "Dictionary of National Biography," J. Mabbe lived from 1572 still 1642. He was a Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, where a copy of his "Celestina" is preserved, and may have met Minsheu, who was there in 1610. The same authority tells us that Minsheu based his work upon that of Richard Perceval, or Percival (1550-1620), the author of "Bibliotheca Hispanica" (London, 1591). Whether Minsheu composed, or borrowed, his Dialogues I know not; but in the first, translated into fairly good Biscayan by Nicoleta, there is the date 1599. Dr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly tells us in his "History of Spanish Literature" (London, 1898) that "Celestina" was the work of Fernando de Rojas, Alcalde Mayor of Salamanca, and first published in 1499 at Burgos. Many quotations from it have enriched the "English Historical Dictionary" of Oxford; and some others might, with advantage, be added, for instance those illustrating the rare verb "implume" = to pluck, strip, for which one would rather expect "unplume" or "displume." The book was so popular in the sixteenth century that it may have been known, possibly in a French version, to Master W. Shakespeare. At any rate, Mabbe's translation contains at least two phrases which show that Shakespeare was in his mind. It appears that his translation was not in all places literal; and there is other evidence that he admired Shakespeare.

Before leaving the subject of Bascology, suggested by Nicoleta's version of Minsheu's "Diálogo Primero," may I point out two mistakes in the "Discoveries" of Dr. A. E. Drake, as quoted by Dr. Skeat in THE ACADEMY of April 11th, 1908? After twenty-two years' acquaintance with Baskland, and its vanishing old language, I do not know ola in the sense of "pole of a hen-roost." It means "argoma, aliaga"—i.e., furze, gorse. Nor is adar properly a branch, but a horn—probably first-cousin to Gaelic adharc. A branch is abar, perhaps connected with Gaelic barr = top, summit. The branch of a tree might in poetical style have been called its horn, just as the French call the horns of a stag its bois = woods. But Nicoleta's word for cuerno = horn is adar, and this is still so used in all the Baskish dialects.

On p. 92 of the fourth edition of "The History of the Christian Church," by F. J. Foakes Jackson, B.D. (Cambridge, 1905), one reads: "Both Tertullian and Minucius Felix speak of the Cantabrum, or according to some copies Labarum, as a Roman standard. Eusebius, in his Life of Constantine, implies that the term had been long in use. Its derivation is obscure; probably it is formed from the Basque word for a standard. The Greek Fathers write it λάβωρον or λάβουρον." I am not aware that the Basks had any native "word for a standard." Some modern etymologists have tried to explain λάβουρον by lau buru, which means four heads, ends, or extremities in good Baskish; but there is no evidence that such a term was used by the Vascones or Iberi under the Roman Empire, either in the sense of a cross or of a military signum. The oldest form of buru = head was puru, as appears from compound words; and the oldest form of lau (or lab in some dialects) was laur. A part of Baskland was known to the Romans as Cantabria; but even if cantabrum were a correct reading, we have this opinion of Lewis and Short, in their Latin Dictionary: "the connection with Cantabria is a mere conjecture." It is more probable that labārum is connected, like the root of λαμβάνω, with lamh, the old Keltic word for hand. Labur in Baskish means short. That which is short is at hand. It may be that Latin labōr = handiwork is also connected with Gaelic lámh, the latter word being used in the phrase lámh le in the sense of "near to." It would be more plausible to connect laur with λαύρα, if Greek monasteries were originally quadrangles. It may be that some people, finding in the Baskish Dictionary of Aizkibel laba translated by "metal candente" = glowing metal, have concluded that Italian lava is from prehistoric Heuskarian. It is, however, more likely that the Basks, taking lava from Italian, pronounced it, in their native way, laba, as they have not in their own alphabet the sound of V. Labe is oven in Baskish (not unlike some old forms of loaf), and the inside of a volcano is so like an oven that its product might be called by the same name. Vesuvi (the possessive case of Vesuvius) happens to mean in Baskish "two fire(s) beneath." It is not, I believe, known whence that volcano got its name. Nor do we know how old the Baskish language may be, nor in what regions it may have been spoken two or three thousand years ago. Mr. A. E. A. Fremantle, B.A. of University College, Oxford, thought that lava was to be connected with λεῖψα, kettle, from the same root as λεῖψω, libo. It occurred to me that it might be akin, if not to labe, at least to labai—Baskish for slippery, which is like Latin labōr. But etymologies are as slippery ground as ice. Let us leave them with our skates!

ELFETA

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—Chaucer tells us that Cambyuskan

Hadde two sones on Elfeta his wyf

("Canterbury Tales," F. 29.) Elfeta is the spelling of the Hengwrt MS., the peculiar importance of which Professor Skeat has pointed out in his "The Evolution of the Canterbury Tales" (Chaucer Society, 1907; for the issue of 1903), of Cambridge Manuscript Dd. 4.24, and of Bodleian 686. Until recently I have been disposed to regard Elfeta as a feminine diminutive of Elf, coined by Chaucer, and Cambyuskan as one of a large number of heroes of romance who wedded fairies. Very lately, however, I have observed that in Skeat's edition of Chaucer's "Astrolabe" (Chaucer Society, 1872) certain star-lists on pp. xxxvii.-xlv. give to their 29th star the name Elfeta or Alfeta. I think this star-name is far more likely to be the source of the name of Cambyuskan's Queen, but have not the means of further inquiry. Will anybody inform me whether Algarsyf, the son of Cambyuskan, was also named for a star?

THE HOME SECRETARY AND THE LASH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The lash has gone very much out of favour with the public of late years, but I fear that public officers like the Home Secretary do not always sufficiently consult the wishes of their employers the public, and, unfortunately, under our present system, the members of a Ministry hang together, and the public cannot turn out one without turning out all, which they may not wish to do. And the present Home Secretary is not the only holder of that office who often speaks and writes as if he were the servant of an absolute monarch rather than of the public—though he usually yields to public opinion when strongly expressed.

Flogging, however, has many advocates who are virulent and noisy, and clamour for applying the lash to prisoners who are now exempt from it. I do not believe that their numbers are at all proportioned to the space which they occupy in the Press. Allegation is their forte, but they are not particular about proof. Indeed, as regards the vaunted successes of the cat and the birch, the particulars given are often so defective that their opponents cannot find out what cases they alluded to. As regards flogging Judges they never try the cat without a considerable addition of imprisonment or penal servitude; and though the statute may require such a sentence in addition to the flogging, the Judge could make the imprisonment as short as he pleased, and would no doubt make it short if he really relied on the cat to effect a cure. But on comparing the sentences of Mr. Justice Lawrence with, for example, those of Sir John Day, we cannot fail to notice the reduction in the number of strokes without any similar reduction in the accompanying term of imprisonment. Flogging Judges seem to be losing faith in the favourite remedy, whatever their admirers may say to the contrary. Indeed, Mr. Justice Lawrence implied that he passed these sentences not with a view to any beneficial result, but in order to show his sympathy with the victims! The assigning of such a reason for passing these sentences ought, I think, to have led a public officer to reconsider them carefully. But this is not all. Flogging under the antiquated Vagrant Act of 1824 (which never extended to either Ireland or Scotland) still goes on, although more than one Home Secretary has declared his disapproval of it. If the question of its continuance were submitted to the present House of Commons there would, I believe, be an enormous majority against it; but the Home Secretary is too busy with his scheme of "indefinite sentences" for "habituals" to redress this crying evil, or even to give general directions to his subordinates to remit all sentences passed under a section which he cannot find time to repeal. Then there is flogging for breaches of prison discipline after a secret inquiry before the Visiting Justices, the precise nature of the offence and the evidence given in proof of it never being made known to the public. The system would suit Russia better than England. But there is this difference between it and the other flogging sentences to which I have referred—the others are carried out unless the Home Secretary intervenes; this one cannot be carried out without his approval. In a recent return it would seem that the approval was given in sixty-seven cases out of seventy. Whether the three remissions were made on the merits or on medical grounds I do not know, but at all events there must have been either a wonderfully efficient tribunal of the first instance or a wonderfully inefficient tribunal of appeal. One would wish to know what kind of report of the proceedings was placed before the Home Secretary before deciding, and whether the prisoner had any opportunity of being heard. But some officials seem to think that if the decision is deferred for some time the public will give them credit for having given the case a full consideration, though perhaps they never had sufficient information to arrive at an intelligent conclusion.

THE HUB OF LIFE

By VICTORIA MAITLAND. 6s.

What is the hub of life? "Love," decides Miss Maitland, and in this novel she gives us a convincing study of the very varied effects of the master passion. We see it at its highest expression in the character of Helena, the high-spirited girl whose devotion never falters in the face of an appalling disaster; we see its results on Allan Field, who, maddened by jealousy, tries to wreak vengeance on the family he conceives to have done him wrong; and at the close we see a dawning recognition of its power in Adrienne, the delightful bachelor girl who plays the good fairy to her relations and is loth to lose her cherished independence.

But the author does not confine herself to matters of sentiment. In many of her episodes she shows great dramatic power; and she is very happy in her choice of backgrounds for her varied incidents. Beginning with a picturesque corner of Northumberland, we visit the beauties of Warwick and Kenilworth; we see the long avenues of St. Cloud and Geneva in the moonlight; and all these scenes are finely described by the hand of one who knows them well. "The Hub of Life" should be read by every one.

THE PONGO PAPERS

AND
Duke of Berwick

By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS.

With Illustrations by DAVID WHITELAW. 2s. 6d. net.

This book consists of a Series of Verses satirizing the methods of modern scientific controversialists. Included in the volume is the "Duke of Berwick," an extremely amusing nonsense rhyme. All lovers of skilful and witty light verse should get "The Pongo Papers."

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Lord Alfred Douglas's entertaining whim of associating inappropriate ethical qualities with various undistinguished members of the brute creation reappears in 'The Pongo Papers.' It is all in the best style of 'nonsense-verse,' which consists largely in conveying the minimum of useful information with the maximum of craftsmanship."—Observer.

"Lord Alfred Douglas has done a remarkable thing in this slender book of verses, half nonsense and half satire as he explains in his preface, for he has added another member to the list of legendary persons whose type and habit of mind may usefully be quoted on occasions. . . . It is excellent fooling, and will be enjoyed by all who are amused by comic rhyme and a satire on scientific controversy. . . . We have only one complaint against this excellent little book—there is not enough of it."—Daily Telegraph.

"It is not everybody, as the author admits, who can enjoy nonsense rhymes, but there are very many we feel sure who will appreciate the humour and satire which abounds in the pages of Lord Alfred Douglas' little volume of verses entitled 'The Pongo Papers.' They make some very amusing reading, and the book is cleverly illustrated by David Whitelaw."—Yorkshire Post.

"The Duke of Berwick' is delightfully witty and satirical. . . . No one will deny that the finish and execution of Lord Alfred Douglas' work is extraordinary."—Country Life.

"Lord Alfred Douglas writes a clever preface for a clever little book. . . . he exhibits the very difficult art of being utterly foolish. . . . We are very grateful to him. . . . There is real laughter in 'The Pongo Papers.'"—Tribune.

"In his new book just published by Messrs. Greening, Lord Alfred Douglas has made admirable play with the methods of scientific controversies. 'The Pongo Papers' are pure satire."—Yorkshire Evening Post.

"The Pongo Papers' constitute capital 'nonsense'. . . . The volume provides readers with an hour's light literature and is amusingly illustrated by Mr. David Whitelaw."—Sunday Sun.

"The Pongo Papers' are very cleverly-done nonsense verses with a satirical strain. 'The Duke of Berwick' is to our mind the best as well as the longest of them, but all are remarkably good and neat."—Sportsman.

"Lord Alfred Douglas in 'The Pongo Papers' and 'The Duke of Berwick' by his very amusing verses proves that as a writer of verses pure and simple we have in him a successor to the author of 'Alice in Wonderland.' The illustrations by David Whitelaw are capital."—Madame.

"The poems are written with light and humorous touch throughout, and Mr. David Whitelaw has added some clever drawings."—Outlook.

"The Pongo Papers' have a distinguished originality, and are framed in the metre that the author handles with marked ease and fluency. Along with these witty and diverting sketches appears another elegant trifle, 'The Duke of Berwick.'"—Perthshire Advertiser.

"The Duke of Berwick' is the kind of poetry we should like to read when we are sick or sorrowful, for it is pure art unstained by any trace of human emotion or of that sickly business called living. . . . 'The Pongo Papers' are a brilliant satire. . . . This is a book which everyone must read."—Vanity Fair.

"That it takes a clever man to write nonsense is a truism. At any rate 'The Pongo Papers' and 'The Duke of Berwick,' by Lord Alfred Douglas, are conspicuously clever and in some parts even brilliant."—Publisher and Bookseller.

"The Pongo Papers,' by Lord Alfred Douglas, contain some of the wittiest verse that has been written in our time. The satire is rapier-like in its thrusts. The solemn methods of modern 'scientific' thinkers come in for some delicious railery. 'The Duke of Berwick' is full of drollery, and will bear reading more than once. It is difficult to estimate the amount of delicate art and literary culture that have gone to the writing of these astonishingly clever nonsense-verse."—Publishers' Circular.

THE MOSHER BOOKS

is now ready, and will be sent free on request to booklovers anywhere that can be reached by mail. This Catalogue, like those that preceded it, is not made up of old and hackneyed quotations concerning books. You are not wearied by "a jollie good book" jingle and that sort of thing, but you are treated to some very genuine prose and verse not seen in every cut and decidedly dried anthology.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, PORTLAND, MAINE, U.S.A.

Have you heard people talking about a new book called

THE FOURTH SHIP?

Probably you have—without giving much attention to it. Well, this will tell you something about that book. The publishers are advertising in this conspicuous fashion in THE ACADEMY because they believe it to be just the kind of story which readers of THE ACADEMY will appreciate. It may not be everybody's book, but it is certainly the book for everybody who appreciates a delicate touch, true sentiment, and a sincere and penetrating picture of life. The readers of THE ACADEMY, the publishers believe, are people of this sort. So to them we recommend this advertisement of

THE FOURTH SHIP

THE FOURTH SHIP

BY ETHEL COLBURN MAYNE.

The Times, for example, reviewed this book at great length, and called it "a delightful book, which suggests a series of delicate vase-paintings," while The Daily Telegraph pronounced it "a sheer delight, full of delicate workmanship and real life." Then T. P.'s Weekly found it "very definite and striking, very vivid and intimate," and The Cork Constitution praised it as "curiously delicate, yet powerful, tenderly yet impressively worked out." The Manchester Guardian said that the work was "of such delicacy and charm as to recall Jane Austen," and The Morning Leader added that "the author shows an exquisite sense of value all through the book."

The result of these notices is that "THE FOURTH SHIP" is beginning to sell, and is just now in lively demand at all the principal libraries in the country.

Other Books from the same publisher's list, which you may care to order at your library, are:—

LIFE AND LETTERS

THE second letter on the subject of Socialism and Christianity from Mr. Paine which we publish in our Correspondence columns only serves to show how very dangerous it is to argue from imperfect and partial knowledge. It is quite evident from Mr. Paine's letter that he has the very vaguest ideas as to what Socialism really means. He calmly remarks, "I have not read Mr. Bax." What a confession for a Socialist! What would Mr. Paine think of a man who professed to be a member of the Conservative party and who declared that he did not believe that the preservation of individual liberty was any part of the policy of that party, and who on being referred to the speeches of the late Lord Salisbury, Mr. Balfour, and the other leaders of the party, replied, "I have never heard or read the speeches of Mr. Balfour or Lord Salisbury"? The vast majority of Socialists are atheists and Freethinkers, and say so quite frankly. Mr. Paine will not alter the facts by blandly ignoring them or by exposing his ignorance of the writings of the leaders of the movement to which he professes to belong. None are so blind as those who will not see, and if Mr. Paine, after reading the letter which immediately follows his own, does not feel it necessary to revise his views we fear he is past praying for. As to the statement which he makes—"the Socialist movement is making rapid progress"—as far as this country is concerned we unhesitatingly give it a flat denial. It is impossible to argue with a man who persists in saying that two and two make five, and who, when it is pointed out to him that the vast weight of intelligent mathematical opinion has decided against the proposition, replies by saying, "Time will show that I am right," and supports his theory by quite irrelevant references to the utterly unimportant views of certain utterly unimportant nonentities who have managed to get themselves elected Members of Parliament. To do the so-called Christian Socialists justice, we are of opinion that a very much better case could be made for them than is attempted by Mr. Paine. We rather fancy that our contributor Mr. Marson could furnish us with at any rate a reasonable basis for argument. We offer him the hospitality of our Correspondence columns for the purpose.

The letter which we print from Mr. Dalrymple Duncan on Socialism and Suffragitis confirms in every particular the contention which we laid down in a recent article that these two diseases are intimately connected. By the way, it appears that there is to be a demonstration of female Suffragists on June 21st in Hyde Park, and the interior of tube-stations and lifts have been "beautified" by portraits of ladies who are to address this momentous gathering. It is greatly to be hoped that some counter-demonstration of sane and right-thinking women will be organised. There is not the least doubt that the feeling in the country against the Suffragettes is very strong indeed. The further they go with their demonstrations and their public shrieks the more do they disgust the vast majority of reasonable people of either sex. We invite suggestions from our readers as to the organisation of a counter-movement.

We have to congratulate the Daily Mail on the discovery of a new source of humour. That paper and the journals allied to it have, we may say, done pretty well in the past; they have alluded to Mr. Dick Swiveller's entertainment of Mr. Pickwick, they have hailed Miss Corelli, Mr. Guy Thorne, and Mr. Crockett as a "Celtic Galaxy," and they have furnished our peaceful British breakfast-tables with some pretty notes on the "Girlhood of a Man." There is something quite charming in this last feat. Of course it is only right that the patrons of a "family paper" should be well posted in such subjects. But a week ago the Daily Mail surpassed itself. It dazzled the reader's eye with the headings:

STRIKE OF "VILLAINS."

AMUSING STORY OF A CLOSED THEATRE.

And, indeed, the story proved to be of a side-splitting character. It seems that last January a company of actors was engaged to play in a pantomime at Bexhill-on-Sea; whereupon the following farcical incidents (much funnier, surely, than anything in the pantomime) took place:

On the Saturday evening, in consequence of the artistes not being paid their salaries, two comedians, Munro and Wilson, who were playing the part of the "villains," refused to perform. An uproar ensued, in the middle of which Mr. St. John, manager of the company, to whom all looked for their salaries, escaped with his portmanteau to the station. He was observed in his escape, however, and promptly haled back to the theatre by the male section of the company.

An attempt was made to get together a scratch performance, but owing to there not being another two "villains" in Bexhill that fell through. In consequence of this there was no performance that night, and the company was left stranded and practically starving.

Surely the Daily Mail having, as it were, tapped the source of so much mirth, will let us have more from a well which should be inexhaustible. It is humorous enough, we confess, to think of these twenty-five wretched strollers starving at Bexhill; left there without money, without food, in imminent danger of being turned out into the streets or on to the shore. And some actors are married, and have delicate wives and sick children and pressing debts incurred for the hard, simple necessities of life; and some of the twenty-five doubtless looked forward to that engagement at Bexhill as a drowning man looks at an approaching boat; and all this makes the tale ever so much funnier. But there must be even better things of the same sort, which would make the lively pages of the Daily Mail livelier still. For instance, actors sometimes get ill: why should we not have something of this kind?

AMUSING SCENE.

COMIC CLOWN PERISHING OF PERITONITIS.

And then actors die occasionally; the Daily Mail will, doubtless, let us know of the event after this sort:

HUMOROUS INCIDENT.

EXIT WHIMSICAL WILKINS.

"CANCER" HIS CUE.

Really, if the matter be properly handled, there will be no excuse for wasting threepence a week on Punch. Every week we may expect a few sparkling jokes at the expense of poor actors ; and why leave out struggling authors and unlucky painters ? This is an ethical age, the Harmsworth publications are nothing if not ethical ; and quip and jest will enforce the great moral lesson that the greatest of all sins is the want of money.

Seriously, one longs sometimes for the establishment of the régime of the Mikado—the Mikado of Mr. Gilbert. Here is a case in which the punishment should be made to fit the crime. One does not want to be ferocious and vindictive, we do not propose that the proprietors and staff of the Daily Mail should be compelled to read the "Children's Encyclopædia ;" but one would be glad to lead these gentlemen apart, to starve them a little, to make them taste the draught of hope deferred, to take them down to Bexhill, and finally to defraud them of their wages, and to leave them stranded there at the mercy of chance compassions and of their landladies. It is possible that the case might then seem less "amusing." It is an ill sign of the times that the stupid and callous brutality we have noted is supposed to appeal to the great mass of the people. Gross literary ignorance, shameless puffery, staring incompetence, the insertion of paragraphs which are of no pleasant content—all this we must pass. But the Yahoo laughter over the distresses and agonies of helpless men and women shall not be allowed to pass. He who grinds the faces of the poor is denounced as accursed ; we need not seek far for an epithet to apply to the man who makes comic capital out of the woes of poverty.

The May Week number of the Cambridge Review contains some interesting, not to say highly diverting, reading. On June 17th, at 3.15 p.m., certain honorary degrees are to be conferred on certain distinguished persons, and, by the "kindness of the Public Orator," the Cambridge Review is in a position to offer us some "memoranda on their careers." The memoranda are really great in their way. Of Mr. Kipling the Public Orator dilates as follows :—

(11) Rudyard Kipling has had the rare distinction of having been the theme of at least three volumes of literary criticism during his life-time : the "appreciation" by G. F. Monkshood, the "Kipling Primer" of F. L. Knowles, and the elaborate review written by Richard Le Gallienne. The "Seven Seas" is dedicated to the City of Bombay, and its opening poem tells us of the author's pride in the city of his birth—

For I was born in her gate,
Between the palms and the sea,
Where the world-end steamers wait.

The rapidity with which his reputation was won was remarkable. In 1890 it was associated with the familiar saying, "but that is another story ;" in 1899 he was exhorting us to take up "the white man's burden." His work in prose is noted for its vigour, vitality, vividness, veracity, and virility ; while his verse is of a brilliant and highly rhetorical type.

The which, surely—leaving out, of course, the vigorous, vital, vivid, veracious, and virile part—might have been written by Biffins of the Fourth Form. And when the Public Orator ventures on a trifle of detail he becomes still more delicious ; assuring us, for example, that the "best-known" of the "Barrack-Room Ballads" "tells of the soldier who hears 'the East a-callin','" and sighs for the once-familiar sights and sounds on "the road to Mandalay." We discover further that :

In the same volume the soldier's tribute to the fine qualities of the savage Soudanese warrior achieved a great success ; and any who ever heard the late Mr. Cobb play and sing his own setting of these two ballads, are not likely soon to forget them.

It seems to us that on the whole the Public Orator at Cambridge might with advantage furbish up his literary wits, not to mention his literary style. That any person in his senses should consider that Mr. Monkshood's "appreciation" of Mr. Kipling, and Mr. Knowles's "Kipling Primer," and Mr. Le Gallienne's "elaborate review" confer rare distinction upon their subject is idiotic. That the Editor of the Cambridge Review should smack his lips over such babble astonishes us.

Lovers of good dancing should certainly not miss paying a visit to the Pavilion Music Hall, where Guerrero is appearing nightly. On the occasion on which we visited the theatre last Monday, a Bank Holiday crowd did not seem to appreciate at its proper value the exquisite art displayed by this accomplished dancer. Guerrero's art is not confined to that of dancing. She is also a master of facial expression and gesture, and in the thrilling little episode in three short scenes which culminate in her betrayal of the brigand to the soldiers who are searching for him, she is most admirably supported by the gentleman who takes the part of the brigand. The whole performance is on a very high level, and is a reminder of the fact, which has often been noted before, that the best art is quite as often to be found in the music-hall as in the theatre.

The editor of the Book Monthly has been interviewing the editor of a rival journal called the Tailor and Cutter. The editor of the Tailor and Cutter knows all about "the dress of authors." He is of opinion that Mr. Augustine Birrell dresses "passing well," and that Sir Gilbert Parker is quite one of the best-dressed men of the day. On the other hand, Mr. Swinburne's habiliments are stated to be "of the farmer type," while the "note" of Mr. Hall Caine's get-up is "individuality." The editor of the Tailor and Cutter told the editor of the Book Monthly a great deal more to the like effect. Mr. Birrell may have changed his style of dress since he became a Cabinet Minister, but in the drear days prior to the return of the present Government to power we saw a good deal of Mr. Birrell, and we should never have dreamed of describing him as a man who dressed even moderately well. While as to Mr. Swinburne, there never was and there never will be the smallest suggestion of "farmer" about him. However, the matter is entirely a small one. It is not the reach-me-downs of authors that concern anybody in his senses.

The prophets appear to have been quite wrong in their views as to reprints. On the face of it it is gratifying that they should have been wrong. For obviously the thing that we need—that is to say, when we begin to consider English letters—is reprints. Five years ago it was commonly supposed that the cheap classic had come for a day. It was regarded as a mere publishers' fetch, and we were told that the book-buying public would speedily grow sick of it. Yet at the present moment we are publishing reprints with the most palpable assiduity, and the public do not appear to be in the least tired. And whereas in the beginning of the movement the publication of two or three volumes at a time was considered highly enterprising, we now feel ourselves competent to descend upon the market not with spies, so to speak, but with whole battalions. Mr. Dent has just sent us a list of 349 volumes of "Everyman's Library" published by his firm, and he announces coolly that "twenty-five new volumes are just added." It is plain that if there were no demand for "Everyman's Library" Mr. Dent would scarcely go on making his additions. But he goes on making them. This is as it should be, and it proves to demonstration that when all is said the reading public is not by any means so black as certain critics are inclined to paint it. In other words, if you give it of the best, it has sense enough to rise to the occasion. The early notion that people bought classics on the mere ground of their cheapness is by this time pretty well exploded. It is true that they might not buy them if they were dear ; but it is equally true that they have ceased to buy them as mere "furniture." There can be no doubt that books are now being read in reprint form which would otherwise have been neglected. The catholicity of the editors of "Everyman's Library" and the pluck of the publisher cannot be questioned. We are glad to perceive that they are not wanting of their commercial reward.

Quite a number of new firms of publishers have sprung into existence during the last twelve months, and among those which have attained the most striking success may be named that of Mrs. E. Grant Richards. This new firm must not be confused with the old firm of Grant Richards. It will be remembered that on the failure of Mr. Grant Richards for an amount exceeding £60,000, on which sum a very trifling asset in the pound was ultimately paid, the original firm ceased to exist. Mrs. Grant Richards, however, of course has had at her disposal the advice and experience of her capable husband. It is understood that Mr. Grant Richards has made the noble resolution, which has nowadays become almost old-fashioned, of endeavouring, with the assistance of Mrs. Richards, to pay off his creditors in full. Nobody who is acquainted with the almost Quixotically honest character of Mr. Richards will be surprised that he has taken this resolution, and in an age when commercial morality is becoming more and more lax it is one which will be universally applauded. Mr. Grant Richards is understood to have felt particularly distressed that among his unpaid creditors was a large proportion of authors many of whom could ill afford the loss which was entailed by intrusting the publication of their books to his hands. This sentiment is one which does him the utmost credit.

GIVING PLACE

Thou art not, though thy hawthorns on the air
Spread rich, thy lilacs sweeping everywhere,
Persia's fine way
Superbly gray ;
Though thy laburnums drop—thou art not there—
There is no May.
It is the June, the lovely June, concealed,
And all her beauties treasured that will yield
Themselves, how soon !
My senses swoon ;
Where the white umbels blow across the field
There must be June.

THE FLUTES OF SILENCE

The swoln grey-fingered shadows stretch between
The chestnut boughs, to touch the fountain's rim,
And on the large leaf-freckled basin dim
The still dissolving show of that faint scene ;
There a bright inlay of glassed leaves is seen ;
The sun flows in and floats, as if it knew
No gushing of white waters to the blue
Would stir among the mosses' film of green,
And parcel out the cloud-built floor, and make
The inverted minarets of poplar shake ;
For ever this phantasmal place, believe,
Thrills to the flutes of silence faintly blown,
While from the sallow hedge, moist leaves are sown
Falling like meteors faint at shut of eve.

REVIEWS THE SHAKESPEARE APOCRYPHA

The Shakespeare Apocrypha. Edited, with Introduction, Notes and Bibliography, by C. F. TUCKER BROOKE. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 5s. net.)

THIS careful and scholarly book is a collection of fourteen of the plays which have at one time or another been attributed to Shakespeare. So sound and trustworthy a text as this has been, in the case of many of these plays, badly needed for some time, and the other editorial functions have been performed by Mr. Tucker Brooke with learning and care ; while his Introduction is admirable.

During the last three centuries more than forty plays not in the first folio have been attributed to Shakespeare—in the earliest times uncritically, by mere hearsay, or by fraudulent publishers ; later by the English scholars of the eighteenth century, whose scholarship was hardly minute enough to be secure in noting the difference between the real Shakespeare and his contemporaries or imitators ; and, lastly, "in a burst of midsummer madness," as Mr. Tucker Brooke well says, by the German Shakespearians, with Tieck and Schlegel at their head, who wanted to claim for their demigod almost as much, though on different grounds, as the Baconians nowadays want to claim for theirs. Of these forty odd plays, Pericles and Titus Andronicus have now been accepted, rightly or wrongly, into the canon ; others, like The Second Maiden's Tragedy, which was destroyed by Warburton's cook, have perished ; others were flat forgeries ; and others, again, have either found their proper attribution, or turned out too flagrantly un-Shakespearian to deserve a place even in the Apocrypha. The fourteen plays printed by Mr. Tucker Brooke comprise the residuum—those which may be regarded as entitled to the benefit of the off-chance that Shakespeare wrote them, altered them, or touched them up. In his Introduction Mr. Tucker Brooke examines the value of that off-chance.

It is not very great. In the first place, all these plays are of different genres from those in the canon. There is not a single plot taken from the French or Italian. In nearly all fourteen plays the characters are English. Two are relations in dramatic form of famous crimes of the day—a branch of drama which is only recently extinct, but not one to attract a Shakespeare. Several are close studies of contemporary life and manners, the kind of thing that Ben Jonson liked to do, in Bartholomew Fair and elsewhere, but which the canonical Shakespeare never did, save perhaps under the guise of history or fiction. Finally there are the biographical chronicles—Sir John Oldcastle, Thomas Lord Cromwell, and Sir Thomas More. It is here that we cannot follow Mr. Tucker Brooke with complete confidence in his prima facie objection to the Shakespearian authorship. True, there is no biographical chronicle in the canon, but there are several plays that come being very near it—Richard II., for instance—and others, of which part, at least, is the disconnected biography of some one character. Again, it is hardly safe to condemn such plays outright on the ground of "structural chaos." Structural cosmos is not a marked characteristic of Shakespeare's chronicles ! The kind of play and the conditions of presentation on the stage did not demand it. We are not, however, disagreeing with Mr. Tucker Brooke's conclusions ; we are merely pointing out that this is the place where his prima facie arguments are weakest. For all that they are probably sound, and, empirically considered, the plays—and especially the very interesting Sir Thomas More—bear him out in the decision he arrives at.

It would take too long to examine the claims of all these fourteen plays to have been written, revised, or touched by Shakespeare. Mr. Tucker Brooke has done it candidly and soundly, and every reader will want to play the game for himself. We find it difficult to believe that Arden of Feversham, a brutal and clumsy play, will hold much longer the place which it has somehow won, even in the opinion of so great a critic as Mr. Swinburne. Did Shakespeare even touch it up? Several critics are still inclined to trace his hand "glancing along" in one or two passages. Here is one of them. Shakebag, the murderer, is lying in wait to kill Arden :

Black night hath hid the pleasures of ye day,
And shetung darknesse overhangs the earth
And with the black folde of her cloudy robe
Obscures us from the eiesight of the worlde,
In which swete silence such as we triumph.
The laysie minuts linger on their time,
Loth to give due audit to the howre,
Til in the watch our purpose be complete
And Arden sent to everlasting night.
Greene, get you gone and linger here about,
And at some houre hence come to us againe,
Where we will give you instance of his death.

Did Shakespeare write that? He might have—but so might a dozen others of his time. And Arden's relation of his dream in the following scene, which is another supposed Shakespearian passage, is just like a dozen other of the dreams of which Elizabethan audiences were fond. As to A Yorkshire Tragedy, another play, or rather sketch, on the same lines, it is—but for one passage of admirable prose—a worse production even than The Fatal Curiosity, and even the contemporary evidence of the Stationers' Register and the title-page of the first edition—even the opinion of Dr. A. W. Ward—cannot make us believe it to be Shakespearian in the minutest degree. We should, on the other hand, dearly like to believe in Mucedorus, that fascinating piece of childishness, that delightful fairy-tale, with its bear and its wild man of the woods, its clown Mouse, and the rest of it. But, alas! the will to believe is here of no avail.

The case is very different with what is, in many respects, the most interesting play in this volume, Sir Thomas More. Here we hit upon one of those exciting possibilities and puzzles which are too rare in the career of the student of texts and manuscripts. The original manuscript of this play lay neglected in the British Museum till Dyce printed it in 1844. It is a very untidy manuscript, written in several different hands. The story seems to have been that a clean copy, all in one hand, was sent to the Master of the Revels for licence, that he objected, as his own notes in the margin show, to certain things, and that the manuscript was thereupon handed over to two or three or more people, each of whom was to alter a part. Was one of those people Shakespeare? And have we in this manuscript an authentic specimen of Shakespeare's handwriting?

One supreme passage, the scene in which More (or Moore, as the play spells the name) calms by his eloquence an insurrection among the citizens of London, has been assigned by Stebbing, the great critic of Bacon, and by others to Shakespeare; and the reader cannot but agree that here, if anywhere in this book, we have something that proclaims itself Shakespeare. It is Shakespeare all over—in rhythm, in the use of words, in grandeur, in humour, in its view of the mob, in dramatic force, in everything. It is a first draft, corrected and "blotted" in a manner that should have satisfied even Jonson. It appears that comparison of the handwriting with the only extant pieces of Shakespeare's handwriting—the signatures to his will and to the two deeds—is inconclusive; and much surely hangs upon the nature of the script. Is it English or Italian? Be that as it may, the internal evidence of this scene (which should be read in its entirety) is as conclusive as such things can be.

The question is complicated not a little by the uncertainty as to whether some other portions of the amended play are in the same hand as the great insurrection scene or not. The experts in manuscript are divided; but the weight of evidence appears to be on the side of an identity of hand in certain weaker passages, which might yet be by Shakespeare. It is possible, too, of course, that the adaptor, in making his improvements, copied out in his own hand certain things which he took over from the original.

It is an exciting question. But, whichever way it is settled, no one can fail to admit, with Dr. A. W. Ward, Mr. Tucker Brooke, and many others, that the play itself is, next perhaps to The Two Noble Kinsmen, the best in the Shakespeare Apocrypha.

MEMORIES

Memories of Men and Books. By the REV. ALFRED JOHN CHURCH, M.A. (Smith and Elder, 8s. 6d. net.)

MR. CHURCH writes with such engaging frankness and exhibits himself in this volume in such an amiable light that he disarms criticism. Age has its privileges, and he would be a churl indeed who would find fault because the "memories" of a kindly old gentleman in his eightieth year are sometimes a little trivial, sometimes, it might almost seem, hardly worth remembering. Had Mr. Church done nothing in his life but write his "Stories from Virgil" and "Stories from Homer," he would have deserved well of the world. Many stories from the classics have been written, but none of them approach in merit the work of Mr. Church. Written with genuine enthusiasm in fine, clear-cut English, they have been a fruitful source of inspiration not only to schoolboys, but to others to whom the classics were a sealed book. They have the genuine taste and aroma of the originals. They rank as literature with Lamb's "Tales from Shakespeare." And it is interesting to see in perusing the pleasant pages of his book how his ardent love and knowledge of the classics have influenced and affected his whole life, giving him breadth of taste and knowledge, an amiability of outlook. The "humanities"? Yes; there is something in them that those who would banish Greek and Latin from our public school curriculum would never be able to replace.

Of himself Mr. Church has no tales of heroism to tell. His is the record of a quiet, studious life passed, for the most part, in libraries and class-rooms. He has been schoolmaster, professor, parish priest, author, and reviewer. He admits with charming candour that he was not a conspicuous success either as schoolmaster or professor. His heart was all the time in his writing, with which he never allowed his other avocations to interfere. He confesses to having produced some seventy books—a rare record of industry and devotion—and the reader who is interested in these matters may learn from these pages the financial results of Mr. Church's literary labours. The "Stories from Virgil" and the "Stories from Homer"—his most successful volumes—have brought him a little over £2,000; but this sum, of course, took many years to earn. In addition to his work as author, Mr. Church claims to have reviewed forty thousand books—a staggering achievement which argues not only great mental stability, but marvellous physical vitality on the part of the reviewer. For those who desire to know the secrets of reviewing, Mr. Church provides an illuminating chapter. Quite as interesting as the author's literary memories are some of his reminiscences of old London and of Oxford in the late 'forties. Things were different at Oxford in those days:

Of organised sport there was very little—nothing, in fact, except rowing. The College was too small and, I take it, too poor to have a cricket-ground. It was possible to belong to the Magdalen Club, which was then practically the club for the University. But cricket was an expensive amusement, and, though there were two or three good cricketers in Lincoln, no one ever played. We were more zealous consequently about rowing.

Mr. Church was associated at Oxford with many men who have since become famous in Church and State. One of the most interesting personalities he describes is that of Mark Pattison, tutor of Lincoln College. Of him he writes:

He lived for a while in what we should now call a "clergy house," of which John Henry Newman was the head, and he was associated in the work of the "Lives of Saints." . . . He was accustomed to recite daily the "Hours of the Roman Breviary," and he was once at least among those who frequented Dr. Pusey's confessional. . . . Social he never was. He was good enough to admit me to his friendship, but I never felt quite at ease in his company. What undergraduate could ever forget the disconcerting stare with which he regarded him during the duty call which was paid at the beginning of a term? He did not attempt to make conversation, but glared, so to speak, over his spectacles at his visitor. The hardest youth, though he might be said to fear neither God nor man, quailed before that speechless, petrifying look.

It should be added that Mr. Church has many pleasant and entertaining anecdotes to tell, and from the first page to the last there is not an unkind word about anybody.

THE MAKING OF ANTHOLOGIES

Poets of Our Day. By N. G. ROYDE-SMITH. (Methuen, 5s.)

CERTAINLY the living poets are lucky fellows. Here is yet another book devoted to their glory, and it would seem that at last they are coming into their own. We say at last, in thinking of them as a long-neglected body of artists, but really some of those who have taken the most space in this volume are quite newcomers. Mr. Noyes, for instance, is quite a new voice in the modern jargon, crying volubly a very easy sing-song through many pages—second-rate narrative, with now and then absurdly literary phrases and lines breaking through.

Older poets there are in the book who have already received the only approbation possible or worth having nowadays—that of the fit and few. There is, for instance, a beautiful familiar poem by Mr. Bridges; inspiring verses by Mr. Newbolt, including the fine "Drake's Drum;" Mr. Davidson's capital "Runnable Stag." There are some singular and beautiful verses by a poet who has always been secure from popularity, Mr. de la Mare; and, alas! there is some singular rubbish by Mr. Stephen Phillips, who has always been sure of it, and who proffers the shoddiest of blank verse to the great name of Milton!

Miss Royde-Smith anticipates cavils at her omissions, and we therefore withhold ours. It is the sin of commission which is never to be forgiven in the anthologist, and it is to this unpardonable fault that our attention has frequently been called in looking through her book. Possibly the selection has not in every case been in her own hands—in which event we are sorry; but if her choice has been absolutely free, why, then, we are still sorry. Apparently she has a hearty love of poetry, and has cast her net widely—too widely. She has caught several American poets who have hitherto been unknown to us, and shall be still save for what we perforce remember from her book. Some of the verses come so near to being what Mr. Henry James likes to call "the real right thing," and yet are irritating shams. We would exchange whole loads of them for one of Father Tabb's perfect jewels (of pearl or opal), though perhaps not those of his which our anthologist has selected. Here are some American verses for which, as we gather from her Introduction, Miss Royde-Smith has a strong admiration—we will not name the author:

And while far up the gorges sweep
The silver legions of the showers,
I have communion with the grass
And conversation with the flowers.
More wonderful than human speech
Their dialect of silence is,
The simple Dorian of the fields,
So full of lovely subtleties.
When the dark pansies nod to say
Good morning to the marigolds,
Their velvet taciturnity
Reveals as much as it withholds.
I always half expect to hear
Some hint of what they mean to do,
But never is their fine reserve
Betrayed beyond a smile or two.

Yet very well at times I seem
To understand their reticence,
And so, long since, I came to love
My little brother by the fence.

We are tempted to speculate on the nature of this "little brother by the fence," but, leaving this, we think only a mere flicker of attention, a mere shadow of humour, are needed to discover how consummately bad these verses are, and we regret that Miss Royde-Smith should have surrendered her judgment so readily to her enthusiasm. Her other selections from American versifiers—always with the noble exception of the fine poet already named, Father Tabb—are also questionable; indeed, there is scarcely a verse equal to the level of the English pieces, though that is not very lofty. All this we say because she looks to America for the next great poet, and, thinking of the specimens she has collected here, we can only record our gentle dissent. Perhaps in our own country there is no surer promise or sign of the "next great poet" than in America—unless, indeed, he is here already, singing unrecognised and scorned, as has sometimes happened. But whatever surprise and humiliation that subtle ironist Time may have prepared for our incredulous hearts, one thing, we think, is clear—that the American poets represented so generously in this small book give absolutely no support to Miss Royde-Smith's expectancy. American critics will doubtless deny this with agreeable vehemence, and see in her a perfect anthologist with prophetic perceptions.

The making of anthologies is, we know, a fascinating employment. We ourselves have found a fascination in the mere projection of a book of English verse. But it is not an easy thing to do well, and where Miss Royde-Smith has erred, we fear, is in not distinguishing clearly between a mere bundle of poems and an anthology. Observing, apparently, only the easy arbitrary limits of date, she has simply produced the former, when she might with a little more precision of aim have accomplished the latter. We beseech intending compilers of little books of verse to remember that such justly-renowned examples as Palgrave's "Golden Treasury" and Mrs. Meynell's "Flower of the Mind" owe their excellence to the definite unifying principle of choice, whereby harmony in variety is secured, and one poem becomes, in a certain sense, the complement of another. An acutely critical preference is not sufficient, though it is quite essential. In the book before us there are, of course, many fine poems, but some of them ought not to be there. As an instance we will mention the magnificent ode of Francis Thompson's, "From the Night of Forebeing," which is of a pitch too lofty, of a power far too intense for the company of little things. It is a mountain among pleasant little hills and trim gardens and stucco temples, and to read it here makes one sadly discontented with many of the others. Yet our present-day poets are born for anthologies. Theirs are mostly brief things, little poignant things, full of tender apprehension of life's transience, full of dreams and roses; theirs are often, to use Mr. Watson's amusingly magniloquent phrase, "Elusive notes in wandering wafture borne." But the great authentic music which, we hold, our own day is still privileged to hear from its singers, the music of august and beautiful voices, is best left alone.

THE THREAD OF EMPIRE

Over-Sea Britain. By E. F. KNIGHT. (Murray, 6s. net.)

The Real India. By J. D. REES, M.P. (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net.)

THESE two books combined give us the history brought up to date of nearly the whole of the Empire.

Anything from the pen of the author of "Where Two Empires Meet" is welcome—and arouses pleasurable expectation—which will not be disappointed by reading the book under review. Mr. Knight's aim is to give a comprehensive account of the British possessions beyond the seas in a work of moderate compass. This volume deals with the Mediterranean, A'rican, and American possessions of Great Britain, and we are promised in a second volume the British possessions in Asia and Oceania. And so "The Real India" is doubly welcome. Mr. Rees offers us a quite impartial record of the political, economic, and social condition of India to-day. He speaks with the experience of twenty-five years in the Indian Civil Service, having passed through most of the grades from Assistant-Magistrate to British Resident and Additional Member of the Governor-General's Council, and has served as Government Interpreter in several Oriental languages, and as Government Reporter on the Indian Press. Dealing in order of publication, we revert to "Over-Sea Britain."

It begins with a clear and concise history of the Empire's growth and of the several forms of government under which our Colonies live. The increasing value of England's Colonial trade is demonstrated and Imperial defence is discussed. Mr. Knight takes us through the Mediterranean to South Africa, then, travelling North from the Cape, through Rhodesia to West and East Africa and to Egypt. After that we cross to America.

The maps which illustrate it all are clear. The places we wish to find are salient and catch the eye. No better school-book exists for the young student of Empire; no better aide-mémoire for any student.

Gibraltar's eventful history is dismissed shortly, but we are reminded that the origin of its name is Moorish. In the eighth century the Moorish Chief Tarik landed there, and made it the base for two invasions of Spain. Hence Djebel-el-Tarik, or Tarik's Hill.

The vicissitudes of African history are traced; how the coasts were occupied in turn by Egyptians, Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, how the Arabs were first to penetrate the interior, and how the Portuguese carried on the work of exploration under Prince Henry the Navigator and Bartholomew Diaz, until their work was crowned by Vasco da Gama, who discovered and rounded the Cape of Good Hope, and opened the ocean route to the East Indies. Then the Pope's line was drawn, and all Africa was ceded to Portugal, all America to Spain.

Holland was the first power to dispute Portugal's claims in Africa. Then Britain succeeded her; and from our occupation of the Cape of Good Hope we are brought in these pages to the partition of Africa by the Berlin Conference of 1884. Mr. Knight reminds us what we owe to Cecil Rhodes in South Africa, to Sir George Taubman Goldie in Nigeria, and to the British East Africa Company when that Conference took place. We then lost many tracts that our missionaries and traders had opened. But Rhodesia, Nigeria, and East Africa, right up to the Abyssinian frontier, and to the Sudan Nile Valley were preserved to the Empire by the enterprise and patriotism of individual citizens.

Each colony in turn is briefly surveyed and analysed. Population, Government, and defence, physical features and production, and their industries are brought home to us. And the vast extent of territory which our African colonies offer to our enterprise is pictorially mapped out.

And so we come to America—and the Pope's line again. America was ceded to Spain in the sixteenth century in virtue of the discoveries of Columbus. But France and England disputed the freehold and free hand so granted. England established herself in the eastern Provinces of America. France had been before her in the Canadas and extended her borders down the valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico, barring British expansion west. War between England and France in America was the healthy permanent condition in which the colonists lived until the eventful day when Wolfe gave Quebec and the Canadas to Britain at the cost of his life, and the gallant Montcalm paid the same price to France for their loss. By the irony of fate, twenty years later, by the Treaty of Paris, England lost all to the United States, except the very Canadian Dominion from which she had ousted France. Then follows a moving history of the welding together of two great races of colonists—French and British—driven, too, into one another's arms by American hostility. Canada is described as South Africa has been, and we are reminded that British possessions in North America are of greater area than are the United States. We are shown the enormous possibilities of the Dominion, and the enterprise which is being expended in developing them. The West Indies and our South American Colonies are not neglected, and then Mr. Knight leaves us, much regretting the parting, but hoping that he will soon give us the second volume which he has promised.

So now again we take up the thread of Empire in "The Real India." Mr. Rees adopts a very similar path of introduction to Mr. Knight's. He gives us a sketch of Indian dynastic history from the stone age to the Mogul Empire—to the rule of John Company (terminated by the Mutiny)—and shortly describes the rule of successive Viceroy's under the Crown until Lord Curzon's administration, which is given some space. Lord Curzon's chief energies were devoted to education, foreign policy, and the partition of certain provinces; but his long career of usefulness was cut short in an unhappy difference with the Commander-in-Chief over Army organisation, and he resigned. And then, by some extraordinary perversion of judgment, the Secretary of State published to India and to the world the wrangle that had taken place between a great Viceroy and a great soldier. Mr. Rees is an ardent advocate of a strong and efficient Army, and applauds Lord Kitchener's organisation, which places military units in the brigades and divisions in which they will have to fight, and which has just been proved with such good results in the Zakka Khel expedition, and which is being now tested again in the Mohmand country. An account is given of the land system, and we learn how much easier is the lot of the cultivator to-day in British India than it was under any former Government, or than it now is in any of the native States.

The measures for famine prevention (rather than famine relief) are given appreciative consideration, and the contrast is shown between the sufferings from famine to-day and the awful scourge which failure of crops constituted in olden times, producing even cannibalism and leaving villages the prey of wild beasts. An exhaustive account is given of the system of government and of the administration of justice, by which we are reminded that a large proportion of offices are in native hands, while the bench is to a great extent occupied by native Judges. Passing to finance and revenue, a happy tale of progress is told. Taking only the railway as one indication of prosperity, between 1876 and 1881 there was an average net loss of 120 lakhs of rupees, between 1899 and 1905 an average net gain of 111 lakhs.

Mr. Rees gives us an illustrative sketch of Russia's position on the north-western frontier. He quotes figures from Mr. David Fraser's "Marches of Hindustan" to show that Russia could maintain an army 400,000 strong on the Afghan frontier, but he holds that the position in Persia merits attention rather than in Afghanistan.

And then we have unrolled before us the present unrest in India. Bande mataram is translated Hail Motherland. But Mr. Rees will have it otherwise: Hail Mother, Mother Kali—the goddess of death and destruction. The cry Svadeshi, "Our Country," under which British trade goods are being boycotted, is giving place to the more threatening cry Svaraj=self-government, which means independence. The Bengali Babu, the chief agitator, would rid India of all signs of British rule except the British Army, without the support of which the Bengali would be swept in a week from the places he proposes to fill by the fighting races of the North, who will have none of him. The chief causes to which Mr. Rees attributes present unrest are—1. Education; 2. Publication of the Curzon Kitchener controversy; 3. English political agitation.

1. Education as now established:

Is purely secular, and all the natives, except those who are themselves the product of the system, unite in condemning the results.

Herbert Spencer is the idol of the Indian graduates, who too often are without any sense of duty to parents or to the State, and almost all of them have forsaken the religion of their fathers.

2. Then for the controversy :

The Viceroy, hitherto regarded as the all-powerful agent of a Sovereign ruling by Divine right, had engaged in a pitched battle with the Commander-in-Chief and had been beaten !

"Sic transit gloria mundi."

3. The untimely and loud-spoken support of Indian nationalism (which does not exist) by Sir William Wedderburn, Sir Henry Colton, Mr. Keir Hardie, and others have made confusion worse confounded, and have added danger to the ever-present difficulties of their fellow-countrymen in India.

Mr. Rees makes an appeal for a level head in dealing with India. We must make up our minds that India cannot be governed on democratic principles :

We must avoid like the plague, than which it is no less disastrous, the introduction into India of our party politics.

We rejoice to think that there is behind Lord Morley, who is so bravely upholding British rule in India, a statesman so sagacious, sympathetic, and Imperial-minded as is the author of The Real India.

NATURE-BOOKS

From a Hertfordshire Cottage. By W. BEACH THOMAS. (Alston Rivers, 3s. 6d.)

The Peacock's Pleasaunce. By "E. V. B." (Lane, 5s. net.)

THE vogue of Nature-books seems not to abate in the least. The first of those named above is full of an open delight in earth's tiny miracles and large wonders, full of close observation, full of good English marred only here and there by lapses into regrettable slang. We remember reading some of Mr. Beach Thomas's papers a few years since in the pages of a contemporary, and collected they make an interesting volume. He has the advantage of an intimate knowledge of many marvels of field, garden, and hedge ; he is modest in his claims and purpose ; he understands well and loves well. He is to be thanked for his frequent quotations—always apt and seldom trite—especially for his acknowledgment of that strangely-neglected lover of Nature and singer of her beauty, Lord de Tabley. Here and there we have discovered repetitions due to careless editing of scattered articles ; but the articles, on the whole, were well worth collecting, and we have found them well worth re-reading.

The second book is different in style, vague in aim, and somewhat difficult to review. The initials "E. V. B." are by this time familiar to many readers, and carry a certain commendation of the books in which they appear. The title has little to do with the contents, save for the introductory chapter, and that chapter itself is vague and unconsidered. In a sense it is a Nature-book, but Nature is not first in the author's mind. She loves better, we fancy, to write beautiful phrases about natural things than to use those things directly and clearly. Hers is a discursive, opulent manner of speech, which would once have been called exotic ; and reading her, one is teased by the suspicion that this elaboration of coloured words exists primarily for its own sake, not to provide any urgent expression of quick love. One misses, in short, just that touch of personal sincerity and spontaneous feeling which, surely, they must have who would write of Nature, whether directly of her means and aims, or—as is rather the way of "E. V. B."—in indirect tribute and oblique homage. One misses precisely that sharp ardour which would make all defects petty and of none account. We regret this, because her gifts are obvious—a single paper, "Pharoma," is proof—and if her patience and passiveness in the secret presence were as great, if she would but wait for the spark from heaven to fall, and write only from a fine, free impulse, she might produce the book which her present one does no more than help us to expect. As a rule we do not like to cavil at a book because it is not something else, but "E. V. B." has not, we believe, given us of her best. She does not seem to have made up her mind what sort of book she wanted, and this uncertainty is apt to be irritating to the reader once he is aware of it. For a minor cavil we should like, with great boldness, to mention the author's irrational little complaint against new houses built where was none before, which is in rather solemn contrast to the succeeding description of an aristocratic tea-party, where everything was infallibly correct and irreproachably fastidious. Every reviewer who is not a Duke will find this contrast a little trying.

To write a really valuable book of direct observation, such as Mr. Beach Thomas attempts, or of imaginative impressions, as "E. V. B." apparently attempts, requires powers which neither writer possesses in adequate degree. To the faculty of close observation must be added a gift of imaginative perception ; and for imaginative impressions must be found a firm basis of direct observation. It is no great dispraise to say that both authors fall short of "what might be," but the failure is more marked and damaging in the case of "The Peacock's Pleasaunce," where the aim is more ambitious and difficult. Let us have done, however, with this awkward tandem business ! It is only because we are trying these books by a somewhat exacting standard that we find them inadequate or ineffective. Mr. Beach Thomas is indiscreet enough to make frequent reference to the writings of Mr. W. K. Hudson, frequent acknowledgment of his fine work, thus reminding us, though we are in small danger of forgetting, of books which we especially love. Mr. Hudson has combined these essentials of observation and imagination in a rare degree of perfection, as has (for another instance) Maeterlinck in "The Life of the Bee." True to the kindred points of heaven and home, Mr. Hudson has united something of the poet with something of the naturalist—only making us regret that poet and naturalist were ever severed. He is the only writer we in our poor experience have met who may claim the mantle of Richard Jefferies, having above Jefferies' great gifts a singular power and charm of style.

The writer of Nature-books has a most fortunate opportunity. Let his volume be but barely readable, it will—with a little judicious notice—become promptly popular. He has the security that, with a common amount of modesty, cunning, watchful exactitude, and a style now and then faultlessly grammatical, he can hardly be guilty of a very bad book ; his subject saves him. He starts with a charm that is not his own ; his mere theme recalls an interest—sometimes a deep, dumb passion—which even his grossest blunders, his serenest errors of taste and judgment, will hardly defeat. Townsfolk who see a green field or wave for but two weeks of the year and babble of it for the other fifty will read his pages with confessed delight. Let the author talk of the "four things which are little upon the earth, but exceeding wise," and straightway they, the little people of the cities, will devour his words. Let him tell of "wild animals at home," and they will gain from his pages a zest more keen for tricks of performing seals at the Alhambra. Save for the slight drawback of a sedulous, lifelong ignorance, we think we ourselves could write a Nature-book that would achieve a quite respectable success—from the publisher's point of view. But for that harder task (which "E. V. B." has essayed) of rendering impressions and creating an atmosphere—for that remoter quest of evoking the spirit of flowers, trees, seas, and of ordering in the chambers of the mind the subtle pageant of the year—for this a larger power and more exquisite intimacy is needed. Nature looms up around us—near, real, inscrutable ; her passion astonishes, teases, thwarts. It is much if a feature be glimpsed, a look caught, a mood communicated ; for which how humble a service, how patient a vigil, how simple and severe a rectitude are needed ! For she, the creature of God, will not reveal herself save to a heart of childlike integrity and saint-like passiveness.

THE VANITIES OF FATHER VAUGHAN

NONCONFORMITY formerly possessed its Dr. Parker. He was no mean orator. He had pulpit parts, in fact, and he could dazzle and excite the congregations which sat under him in a manner which filled the rest of the Nonconformist preachers of this world with sheer envy. We have heard Dr. Parker whisper in the City Temple of a small boy who begged the loan of a ladder in order that he might "pull down some stars for Dr. Parker." The worthy Doctor was never a man who could rest content with mere bouquets. He wanted the stars—in a measure he got them. He lived on rhetoric of the glittering sort, and he lived comfortably on it. There was nothing behind him but the simplest piety; he had no intellect and no ambitions for the world, no pains for mankind, no agonies or bloody sweats; nothing but shining rhetoric and simple piety. These qualifications raised him above Spurgeon and raised him even above Henry Ward Beecher. He became the classic pulpiteer of Nonconformity, and it is in this figure that he will be remembered. We believe that during the greater part of Dr. Parker's pastorate the congregation of the City Temple went the length of confusing his preaching with religion. They found in that carefully calculated voice and that profound manner and that unblushing egotism the same sort of definite delight that the old lady is said to have extracted from the blessed word Mesopotamia; they never wanted for spiritual food so long as Dr. Parker might periodically appear before them, and they were uplifted and kept sweetly going accordingly. The City Temple developed into one of the religious show-places of London. Nonconformity up from the country on a metropolitan jaunt visited the British Museum and Madame Tussaud's on week-days and went "to hear Dr. Parker" on Sundays. Such was his fame that curates and occasional dignitaries of the proper Church did him the honour of more or less surreptitious auditory. The which stray lambs invariably went away marvelling. Some of them, no doubt, discerned exactly to what Dr. Parker amounted; others of them did not. It was all great business, and we were either the better or the worse for it, as the case may have been. After Dr. Parker, of course, they succeeded the Rev. R. J. Campbell, who, despite his thirst for Daily Mirror publicity, is a different and more sorrowing pair of horses. And betwixt and between whiles, as it were, we have been vouchsafed the Reverend Father Bernard Vaughan. For the past couple of years or so Father Vaughan has passed for a portent and a show. He belongs to a faith which has not been addicted greatly to oratory in this country for many a long day. He is what the vulgar call a Roman Catholic, and what the enlightened call a Papist. Whatever mandate he may possess comes out of Rome. He is the brother of a deceased Cardinal. It is necessary that we should remind ourselves of these facts, and particularly of the fact that the English labourers in the Papal vineyard differ hugely from the labourers in the Nonconformist vineyard in that, as a rule, they are silent, prayerful persons rather than shouters or sensation-mongers. General Booth, we believe, is credited with the remark that he did not see why the devil should monopolise all the best tunes. Hence has the "General" permitted his followers to sing holy hymns to fairly ribald airs, which, as we all know, they do with marked zest and gusto. Something of this nature would appear to have happened in the mind of Father Vaughan. He has observed—as many another good priest has observed—that the preachers of "damnable heresy"—particularly Dr. Parker and the Rev. R. J. Campbell—might kick up considerable dust by the exercise of gifts which are more commonly brought into play by politicians and quack doctors than by godly men. And he has chosen—probably from the highest motives—to adopt the more striking of their methods. In the beginning he perceived that there was an affair called Society, and that this Society was peculiarly and dreadfully sinful. It did not love its neighbour as it should; it did not cleave to its wife or its husband as it should; it loaded itself with expensive food and fizzy wines; it blazed in ill-gotten jewels; it gambled quite dreadfully; it lived in palaces and kept fat and brazen servitors; it whirled about fiercely in motor-cars; it read footle and hanged foolishness on its walls; and it bought layettes and patent-leather shoes for its little pet dogs. We expect that when Father Vaughan began to lay his malacca cane across the wicked white shoulders of this entity he looked for screams. He made sure, doubtless, that Society would up and make a martyr of him; instead of which Society went to Farm Street in solemn troops and was moved out of its Sunday ennui into polite and decorous grins. The hubbub and the sensation has not been for Society. There are no weals on its fair back, and there is no contrition in its abounding heart. It bibs at its crystal cup and cleans up its golden platter with the same delicate avidity as of yore. It is no more afraid of the "scathing denunciations" of Father Vaughan than it is afraid of the withering shilling indictments of "Rita" or the equally withering six-shilling indictments of Miss Marie Corelli. The mission of Father Vaughan to the West End of London has been just as free from spiritual effect as was the mission of Messrs. Alexander and Torrey to the same libidinous quarter. Out of it, however, Father Vaughan emanates a much-talked-of, much-paragraphed, much-photographed simple priest. He has reaped the reward that sensationalism brings a man—that is to say, he has done nothing and nobody, save himself, the smallest service. We do not imagine that the Reverend Father anticipated such a turn of events when he set out on his crusade, though there are a thousand wise heads and sound hearts in the service of Rome who could have told him exactly what would happen had he taken the precaution to confide in them before he started. It is not in the least to his discredit to say that he now stands a defeated and highly popular missionary. Society hangs on his slightest word, it is true; so does the Daily Mail. When he speaks, Society prepares to be agreeably thrilled, and luxuriates for a Sunday afternoon in the pleasing knowledge that it is fundamentally human, and that the people who say it has no heart and is a mere thing of fashion and convention are liars. The Daily Mail, on the other hand, and the balance of the "scoop" journals treat Father Vaughan to the paragraphs of eminence, and do their best to assist him to the conviction that he is a great cleric. The category of the sins of Society being limited practically to the seven deadly sins—which, when you come to think of it, afflict all humanity—the Reverend Father has speedily got to the end of them, and he is come, therefore, into the position of a person with a flail when the threshing is over and done. In other words, he is gravelled for matter. So that he has been compelled, for his reputation's sake, to seek adventure in fresh woods. Last week he appeared before an audience hand-in-hand with Mr. Tommy Burns, the pugilist, and was photographed side by side with that worthy—both gentlemen, by the way, being at the time clothed in the innocent habiliments of their respective professions. Mr. Burns, it should be mentioned, is a "staunch Catholic," and came into Father Vaughan's company as the result of an "exhibition bout" given in aid of a Catholic institution by Mr. Burns and a Mr. O'Keefe. It is not for us to asperse either Mr. Burns or the Catholic institution in question on this account. Mr. Burns has a good right to be a "staunch Catholic" if he wishes to, and the Catholic institution in aid of which he so generously knocked Mr. O'Keefe round the ring is probably in need of money. Mr. Burns's spiritual advisers know better what to say to him than we do. And we humbly trust that Father Vaughan's spiritual advisers are in the like case. But if there be praise or blame in the matter, that praise or blame should be extended to Father Vaughan; for when the shepherd approves surely the sheep who may have broken through are not specially wicked. On another recent exploit of Father Vaughan's, however, we shall venture to throw a trifle of reproofful light. We understand that the Reverend Father's latest charge against the upper classes is that they refrain from becoming the parents of large families. Father Vaughan is of opinion that this is most sinful of them. For our own part we shall not be casuistical on the point, contenting ourselves rather with immediate reference to our much-neglected Peerage and Baronetage "corrected by the nobility." If the nobility does not know how many children it has then nobody else does. And what do we find? From the top, in the persons of their most gracious Majesties King Edward VII. and Queen Alexandra (whom God preserve), downwards, the tale is a tale of full quivers, and many of them running over. "No issue" is, in fact, the most dolorous of circumstances the nobility can record about themselves, and, to do them justice, they appear to take singular pains to prevent any such record being registered against them. The noble family without a direct heir is practically a house in mourning. And to make sure on the point, nine times out of ten it provides for itself a second string and even a third, fourth, fifth, and sixth strings with plenty of Hon. Muriels, Olives, Bettys, and so forth, to give tone to the proceedings. The bewildering and gratifying multiplicity of the Royal House is known and appreciated by all of us, and turn where you will among the baser sort, such as dukes, earls, marquesses, and plain barons, you will find entries of issue running to five or six by one marriage, and ten or more where, as is not uncommon, there have been two marriages. Here is the Marquess of Abergavenny, for example, with nine children, the elder a son. Viscount Boyne is down for a baker's dozen; Lord Brassey for five; Lord Ellesmere for eight; the Duke of Buccleuch for eight, and Earl Cadogan for eight. These are instances taken at random. There are hundreds of others, if Father Vaughan cares to look them up. We have no desire to moralise, neither do we wish to be rude, but we venture to think that Father Vaughan would be wise if he went back into himself and his Church. The world cannot be saved by the kind of oratory which moves people to discussion at the Savoy Hotel and sets the Daily Mirror photographers dogging the orator's footsteps. If the Church of Rome had need for the good offices of such orators she could turn a thousand of them loose upon England to-morrow. But she is a wise Church, and she holds them back. X.

THE IDEAS OF COVENTRY PATMORE

AN admirable article upon Coventry Patmore, by Mr. Percy Lubbock, in the current Quarterly Review leaves but few features unnoticed; but there is one marked and singular characteristic of Patmore's poetry which he does not appear fully to have apprehended—its unique spiritual intimacy. There are poets, such as Keats and Meredith (to name two at random), whose felicity it is to dwell in close and constant communion with the spirit of earth, for whom earth is more than a beauty, a visible thing, a nourisher of men. Meredith, indeed, is aware of a sentient, almost a personal, spirit discovered in flowers and clouds and hard weather. He has the gift of an unusual intimacy, not merely with her readable signs and moods, but with the inward significance of these, so that earth becomes the soul of his faith, the consolation of dark days, the luminous centre of his hope for the future.

Such a constant attitude of communion is rare even in poets. Patmore's poetry reveals it, an intimacy even exceeding Meredith's in intensity, as its object is far different. His chief communion is with holiest of sacred things. His earlier poems, "The Angel in the House" and "The Victories of Love," are concerned with the office and prerogative of woman, the sacredness of love, and the initiation, by marriage, into the secret of a deeper and life-long companionship of soul. Illicit fervours are not within his contemplation, even not within his imagination. He sings of love the farthest removed from coldness and constraint, but wearing a white radiance beyond earth's common glow. He sings of those:

Who taste, in Nature's common food,
Nothing but spiritual joy;

and for whom mutual love is a part of pure religion. He sings of a "glittering peace," and the wonderful preludes of "The Angel in the House" throb with a passionate, calm purity from which earth's grossness has been sharply winnowed.

In form and power there is a gulf between these poems and the great Odes, but the latter are the imperative utterance of the same ardent, worshipping spirit. The union contemplated, however, is more difficult, austere, solemn—the union of the soul with God. In the indissoluble and perfect marriage of man with woman he sees foreshadowings—as expressed in the Ode "Sponsa Dei"—of the greater and infinite union:

What if this Lady be thy Soul, and He
Who claims to enjoy her sacred beauty be,
Not thou, but God?

To this high doctrine most of the Odes are tributary. The idea of marriage has for Patmore a universal significance; it is an ever-present metaphor through which the world unfolds itself to him. He hears Psyche cry to Eros:

The whole of life is womanhood to thee,
Momently wedded with enormous bliss.

He sees Spring as the marriage of all things. And with this idea of union so daringly conceived in terms of the loftiest human relationship Patmore has involved, somewhat obscurely, the idea of spiritual virginity, passing over this most delicate ground with an unprofaning simplicity. In one Ode he calls to Love's festival, "in the glad Palace of Virginity:"

Young Lover true, and love-foreboding Maid,
And wedded Spouse, if virginal of thought.

He bids:

Gaze without blame
Ye in whom living Love yet blushes for dead shame. . . .
Gaze without doubt or fear
Ye to whom generous Love, by any name, is dear.

And he ends on a characteristic cry:

Love makes the life to be
A fount perpetual of virginity;
For, lo, the Elect
Of generous Love, how named soc'er, affect
Nothing but God,
Or mediate or direct,
Nothing but God,
The Husband of the Heavens:
And who Him love, in potency great or small,
Are, one and all,
Heirs of the Palace glad,
And inly clad
With the bridal robes of ardour virginal.

There is an aspiring boldness in Patmore's attitude which may offend some. Those for whom the Ineffable Name is a threat, and whose worship is but meant for propitiation and appeasement, cannot apprehend the ardent purity of such an imaginative devotion. And those for whom marriage—far from being, as to Patmore, a prolonged spiritual communion—is but a base precautionary expedient, and its sacrament an antique mummery, will not understand the enormous significance intended by Patmore in his translation of the idea into purely spiritual regions. Neither will those to whom the flesh is utterly anathema understand how this austere mystic, notwithstanding his studies in those earlier saintly writers who too regarded the physical as chief foe of the spiritual and ready weapon of the devil, should hymn the cunning body as:

Creation's and Creator's crowning good Little sequester'd pleasure house
For God, and for his Spouse.

For the development of his special doctrines (for doctrines they may properly be called) he owed something doubtless to those studies of the saints. His prose essays, as well as his later poems, are touched with their beautiful fire; meditation upon their lives and memory has exalted his thought, purged it of earthliness, removed him from the grosser, darker contact. (And farther, I may here remark, passing for a moment beyond the intention of this article, to that high companionship is to be ascribed something of the personal arrogance which must always be an offence to men mumbling contentedly upon the lower slopes. There seems to have grown in him a rather exorbitant impatience of mortal errancy, a keen and painful sense of the "multiplying villanies of Nature," explicit in many of his writings in prose and verse. But it is to be remembered that such an arrogance may be neighbour to—nay, cloak of, humility, being hardly more than an impassioned and indignant rectitude.) Certain of the poems are most fitly to be read after a chapter of à Kempis or St. Francis of Sales; while others form an incidental commentary upon the most marvellous passages of St. Augustine's "Confessions"—that one, for example, beginning, "What do I love when I love thee?" or that of the Saint's holy meditation with his mother, a few days before her death, upon the soul's absorption in God; or those exalted sentences from the last pages:

Nor in all these which I run over consulting Thee [i.e., the senses, memory, external things] can I find any safe place for my soul, but in Thee; whither my scattered members may be gathered, and nothing of me depart from Thee. And sometimes Thou admittest me to an affection, very unusual, in my inmost soul; rising to a strange sweetness, which if it were perfected in me, I know not what in it would not belong to the life to come.

Mr. Gosse has referred to Patmore's admiration of the poems of St. John of the Cross, and his familiarity with St. Teresa's "Road to Perfection;" but he points out, what it is right to remember, that "Patmore's own line in the evolution of the sex-metaphor had long been taken" before he was acquainted with the Spanish mystic. His study of St. Teresa was of earlier date, and in passing I may say that it seems somewhat remarkable that he should have known but little of the poet who ennobled his song with the inspiration of her name, and was himself Patmore's precursor in both the form and spirit of his verse—Richard Crashaw. But whatever Patmore owed to his meditations upon the Saints (whom he rightly regarded as essentially poets), his later Odes which chiefly remind us of them do but unfold, as has already been said, the conceptions of the earlier amorous "Angel in the House," extending their application from human relationships to divine.

Nor, to differ a little from the Quarterly Reviewer, does it appear that Patmore's mystical inspiration was due to his conversion; he was always a mystic at heart. And that conversion, again, was surely, from Patmore's nature, an inevitable step. There is a common notion that a poet is likely to be wooed and won by the ritual of the Roman Church, but of any such influence there is no trace in Patmore's poetry. I am reminded in this connection of the names of two great English prose writers, Pater and Newman. The author of "Marius the Epicurean" was indeed strongly attracted, I believe, by this noble feature of the ancient worship, but did not "go over;" while Newman did, yet not at all for that persuasion. Nevertheless, while the commonly-supposed impulse was, apparently, entirely inoperative in Patmore's case, there can be no doubt that the step itself—coincident as it was with a period of intellectual ripening, or white-heat—was of profound importance to his work. It brought a dewfall to the leaf and rain to the roots. If the only fruit had been the Ode "The Child's Purchase," in which he dedicates himself, in verse thrilled with his most intimate convictions, instinct with his profound mysticism, to the service of the Blessed Virgin, we should have been indebted to his conversion for one of the noblest of the few truly religious poems in our tongue:

Ah, Lady elect,
Whom the Time's scorn has saved from its respect,
Would I had art
For uttering this which sings within my heart!
But, lo!
Thee to admire is all the art I know.
My Mother and God's; Fountain of Miracle!

Give me thereby some praise of thee to tell
In such a Song
As may my Guide severe and glad not wrong,
Who never spake till thou'dst on him conferr'd
The right, convincing word!
Grant me the steady heat
Of thought, wise, splendid, sweet,
Urged by the great, rejoicing wind that rings
With draught of unseen wings,
Making each phrase, for love and for delight,
Twinkle like Sirius on a frosty night!

Doubtless they are but few who possess at once the religious purity (the spiritual virginity of Patmore's favourite theme) and the poetic intensity which are equally necessary to a proper apprehension of the full significance and value of these mystic Odes. They are, indeed, poetry for poets, and Patmore himself had misgivings as to the wisdom of uttering secrets in the common ear. Mr. Gosse has told of the poet's sudden, irremediable destruction, in manuscript, of "Sponsa Dei," not the Ode of that title, but a little prose work in which is interpreted more precisely

The love between the soul and God by an analogy of the love between a woman and a man; it was, indeed, a transcendental treatise on Divine desire seen through the veil of human desire.

Patmore destroyed it because the world was not ready. All that remains of the book is the vague memory of it in the minds of those few of his friends whose privilege it was to see it or hear it read. It is, of course, unavailing to speculate upon the value of the work, but the subject was one to which the poet had given profoundest meditation, and it would have been a kind of "golden book" of those lofty ideas of his which now appear but here and there in the "Unknown Eros"—intense Odes assuredly, but inevitably presenting Patmore's subtle "religious metaphysic" fragmentarily.

In this note I have, of necessity, avoided mention of the isolated poems of various inspiration, such as "Departure," "A Farewell," and "The Azalea," which alone are a secure title to an immortality of honour. Of these, and of the more purely literary qualities of Patmore's verse, I hope to write later on.

"TARTAN"

THE etymology usually given of this most interesting word is one which no one who regards phonology can much respect. It is commonly said to be derived from the French liretaine, which Cotgrave explains as "linsie-wolsie, or a kind thereof, worn ordinarily by the French peasants." This is in itself a word of very doubtful origin, and if it have any relation with lartan it can only be because it is a corrupt form from the same original, which perhaps may be admitted as being just possible. That it cannot have originated our English word is plain from the following consideration—viz., that, although the spellings of lartan are numerous, the former syllable never by any chance contains an i. The English word can, of course, begin either with ter or tar (compare clerk with Clark), but with tir never.

I can see but one possible source for it, and that is the country named Tatary, usually spelt Tartary, not only at present, but in the Middle Ages. Perhaps our ancestors thought that the Tatars came out of Tartarus; indeed, there can hardly be a doubt upon this point, if the "Century Dictionary" correctly ascribes to St. Louis the saying—"Well may they be called Tatars, for their deeds are those of fiends from Tartarus." That Europeans regarded them with fear and horror is a mere matter of history.

Hence it was that, as Ducange shows, the Tatars were called Tartari and Tartarini. Allied to the latter form was Tartarinus, in Old French Tartarin, the name of a stuff supposed to be brought from Tartary or to be of Tartar work, though it may well have been really Chinese. It was a kind (or more than one kind) of cloth, originally of great value and embroidered with gold; sometimes it was a precious kind of silk. It was of various colours—blue, red, purple, and even white or black. It is mentioned as red in 1388.

The word, being adjectival, took many forms, such as Tartariscus, Tartaricus, Tartarinus, Tartenus, Tartara; in French, Tartarin, Tartarique, Tartaire. A Tartary falcon was called in Old French Tarlaret or Tartarot. Ducange does not give Tartenus, but it occurs in the "Liber Custumarum," p. 209, in the year 1302-3, in the phrase "de pannis Tartenis." And some of the forms can best be explained from a Latin Tartanus.

It is also highly probable that "the cloth of Tars" mentioned in Chaucer's "Knight's Tale" is a stuff from the same source. The simplest explanation of this, and of the Old French Tarse, is to suppose that the stuff from Tartary, or Persia, or China (in the Middle Ages easily confused) reached us by way of Tarsus in Cilicia, being shipped thence by the traders to the Levant. Godefroy gives a quotation to show that certain ladies were clothed in silk, or Tarse or cendal: "Bien vestues de soie, de Tarse, de cendal."

The variation of Tartarinus to Tartanus is easily seen by inspection of the will of Lady Clare in 1355. In the Royal Wills, p. 30, is mention of "un lit de noir tartaryn;" and on the next page, "un vestement de blank tartayn, raié d'or pur." The variation from Tartanus to Tartara at once solves the otherwise insoluble puzzle presented in Jamieson's Scottish Dictionary—viz., the variation in Scottish from Tartan to Tartar. He quotes from some inventories dated 1488:

Item, a covering of variand purpir tartar, browdin [embroidered] with thrissillis and a unicorne.

The earliest Scottish form (according to Jamieson) is tarlan, in the accounts of John, Bishop of Glasgow, Treasurer of King James III., anno 1474:

Item, fra Will. of Rend, 7 Maii, and deliverit to Caldwell, halve ane elne of double tarlan, to lyne riding-collars to the Queen, price 8s.

But Michel, in his "Civilisation in Scotland," says that "double tartane" is mentioned in the same accounts, anno 1471; i.e., three years earlier.

It will now be understood that the forms of the word are necessarily various. From the Latin Tartara, French tarlaire, came the Scottish tarlar. From a Latin Tartanus (not found, but a better by-form of Tartenus, and authorised by the Old French tarlayn) came the Scottish and English tarlan. From tarlarinus (French Tartarin) came not only tarlarin, tarlaryn, but many others. I have met with terlaryn, tarlaron, tarlren, tarlourn, tarlourne, tarlron, tarterne, tarlyn, and there is no particular reason against the possible reduction of such a form as tarterne to a modern tarlan, coinciding with the form from Tartanus. Another form was tarlarium, occurring in stanza 31 of "The Flower and the Leaf." I have already explained this in my note to "Piers Plowman," text C. xvii., 299, but it will be interesting to many to repeat a part of it, with further comments.

Tartarium was, at first, a thin embroidered silk; it was particularly used for ornamental banners attached to trumpets, on which coats-of-arms were embroidered. In "The Retrospective Review," New Series, i. 110, is a note:

Item, iij Baners de Tartarin petitez, frapez des arm' du Roy et de St. Edward.

And the writer very neatly remarks that this at once explains the line in Henry V., iv., 2, 61:

I will the banner from a trumpet take,
And use it for my haste.

For such a banner already had a Royal coat-of-arms upon it, and so could be at once used instead of a standard; see Wright's note on the passage.

The chronicler Hall, describing the banners of Henry VII. after the battle of Bosworth, says:

The third was of yelowe tarterne, in the which was painted a doane kowe [i.e., a dun cow].

In his edition of "Marco Polo," i. 259, Colonel Yule, speaking of the cloths called nakh and nasij, says:

These stuffs, or such as these, were, I believe, what the medieval writers called Tartary cloth, not because they were made in Tartary, but because they were brought from China and its borders through the Tartar dominions. Dante alludes to the supposed skill of the Turks and Tartars in weaving gorgeous stuffs ("Inferno," xvii. 17); and see Mandeville's "Travels," pp. 175, 247, where "clothes of Tartarye" are mentioned.

At p. 252 of the same Tartarine means a Tartar, and at p. 255 we read of "clothes of Gold and of Camakaas and Tarlarynes."

In the Cambridge Antiquarian Society's publications, No. XXII., p. 357, Vol. IV., we find mention of "corteyns of grene tarlren," and of "aulter clothes of grene tarlren"—both in 1453.

In the "Cambridge Churchwardens' Accounts," ed. Foster, we find at p. 7 "blewe tarlourne," in 1504; and at p. 13, "blew tarlourn," in 1511.

It would not be difficult to add largely to the quotations above, and to adduce many illustrative comments from various authors. I have only indicated the nature of the argument for the etymology here proposed.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

ABRAHAM COWLEY

FOR two centuries there has been almost a conspiracy of dispraise for Cowley, broken only by a few whimsical fellows who were somehow born sons of Abraham, and knew it, and acknowledged themselves, also, as sons by adoption. But it requires a certain courage to love Cowley, except as an essayist, and even Dr. Lumby allowed folk to love him there. But when Addison, Johnson, and a host of critics have cursed, it is well to remember that Charles Lamb found him exquisite and delicious. After all, has not the message of simplicity and nature been too exclusively preached? May one not plead for Art too, and the elaborate? The seventeenth century, with its lace and tapestry, with Parkinson's parterres and auriculas, Vandyck, Orlando Gibbons, Inigo Jones knew something of τὸ καλόν, and to the stately gentlemen of his age Cowley was among the eternal. George Villiers called him the Pindar, Horace, and Virgil of the English; Milton placed him with Spenser and Shakespeare. Wood calls him the greatest ornament of our nation; Evelyn, the best of poets; and Charles II. lamented that he had left no better in England. On the other hand, as we know, Pope asked who now read him. Addison said that "the reader's attention is dazzled by the continual sparkling of his imagination; you find a new design in every line, and you come to the end without the satisfaction of seeing one of them executed." Dr. Johnson will not even allow poor Abraham wit. He calls that wit which is at once natural and new; that which, though not obvious, is, upon its first production, acknowledged to be just; that which he that never found it wonders how he missed—and then says of Donne and Cowley:

Their thoughts are often new, but seldom natural; they are not obvious, but neither are they just, and the reader, far from wondering that he missed them, wonders more frequently by what perverseness of industry they were ever found."

Mr. T. H. Ward, in 1880, cried that even our curious age could not reprint him, and that Dryden absorbed all that was best in Cowley. The last has been handsomely answered eight times by the publishers, and, if the former critics seem conclusive, we may reply to them in short. To Pope we may mention Cowper, Gray, Burns, Collins, Shelley, Wordsworth, and innumerable poets since. To Addison we may quote Cowley himself, from his ode on Liberty:

So the imperial eagle does not stay
Till the whole carcass he devour
That's fallen into its power.

To Dr. Johnson we may plead that the dictator proves too much. Which of us, when we see an old Court lappet, or the west front of Wells, or some fine jewel-work, could fail to wonder not that we had missed it, but at the ingenuity which discovered it? All highly-wrought work is destroyed by such iconoclasm. But very much of Cowley is simple to severity. Could any one put more plainly the relation of reason to faith?

Though Reason cannot through Faith's Myst'ries see
It sees that there and such they be;
Leads to Heav'n's Door and there does humbly keep,
And there through Chinks and Key-holes peep.
Though it, like Moses, by a sad command
Must not come in to th' Holy Land,
Yet thither it infallibly does guide
And from afar 'tis all descry'd.

There is a deal of supercilious nonsense talked about conceits, but who can dislike such lines as those which describe the last trumpet sounding?

To the long sluggards of five thousand years;
or describe Elijah as

The second man who leapt the ditch where all
The rest of mankind fall.

Dr. Johnson carps at Cowley's dressing of the angels; but Milton never clothed his angels better than St. Michael is suited when O'er his shining Form a well-cut cloud he threw,

Made of the blackest Fleece of Night,
And close wrought to keep in the powerful Light,
Yet wrought so fine it hindred not his Flight.

A sentence of Cowley, or even a line, brings up all Horace at his best. Did Quem tu Melpomene say more than this?

When once such Fairies dance no grass doth ever grow.

Or has modern science ever defended herself better than in the Ode to the Royal Society which Evelyn bespoke: "the noblest argument from the best of poets"?

We would be like the Deitie
When Truth and Falsehood, Good and Evil, we Without the senses aid within ourselves would see;
For 'tis God only who can find
All Nature in his Mind.

The love poems have been the peculiar butt of the critics. They say that Abraham was more in love with love than with ladies. They disdain the old livery of flames, hearts, and arrows, as if the foaming, biting, and throbbing of the Swinburnians were somehow preferable. They will have no humorous love-making, all must be as heavy as a Dissenting prayer-meeting:

Him who loves always one, why should they call
More constant than the Man loves always all?

The true Cowleian neither disdains the Platonic realism, nor the fine old stage properties, nor the smiling hyperboles of "The Mistress." He enjoys "My Picture" quite as much as the Browning Society affects the epilogue to "Fifine." The picture, enlivened by her presence, was to gain the vitality the banished poet lost:

My Rival-Image will be then thought blest
And laugh at me as dispossess;
But Thou, who (if I know thee right)
I th' substance dost not much delight,
Wilt rather send again for Me
Who then shall but my Pictures Picture be.

The Cambridge University Press certainly did well to republish Cowley.

C. L. MARSON.

COUNSEL FOR THE CLAIMANT

It is a singular fact that the misfortunes of the individual should bring in their train misfortune to his fellows. In other words, a one-man tragedy is an impossibility. Whether the stout gentleman, who was known thirty years ago throughout the length and breadth of England as the Claimant, happened to be an unfortunate and badly-used baronet or the most impudent and cunning of impostors, is not for us to say. After litigation extending over several years Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and a jury came to conclusions about him which resulted in his being sentenced to a severe spell of penal servitude, and as the English law is believed to be well-nigh infallible, we must suppose that the man who called himself Sir Roger Tichborne was not Sir Roger Tichborne at all, but some other person. Whoever he may have been, he fought his fight and suffered his punishment or martyrdom, and went the way of all flesh with his real secret undiscovered of mankind. In the latter part of his struggle with the mighty—that is to say, when it was no longer a question of fighting for what he was pleased to call his estates, but for his personal liberty, he took to himself the services of one Edward Vaughan Kenealy, who, because of the connection, became quite as famous or notorious as himself. Dr. Kenealy was an Irishman and a barrister. He defended the Claimant at his trial in the Court of Queen's Bench, and his speech for the defence took up a matter of nearly fifty days:

Even in that length of time, he says, I did not attempt to unriddle the thousand and one enigmas to be found in the career of the Defendant. The Claimant himself is the greatest enigma the world ever saw. If he is Tichborne it is a mystery of mysteries how he could have committed the wonderful follies of which he was guilty. If he is not Tichborne, it is, and ever will continue to be, a wonder of the world how he could have persuaded noblemen, gentlemen, ladies, priests, Carabineers (consisting of some of the finest soldiers in the world), nearly all the old tenants of the Tichborne estates, and lastly, Lady Tichborne, one of the keenest, cleverest, and most suspicious of women, that he was no other than the long-lost Roger, the long-absent son who had been missing for so many weary years. A hundred doubts at this moment crowd my mind, which it would take a hundred hours to answer. A hundred proofs, on the other hand, are before me which go to show that no other living man but Roger could have presented such evidences as did he. If the Claimant be an impostor—be Orton—he most thoroughly deceived his counsel, for in my mind I need not tell you there is no doubt that he is the genuine man. I have done all that I could in my case to ascertain how the truth lay. It is possible I may have been deceived, but when doubt rushes over my mind I say to myself, "He could have deceived, but no man born of woman could deceive a mother into the belief that he was her son, more especially if he were the low-bred, brutal ruffian this gentleman is pretended to have been." That mother lived with him for over a year; she allowed him out of her own narrow income the allowance she gave to her second son, Alfred, one whom she dearly loved, and for whose infant son there was a treasury of affection in her heart second only to that which she bore to Roger.

This opinion—namely, that the Claimant was Sir Roger Tichborne—Dr. Kenealy held till his dying day. It is set forward in the volume before us by his daughter, Miss Arabella Kenealy, presumably as his testament on the subject, and there it is. Apart from his association with Orton or Tichborne, Dr. Kenealy appears to have been an ordinary come-day go-day practitioner at the Queen's Bench, capable and assiduous as such men are, and not without prospect of advancement in his profession. Indeed his daughter assures us that it was understood that he would rise to the Chief Justiceship. Like many another lawyer, he had a taste for letters; his reading was extensive, he rhymed somewhat, and considered himself a critic, and he appears to have been addicted to the unwelcome hobby of composing voluminous theological works. Practically we have said here all that needs to be said about him. It was the Tichborne case that brought him into prominence, and it was the Tichborne case that ruined him. For the powers that be were not content merely to send "Orton" broken and dishonoured to penal servitude; they were determined to get even also with his principal adviser and henchman. That Dr. Kenealy showed at times a disposition to be over-zealous in the cause of his client, and that he frequently brought himself into heated collision with well-meaning persons whom he believed to be his client's enemies, cannot be gainsaid. No really competent counsel placed as Dr. Kenealy was placed and believing as Dr. Kenealy believed could have done otherwise. The Court cast an angry eye on him, as Courts will when you ruffle them, and it failed to forgive and forget as Courts should in the circumstances. The result of it all was that it seemed desirable to those in authority to procure Dr. Kenealy's disbarment. Against such an indignity and such a closing of his career he fought with what skill he might; and, though he did not lack friends in high quarters, the feeling of the hour was too strong for him and he was ejected from the community of the Bar. One of the charges brought against him, if you please, was "that after the verdict you shook hands with the convict," which very human and decent proceeding appears to have been construed as a sort of contempt of Court. What this disbarment really amounted to is indicated by a letter which was sent to Dr. Kenealy by a Mr. James Wishaw, one of the Benchers of Gray's Inn. Mr. Wishaw wrote as follows:

Eastbourne.

Sir,—I am on my deathbed, and in all probability before many days have passed I shall be in the presence of God Who made me, and to Whom I shall have to render an account of the good or evil I have done in my past life. It will be a relief to my mind to ask your forgiveness for one of the worst acts that now presses on me, and which I helped to accomplish. I mean your professional ruin and your expulsion from the Bar and the Gray's Inn Bench. I feel now most strongly the cruel injustice of this act, and my conscience would be lightened of a heavy load if I could only feel sure that I leave this world with your pardon for an act which I have regretted. But never until now, when my time on earth is short, did I feel how deeply I had sinned in giving way to the will of others against my own conscience.

I send these lines written with a hand that trembles and from a heart that feels the solemnity of my present condition, and once more before I close I ask you and Mrs. Kenealy to forgive me for not protesting against the crime that was committed by the Chancellor and the Gray's Inn Benchers.—Yours sincerely,

JAMES WISHAW.

Surely here was the unimaginable touch of time putting things right with a vengeance. But the receipt of such a letter, while it gave Dr. Kenealy an opportunity for forgiveness—an opportunity of which he immediately availed himself, did not bring back to him his lost career.

For the rest these Memoirs have a quiet interest of their own, and are well worth reading. They are interspersed with plenty of anecdote, much of it new, and all of it good. From time to time too, we get pieces of writing by the Doctor himself which, if not of the highest literary merit, are quite startlingly refreshing in their way. On p. 212, for example, we find a set of verses entitled "Advice to a Judge." They begin in this wise:

When on the regal seat of Justice throned,
Bear this in mind: thou hast not been advanced
Beyond thy fellows to give loose to temper,
Or prove thyself capricious, weak or spiteful,
But to administer the law with truth,
And to be honest, just and fair to all.
Sully not thy grave place with jests and jokes,
Or low buffoonery, ever on the watch
To win the thoughtless laughter of the crowd.

This is not the most delicious of poetry, but there can be no getting away from its truth.

Miss Kenealy is to be congratulated upon the judicious manner in which she has edited and arranged a book which might very readily have turned out to be a sort of autobiographical ragbag. She has performed a filial duty in a competent and sensible way.

APOLOGIA PRO ANGUI

MEN, mammals, and things have all suffered from the careful or careless libels of writers whose highest aim has been to produce a certain effect regardless of the means used. But persons and things are usually vindicated sooner or later by numerous literary policemen, who resolutely arrest the offenders. Let a man or an institution or a thing be misrepresented, and a hundred antiquarians, historians, or critics refute the error with a triumphant roar, drowning for ever the venomous shriek. If, however, an animal be ruthlessly mangled on some writer's rack, hardly any one troubles to raise his voice in vigorous protest. For the people really competent to expose and stop such unnecessary cruelty are enthusiastic naturalists whose attentions are concentrated on Nature's own gorgeous green library, and not on the curiously-scented pages of Art. And so the evil fungus spreads and swells until a huge mountain of unsavoury putrescence is all that much literature can display when, if she would only adhere to the truth, she might so easily show a silver stream winding smoothly over golden moor and mellow mead. Not that her libels on animals are always unpleasant in character; to dogs and doves, for instance, fond authors have constantly attributed exemplary dispositions to which, in reality, those creatures have little or no claim, but on which humanity is actually requested to model itself. If I, for one, honestly believed the dog to be capable of the tremendous heroism and self-sacrifice (frequently for very unworthy causes) which have been ascribed to it by many writers, I would gladly vote for the utter destruction of all dogs on the ground that virtues—such transcendent altruism—can only have a demoralising and devitalising effect on the average citizen. Besides, it is neither right nor dignified for man to take his moral lessons from a lower animal; his ideals should be drawn from a plane higher than his own.

Of familiar animals, perhaps the domestic cat is the chief victim of those writers who have not hesitated to parade their very superficial knowledge or unfathomable ignorance of that creature's true nature. In frivolous books of fiction or sober volumes of miscalled fact one always finds a cat's foremost characteristic to be the blackest treachery, although it should be obvious to a thoughtful observer that such violent statements must be the usual criminally indolent plagiarism from some long dead influential fool whose flimsy excuse for unleashing so wild an opinion upon the world was, probably, that once he trod heavily upon a pet cat's tail and was promptly and properly bitten for his gross clumsiness. It is easy, however, to vindicate the cat; the plain truth and a little intelligence are the only needful instruments.

Far more difficult (if indeed possible) is the task of lifting down the smirched reputation of the serpent from the pillory where for centuries past the combined forces of poetry, prose, and painting have hung it up so unjustly to public odium. The serpentine incarnation of Sathanas in Genesis, the nastiest, most virulent similes of Homer, Virgil, Horace, Pliny, Shakespeare, Molière, and numerous modern authors, the most grotesque anecdotes of ancient naturalists, some of the most ludicrous stories recounted in modern books of travel, and the most vulgar "thrills" in sensational fiction have all alike extracted their poison or their spice from fancied or exaggerated properties of snakes. By those writers (past and present) to whom love of the marvellous and contempt for the truth were or are second nature the snake has been credited with colossal powers of deglutition, with a wonderful mesmeric influence over its prey; it has been gifted with breath so poisonous that the surrounding atmosphere became a sure death-trap to any one inhaling it; to several species these unscrupulous writers have given the very ingenious "emergency" power of utilising their convenient shapes as rolling hoops for more rapid pursuit or retreat, whilst, as the crowning achievement of authorial madness, to others has been attributed a miraculous immunity from the action of fire. By modern writers, whose impetus to lie would seem to be acquired ignorance or degraded imaginative force, the serpent is consistently described as being horribly disgusting and slimy, as having a sting (generally confounded with the forked tongue, but sometimes by insect analogy located in the tip of the tail), and as the most appropriate embodiment of insidious treachery. There is a third class of writers whose behaviour is quite inexcusable. The attitude of the two former groups rests, it may be, more on a desire to impress than to inform, and for that reason may be condoned; but what possible justification can be offered for those persons who deliberately mislead their readers with statements and theories about the serpent tribe—theories couched, too, in just the calm scientific terms so alluring to the uninquiring mind? These self-styled naturalists' books ought to be suppressed, for their silly suggestions to young keepers of snakes about suitable methods of feeding this kind of pet frequently lead to much innocent cruelty to reptiles. I have ploughed (there is really no other word) through many books about snakes, but, with possibly two exceptions, all demanded copious emendation and excision. These would almost seem to be a conspiracy of professional naturalists to substitute uncouth supposition masquerading as fact for the old dazzling falsehoods; at any rate, these books entirely lack the dramatic presentation so generously provided by the unscientific.

There is yet another class that has sinned deeply against the snake. Many artists paint serpents from notions gained presumably in awful nightmares, or (what is infinitely worse) from badly-preserved specimens. Hence we find the snake in art falsely formed with round body and indescribably hideous head fashioned rather like an ace of spades; sometimes the creature's bifid tongue is depicted as culminating in a sharp arrow-like point; still more often the artist has grotesquely violated all laws of anatomy by picturing its mode of progression as a series of undulating arches, or, when the snake is climbing a tree, by making its body embrace the trunk in a regular spiral. One might easily prolong this list of literary and artistic errors, but enough has been stated for adequate illustration of the vast amount of crystallised nonsense or misinformation existing (alas!) very often in otherwise excellent settings. Of course so much caricature and perversion must have some foundation in fact. The wildest phantasmagoria must reflect, however faintly, a real scene. And it is because the anaconda and the cobra possess such dreadful weapons that the whole serpent tribe has been invested with a deadly glamour which clings to it still. Thanks to the two facts that rather less than a quarter of the entire serpent species possesses a more or less poison-dealing fang, and that a still smaller proportion has great constricting powers, the whole race has had to endure perpetual shame in Art and Literature. How is it that these qualities have been magnified to the utter exclusion of much that is lovely and pleasing? Literature has lavished her richest figures and phrases upon the aerial splendour of birds, the wonderful intelligence of certain beasts, and the radiant beauty of flowers, but she has had only monstrous epithet and foul aspersion for the snake. Can she find no lofty inspiration from that mysterious creature? For the serpent is pre-eminent among God's creatures for its exquisite grace and harmonious colours and subtle blending with its leafy environment. Just take some grey-green primrose-collared ring-snake and watch its lithe, sinuous body gliding with such consummate ease and poetry, now through the long grass with a bewildering deftness that pains as it pleases the eye, now over the velvet moss stained deeper and richer in colour by contrast with the reptile's shimmering body. Mark the liquid, lustrous sheen of its head-scales, note the restless darting forth of the long black tongue, an organ so sensitive and delicate that its touch on one's hand or cheek is as though one were kissed by some dim dream figure of the pale dawn. Then observe the reptile's eyes—their immovable glitter more startling than the vivid green glare flashing in the twilight from a cat's phosphorescent orbs. All a diamond's brilliance and all its frost lurk there, but behind that is life, strangely isolated perhaps, but yet life in all its mysterious wonder. I know no sight more purely beautiful than that of a snake swimming in a clear pool. The spirited horse, the elegant gazelle, the ornamental lyre-bird, the lace-winged butterfly cannot reveal the grace that flows from a serpent's form as it sweeps rhythmically through the water. It is the poetry of motion visibly and supremely expressed in a veritable liquid sonnet. And these lovely creatures are for the most part quite harmless, far more inoffensive indeed than yon silk-haired lap-dog or this yapping terrier or that tame canary. But just as in the realms of prose and verse and picture the snake lies, hateful and hideous, deformed beyond belief, so in the world of actuality it is at the mercy of any shrivelled Litt.D., or spectacled Methodist "deacon," or blustering, thoughtless boy who may light upon it during a country walk. For in whole-hearted detestation of the serpent, intelligent, commonplace, and dullard act as one man. A wriggling, active snake suddenly dropped amongst a crowd of hostile savants will speedily unite them in the strongest common brotherhood—the brotherhood of Fear.

If I have written with a dogmatic assertiveness that may provoke a challenge as to my qualifications or authority in the matter, I can only say that for some years a whim induced me to keep several European and American snakes and to give them the closest personal observation. And the result of my study has been not a desire to publish a dry mathematical dissertation concerning peculiarities of reptilian evolution, or a prosy thesis on the possible correlation of diet and disposition in serpents, but a longing to tell everybody—especially the man with the pen or paint-brush—how intensely interesting, how infinitely varied, how full of literary or artistic possibilities, above all how utterly unlike its popular repute is the snake. For where there was slime there is prismatic iridescence, where there was poison there are docility and gentleness, where there was cunning there is natural simplicity, where there was horrible ugliness there is incomparable grace. May future generations realise that the snake dwells not in the damp dungeon, but in the warm-scented meadowland; that it is not a creature of darkness and death, but of light and life.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Life and Letters of Robert Browning. By MRS. SUTHERLAND ORR. New Edition, Revised and in part Rewritten by FREDERIC G. KENYON. (Smith, Elder, and Co., 7s. 6d. net.)

SINCE the original publication of Mrs. Sutherland Orr's Life of Browning in 1891 there has been brought to light a considerable amount of new information with regard to the poet's life and habits. This information has rendered Mrs. Orr's biography in part an obsolete volume, and Mr. Kenyon, in undertaking the task of preparing a new and revised edition, has earned the gratitude of all Browning lovers. He has proceeded with almost unnecessary caution, adding a little here, altering a little there, but conserving as much as possible of the original narrative. The facts about Browning's marriage have now been set out in their proper portion, and some additional material with regard to the closing weeks of the poet's life has been supplied by Mr. R. Barrett Browning. Thus corrected and amplified, the volume is presented to us as the final and authoritative account of Browning's life.

In many respects it is a disappointing book. Browning has suffered from no lack of commentators and panegyrists, but few have read him to so little purpose as his biographer. Mrs. Orr indulges in a number of what would appear to be wilfully oblique misjudgments on Browning's poetry. As a critic she is seldom reliable and never illuminating. Of the inner life of Browning we hear little, chiefly because there was so little to hear. There was a side of the poet that was never turned to the world. He is "Mr. Browning" throughout these pages, and there can be little doubt that it is as "Mr. Browning" he would desire to be remembered. So he confronts us in Mrs. Orr's book, as from Rudolf Lehmann's canvas in the National Portrait Gallery, the very embodiment of the elderly English gentleman. Browning less than any man wore his heart upon his sleeve. To the casual observer his life was a succession of dinner-parties, show Sundays, and social calls, nor are we permitted to surmise what depths of sorrow or ecstasy lay latent and unrevealed in that strangely complex nature :

Outside should suffice for evidence :
And whoso desires to penetrate
Deeper, must dive by the spirit-sense—
No optics like yours, at any rate !

Once indeed he laid bare the hidden chambers of his heart—"once, and only once, and for one only." After the death of his wife he became, as one of his biographers, has aptly phrased it, "a splendid mask."

For those, however, to whom the exterior aspect of a poet's life is of value this book will always have a certain appeal. The ultimate position of Robert Browning in English poetry is a theme on which we are not at the present moment tempted to dwell. It is still, so to speak, in solution. But whatever posterity may do to "Sordello," it is difficult to believe that the poems in "Men and Women" and "Dramatis Personae" will ever cease to be known and loved. This, too, must always remain to Browning's credit that, in an era of spiritual despair and denial, "he at least believed in Soul, and was very sure of God."

Literary and Historical Essays. By HENRY GREY GRAHAM.
(Black, 7s. 6d.)

READERS of "Social Life in Scotland in the Eighteenth Century," which, by the way, was "crowned" by THE ACADEMY as being the greatest book of the year 1899, will welcome this collection of essays by Mr. Henry Grey Graham. His death in 1906 at a comparatively early age removed one of the greatest enthusiasts for the eighteenth century. There was nothing in that period of which Mr. Graham was not a diligent and acute observer. He knew every wit and every author, every leader of fashion and society, every celebrity of the time—not merely by sight, but also by such little tricks of dress or mannerism as their intimates have noted here and there in their voluminous memoirs. As his anonymous biographer points out in a brief, excellent Preface to this volume, he was infinitely more at home in the eighteenth century than at a Glasgow dinner-table. In the tavern where the literary coterie foregathered in Edinburgh, in the drawing-rooms and coffee-houses of London, in the salons of Madame du Deffand or Madame Geoffrin in Paris, he would have known any one worth the knowing, not as a mere outsider, but as an intimate who is subconsciously aware of every little foible and eccentricity, jealousy and pet aversion, well aware what topics to obtrude and what subjects were best let alone, and in pungent satire and ready quip well able to hold his own in these tournaments and duellos of wit. It seems a little surprising to find a man so equipped in a Scotch manse. But Mr. Graham, we are told, lived and died a Scotch minister, for some years residing in a little rural parish in Berwickshire, and later having charge of a church in Glasgow. No doubt he performed his duties well and conscientiously, but it is impossible for a reader of his books to imagine him in the rôle or, indeed, as really "living" in any other period than the eighteenth century. The first three essays in the volume deal with "France Before the Revolution." Compressed into a small compass, they give a wonderfully vivid picture of the period. Mr. Graham has a forcible, direct style. He knows what he wants to say, and he says it in simple, straightforward language that leaves no doubt as to his meaning. He has no "prettinesses" or flowery passages; but his sentences are neat and well turned, and he says many acute things "by the way." "Nothing is more pitiless than a principle in action;" "In this world we are punished more for indiscretions than for sins;" and "Fanaticism is a conscience in an acute state of inflammation"—these are some of his pithy sayings.

His essay on Samuel Richardson is full of wise and true remarks. He seems in a flash of intuition to gauge exactly his author, and to distinguish at once his strength and weaknesses. "Richardson," he notes, "always wrote as a preacher, and was always afraid that if he was exactly true to Nature he would be false to his mission of instructing society. He could only conceive of two possible ends for his bad characters in his zeal to vindicate the ways of Providence—they must either be reformed or they must die a miserable death."

Other essays in the book deal with "Old Burghal Life in Scotland," "Glasgow University Life in Olden Times," and "Russel of the Scotsman." All are written with charm, enthusiasm, and learning.

Thyrsis and Fausta. By ROSALIND TRAVERS. (Elkin Mathews.)

PERHAPS we cannot better praise Miss Travers' pastoral play, the title-poem of this volume, than by saying that it is really interesting; for pastorals have so often been dull. The plan of it is, of course, full of excellent opportunities for pleasant Nature verse, and Miss Travers is quick to use these opportunities. Her lyrics are lyrical and wonderfully varied in form and music, while some of the blank verse has a capital descriptive quality. Of the other verses in the book, some are simple and beautiful, and one or two pieces are "realistic" and distasteful. The most ambitious thing in the whole book is "Laus Amicitiae," in memory of Richard Garnett. It is a long, stately, processional kind of poem, in the Spenserian measure and the Shelleyan manner. Without presuming to question the sincerity of her threnody, we may doubt whether Miss Travers was wise in adopting this measure and manner, for she inevitably provokes thereby a constant reference in the reader's mind to "Adonais."

The Land of Pearl and Gold. By ALEXANDER MACDONALD, F.R.G.S. (Blackie and Son, Ltd., 10s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a very attractive collection of breezy tales of prospecting, mining, and travel in and on the coasts of Australia, in New Guinea, and other islands. Pearl is given precedence of gold in the title, but in the text there is only one tale of pearl fishing, and that is nearly at the end. But a pearl is the lady of all gems, and so the title is in the best of taste. Place aux dames!

Mr. Macdonald tells these sixteen tales in the first person, and there is not one that is dull. He delineates his characters with force and sympathy, and we quickly make friends with many of them. "Mac," the huge Scotchman, is his constant henchman, as loyal as he is self-assertive, as tender-hearted as he is fierce. Morris, the gentleman-miner and "new chum," whose nerves are so unstrung when his mate, "the Shadow," lights a detonating-fuse in a shaft that he jumps for the rope by which he and Shadow are to be hauled into safety, and so pulls down the windlass-barrel. But, having seemingly doomed himself and comrade to destruction, his nerve is good enough again, and he digs below the burning fuse and cuts off its connection with the charge (see "The Golden Promise Mine"). "The Warden" is a resident magistrate who holds the wildest valley of New Guinea in the hollow of his hand, being feared by cannibal natives and worshipped by pioneer miners to the extent that their first preoccupation was to avoid any action which might involve him with his seniors—happily a no uncommon type among those in whose hands lies the honour of the Empire at its outposts (see "Men of the Yodda Valley"); and there are many others whom the reader will not forget.

Though many fortunes are made in the gold and other mining fields, too seldom, alas! does the pioneer or bonâ fide miner skim the cream. He has many dangers and difficulties to overcome—physical, dangers of fatigue, fever, and thirst. The enmity of the aborigines, the wile of the mining Chinese, these produce a stirring tale in "White, Black, and Yellow," when threatening black men, preparing a great corroboree are attracted to the camp of no less hostile Chinamen, and one enemy disperses the other. But the canteen-keeper and the sharper are almost the worst enemies of all, and the tactics by which a good find must sometimes be secured to the pioneer is humorously told in "How we Held Mackay's Find." "On a Colonial Coaster," which tells of a voyage round Australia, sounds a little improbably rough and haphazard; but "A Sugar Expert" deserves notice. A mining engineer is pressed into visiting the sugar-plantations of the Bardekin Delta, and spends a bewildering two days amid hospitality and culture, resource and cultivation. He finds sugar and sago, pineapple and vineyards, all thriving, and a planter who invents anything from a shower-bath to a flying-machine, and whose steam sugar-cutter is to solve the great difficulty of labour; for the Kanaka is no longer to be admitted, and white labour unions are fast making planting a losing game. A blank cheque is offered the miner for a report as a "sugar expert," which is never filled in.

Mr. Macdonald describes scenery with an artist's pen, and he is nowhere happier than in "The Pearling Grounds," when he donned the diver's dress and went down to a coral reef:

I stood in the midst of a magnificent marine forest, where graceful coral branches intertwined with less material tendrils growth. The fronds of the coral palms trembled as if in a gentle breeze, and the more robust growths swayed slowly to and fro."

And so we will leave Mr. Macdonald, but well above water.

"The Land of Pearl and Gold" will be always a welcome companion to those who like to read of men doing man's work in the wilds.

William Clarke. A Collection of his Writings. (Swan Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.)

THIS is a book that puzzles us not a little. The piety of friends has produced it, critics here and there will find it easy to praise it, but who, who, who will read it? Here is a fat, serious volume of four hundred pages (with a biographical sketch by two hands), containing a selection from the writings of a journalist who, after a life of strenuous business, died in 1901. To most readers Mr. Clarke's name will be quite unfamiliar, since the greater part of his work was anonymous. To say that the papers are excellent in style and matter is to give them no undue praise; they are very good journalism indeed, of the thoughtful, forcible kind which newspaper editors always need, though often they don't know it. But this does not seem to us a sufficient reason for the issue of a fat, serious volume of papers upon "Socialism," "The House of Lords," "Charles Spurgeon," "The Tidiness of Rural England," "The Uses of Agnosticism," etc., etc. Nor do we think it was necessary for Mr. Herbert Burrows to give us in his "Sketch" details of Mr. Clarke's diligent life as a journalist. These things always make us a little mournful, just as a life of a diligent stock-broker would. We say nothing of the character of Mr. Clarke, which appears honourable, simple, just, religious, in that best of lights—the light of his friends' love; we merely question their wisdom in publishing, seven years after his death, the newspaper articles of a man whose influence as a critic (though anonymous) of affairs and ideas was far greater in his lifetime than it can ever be again. And we would say nothing upon this point if we could dare to hope that newspaper writers would be spurred to emulate the capable and lucid style of Mr. Clarke's writings; but, alas! there is a great gulf between the anonymous generation of 180—and that of 1908, and all the bodies of the 1908 journalists, righteously slain, will not suffice to fill that gulf!

Preludes and Romances. By FRANCIS WILLIAM BOURDILLON. (George Allen and Sons, 3s. 6d. net.)

THERE exists in a certain library a palimpsest whereon was written down in Monkish Latin some stories of the older world—the work, it may be, of some not too pious brother who, irked by the continual restrictions of the monastic life, sought this harmless outlet for his errant fancy. These legends Mr. Bourdillon has, by great good fortune, happened upon, and in this volume they reappear in the form of modern English verse, while retaining something of their native dignity and grace. There are four in all, and they exhibit a wide range of subject. In "The Choice of Adam" we read how Adam was offered by his Maker the gift of wings, and how he elected to be mere man. "The Debate of Mary and Venus" exhibits the conflict of the pagan ideal of life with the Christian doctrine of self-sacrifice and penitence. A temple once dedicated to Venus, Queen of Love, has become the home of Our Lady of the Seven Dolours, and one night the goddess comes back to her ancient habitation, to find that her empire has been overthrown. She vanishes with a prophecy—or is it a threat?

Beauty and love of beauty shall remain,
And Aphrodite hold men's hearts again.

In "Chryseis," the succeeding poem, we have Mr. Bourdillon at his best, though his scansion is occasionally faulty, as, for instance, in such a line as:

The heart of the adversary. And he who sings.

As a background to these romances we are given some vivid word-pictures of the Sussex Downs, where the poet has gathered a small group of congenial holiday-makers, one of whom charms his companions with the wisdom and fancy of the nameless and forgotten monk. Mr. Bourdillon discovers in the stories a resemblance to "many of the exempla or gesta which were in the library of every religious Foundation, save that they frankly dispense with the moralizatio at the end of the tale." But surely in "The Choice of Adam," at least, the moralizatio is implicit in the story.

FICTION

The Child of Chance. By MAXIME FORMONT. (John Lane, 6s.)

UNDER the title "Le Semeur" this novel had recently a considerable vogue in France and on the Continent generally. Its appearance in an English translation is a welcome event. It is due to the translator to say that he has done his work well. The story is told with an admirable economy of words, and in sentences which are as perfect and clear-cut as cameos. All redundancies have been carefully eliminated, and the impression left on the mind of the reader is one of extraordinary power and directness. The problem raised is, so far as we know, one new in fiction. It is briefly this: Is a woman, deprived of the opportunities of marriage, justified in laying violent hands on maternity? The problem is stated and discussed, but it cannot be claimed for M. Formont that he has provided any adequate solution. Marie-Cécile de Lauretan, the central figure of this story, had been trained from her earliest childhood in a Freethinking school of philosophy. She had been taught that the end and aim of woman's existence was motherhood, and that it mattered not how it was acquired. These ideas bore fruit, and the desire for offspring became an absorbing passion in the life of the young girl. When she realised that, owing to the selfish extravagance of her father, she would be unable to marry, she determined to become a mother without being a wife. The father of her child was a young Italian workman, for whom she had neither affection nor respect. She leaves him at once, and devotes the remainder of her life to the upbringing of the child. Some years after this she meets a man with whom she falls in love. Louis de Voves is told the secret of her past life, but determines, notwithstanding, that he will marry her. The marriage proves to be a singularly happy one, and all goes well till the father of Marie-Cécile's child once more reappears. Maddened with jealousy, this man swears that he will have his revenge, and he announces his intention of claiming the child as his own. A secret interview between Marie-Cécile and her aforetime lover follows, and the man is persuaded at length to relinquish the claim to his son. He pleads, however, that he may be allowed to see him, and to this request the mother yields. The story of the encounter is finely told. Marie-Cécile and her son are walking together in a public park, and they pass the man who has played so eventful a part in the lives of both of them, without a signal of recognition from the mother:

Pietro Arrigoni said never a word. He bent his head. The woman and child passed on. His life passed with them.

He watched them disappear through the iron gates. The music had died away into a soft, plaintive air. He was alone, and was about to vanish into space.

It was his fate. He was the passer-by whose gesture creates life, who disappears into the unknown, while no one asks if he will ever return. He was the Sower.

The story is told without the least suspicion of grossness, and in the person of Marie-Cécile the author has succeeded in providing one of the most successful and interesting psychological studies in contemporary fiction.

The Prodigal City. By TRISTRAM COUTTS. (Greening, 6s.)

THIS somewhat elaborate study of municipal Socialism possesses the merit of being novel. Mr. Coutts shows considerable knowledge of local government, and though he may not intend this book to be taken too seriously by politicians, it undoubtedly deals many hard blows at municipal trading and corruption. Downington is the "prodigal city," the victim of a democracy that is both reckless and illiterate. The council is composed of thieves who masquerade under the names of "Liberal," "Conservative," and "Labour," but the greatest rascals of all are the Labour men. Everybody with any influence has to be "squared;" all local contracts are bought and sold by means of secret commissions, and false balance-sheets are prepared on every occasion to hoodwink the ratepayers. An American millionaire, who foresees that such a course of events must ruin any town, engages through an agent, an ardent reformer, Rupert Ethering, to get into the Downington Council and hurry forward all the schemes for extending the municipality's trading powers, so that the lesson may be soon learnt. Gabriel Downright's prophecy is justified when several leading firms begin to transfer their factories to the garden city established by him, but it is the local Labour leaders who eventually cure Ethering of his Socialism, and in the end we find him accepting an offer from Downright to contest Rosalyn, the garden city, in the Conservative interest. According to Mr. Coutts there is no honest person in the service of the ratepayers of England, and he distributes his criticisms irrespective of party; but the portrait of Quinion, the Labour leader, is likely to arouse most irritation. Labourites and Socialists are very sensitive nowadays, and the character of Quinion will not be allowed to pass unchallenged for the very reason that there is a strong suspicion that it is true to life. "The Prodigal City" is well worth reading despite a few imperfections in the style caused by carelessness in writing.

His Final Flutter. By HENRY POTTS. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)

MR. NAT GOULD must undoubtedly look to his laurels. For there has appeared on the horizon of sporting fiction Mr. Henry Potts. He not only knows racing, but can write about it, both picturesquely and convincingly. Mr. Potts has already gained undoubted commendation for his earlier book, "Circuit Companions," and "His Final Flutter" should maintain the reputation he has achieved. Viewed dispassionately, "His Final Flutter" gives quite an intimate and, in a way, curious picture of racing. To the uninitiated a horse-race should mean a race between two or more horses. But "to those who know" (and Mr. Potts is evidently of the latter category) it is much more than that. It is a match between the owner and the bookmaker, between the owner and the public to prevent the latter from "spoiling the market" by indiscriminate wagers before the race, and again between the owner and the bookmaker, who in certain instances is not above maiming or hounding a horse that he does not want to win. There is also another contest of wits, more dangerous, but still possible up to a certain point, between the owner and the handicapper. No owner must run his horse unfairly or untruly, but he may run him over a wrong distance where his true form will not appear, and so win a light handicap in the race of his choice. All these tricks and opportunities for finesse Mr. Potts knows well, and uses them quite cleverly in "His Final Flutter." He also weaves in quite a nice little love-story, where the course of true love runs by no means smooth for a time, but eventually the loyalty of the lady and the good common sense of her father—a most delightful parson—prove too much for the machinations of a detestable aunt and nephew.

Altogether "His Final Flutter" is quite a good, breezy, sporting story, written without pretentiousness, but written soundly and naturally. Mr. Potts gives us a whole racing season, from the Lincoln meeting to the Cesarewitch, and leaves his hero and heroine happily married, having beaten the Ring, with no clouds threatening their lives, and the Turf put behind them and forsaken.

Lady Lee. By FLORENCE WARDEN. (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

MISS WARDEN'S name on a title-page means only one thing—sensational and successful melodrama. Her latest book is no exception to this rule. Thrill follows thrill, sensation sensation, until at last, with one final cataclysmal ecstasy, the curtain falls on a tableau foretelling a happy future for those who deserve it.

It would be idle to pretend that "Lady Lee" is another "House on the Marsh." We shall probably wait long before that triumph is repeated, but it should rank well among its fellows and be successful among those innumerable readers who read to please their hearts rather than their heads. It has that characteristic which is often called, for want of a better name, a "human interest." The characters are well and clearly drawn, and if the line-work is just a little heavy and the colours have been used somewhat lavishly, that is a fault on the right side in the eyes of Miss Warden's public. Of its literary merit there is no need to speak. Miss Warden's name is enough to guarantee that there are no solecisms or breaches of taste. Her style, though never ambitious, is clear and direct, and her grammar unimpeachable. And this is much more than can be said of many modern writers. There is also one more point in her favour—she is never dull.

The Bond Woman. By H. MAXWELL. (Digby Long, 6s.)

THE only impressive thing about this work is its extreme length. We reached the last chapter, but only by dint of great perseverance and, we must confess, judicious skipping. We should feel more compunction on this score were we not convinced that we had missed nothing of any importance in the lives of the unusually dull and extraordinarily talkative people who form the personnel of the book. So garrulous are they that such a statement as this is difficult to believe:

But for the untiring efforts of the indefatigable Mr. Tatham there would have been no general conversation at all.

The "bond-woman" is Grace Osborne, who marries a wealthy, self-made man, Amos Bond, on his deathbed, with the full intention of becoming the wife of another man as soon as her husband dies. Bond does not die, but later, finding that his wife does not love him, chivalrously endeavours to disappear. A convenient railway accident helps him to achieve this end, and he is to all intents and purposes a dead man when he finds that, owing to the fact that he has neglected to make a will, his money is all going to the wrong person. To prevent this he is compelled to make an ignominious reappearance, thereby seriously inconveniencing his wife and his talkative family—who talk all the more in consequence.

The Wheel o' Fortune. By LOUIS TRACY. (Ward, Lock, 6s.)

THE adventures of Dick Royson in search of a mysterious buried treasure in an African desert are conventional enough, but Mr. Tracy writes sufficiently well to make his book interesting reading. The young man is introduced to us as he watches a procession of the unemployed. He, too, is out of employment. A timely carriage accident, however, provides him with an opportunity of displaying his prowess, and, as a result, he is engaged by Baron von Kerber to be the second mate of the Aphrodite, the yacht which is carrying Mr. Fanshawe, his daughter, Mrs. Haxton, Captain Stump and his crew to Africa. Royson is the heir to a baronetcy and a large income, but this fact is kept a secret to Miss Fanshawe and the reader until the proper time for its publication. Meanwhile Royson falls in love with Miss Fanshawe of course, and it also follows that his proposal comes before the knowledge of his change of fortune reaches him. This is all part of the modern novelist's extreme fondness for proving the sincerity of his hero and heroine. However, the love-making forms a small part only of "The Wheel o' Fortune." All the mystery surrounding buried treasure is drawn upon for surprise and counter-surprise; the interest in the baron and Mrs. Haxton is worked up to a strong pitch, but in the end the author has very little to tell of them. An author should see that he can manufacture a good solution as well as a good mystery, and Mr. Tracy's weakest spot is the conclusion of his story. Mr. Tracy is by now a well-known writer of sensational novels, and his latest book, whilst striking no new line or probing deeply into the problems of life, is a good specimen of the story-novel pure and simple. We have met many Dick Roysons before, and they have performed many of the feats Mr. Tracy describes. That fact, however, will not trouble the author's readers. They like a readable, exciting story, and in "The Wheel o' Fortune" they will get it.

CORRESPONDENCE

SOCIALISM VERSUS CHRISTIANITY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I write just two or three words not in order to contradict or have the last word, but merely to clear up one or two points. I have not read Mr. Bax's book, and have no knowledge of what his religious opinions are; but this makes no difference to the argument. One swallow does not make a summer, and it is impossible to argue that because one or more men profess Atheism or Agnosticism, therefore the party to which he belongs is all of the same colour. No one would say this of the Tory or Liberal party, and therefore why of the Socialist? I still maintain that the large majority of books—viz., the "Fabian Essays," "The Labour Ideal Series," "Socialism," by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, to quote some I have read, are sympathetic as far as religion goes, and not against it. The Socialist Members in the House of Commons are certainly not opposed to religion, and they are very good specimens of the English Socialist. Still, after all, this is not a matter between him and me; time will show who is right. The Socialist movement is making rapid progress, and the Light that shines in the darkness will in due time show if it be religious or no.

W. H. PAINE, Curate of St. Mary's, Primrose Hill, N.W.

[Our comments on this letter will be found in "Life and Letters."—ED.]

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is strange that so many intelligent people should still remain in doubt as to the real attitude of Socialism towards the Christian Churches. And yet Socialist writers have been admirably frank upon the subject in their published works. A few extracts from the writings of their leaders may therefore prove interesting; they certainly speak with no uncertain voice.

Karl Marx ridicules the belief in Christianity. He says:—

Morality has nothing to do with religion—that it has is only asserted by fools or hypocrites.

Again, Mr. E. B. Bax, the most eloquent of the English exponents of the "Ethics of Socialism," writes:

The association of Christianity with any form of Socialism is a mystery; it is useless to blink the fact that the Christian doctrine is revolting to the higher moral sense of to-day. The theories of the older religions are impossible for us. Christian Socialism is an anomaly, not only alien, but hostile to us. We care nothing for Christ, Mahomet, Gautama Buddha, Confucius, etc. In fact, reverence for authority of any kind was destroyed by Socinus, Luther, Calvin, and their followers. By denying the authority of the Church as a Divine teacher, and substituting free-thought and private judgment, the pillars of the entire dogmatic edifice were broken, leaving it only a matter of time for the whole edifice to fall in. . . . Even dogmatic Protestantism leaves it open to dispute every dogma on Biblical authority; each man can devise a system out of that heterogeneous body of literature called the Bible.

Mediæval civilisation was Christian theology in its only consistent form. . . . The present mental attitude of educated men differs from that of all previous ages.

And then further on he makes the ingenious, but rather odd, admission that "unconscious humbug is an important ingredient in the spirit of the age."

Most of us will agree with him in this. Again, in a work published jointly by the late William Morris and Mr. E. B. Bax we read:

To most men the religion of modern society means nothing more than mere sets of names and formulas, to one or other of which every respectable man is supposed to be attached, and in which he will be sure to find a conventional solution of the great problem . . . the general grimace of religion which has taken the place of real belief.

With regard to belief in a future life, Karl Marx wrote:

Beyond Nature and Man there is nothing; and those higher beings created by our religious fancy are but the fantastic reflections of our own being.

Surely this is pure atheism! Herr Behel, the leader of the Socialists in Germany, declares against the immortality of the soul.

Mr. Robert Blatchford also wrote recently in the Clarion:

I am working for Socialism when I attack a religion which is hindering Socialism; I do not like the Christian Church.

Nothing could be more straightforward than these announcements as to the objects of Socialism. We should understand by them exactly the nature of the struggle which we have to face. On the other hand, the efforts of some Christian writers to minimise the doctrines of Socialism are contemptible and dishonest. One point has been made clear: a man cannot be a Socialist and remain a Christian; he cannot at the same time run with the hare and hunt with the hounds.

THE CHRISTIAN SOCIAL UNION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My attention has been called to an editorial note in the last issue of THE ACADEMY which seems to suggest that all the members of the Christian Social Union are Socialists. Such a remark might be allowed to pass in the vague and general sense in which it may be said that "we are all Socialists now." But if the term Socialism is used in its more technical sense to denote the collective ownership of capital and land, it would not be accurate to describe the Christian Social Union as being committed to any such policy. An official statement of the position of the Christian Social Union was published last month, of which I beg to submit a copy, to emphasise the fact that the Union has never been identified with any political party.

J. CARTER, Hon. Secretary of the C.S.U.

Pusey House, Oxford, June 8, 1908.

[We have pleasure in publishing Mr. Carter's disclaimer, and we are very glad to hear that the Christian Social Union is not committed to approval of Socialism. This is as it should be, and we regret that we in any way misrepresented the aim of the Union.—ED.]

SOCIALISM AND SUFFRAGITIS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—With reference to the assertion made by your correspondent Mr. Mackenzie Theedam on behalf of that ludicrously superfluous organisation the Men's League for Women's Suffrage, in THE ACADEMY of May 30th, that "Socialists as a body have opposed our movement," would you allow me to defy him to produce the name of a single prominent Socialist who has ventured to oppose female suffrage, or even that of one who has failed to support it? The three most representative leaders of Parliamentary Socialism—Mr. Keir Hardie, Mr. Snowden, and Mr. Victor Grayson—are devoted satellites of Miss Pankhurst. Every member of the Independent Labour Party supported the motion in favour of woman suffrage in the recent division in the House of Commons. At Leeds, Huddersfield, and several other towns the Suffragettes were protected by the Socialists from the Radical chuckers-out and the violence of the mob. Among the less purely political section of the Socialist faction Mr.

George Bernard Shaw, Mr. R. J. Campbell (of the City Temple), and Mr. R. B. Cuningham-Graham—to name but these—have identified themselves closely with the Suffragette cause as Galahads of to-day; and it would be an easy matter to add to the list by the enumeration of minor celebrities were it necessary to do so. In France Socialism and Feminism have walked hand in hand, and a parallel movement is to be found existing in all other European countries. The nine women members recently returned to the Finnish Diet were, without exception, Socialists of an extremely virulent type. It is greatly to be feared that the Jellabys of female suffrage surpass even their mistresses in the recklessness of their departure from the “line of fact.”

“TRUTH CANNOT BE SECTARIAN”

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I be permitted, with the utmost respect for your opinions in your issue of the 6th inst., to express my entire disagreement with them?

In his essay on Nature, John Stuart Mill observes that, according to the Platonic method, it is a rule that the meaning of an abstraction is best sought for in the concrete—of the universal in the particular. Applying this to the abstraction truth, its meaning is conformity to fact or reality; its essence being what is certain, absolute, fixed, positive, unerring, and universal. To cite an example, inter alia, one speaks of the laws that govern Nature and our physical selves as truths, because they cannot be diverted or disproved of. But surely, Sir, you must admit that religious tenets, doctrines, and dogmas, per se, are subject to flux, change, and doubt, are not universal, and are therefore not compatible with the meaning of truth, as I understand it.

The ethical laws commensurate for the weal and happiness of mankind and the individual, which underlie all sectarian teaching and all religion may be truths—but this is beside the question.

It seems to me that what you have laid down in your paragraphs as inviolate truths to millions of the world's inhabitants would seem untruths. These myriads ascribe truth to their own particular creeds. Therefore I fail to see or comprehend how “truth cannot be sectarian” is “a false statement.”

It seems to me, Sir—and I make the suggestion in all humility—that the abstraction truth in all religious systems should be changed into the more consistent term of belief. Beliefs, unlike truths, need not undergo the ordeal of inexorable proof and logic.

A PROTEST

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is really a pity that you should admit letters like those of Mr. Edward S. Dodgson into THE ACADEMY. It is impossible to explain to your readers who are not philologists how utterly devoid of scientific value these random speculations are. This week you have printed, to the consternation of your philological friends, a column and a quarter of stuff like this:

“It is more probable that labarum is connected, like the root of λαμβάνω, with lamh, the old Keltic word for hand.”

What a curious idea Mr. Dodgson has of scientific probability! Three words are similar in sound, ergo they are radically akin. He does not take the trouble to investigate the history of the Greek or Keltic word. Had he done so, he would have found out that it is generally agreed by scholars that the original form of the root of λαμβάνω was “slab,” and that the original form of the root of lamh was “pal.” The roots have only “L” in common.

A PERSONAL APPEAL FROM THE SCOTTISH PATRIOTIC ASSOCIATION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is greatly to be regretted that many writers and public speakers (inadvertently it may be, but erroneously) use the term “England” for “Britain,” “English” for “British,” and “Englishmen” for “Britons” and “British people,” these errors creating confusion in many minds, and tending, through use and wont, to become the accepted terms, although they are at variance with historic fact.

We beg earnestly to call your attention to the following points with reference to the offensive misuse of these terms, and to appeal to you, in the interests of Justice and Honour, to aid by your example and otherwise in arresting this unfair and mischievous practice.

The question involved is not one of sentiment alone, though even as regards sentiment history shows the immense importance of conciliating rather than offending it. But the matter is one also of national rights and international honour. The substitution of the terms “England” and “English” for “Britain” and “British” involves the violation of the very first condition of the union between Scotland and England, and subsequently between Great Britain and Ireland. It is laid down as the first condition in both Treaties that when the United Kingdom is referred to the united name shall be employed. The Empire is not the English, but the British Empire; the Parliament is not the English, but the British Parliament; the Army and Navy are not English, but British; the Flag is not the English, but the British Flag; the Sovereign is not the English, but the British Monarch.

So keenly is the injustice felt in Scotland of having the terms that stand for Union set aside, and the sectional terms “England” and “English” put in their place, that in 1897 over 100,000 Scottish people of all ranks and classes, including Members of Parliament, Principals of Scottish Universities, and Lord Provosts, Provosts, and magistrates of numerous cities, towns, and burghs in Scotland, as well as thousands of Scottish people in the Colonies, signed a protest against it, which was presented to and graciously accepted by her late Majesty Queen Victoria. It is surely a pity that, by the use of inaccurate and offensive terms, national animosities should be provoked which the adoption of a united name was wisely intended and well fitted to lay at rest.

We beg to draw your attention to the slip made in your issue of May 30th (p. 824) where you use the term “Anglo-French Exhibition” instead of “Franco-British Exhibition.”

Our appeal to you for your co-operation (by example and otherwise) in discountenancing the abuse referred to is made in the interests of international goodwill; and we feel sure that the appeal will not be made to you in vain.

In the name of the Scottish Patriotic Association,

DAVID MACRAE, President.

DONALD DEWAR, } Hon. Secretaries.
D. G. MACKEMMIE, }

PS.—I do not know if the lesson you mention is meant only for Englishmen, in which case the word used is correct, but the term “English people” should be “British people.”—D. MCK.

THE SHAKESPEARE QUARTOS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is with much pleasure that I have read Mr. Huth's letter in THE ACADEMY of June 6th, criticising certain arguments as to the dates of Shakespearian quartos recently advanced by me. If there is anything at all in my theory, it cannot but profit by such minute attention as that which Mr. Huth appears to have bestowed upon it. Since I hope to return to the subject in greater detail in a future number of the Library, I cannot now enter into a general discussion of the evidence, but one or two remarks on the particular point raised may not be out of place.

Until I have examined Mr. Huth's copies of the quartos—which I hope he will have the kindness of allowing me some day to do—I can, of course, only speak hypothetically. With regard to the variations in the measurement of the LM pot watermark, I should, however, like to recommend the following considerations to his attention:—(i.) Allowance must be made for the unequal shrinkage of different sheets in drying. Mr. Huth, as a bibliographer, is, of course, well aware of the curiously different measurements sometimes found in different impressions of the same woodcut, owing to the varying dampness of the sheets when printing. A similar variation must, I think, be expected in watermarks. (ii.) Watermarks also vary owing to the gradual deformation of the wiremark during the use of the frame. For instance, the PA pot, which occurs no less than nineteen times in the Capell volume, shows marked signs of deterioration and warping, though it has not been rewoven, as apparently has the GG pot. (iii.) It is quite possible that Mr. Huth's copies of the quartos may contain marks unrepresented in the Capell volume, and which are consequently not described in my article. I have recently re-examined the Capell volume with care, and am convinced that the mark in question is from the same frame throughout, even though it may vary slightly in measurement. On the other hand, I quite admit the difficulty, in certain circumstances, of being sure of the identity of watermarks, and have no wish to deny that the table I gave in the Library may yet require correction.

Dr. W. H. FITCHETT AND PUBLIC OPINION

Dr. W. H. FITCHETT, M.A., the Author of "Fights for the Flag" and "Deeds that Won the Empire," who lives in Melbourne, Australia, sends the following letter to the Editor of Public Opinion:—

Dear Mr. Parker—

I get your PUBLIC OPINION regularly, and find it most interesting and valuable—a matchless bit of journalistic work. It ought to find a place, for one thing, in every newspaper office outside London, for nothing else I know gives such a reflex of the thought in the current history of the world.

Yours ever,

W. H. FITCHETT.

PUBLIC OPINION A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT :: THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY ::
Every Friday. Twopence.
EDITED BY PERCY L. PARKER.

MR. JOHN LONG'S NEW BOOKS

"A REMARKABLE BOOK."—T. P. O'CONNOR

MEMOIRS OF EDWARD VAUGHAN KENEALY, LL.D. By his Daughter,

ARABELLA KENEALY. With Photogravure Portrait of Dr. Kenealy and several other Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

BRIEF EXTRACTS FROM THE FIRST REVIEWS.

Saturday Review.—"No more interesting biography of a lawyer has ever been written." Birmingham Gazette.—"There is no more romantic story in the history of English law than that of this brilliant lawyer." Morning Post.—"Dr. Kenealy moved in an interesting circle, of which these Memoirs present some striking recollections." Daily Mail.—"An upright, scholarly, courageous, and lovable man." Daily Mirror.—"This most unusual and very interesting book." Country Life.—"Its richness and raciness."

A VOLUME OF EXTRAORDINARY FASCINATION

MORE SOCIETY RECOLLECTIONS. By an ENGLISH OFFICER, Author of "Society Recollections in Paris and Vienna, 1879-1904." With 44 Portraits of Celebrities. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

[Now ready.]

The gratifying reception that was accorded "Society Recollections in Paris and Vienna, 1879-1904" has called forth the present volume, in which the author covers ground both in France and Austria that was left untouched in the former work, and he travels over a wider area of Southern Europe generally. The writer depicts the life and manners of the Continental Smart Set—the Court, the Corps Diplomatique, the Services, and the Aristocracy. It is written by a man of the world, who has been everywhere and seen everything.

GLIMPSES OF THE AGES. By T. E. SAMUEL SCHOLES, M.D. Demy 8vo, 12s. net. Volume II.

[Now ready.]

The most momentous world-question of the future will be the relations which shall exist between the white and the coloured races. Dr. Scholes's first volume dealt with the physical, mental, and moral distinctions which are said to exist between the two races. In the present volume he proceeds a step further, and examines the alleged distinction by which the white race has become the superior, and the coloured the inferior race.

CREATION'S DAWN. By "KISH." With Preface by Prof. A. H. SAYCE. Crown

8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

[Now ready.]

Many of the difficulties encountered in the Creation and Deluge Narratives of Genesis are here satisfactorily explained on an entirely new basis. This book should be in the hands of all those who have doubts as to the veracity of this part of the Biblical Narrative.

EDWARD FITZGERALD AND "POSH," "Herring Merchants," including a number of Unpublished Letters from Edward Fitzgerald to Joseph Fletcher, or "Posh," not hitherto published. By JAMES BLYTH. With 16 Illustrations specially taken for the work, including two of "Posh." Crown 8vo, 4s. net.

[Immediately.]

To the many who regard Edward Fitzgerald as the greatest of English letter-writers the announcement of a volume which will contain a number of unpublished Fitzgerald letters is certain to stir curiosity. It is the story of Edward Fitzgerald's friendship with "Posh," the boatman. Many readers who know their Fitzgerald well have been puzzled by the frequent reference to "Posh" in Fitzgerald's writings. The story is now elucidated by Mr. James Blyth. Fitzgerald confessed that he had a "very young-lady-like partiality" for writing to his friends, and these letters show another phase of his intensely human character.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE YOKE"

THE OLD ALLEGIANCE. By HUBERT WALES, Author of "Mr. and Mrs. Villiers,"

"The Yoke," and "Cynthia in the Wilderness." With 8 Illustrations by H. R. MILLAR. 6s.

[Immediately.]

The three novels—"Mr. and Mrs. Villiers," "The Yoke," and "Cynthia in the Wilderness"—by which Mr. Hubert Wales has so quickly made himself known have one quality in common: they are as unlike the average novel as anything can well be. Mr. Hubert Wales does not, of course, write for "babes and sucklings"; and he may conceivably say things that startle part of his audience; but, at all events, if one dissents from his opinions, it must at least be admitted that he approaches the complexities of life from a new outlook. It is probable that Mr. Hubert Wales's latest story, "The Old Allegiance," will be the greatest surprise of any of his books.

THE NEW SOCIETY NOVEL

KEEPERS OF THE HOUSE. By COSMO HAMILTON, Author of "Adam's Clay,"

"Brummell," 6s.

The opinion of the World.—"Mr. Hamilton's study of Mary Bellenden is intensely sympathetic, and he has handled a daring subject with extreme delicacy. This striking story is one of undoubted pathos, and such an one as may be very true. Withal, he points more than one moral. Daring it may be, unconventional and intensely clever it is without question."

AN UNCONVENTIONAL NOVEL

THE CONFESSIONS OF CLEODORA. By CARLTON DAWE. With Coloured

Frontispiece. 6s.

* * The autobiography of a woman who has sounded the depths of life, and lays her soul bare to the world; but it is something more—it is a transcript from a phase of life which is not usually treated by the novelist.

W. T. STEAD, in the Review of Reviews.—"A very remarkable story; a novel to set people thinking. It is a bold, brilliant, defiant presentation of a phase of the relations of the sexes which I do not remember ever having seen treated with the same freedom, delicacy, and audacity. It is difficult to praise the book too highly."

EVERETT & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

LONDON IN THE SIXTIES

By "One of the Old Brigade"

With Illustrations by HAROLD PIFFARD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A book of interesting recollections and many anecdotes of London as it was nearly two generations ago. The greater part of them are sporting and dramatic, but for the social historian there is much that is interesting in connection with old streets, inns, and clubs.

ENGLISH BIRD LIFE

By H. KNIGHT HORSFIELD

With 100 Photographs from Nature specially taken for this Book.
Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A pleasant and admirable book . . . Mr. Knight Horsfield writes very charmingly, and much more in the style of Richard Jefferies than of the late Professor Newton. The book is excellently illustrated by photographs by that close observer and student of bird-life Mr. T. A. Metcalfe and others. They absolutely justify the remark of the author that 'in many cases they show phases of bird-life rarely to be witnessed, and have been obtained under conditions which may never recur.'—Country Life.
"The text combines in an unusual degree familiar description with scientific knowledge. . . . The book is one that will be eagerly welcomed."—Glasgow Herald.
"A wholly delightful book as conspicuous for its close and sympathetic observation as for its graceful and scholarly style."—The Buhark.

LIFE AND LETTERS

We are delighted to call the attention of our readers to the National Women's Anti-Suffrage Association, of which the Hon. Ivor Guest is the Hon. Secretary. It is a pleasure to be able to record the fact that, as a counter-blast to the recent demonstrations of the screaming sisterhood, thousands of sane and clear-headed women all over the country have been pouring letters into Wimborne House in support of the Anti-Suffrage Association. One of the evening newspapers has given us a few specimens chosen at hazard from these letters. It is very cheering to read them, and to find that the ladies who write them have even stronger views against the women Suffragists than we have ourselves—which, when you come to think of it, is saying a good deal. A great many of these admirable ladies express the feeling to which we before made reference—viz., their dislike of publicity and public demonstrations. It is certainly very unfortunate that in our days, apparently, in order to be taken seriously by political parties, we are obliged to demonstrate, whether we like it or not. Perhaps the days are not far distant when it will be necessary for those who believe that two and two make four to convince Mr. Asquith of the sincerity of their belief by means of banners and brass bands. Anyhow, things have come to such a pass that we must call upon these ladies, in spite of their reluctance, for once in a way to imitate, in a modified way, the methods of their opponents. The noisy minority has held the field long enough, and the time has come when the silent majority must find a voice and make itself heard. When it does so we shall hear no more of the Suffragist movement, and we shall be able to look back on these troubled times as a period of temporary insanity.

There seems a tendency in many quarters just at present to congratulate ourselves on the splendid and imposing London that has risen, or is rising, from the ruins of old slums and grey, grim streets. This is all very well, and one does not deny that in nine cases out of ten the new buildings are a great improvement on the old. Regent Street in stone is putting to shame the old stucco frontage—though that had its graces, too—and the new theatres about Aldwych and the Strand are certainly more agreeable than the dirty old cockpits burrowing nervously into back streets that we remember so well. Of course there is a per contra; there was a picturesque note about tumbledown Clare Market that the judicious will miss, that lovers of Dickens will grieve for, and the destruction of Clement's Inn was a crime. Nothing can make up for its pleasant lawns or for the old garden-house or for the Hall. Still, the new London that is rising is stately, grandiose, even superb, and the occasional weaknesses in its architecture may be made to serve a moral, if we are reminded by them if our great colonies, which are nothing if not inartistic.

But, granting that the heart of London is becoming worthy of its position as the centre of a great world-people, we must not forget that the centre is only a small spot in the middle of a very big circle. All the fine fronts that we are boasting about are contained in a mile radius from Charing Cross; beyond that radius are many leagues of streets which are far from lovely, some of which are unspeakably dreary. Logically, dreariness may not matter; the reasonable man is supposed to be content if the roofs and walls of his dwelling are watertight, if his water-supply is ample, and the drains beyond reproach. But happily we are not conformed in practice to this ideal; we thirst for pleasantness, for beauty even, though we may not be aware of the fact; and in a great town we thirst above all for green leaves, for some relief to the awful wilderness of brick and stone. The poor little window-boxes in the wretchedest slums are significant of this desire for the green world beyond the walls; and here we think is the hint for a great reform. The architecture of most of our streets is past all hope; nothing but an earthquake could reform that. But what a transformation could be effected if every street in London without exception were planted with avenues of trees, if every horrid back-yard, every dismal asphalt court were made an arbour of leaves. London would be one of the great forests of the world, and pleasantness and beauty and fancy apart, I suppose its healthiness would be much increased, since every leaf on every tree is a magazine of pure air. Of course many people would protest, some would say that the fallen leaves in autumn made a nasty litter; and we would suggest that these people should be allowed to protest.

But it should not be forgotten that there are many trees that thrive in London besides the plane. The plane has a splendid growth, and fights the soot and fog and clay sub-soil valiantly; but still there are others. The catalpa makes as good a resistance; there is an aged specimen in Gray's Inn which tradition says was planted by Raleigh. Then the ash deserves attention, and the mulberry also, and where breadth rather than height is desired the fig-tree is eminent above all. It will grow green and broad and glossy planted in the most evil soil; it will thrive in the cold and clammy depths of an area, and it seems to find a diet of "blacks" nourishing. As much may be said of the vine; we have seen in Pentonville a wall covered with purple grapes; so the two great symbolic trees are available for the decking of our meanest streets. The lime, which is often planted, should be planted no more, since its leaves are withered in most seasons by mid-July; but there are many candidates ready to take its place. It would be desirable that a space in each of the central squares should be made into a champ d'expérience; various growths should be planted, and their behaviour watched; and above all it would be desirable that the true method of tree-planting should be imparted to the workmen employed. Sir Walter Scott used to quote a verse which gave the limits of time—between Martinmas and March—but we remember a good many years ago seeing a long line of narrow and deep graves dug in Rosebery Avenue, into which graves were placed plane-trees just coming into leaf. The results were not happy. And there is another point. We printed in THE ACADEMY a few months ago some charming verses which celebrated the growth of wild flowers and grasses that had sprung up in the empty spaces of Aldwych. These flowers and grasses must yield place to buildings; but why should not a certain space be set apart in every park for these wild folk of the woods and meadows?

The Hapenny Bird pipeth for us again :

Unlike some of our confrères, we, the editors of the Red Magazine, will at all times be pleased to welcome the personal calls of intending contributors and critical readers. That perfect understanding which should exist between the producer and the writers of good literature can only be obtained by personal contact. The editors will therefore welcome at these offices the many talented men and women who have hitherto found it difficult to reach the fountain-heads of those publications for which their efforts were intended In that spirit of confidence and mutual understanding we greet you

Which is the purest balderdash. The notion of the Harmsworths greeting anything or anybody in a "spirit of confidence and mutual understanding" will appeal pleasantly to the simplest; even as the editors' babble about "writers of good literature" will amuse the wise. Writers of good literature who cannot get at the "fountain-heads" of the publications for which their efforts are intended have no feet. In the first issue of their captivating sheet "the Editors" give us work by Maud Stepney Rawson, Fred M. White, Oliver Onions, H. B. Marriott Watson, and Winifred Graham, all of whom, we suppose, came into the office out of the gutter and were received benevolently by "the Editors" of the Red Magazine. These same editors complain that other editors, not themselves, "achieve success in magazine publication by heaping together well-known names." Of course there are no well-known names in the Red Magazine. And what is more, when the Editors come to deal with the poetical side of matters we are constrained to wish that they had gone in for names. Here is a stanza from a tearful dithyramb entitled "Just whisper, 'Never mind' "!

But love must prompt that soft caress—
The love must aye be true;
Or at that tender, clinging touch
No heartease comes to you.
But if the arm be moved by love,
Sweet comfort you will find,
When some one slips an arm around,
And whispers, "Never mind."

"Where is our wandering boy to-night?"—possibly editing brainless magazines at Carmelite House.

Number 3 of the New Quarterly contains further extracts from the notebook of Samuel Butler, author of "Erewhon." Some of them are quite delightful. For example :

The essence of priggishness is setting up to be better than one's neighbours. Better may mean more virtuous, more clever, more agreeable or what not. The worst of it is that one cannot do anything outside eating one's dinner or taking a walk without setting up to know more than one's neighbours. It was this that made me say in Life and Habit that I was amongst the damned in that I wrote at all. And so I am; and I am often very sorry that I was never able to reach those more saintly classes who do not set up as instructors of other people. But one must take one's lot.

In a sense it is extraordinary to find a man of Butler's critical powers owning to such a view even in a notebook. There is nothing so pitiful as the prig. On the other hand, the mere telling of a man that he is wrong about this, that, or the other when you know him to be wrong cannot fairly be called priggishness. If one discovers that one's neighbour imagines that two and two make five, there can be no possible harm in endeavouring to set him right on the point. We believe that many writers, particularly in the higher walks of journalism, refrain from a good deal of plain speaking because they feel as Butler seems to have felt. In our view the result is most dire. You will find usually that when a person has a schism to ventilate that person is never in the least diffident about its ventilation. And it seems to us that there should be no diffidence, half-measures, or mealy-mouthedness in the reproof of him. The man who does not set up as an instructor of other people may be blessed, but there can be no doubt that he is in sore need of instruction.

The Daily Chronicle of June 12th delivered itself of opinions as to Offenbach. La Grande Duchesse was performed at the Shaftesbury, and the Daily Chronicle of the date we have mentioned spoke of the revival as a "regurgitation of this wild burst of strident clamour and tinsel show." Also, on June 12th, "Offenbach's masterpiece was a sorry business from an artistic point of view—a flaunt, a flare, a din, gaudy, graceless, and wholly extravagant." Further, on June 12th, the "company" at the Shaftesbury was not "supremely good." But in the Daily Chronicle of June 17th we read :

A bright, breezy entertainment is the revival at the Shaftesbury of the world-famous comic opera La Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein, and one happily that is attracting large audiences to this theatre.

The delightfully exhilarating music of Offenbach is admirably interpreted by the company specially brought here from Paris, and headed by that splendid artist Madame Tariol-Baugé. This gifted prima donna has never been seen to better advantage than in the rôle of the amorous ruler of the little province. Last night she proved herself to be the mainstay of the representation, and her rendering of "Le sabre de mon père" and other familiar solos was most effective.

It would be interesting to know what fall of white marble took place in the soul of the musical critic of the Daily Chronicle in the five days between June 12th and June 17th. It is characteristic of the halfpenny paper that it seldom knows its own mind from day to day. Accidents will happen even in the best newspaper offices, and we suppose that the discrepancy we have pointed out is the result of an accident. But is it not incumbent upon the Daily Chronicle to go a little further and tell us in a few sparkling words which of its notices it really means?

We have been sorely perturbed in mind this week concerning a sonnet, a poem, a—well, let us say twelve lines that follow the rules and two that don't—which appeared in last Wednesday's Daily Chronicle under the ægis of this affecting introduction :—"Written on the prison-slate in my cell at Holloway to while away the hours of my recent imprisonment for the suffrage." The first four lines are really excellent when cleared of their suspensions—brought down to x and y, so to put it; and, while engaged in excavating for their significance, we felt confident that they would do the authoress credit :

Must we pass scoffing that sweet creed, that dreams
Of kindred souls—of sympathies divine
Lit in eternity's dim past—and deems
Such fire, once kindled, through Time's mists can shine?

That fourth line is rather a tongue-twister; but, naturally, to a glib, gay Suffragette articulation has no terrors—witness the "surely 'twixt us twain," which adorns the fifth verse. Then, however (as we feared when we read "kindred souls" and "Time's mists"), we find "blind clinging," eyes compared to "deep wells," "soft arms," "fate's blasts," and a "haven"—which things are all unfortunate and condemnatory when one is writing a sonnet even on a prison slate. There can be no excuse; it might so easily have been rubbed out and re-written, or, better still, left erased on the chance of being "precipitated" later on by an experimentalist in the occult. But the gem of this effusion shines in the concluding couplet:

'Mid Heaven's hymns, methinks, none will discover
A word more sacred than the earth-cry—Mother.

We shouldn't have dared! Miss Irene Miller is a plucky person, and deserves a commemorative gift of a Rhyming Dictionary, for she so evidently means well.

It were ingratitude to omit notice of the return of Adeline Genée. Who has cared for the "Empire"—and she absent? Who will not go now—and she back? For ten years we have had this bright, incomparable dancer in the midst of us, perennially fresh, gay, irresistible; and the six months of her absence have seemed strange and void. From a debauch of bad pictures and the dismaying thought of nasty plays it has been a relief to turn for an hour and watch Genée. When Hall Caine and Dr. Clifford have ceased to entertain us, and even the Suffrage wranglers have failed to amuse, she has remained vitally attractive. Seeing her, you forget she is said to practise four hours a day—does a swallow practise his evening flight? She dances a villanella, a roundel, a triolet; to think of an "Empire" ballet is to recall her infallible charm. Who that saw her will forget her admirable, irreflective gaiety in the Watteau scene—from Cinderella, was it?—two years ago! It is easy to fall into facile superlatives; it is easy, as we know, to make dancing ridiculous by ascribing to it the perfectness of other lovely things; but in plain truth Adeline Genée is one of London's delights.

We notice that Mr. Claudius Clear, of the British Weekly, has been writing an article called "The Human Ass." The article is not about Scotchmen and it is not autobiographical. "The Ass," says Claudius Clear, "invariably fancies that he can make money in any business, but more especially in the business of the novelist, the journalist, and the dramatist. Until recently he had a profound contempt for all of these, but of late the talk has been that dramatists make much money, and so the Ass has turned his mind that way." We do not suppose for a moment that Claudius Clear is a dramatist. The words we have quoted remind us irresistibly of the story of the Jew who on being shown the moose at the Zoological Gardens remarked to his wife, "Goodness gracious, Sarah, what a nose!" Apparently it has not occurred to Claudius Clear that if it were not for the human Ass the British Weekly would not be over well off for readers.

IN TIME OF MOURNING

If you might break the silence of the tomb,

You would not crave an increase of my tears,

Nor bid me draw the curtains of my room

Nor count once more the tale of vanished years.

The love of lost ones breathes in our desires.

It is not hidden in the cloistered heart,

There to be quenched by Time's consuming fires

When we have wept and played the mourner's part.

If I march forward when the dark besets,

You, watching from your prison house, will smile,

You live in deeds, not in our vain regrets,

And life at most is for a little while!

ANGLICAN MODERNISM

Anglican Liberalism. By TWELVE CHURCHMEN. (Williams and Norgate, 5s. net.)

If the purpose of these essays is to exploit Anglican Modernism they must be regarded, with perhaps one or two exceptions, as singularly weak and inadequate for so important a task. They have, we observe, been compared with "Lux Mundi." But in literary expression, ability, and depth of thought they are a long way behind that famous work.

We are at first struck by the unreal tone of apologetic pessimism of some of the writers, the last attitude that should be adopted by the prophets of a new evangel. Are the "faults of the Church and her amazing lack" really so great that the first contributor, Mr. H. Handley, is reasonably justified in asking such questions as these:

When to this nation will the English Church arise, shine, for her light is come? When will she be to the people something intimate, grand, and vital?

We were of opinion that her Light came long centuries ago. Is the answer to be found in "amended ecclesiastical expression" or in the realisation of "our dream—our Church repenting her sins, and ministering to the English people"? We should have thought that repentance and ministrations were already very present factors in reform. Another writer's gloomy view finds expression in this statement:

The problem we have to face is not so much how to keep Anglican theology alive in an unsympathetic world of thought; what we need to consider is whether Anglican theology is wholesome food for Englishmen of our generation—for the living Church in our midst. Is it, in its present condition, fit to keep the Church alive?

The Liberal theologian is generally himself enough of a modern man to believe that some parts of what generally passes for the Christian message . . . are really outworn, and need to be dropped to make room for new developments and new arrangements.

Why? Because "modern folk are impatient of dogma." But there is no doubt in the mind of any impartial student of history that, as Professor Mahaffy long ago pointed out, it was the preaching, not of morals, but of Christian dogma, which captured and reformed the ancient world.

We are naturally led to inquire what are the "outworn parts of the Christian message," which "Liberal theologians" would eliminate with a view to reform. The answer is not far to seek. It is stated boldly enough in the most remarkable essay in the volume—Clerical Liberalism. Dr. Rashdall leaves us in no doubt as to what is meant by Liberalism, in his desire to state the widest "limits of permissible latitude in the interpretations" of the Creeds and Articles of the Church.

The Essays in "Lux Mundi" are dismissed as "mild utterances" and "attenuated criticism." A much broader "way out" must now be found for Liberal Modernists. So the question is, "What are the essential doctrines of Christianity to which a candidate for Orders must be taken to pledge himself?" At least, we should have imagined, the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds. But we are told that:

There are many who regard such doctrines as the Virgin Birth of our Lord and His bodily Resurrection (not in the sense of a vision which historically occurred to the disciples, but in the sense of a literal reanimation of the Body placed in the tomb) as no more essential to Christianity than the other matters (which?) no less unhesitatingly asserted by the Creeds, about which liberty of interpretation is practically conceded. There is no intelligible principle of interpretation . . . which will not permit us to take the word "Virgin" to mean a young woman, or to understand by "He rose from the dead" a vision of the Immortal and Risen Christ.

Dr. Rashdall is courageous and straightforward enough when he adds:

I shall now be asked . . . if these historical statements are to be explained away, why not the more distinctly doctrinal statements? If the bodily resurrection, why not every form of historical resurrection? If the Virgin Birth, why not the Incarnation, the Divinity of Christ, the Holy Trinity? I admit that so long as the matter is treated as a question of "honesty" or "veracity" it might be difficult to distinguish between the "explanations" and "interpretations" which everybody allows, and others which would leave standing very little of what any average person would recognise as the Christian religion. . . . But the practical question is not now one of honesty, but of spiritual expediency.

What then is to be the standard of Faith? Dr. Rashdall gives a simple answer: "Primarily each man must judge for himself of this spiritual expediency"—an answer which history teaches us would soon result in disruption; an answer which has led to the formation of some two hundred sects among those who have seceded from the Church; an answer somewhat surprising from a priest of the Church, but quite intelligible from a man who assures us that:

In the Church of England the compulsory use of the Prayer-book and Creeds still further limits the range of expedient latitude.

It will readily be understood that Dr. Rashdall sets little value upon General Councils of the Church:

I am not one of those who expect great results of any kind from monster assemblies of Bishops. . . . The power of such assemblies for good is small, their power for evil is large.

More pessimism. (It is too late now to give up the Pan-Anglican Congress.) So the best thing that can be done by these unfortunate prelates, assailed by all parties, is to "place no difficulties" (particularly not the Creeds of Catholic Christendom) "in the way of liberal-minded candidates for Orders," for:

There are much less "advanced" pieces of Liberalism than doubts about the Virgin Birth which induce men to give up the idea of being ordained, and which would have no such effect if they could hear from a Bishop—in public—that they constitute no valid objection to Ordination.

We trust that we do Dr. Rashdall no injustice if we say that his position seems to us scarcely to be distinguished from Unitarianism, with a reverence for the Christian revelation shorn of historical dogma. Nor are we of those who think that the necessity for honest subscription to the Creeds of the Church is a prime cause of diminution in the supply of candidates for Ordination. Dr. Rashdall actually laments that those Theological Colleges where the Catholic faith (Dr. Rashdall's "advanced Sacerdotalism") is dogmatically taught are the "largest and most popular." Nor do we consider that Dr. Rashdall's prescription for whittling down the Creeds to bare Theism is necessary:

To counteract that alienation of educated laymen from the Church which is endangering the very existence of Christianity among us—surely a most exaggerated view.

The suggestions in this essay appear to us an apposite commentary on Dr. Illingworth's recent observation that:

There are signs that the doctrine of the Trinity is again likely to become the battleground that it has so often been before in Christian history; the battleground on which the contention for the Faith will have for the time to be carried on.

Professor Percy Gardner, in his essay "Lay Liberalism," writes in much the same spirit, saying:

That nothing in the way of Creed or Article should be so tightly interpreted as to exclude from the ministry men who have a real vocation for it.

Like other of these essayists, he too seems possessed with the pessimistic notion that the Church is ceasing to be the Church of the people. We allege that there is ample evidence that where the Church teaches dogmatic faith the Church is increasingly the Church of the people, and even of educated laymen, supposed to be alienated. Nearly every age of the Church has seen among all classes a tinge of Arianism, dormant or aggressive, and yet historic Christianity has prevailed.

On the other hand, Professor Gardner well-refutes the very common error that the masses cannot be Christian until they reach a certain level of comfort:

However keenly one may sympathise with those who desire to raise the level of material existence, one must remember that Christianity grew to maturity in the slums of ancient cities, slums compared with which the worst districts of London and Liverpool are paradises. Physical comfort may be a more desirable thing than religious peace—that is a common view, though not a Christian view; but physical discomfort does not exclude religious peace—that is as certain as the fact that the world revolves round the sun.

Some of the other essays call for short notice. Sir C. T. Dyke Acland writes a dignified lament—in keeping with the tone of melancholy which pervades this book—that more of the clergy (and laity) do not belong to the Liberal party in politics, while Mr. A. J. Carlyle thinks that Liberal theology is a sort of panacea for the reconstruction of industrial society, which "at present is governed by blind, monstrous, inhuman force."

The academic essay on Past Liberalism seems a little belated, both in substance and position, being placed ninth instead of first. Professor Caldecott, writing on Nonconformist Liberalism, ignores Mr. Campbell and the New Theology, thus missing the opportunity of a useful parallel to Anglican Liberalism, opinions expressed elsewhere in this book. In curious contrast to Dr. Rashdall's depressing estimate of Ecclesiastical Councils, he points to "the continued and practical acknowledgment on the part of Nonconformists of the necessity of Councils and decrees, though now designated 'assemblies' and 'resolutions'"—in short, that Dissenters feel the want of their lost corporate unity and corporate faith.

We are advised by a note at the beginning of this book that, although each contributor is responsible only for his own essay, the title indicates among the writers a general community of aim. We have quoted at some length in order to show the dominant idea that the Church can only be saved by accepting the widest destructive criticism of historic Christianity. We have protested against both the pessimism and the conclusion. And what is to be substituted? An attenuated faith based on the purely metaphysical doctrine that events which may be supposed to have happened in the spiritual sphere could not possibly have taken place in the phenomenal. There seems to us little difference between this view and the well-known theory of hallucination. We believe that to a vast majority of Christians it is still a condition of their personal and individual faith that the Virgin Birth and the Resurrection of Christ's Body are actual verities in the same sense that the Crucifixion is. If instead there were substituted, as proposed in this book, an illegitimate child and a visual apparition, the whole Gospel of the Christian Faith would for them become non-existent, leaving only a cynical agnosticism. To many "modern" minds this "unscientific position" may appear even pitiable. But its existence is a fact bound up with historic Christianity and the faith of millions. We admit that there is room for greater liberality of thought in ecclesiastical circles about matters that are not essential to the Catholic Faith, but we cannot think that the Church is in danger of collapse unless her creeds are reconstructed on the basis of Theism with an implied belief in the Platonic view of the immortality of the soul, as distinguished from that Resurrection of the body, the preaching of which was to the Greeks, as to many in our own time, foolishness.

THE ROYAL BOROUGH

Windsor. Painted by GEORGE M. HENTON. Described by Sir RICHARD RIVINGTON HOLMES, K.C.V.O. (A. and C. Black, 7s. 6d. net.)

THE history of Windsor is essentially the history of Windsor Castle. Its burghers have, doubtless, played their part in the making of England, but their achievements have been dwarfed in the presence of the mighty deeds of kings and courtiers. Shakespeare, in perhaps the most purely farcical play he ever wrote, has given us a glimpse of civic life in the Royal borough, but for the most part history is discreetly silent—having, indeed, weightier matters wherewith to concern itself. The Castle, which dominates with a proud and insolent superiority the congeries of slums and narrow streets by which it is surrounded, is a monument to the noblest and most kingly traditions of our race.

It is not surprising, therefore, that a book on Windsor should concern itself exclusively with the story of Windsor Castle, and the subsidiary, but no less interesting, story of St. George's Chapel. Sir Richard Holmes has performed his task well, and, had he but been tempted to the faintest indication of human emotion, he would have performed it admirably. As it is the book lacks the flavour of permanent interest. It is—to adopt a familiar and expressive colloquialism—a little “dry.” The personal note is entirely missing, and the author's superiority to anything in the nature of an anecdote is disappointing to one who expects in a history something more than a mere chronicle of facts. It is not for the reviewer to supplement the labours of the biographer, but we are entitled to complain that a period so full of colour and romance as that of the Four Georges should be dismissed in thirteen pages. Of “Farmer George” himself—most attractive of Windsor lovers—we hear practically nothing. It was this amiable monarch who, on the eve of a memorable election, in which Admiral Keppel figured as the Whig candidate, strolled into a silk-mercer's shop in the town, and called out: “The Queen wants a gown—wants a gown. No Keppel. No Keppel.” Surely Sir Richard might have found space for this gem of electioneering tactics. We should like, too, to have heard something of the sprightly Fanny Burney, whom Royalty detained for so many years as an unwilling captive at Windsor Castle.

However, we must be content with what we get, and, since Sir Richard has elected to be other than discursive, we must accept his book for what it is. The style is admirably straightforward and entirely devoid of all pretentiousness, and for the matter—well, it will suffice to say that no essential fact in the history of the borough has been overlooked.

And what a history! From the time of Henry II. until our own day the pomp and pageantry of England have centred round that small riverside town. It was from Windsor Castle that King John went forth to encounter his rebellious barons. It was within a mile of Windsor that these same rebellious barons, under the leadership of an Archbishop of Canterbury, laid the foundations of English liberty in the field of Runimede. It was at Windsor, in 1348, that the Order of the Garter was instituted, concerning the origin of which, by the way, there has been much fruitless controversy. This is Sir Richard Holmes's opinion:

It is highly probable that this circular ornament represents simply the ring or circle of the Round Table, which was the original design of the King's order of chivalry, where all members are equal, and none sat in a seat more exalted than another.

At Windsor Queen Philippa, consort of Edward III., died, and Edward the Black Prince was married. At Windsor, too, in the succeeding reign, Geoffrey Chaucer was appointed superintendent of the repairs of St. George's Chapel. It was in Windsor Castle that James I., the poet-king of Scotland, was imprisoned, and here “The King's Quair” was written, recording an adventure which befell the amorous prince:

And therewith cast I down my eyes again,
And walking, as I saw, beneath the tower
Full secretly new coming her to pleyne
The fairest and the freshest youthful flower
That e'er I saw, methought, before that hour,
For which surprise so sudden, did astart
The blood of all my body to my heart.
And though I stood abased then a lyte
No wonder was, because my wits were all
So overcome with pleasure and delight.
Only through letting of my eyes downfall,
That suddenly my heart became her thrall,
For ever, of free will, for of menace
There was no token seen in her sweet face.

The lady in question was the Lady Joan Beaufort, daughter of the Earl of Somerset. There followed a successful wooing, and the lovers were at length married at the Church of St. Mary Overie in Southwark, now St. Saviour's Cathedral. Henry VI. of England—that most misunderstood of monarchs—was born in Windsor Castle, and fifty years later in Windsor Castle was murdered.

Henry VIII. was a great lover of Windsor, and here he hunted, feasted, and entertained on a scale of unparalleled magnificence. Philip of Spain, consort of Queen Mary, visited Windsor in 1554, and attempted to replace the Royal Arms of England with those of Spain, in which nefarious enterprise he was, happily, frustrated. At Windsor Queen Elizabeth pursued her studies under the tutelage of the learned Roger Ascham. Her proficiency has been attested by her instructor:

I believe that, beside her perfect readiness in Latin, Italian, French, and Spanish, she readeth here now at Windsor more Greek every day than some Prebendaries of the Church doth read Latin in a whole weeke. And that which is most praiseworthy of all, within the walls of her Privie-Chamber she hath obteyned that excellence of learning to understand, speak, and write, both wittily with head and faire with hand, as scarce one or two rare wittes in both the Universities have in many years reached unto.

At the time of the Civil War the townsmen of Windsor threw in their lot with the Parliamentarians. And in 1647 Charles I., after his broken fortunes in the field, returned to Windsor, where he was placed under the strictest surveillance. The next year he re-entered Windsor as an actual prisoner. After the execution of Charles the Castle was tenanted by the Lord Protector, who appears, for some reason not to be surmised, to have treated the fabric with every respect. After a few years of tyranny, oppression, and regnant hypocrisy, unmatched in the history of England, Windsor surrendered itself to the glitter and gaiety of the Restoration. Pepys and Evelyn have both given us characteristic impressions of Windsor life in the reign of Charles II., a sovereign who, whatever may have been his domestic shortcomings, has earned the imperishable gratitude of all lovers of English scenery by his planting of the Long Walk. In 1688, when James II. was King, the Wolsey chapel was wrecked by a mob of Protestant fanatics.

George III. settled at Windsor, and devoted himself there to the life of a country gentleman, farming and breeding cattle and sheep. He was a diligent if somewhat uninstructed patron of the arts, and collected a magnificent library, which has since passed to the British Museum.

One of the most interesting chapters in the volume is that on St. George's Chapel, which, like the more famous Castle, has had a varied and eventful history. Here the body of Charles I. was interred. Wood's “Athenae Oxoniensis” gives us a most interesting account of the burial:

The King's body was then brought from his bedchamber down into St. George's Hall, whence, after a little stay, it was with a slow and solemn pace (much sorrow in harsh faces being then discernible), carried by gentlemen of quality in mourning. The noblemen in mourning also held up the pall, and the Governor, with several gentlemen, officers, and attendants, came after. It was then observed—as at such time as the King's body was brought out from St. George's Hall, the sky was serene and clear; but presently it began to snow, and the snow fell so fast that by the time the corpse came to the west end of the Royal chapel the black velvet pall was all white (the colour of innocence), being thick covered over with snow. The Body being by the bearers set down near the place of burial, the Bishop of London stood ready, with the Service-book in his hands, to have performed his last duty to the King his master, according to the order and form of burial of the dead set forth in the Book of Common Prayer—which the Lords likewise desired; but it would not be suffered by Col. Whichcot, the Governor of the Castle, by reason of the Directory, to which (said he) he and others were to be conformable. Thus went the white King to his grave, in the 48th year of his age, and 22nd year and 10th month of his reign.

This volume may be commended to all those who desire to acquaint themselves with the main facts in the history of England's Royal borough. It is pleasantly illustrated by Mr. George M. Henton:

A HALF-HOGGER

The Shakespeare Problem Restated. By G. G. GREENWOOD, M.P. (Lane, 21s. net.)

WHY do people get so angry when they write about Shakespeare and Bacon? The controversialists are worse than the theologians, and with less excuse, because there are no politics in the question, and because the authorship of the plays and poems cannot affect by one jot or tittle their beauty and their significance. Yet these angry cats sit in the beautiful garden, and yowl and spit at each other till they destroy every human being's pleasure in it with their din. One side is just as bad as the other, and we do not know who began it. Perhaps it is not their fault. There seems to be something in the question which infuriates the gentlest-mannered man that takes it up. Here is Mr. Greenwood. We have no doubt at all that Mr. Greenwood, in the House of Commons and the bosom of his family, is an enlightened, refined, sweet-tempered, and benevolent gentleman. Get him on to Shakespeare and Bacon, and he spits with the best of them. He actually stoops twice in one book to taunt a well-known opponent with his Semitic origin.

Happy are those who, like the present writer, don't care twopence which way they settle it—if they ever do. When the cats have left the garden we go and enjoy its beauties. At the same time, we have our own opinion, though we do not think it worth losing our temper or our manners for. And that opinion is not Mr. Greenwood's. Mr. Greenwood is really a whole-hogger, a hard-shell Baconian; but he is insidiously merciful enough to pose as a half-hogger till near the end of his book. What he means to do, and what he does (barring his rages) very well, is to set out the case against Shakespeare. It is a pretty strong case, of course; it always was. But Mr. Greenwood adds nothing new to it. All he does is to collect everything that every one else has said on his side and pitch it all as strong as he can.

The pity of it is that he pitches it all much too strong. Stratford, we know, was a dirty town and an illiterate town. Is there any authority for saying that it was any dirtier than the other towns from which our Elizabethan poets sprang? And as to the question of its illiteracy, Mr. Greenwood, in pouring scorn on the grammar-school, forgets that Henry VIII. had robbed the guild of its revenues, and that Edward VI. restored some of them. The result would naturally be that, while the older generation was illiterate, the younger, coming at a time when education took a great stride forward in England, were much better taught. Shakespeare left school early (it is for Mr. Greenwood to prove, in defiance of tradition, that he never went to school at all), and was apprenticed to his father; he came to London and held horses at the Theater. That does not prove that he did not make the best use of his time at school, that he did not continue to study as best he could at home, and contrive to go on learning when he came to London. "Fancy William Shakspeare a schoolmaster!" says Mr. Greenwood somewhere. It is as easy to fancy him that as a butcher. He would not need much learning to teach boys the three R's. Why should not that have been more congenial to him than killing calves? And when we get him to London holding horses at the Theater, and taken on in time as a "servitour," Mr. Greenwood's knowledge of theatrical circumstance then and now leads him into a difficulty. He imagines that these arduous duties would take Shakespeare all his time, unaware apparently that plays were not acted every day, and that even actors have contrived to educate themselves under the far more strenuous conditions of the later stock companies on tour. It is all very well to put in sneers about "pale-faced students in Chattertonian garrets;" but that is not argument. He might have been a red-faced student, like old Jonson himself, who certainly did not stop learning when he left school.

It is difficult, of course, to see how the Stratford boy can have learned all that the author of the plays and poems knew. But, although Stratford was a dirty town, is it not really easier to imagine that William Shakspeare (this is Mr. Greenwood's spelling of the player's name; by Shakespeare or Shake-speare he means the author) did contrive to educate himself than it is to imagine that these plays were written by some great courtier who wished his name concealed, and that the secret was kept? And not only kept, but bolstered up by an elaborate series of lies, in which the publishers, the players, the authors, the polite world and everybody joined? Granted that a courtier might probably wish to conceal the fact that he was writing for the public stage, why should he deny the poems? Mr. Greenwood says that there is no evidence to connect William Shakspeare the player with William Shakespeare the poet. But there is no evidence that they were different, and surely some remark upon the coincidence of names would have been made. And for further difficulties we refer the reader to Mr. Greenwood's chapter xv., and invite him to remark the terrible tortures to which the plain meaning of words must be subjected in order to make them fit the theory. No; both sides have their difficulties, but surely the Baconian has the worst.

We will add a selection from the notes we made in reading the book:

P. 207.—"Such was the 'local gossip' about Shakspeare forty-six years after his death—'a natural wit, without any art at all,' a boon companion, and a hard drinker." True; but Ward's remarks also contained the statement that "he supplied the stage with two plays every year." It is not fair to emphasise one part without the other.

P. 212-3.—The same man could not have written "The cloud-capp'd towers" and the verse on the tombstone. This is surely disproved by the plays themselves, in which the same man writes now above the heads of the philosophers and now right down to the groundlings.

P. 214.—Mr. Greenwood objects to Malone's mention of Shakespeare's "liberality." His theory is that Shakspeare was at once a drunkard and a miser. What Malone meant, of course, was breadth of mind, not lavishness in gifts.

P. 215.—It is unsafe to sneer at Downes, and the tradition has nothing impossible about it.

P. 295.—That booksellers put the name of a very popular playwright in the titles of plays they knew he did not write does not make that name a "convenient pseudonym" for another author to adopt.

P. 355.—We recommend Mr. Greenwood—and his authority Judge Stotsenburg—to study the edition of King Lear recently published for the Malone Society.

P. 363.—Are we really to believe—on the authority of Judge Stotsenburg—that even Henslowe would enter as "Perce of Exstone" the play we know as King Richard II.?

P. 365.—Henslowe was not "the leading theatre-manager in London." Far from it. But Mr. Greenwood has been trusting Judge Stotsenburg again.

P. 386.—"Starting with a state of ignorance in 1587" is to beg the question. Lord Penzance should have asked what Shakespeare had done with the ten years since he had (as it appears) left school.

P. 386.—He did not "take a leading part in the management and conduct of two theatres." Which two?

P. 460.—Does Mr. Greenwood really think the hyphen in "Crispinus" is an allusion to the hyphen in Shakespeare? Again, the arms of Crispinus are not in the least like Shakespeare's, and Jonson would never have missed such a chance.

P. 474.—We choose this as an instance of the word-torturing mentioned above. Jonson says, "Thou art a monument without a tomb." Shakespeare, says Mr. Greenwood, had a tomb in Stratford Church.

These, we are well aware, are but minor points. The main point is, as we have said, which, in the absence of evidence, is the more difficult hypothesis? That a young man from the country, with a mind such as the plays prove their author to have had, should have found time and means to educate himself to the point to which modern criticism has proved him to have been educated? Surely several of Samuel Smiles's heroes could match that. Or that a courtier-lawyer-soldier-philosopher-historian should have found time and inclination not only to write plays but to tinker plays, to hang about the common stage and botch up for the managers such old plays as wanted new dressings, should take as a pseudonym the name of a horse-boy turned stage-hand, and should continue to have his secret kept in that hot-bed of gossip and canard, a theatre?

Following Mr. Greenwood, we have abstained from any mention of evidence from the quality and language of the plays themselves or the allusions they contain. What should Bacon know of coursing-matches on the Cotswolds?

THE FALL OF NEW FRANCE

A History of the United States and its People. By ELROY MCKENDREE AVERY. Vol. IV. (Cleveland: Burrows Co.)

THE fourth volume of Mr. Avery's extensive History is concerned with the final struggle between England and France for the dominion of North America, the memories of which are being revived by this summer's celebrations at Quebec. Unlike the last, it deals with a period which is only less well known than the revolutionary epoch which succeeded, and to the student, at least, it will have little novelty or freshness. An illustration of the author's thesis (contested to the last moment by the usually perspicacious Franklin) that "the American Revolution was in the blood" is provided by Governor Clinton's unsuccessful struggle with the New York Assembly against the system of annual supplies—a struggle which terminated before the final phase of the racial contest began. Of this same Governor, Franklin tells how that, when asked for a loan of cannon on behalf of Pennsylvania, he at first "refused peremptorily," but under the influence of Madeira "softened by degrees," so that a promise of six guns increased "after a few more bumpers" to one of ten, "and at length he very good-naturedly, conceded eighteen."

The second chapter contains a good survey of the position of the French and English in North America before the Seven Years' War, and a description of their respective relations with the Indians. In 1754 Franklin pictorially embodied the position of the colonies in the Pennsylvania Gazette by a representation of them as disjointed fragments of a serpent's body, subscribed with the device "Join or die!" (it is reproduced among the illustrations); but his plan of union which was adopted by the Albany Congress of that year was rejected as having "too much prerogative in it" by the provincial assemblies, and in England "was judged to have too much of the democratic." But union had been declared a necessity; and, except in England, the importance of this was taken note of by all parties.

That Canada was lost to France at least as much by the disunion and corruption of its Administration as by the prowess of its assailants appears abundantly from these pages. Vaudreuil, the Governor-General, was a man of no talent, and his malignant jealousy did its utmost to thwart the military genius of Montcalm. Worse than this was the power enjoyed by officials such as Bigot and Cadet, who cheated their King and starved his American province to make their private fortunes. Retribution overtook these men after the Peace, and they had to disgorge large sums; yet Cadet at least had enough left to purchase for himself a barony.

The habitans were not enthusiastic on behalf of their old masters. Had it not been for the priests they might even have joined the invaders. As it was they were on the horns of a painful dilemma. If they submitted to the English their homes were burned by their own Government; if they refused to come in they were subject to the same treatment from the enemy.

The story of the great fight has been inimitably told by Parkman. Montcalm and Wolfe are its undying heroes. The immense difficulties that the great Frenchman had to face, and his longing to have done with it all, are set forth in some detail by the American historian. In an epoch of Suffragitis it is amusing to read how the great soldier met the interference of the Governor-General's lady by having the honour to tell her that "women ought not to talk war," though it is but fair to recall also how Madame Drucour not long before had pointed French cannons for the defence of Louisbourg. Montcalm's fine defence of Ticonderoga (or Carillon) had covered him with glory before the Quebec campaign; and it is somewhat disconcerting to be told that doubts have been cast upon the authenticity of the Carillon flag preserved in the Quebec seminary. However, our American historian is so touched by the Abbé Casgrain's legend about it that he has not the heart to leave it out.

Mr. Avery has studied the Battle of Quebec on the spot, and with regard to Wolfe's celebrated ascent of the Anse au Foulon agrees to the statement that it was "a boldly desperate rather than a physically difficult undertaking." He denies that the British General took undue risks. As to the needless precipitancy with which Montcalm has been charged, he inclines to the view that his tactics were dictated to him by the necessities of the situation. Generally speaking, the assertion that Wolfe was better as a fighter than a strategist seems justifiable, though it is not a popular one to make. Since this volume was completed two additional contributions to the history of this period have been made by Mr. Julian Corbett and Dr. von Ruville. Had the author read "England in the Seven Years' War" he would have seen reason to modify his repetition of the old story that Anson, as First Lord of the Admiralty, had to sign Pitt's orders without reading them, and would have given Admiral Saunders his due share of the kudos of the Quebec expedition; whilst from Chatham's German biographer he might have learned that Newcastle's abilities as a statesman have been unduly belittled. Had he glanced at a map he would also have discovered that Cork is not "on the west coast of Ireland." On another topographical point there seems to be some confusion. On p. 202 we are told that "the way that led from Montreal to Quebec had been cut at Lake Ontario." Presumably for Quebec should be substituted "Fort Duquesne," the reference being to the capture of Fort Frontenac.

The penultimate chapter on the Cherokee War, in which the Southern Colonies were engaged whilst the main conflict of France and England was being waged, is of no very great interest. We can well believe that, as Mr. Avery naïvely remarks,

The Cherokee warriors were not very sentimental when the tomahawk was red.

Neither were the provincials. Apart from this chapter the volume is much less diffusive than its predecessor. It concludes with a summary of the highly romantic Pontiac War, in which the author wisely is content to follow Parkman:

As a matter of justice to the reader of this chapter, I point the way to Parkman's volumes.

As a whole, the history is of more value for its illustrations than its text. The peculiar effluvia emanating from the paper is far from agreeable. There are several admirable maps and contemporary plans, and the coloured pictures include reproductions of Duplessis's portrait of Franklin (1782)—the only known copy—a portrait of Montcalm (from a private photograph), and several representations of British and French soldiers in the uniforms of the period. Among facsimiles of documents are the title-page of "Poor Richard's Almanack" (from the only known copy) and the first page of the London Gazette Extraordinary announcing the surrender of Quebec. Wolfe's private correspondence has been largely drawn upon. It is not all of it strictly relevant; but his description of the kind of soldier he wished not to be is too piquant to escape quotation:

Better be a savage of some use than a gentle, amorous puppy, obnoxious to all the world. One of the wildest of wild clans is a worthier being than a perfect Philanderer.

On what occasion he gave utterance to the sentiment that he would rather have written certain lines of Gray than be the captor of Quebec is immaterial so long as he did say it.

THE SUFFRAGIST AND THE SOCIALIST

IT is impossible to read Mr. Asquith's remarks at the National Liberal Club last week without a feeling of amusement. Referring to the subject of the Education Bill, Mr. Asquith said that :

If the Government did not push on the Bill to its further stages it was because they not only hoped but believed that there were at work pacifying and reconciling forces which . . . might work out a solid and lasting settlement.

We presume that "the pacifying and reconciling forces" to which Mr. Asquith refers must be the surrender and complete "climb down" of the Government which has taken place in consequence of the thorough kicking which they have received over both their monstrous Education Bills. Certainly the Church has not budged an inch from her position, and is not going to. Mr. Asquith went on to his precious Licensing Bill, with which he still professes to be delighted. He regards it, we gather, as "an asset." Well, 4d. in the pound is an asset of sorts. If Mr. Asquith is satisfied with the effects produced in the country by his foolish Bill, those who are opposed to his policy will not grudge him the innocent pleasure of that satisfaction. In just the same way Socialists are always gloating over the "enormous progress that Socialism is making in the country," in spite of the fact that they could muster only 276 votes out of 10,681 at Manchester the other day, and in spite of the fact that their cause is so discredited that even their own newspapers write in this strain :

There is evidently a great slump in the election enthusiasm of the moment. Less than half of the cost of the Dewsbury and Montrose bye-election outlay has been raised. Unless, therefore, the branches make up and recuperate the fund the fighting power of the party will be seriously crippled.

We learn from our contemporary the Pall Mall Gazette, which has lately been doing good work in exposing the fallacies and follies of Socialism, that the Social Democratic party has for months been appealing for 20,000 shillings for its campaign fund, and that only just over a quarter of the amount has been raised. This would not be our idea of "making enormous progress in the country;" but different people look at things from different points of view, and we have never met a Socialist yet who has not assured us that the advent of Socialism was "only a matter of time." The same phenomenon is found in the case of the Suffragettes. Wherever they go they arouse scorn and contempt and hostility, no less among women than among men. The police have had on many occasions a hard task to protect them from the anger of the crowd. During the recent bye-election in Shropshire a party of them who attempted to interrupt a meeting were, without ceremony, then and there subjected to the old-fashioned form of nursery discipline, which is, in our opinion, exactly what is most suitable for them. And yet, according to their own account, their cause is in a most flourishing condition, and their peregrinations through the country have been one long triumphal progress. There is, of course, a certain similarity between the sound which is produced by clapping the hands for applause and the sound which accompanies what is generally described as "a good spanking." But it is unusual for the victim of the spanking to be deceived into thinking that he or she is being made the object of a favourable demonstration. When lovely woman stoops to the folly of becoming a Suffragette there is apparently no limit to her powers of self-deception.

We of course recognise the difference between the Suffragettes who represent the rowdy, bell-ringing, meeting-breaking-up element and the other female Suffragists who desire to attain their ends by constitutional means. We have no sympathy with the object of these latter, but we can at least congratulate them on the fact that they have somewhat tardily and half-heartedly disassociated themselves from their less reputable sisters. It must here be observed parenthetically that at the meeting at the Albert Hall which took place after the procession Lady Henry Somerset, one of the leaders of the Suffragist movement, publicly admitted that she approved of the methods of the Suffragettes and sympathised with them. So that it is abundantly clear that, whatever may be said in other individual cases, Lady Henry Somerset is, on her own confession, absolutely unfitted to have a vote. No person who approves of and sympathises with riotous breaches of the peace and vulgar rowdiness is fitted to have a vote. We are not surprised at Lady Henry's sentiments; they are precisely what we would expect from her, and we are grateful to her for thus frankly demonstrating to the whole world that a woman may be what is called a great lady, possessed of much wealth and property, and devoting most of her life to "good works," and yet by reason of her feminine mind be utterly unfitted to be trusted with the power to assist in making the laws of the country. It would be impossible to find a better object-lesson than that which is provided by Lady Henry Somerset, for precisely the reason that she has almost everything which should qualify a person for the vote. She is a lady of superior education and intelligence; she has spent most of her life in endeavouring, according to her rather limited lights, to benefit other people less fortunate than herself; she possesses, moreover, a stake in the country in the shape of large property. Why, then, should she not have a vote while her coachman and her gardener have votes? The answer is simply: because she is a woman. It is a good and sufficient reason, and it will be observed that Lady Henry Somerset cannot open her mouth at a public meeting without abundantly justifying that ancient and wise provision of the law which debar women from the franchise.

However, the bulk of the Suffragists do not approve of and sympathise with the methods of the Suffragettes; at any rate they are sufficiently well advised not to say so publicly—and on this we may heartily congratulate them. Still, some of their methods are not very creditable. For instance, on the morning of June 13th there appeared in the Standard a letter signed "Caroline E. W. H. Gordon," in which Mrs. (or Miss) Gordon protested against the inscription on one of the banners of the Suffragist demonstration of the names of her great-aunt, Miss Caroline Herschel, and Mrs. Somerville, with whom she was personally acquainted :

To think of the names of two such noble women being paraded through London in such a cause is very bitter to all who love and revere their memories.

So writes Mrs. Gordon. We cordially agree with her that it is an outrageous thing that a body of no doubt well-meaning people, who are regarded by most sane men and women as more or less mischievous cranks, should have the effrontery to write on their ridiculous banners the names of dead women who would have heartily disapproved of and condemned their propaganda. It is doubly outrageous when this is done in spite of and in direct defiance of the wishes of the surviving relatives and friends of such women; and what rhyme or reason have they for parading the names of Angelica Kauffmann, Mrs. Siddons, Jenny Lind, and other distinguished women? We think it exceedingly improbable that these gifted ladies would have cared to make themselves look ridiculous by walking about the streets with banners, to an accompaniment of jests and laughter from a mildly-amused crowd. The female Suffragists who organised the "great demonstration" last Saturday are, we gladly admit, free from the blatant vulgarity and rowdiness of the more militant Suffragettes, but they are sadly lacking in sense of humour and sense of decorum. No doubt we shall be assured by their supporters and victims that last Saturday's "great demonstration" is a conclusive proof that the cause of Women's Suffrage is making "enormous progress in the country." As a matter of fact it proves nothing at all. It is a perfectly simple thing for any band of cranks in this country to get up an agitation about any mortal thing, and if they are prepared to make sufficient noise and to spend a certain amount of money they are certain to attract a great deal of notice. Any one who wished to start a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Shrimps, and to make the prevention of cruelty to shrimps a burning question of the day, would have an easy task. If he did not grudge the expense he could easily organise a demonstration and obtain the services of several hundred charming young ladies, dressed in appropriate costumes, to carry banners with inscriptions setting forth the brutality and heartlessness of mankind towards shrimps. There is no doubt that any such demonstration would be widely noticed in the papers, and that large crowds of curious people would flock to witness it. But it would prove absolutely nothing. There is no sign whatever that any serious change has taken place in the opinion of the people of this country, male and female, as to the advisability of giving votes to women. The country is dead against it, as it always has been, and, we trust, always will be. At present, unfortunately, the leading organs of public opinion seem to be unable to pluck up the courage to say what nearly every one thinks. They are waiting apparently to see which way the cat is going to jump, and in the meanwhile they are afraid to commit themselves. A notable exception to this silly and feeble-minded state of opinion is supplied by the Standard, which is perhaps the most ably edited of our London daily papers. The Standard has recently made up its mind against Woman's Suffrage, and is not afraid to say so. THE ACADEMY, of course, made up its mind on the point a long while ago, and it has no intention of changing it. We are convinced that in making our protest against the Women's Suffrage movement we are supported by all that is best and sanest of the opinion of the women of this country. Englishwomen are the finest women in the world—the most beautiful, the sweetest, the most virtuous, the kindest, and withal the most level-headed—and they don't want to vote or to descend from their pedestals into the sordid arena of politics. All the talk about the progress of the movement for Women's Suffrage is pure bluff; it is like the bluff of the Socialists, who can't raise a few hundred pounds for their election expenses, and it is like the bluff of Mr. Asquith, whose Licensing Bill has made it almost impossible for a Liberal to hold even a "safe seat" anywhere except in Scotland, which is not affected by the Bill. Bluff is, unfortunately, a very important factor in American politics; but in England we have, broadly speaking, never been bullied or imposed on by it.

There is one significant feature of Saturday's demonstration which must be insisted on again and again. It is the open alliance which exists between these misguided women and the Socialists. The demonstration was quite as much a Socialist demonstration as a Suffragist demonstration. The route of the procession was lined with Socialists, a bodyguard of Socialists followed the demonstrators, and any attempt on the part of the casual looker-on to criticise or express disapproval was drowned by Socialist cheers. The proceedings ended, cynically enough, with the singing of "God save the King;" but during the whole course of the march the Socialists sang "The Scarlet Banner" and the "Marseillaise," and gave repeated cheers for "the Social Revolution." Many of the most prominent women who took part in the procession are rank Socialists at heart, though most of them find it more convenient to call themselves "Liberals." The whole movement for giving votes to women is rooted in Socialism, in Atheism, in Revolution, and in brazen defiance of the laws of Nature and the laws of God. Most of the rank and file of the women who have been seduced into taking part in it are innocent enough; they have not the least idea of the deadly significance of their action. They are dupes and victims. A great many of them doubtless simply joined the procession "for the fun of the thing," and from a harmless and natural feminine desire to attract the attention of men. But behind and within the movement are revolution, anarchy, and disloyalty. It is our firm belief—and it will take a great many carefully-organised "great demonstrations" to alter that belief—that the character of the English people has not changed. Let the Socialists and the Suffragists, male and female, rage never so loudly, the people of England will have none of them.

"SAD HAPPY RACE"

I MUST say at once that in treating of the actor and of certain matters pertaining thereto I have no intention of falling into the pit that Mr. Upton Sinclair dugged for himself. This ingenuous American, it will be remembered, desiring to call attention to the wretched and horrible condition of the people who work in Packingtown, Chicago, Ill., U.S.A., wrote a book called "The Jungle." Per accidens, and in addition to his denunciation of the shocking conditions under which labour putrified and died in the service of the Tinned Meat Magnates, he described the nauseous and disgusting manner in which nauseous and disgusting food was prepared for the market; and the result was exactly that which might have been expected. We, his readers, were prepared to hear all about the misfortunes and miseries of the poor Slav, and the unhappy Swede, and the down-trodden labourer, generally with perfect equanimity. In our own happy land there are workpeople who are perhaps not quite so comfortable as they would like to be, who are forced to live in poisonous slum-settlements and to pursue trades which mean degradation and early death; and so we were ready to suppose that something of the same kind might happen in America. Still, one can always fall back on Providence and Smiles and the Blessings of Civilisation; and if the worst come to the worst it is usually safe to say that the author must be guilty of gross exaggeration. It is quite strange how we all hate to be told the plain hard truth about anything. I remember the late Dr. Traill, an amiable man, and in many ways an excellent critic, being intensely irritated by a book called "Tales of Mean Streets." This book merely said quite gently, using grey when scarlet would have been permissible, that the great majority of the London poor live under horrible and barbarous and soul-destroying conditions. I think Dr. Traill must have known in his heart that this was true; but he hated to be told this truth.

But Mr. Sinclair made, as I say, the great blunder. Any little notice that his book might have brought to the poor folk of Packingtown was nullified once and for all by the larger matter of our own stomachs. Any horror that we might have had to bestow on the fate of the characters was swallowed up in the more important question, "Have we eaten tinned rat—and other things—for luncheon?" And there was an end of Mr. Sinclair's fair design.

I am not going to share his fate if I can help it. I am perfectly well aware that my readers do not care two straws whether actors are humbugged, swindled, "done down," bullied by vague threats into silence and submission; and to the general public it is of course a matter of complete indifference whether certain theatres offer the player the handsome choice between death by typhoid, pneumonia, or electrocution. Between four and five years ago, at the Borough Theatre, Stratford, I had the pleasure of seeing an actor surrounded by blue flames, and our electrician assured him that he had had a narrow escape. These trifles are nothing in themselves to the public; and if I dwell upon them, and on others like them, it is because I wish to point a moral. The moral is that the miseries of the artist are likely to be reflected directly or indirectly in his art: and I hope the deduction is clear. If acting is, in the main, an uncomfortable, precarious, underpaid, ill-treated, sweated business, then the best people will be kept out of it, and consequently the performances will suffer, and therefore the public will miss several laughs and agonies that more competent players could have given them. Moreover—and this touches Londoners nearly—if from one reason or another the provincial theatres do not afford a good school, then London acting will deteriorate, and cultured, wealthy, and intelligent audiences will be brought within measurable distance of boredom. I am sure everybody will agree with me that this would be a dreadful catastrophe; and I want to make people see that it must be averted at any cost—even if actors have to be conceded some of the privileges and immunities of bricklayers and chimney-sweeps. If you engage a sweep to exercise his art on three chimneys for eighteen-pence, and then put it to him that he might be a good chap and do the kitchen chimney as well "to oblige" (and for nothing), the man would jeer and depart. You do not say that you will send round a circular to every householder in the parish pointing out that he is "a troublesome sweep to have in the house;" and if you did, he would still jeer. In analogous circumstances the actor would tremble and obey.

I see that my subject is being developed by the way of digression; but I do not know that this is of much consequence. However, an effort to keep on the straight line of thought shall be made; and, to begin at the very beginning, one wonders whether acting is an art at all—even in its highest manifestation—in the work, for example, of Kean the First. For my part I cannot think that even the impersonations of such a man as Kean could have deserved the title of art in its true sense—unless he who reads the poem beautifully is as great an artist as the poet who wrote it. This surely were an intolerable conclusion; the maker must stand on a more exalted plane than the interpreter; and Bach must be for ever higher, even immeasurably higher, than the most skilled player of his fugues. And so the play and the playwright—if one be real art and the other a true artist—must always be far above the players. Indeed there is a sense (Lamb has pointed this out in speaking of King Lear) in which the great play meditated on is a far finer thing than the play seen, as natura naturans is greater than natura naturata. The play acted has gained in distinctness, but it has parted with a whole heaven of suggestion and of mystery.

It seems, then, that acting, even of the best, is not in the highest of all senses an art—for the reasons given, and for other reasons too, I think. Many people, in denying the title of art to the player's business, have alleged its fleeting, impermanent, fluid nature; the curtain falls, and only memories remain. I was urging this argument once to an actor, and he gravelled me by asking what title I should give to a painter whose work was splendid but faded out of sight in a few seconds. I should have answered that an analogy to a thing non-existent and inconceivable did not apply, and, further, that, even admitting the possibility of such a transient art of painting, the analogy was bad. The actor never shows us a complete picture; he does a series of lightning sketches, each disappearing to give place to another; there is no total and simultaneous impression. The circle is barely suggested by a succession of segments; it is never totus and teres.

Acting, then, may be considered as an artistic craft, and it so far partakes of the artistic matter that in its high grades the faculty for it must be innate; no lessons, no experience, will make a great actor out of a man who lacks the inborn gift. Conversely the great actors will rise from the darkest and foulest pits of evil circumstance; they will surge up out of tenth-rate melodrama companies and out of a Dramatic Academy. Of these we do not presume to treat in this place; our business is rather with the clever and competent craftsman, the man who is always to be relied on for "a good show," for an intelligent and lively demonstration of the character that he represents. This is the sort of actor whom circumstances can produce or exterminate. At present circumstances seem to be exterminating him; and I have pointed out that his absence will affect the theatre-going public. Not very long ago there was a Shakespearian production at a well-known theatre, and more than one critic remarked that, with very few exceptions, the whole company seemed ill at ease in Shakespeare, and more especially in the speaking of blank verse. In an orchestra I am told that it is most desirable for all the instruments, without exception, to be played in time and in tune. However good the leader may be, the whole effect is said to be deplorable if the other violins are uncertain, the flutes flat, the trombones sharp, and the bassoon-players just beginning to learn their business. Perhaps something remotely analogous to this state of things may sometimes be found on the boards of very creditable theatres.

And here, by the way, is one of the great causes of the ordinary competent actor's decline. If it is believed that people go to see one man or one woman, or perhaps a man and a woman together, and that it doesn't matter how the other parts are played, then evidently it will not be worth while paying good wages to good actors, and by consequence good actors will starve and die out. The logical end of this system would be for one or two players to give the whole play between them to the accompaniment of splendid revolving scenery. At intervals richly-clad supers at 2s. a night would rush on and do something brisk and exciting while the stars rested their voices. If the public wish for such a state of things there is nothing more to be said; but if they want to see a play played as a whole, then competent players must be engaged down to the smallest parts. The small-part actor is a negative but necessary person; he cannot, save in rare circumstances, do any good either to the play or to himself, and in nine cases out of ten the audience is not consciously aware of his existence. Yet he is a part of the picture, and though he may do no good by his competence, he can do an infinite deal of harm by his incompetence; he can be the one false note in the harmony, ruining the whole effect. Well, if this average actor-man that we are discussing is to be kept in existence, his life must be made tolerable and (under our present commercial dispensation) he must be paid decent wages.

I am afraid that no efforts, but merely time and circumstance, can do anything to mend one of the greatest evils in the matter of the stage. So long as hundreds of provincial towns prefer absurd blood-and-thunder "dramas" to decent plays, ancient and modern, so long will thousands of actors be trained in a very bad school, in a rubbishy method of enacting rubbish. There is no help, I say, for this. So long as melodrama pays, so long will it be produced; so long will the players be taught to practise a series of absurd conventions found to be effectual in "getting rounds." Only at rare intervals can a competent recruit be gained from such a field as this; only a strong man can go through a course of undiluted blood and remain unaffected by it. But other woes are not beyond remedy—if only the players will look to it. Take, for example, the ordinary touring contract. You have an interview with the manager, and he tells you that the tour will be one of twelve weeks. On this consideration, amongst others, you name the salary you require, and later a list of the towns to be visited is given you with your contract. There is, then, a convention on both sides that you are to be in receipt of so much a week for three months, and you pretend to believe that this is so. But you know very well that it is not so. Your contract will be found to be terminable at a fortnight's notice on either side; you are not engaged for three months at all, but for a fortnight, with a fortnightly option of renewal and a fortnightly liability to dismissal. Fair to both parties? It is nothing of the kind. I know of two cases in which actors, for one reason or another, gave the notice in question. In the first case the actor was told to go, and never to dream of applying to that management for another engagement; in the second the manager told the player (a beginner) that if he persisted he would be posted in managerial circles and his career ruined. But what happens when the case is reversed—when the manager gives notice to the actor? Well, the latter goes home and starves, or gets another engagement, as the case may be. In fairness he ought to be able to say to his manager: "If you persist I shall denounce you to the Actors' Union, and no decent actor will work for you." The manager would be vastly amused. There is an Actors' Union—with a membership of eight hundred or thereabouts. Actors tell me that they are artists, and as such they do not care to be classed with low, common working-men; so they stay outside their Union. When the low fellows in question work overtime they get extra pay, and, I think, on an advanced scale; the proud artist does his overtime—or matinée—usually for nothing, rarely for half-pay. It is not at all uncommon for a whole company, who have been engaged for a nominal three months, who have rehearsed, gratis, for a fortnight, to see "the notice" go up at the end of six weeks, which means that the management has robbed them of a month's pay. It is not at all uncommon for the stroller to be confronted with an announcement that "the date of November 1st-7th has not yet been filled in"—which signifies the docking of a week's wages, in spite of the fact that the tour-list contained the line: "November 1st T. R., Mudflat." This practice, I believe, is illegal, and the salary in question would be recoverable at law; but of what use is the law to the actor? He may win his case and secure his pound or two, and be regarded ever after as "a troublesome man to have in a theatre." It is not to be wondered at that he grumbles in his dressing-room and does nothing. Still, of course he has the comfort of knowing that he is an Artist, not a working-man; so he stays outside the Union. And all this, as I have said, does not tend to attract the average capable man into the profession; and by remote consequence when Shakespeare is produced at a big London theatre the performance is a duologue—sometimes even a monologue.

And there is another cause that leads to this melancholy end: that is, the practice of putting raw beginners and moneyed boobies into small parts, and sometimes, one is afraid, into quite considerable parts. Naturally the result is ruinous; the booby spoils his part and does his best to spoil the whole play, and all the while he is keeping a man of experience out of a living. In Utopia managers will agree together that this practice shall cease; in London it will continue and performances will get more ragged and incompetent, and the good craftsman will become scarcer, till the general public signifies in some way or another that it is displeased with the result. There are many reasons why the music-halls flourish at the theatres' expense, and perhaps one of them is that the music-hall "artists," with few exceptions, know their business. An evening at a good "hall" does not mean "Mr. Blank and Miss Dash, supported by a large company of Idiots and Incompetents." I have heard of a manager who was very proud of a Wall which was made of Real Bricks; it would be better to boast of a company composed of Real Actors.

Players, in spite of their miseries and misfortunes, are in the main good-tempered folk; they grumble and bear it if they cannot always grin and bear it. So it is only fitting that the recital of a few of their woes should end on a more cheerful note. I have been waiting for the last few weeks for a certain article in the daily or weekly Press—and that article is the fit eulogy of Mr. F. R. Benson's company from the pen of some competent Bensonian veteran. The article has not appeared—or, at any rate, I have not seen it—and so I make bold here to consecrate a little space to the man who has done more for the craft of acting than all other managers put together. The other managers—one does not blame them—are not in the business "for their health"; they are more or less obedient to the maxim endorsed by that great literary authority Mr. Arnold Bennett—Money Talks; and many of them have well deserved the success that they have attained in the commercial order. But for the last twenty-five years Mr. Benson has both preached and practised the better gospel of the craft for the craft's sake; at one time and another he has produced almost all the plays of Shakespeare, and with but slender means he has surpassed the West-end managers in accuracy and historical knowledge, if not in material splendours and in "real velvet" at twenty-five shillings a yard. I once heard a dialogue between the antiquarian adviser of a fashionable theatre and an old Bensonian, the latter being not only an actor, but a sound authority on heraldry and costume. The antiquary was scoffing at the idea of Mr. Benson producing a certain piece which this person had decorated and costumed in town. "How can Benson dress such a play?"

said the antiquary. "He will dress it in the costume of the period," answered the old Bensonian—"not in dresses fifty years after date, like yours."

But Mr. Benson has excelled in more important paths than these. He has just celebrated the twenty-fifth birthday of his company, and he may reflect with pleasure on the fact that during all this time he has kept the best possible school of acting that England has possessed, or is likely to possess. I have heard that somewhere in London there is an "Academy" of Acting—a place with professors and lectures and such apparatus, a place where well-to-do beginners can be coached in a special part, taught to "parrot" Hamlet (let us say) for thirty shillings a week; a procedure which saves the touring manager money, and is of course greatly to the benefit to the whole profession. Mr. Benson has not such high pretensions; he does not profess to turn out dramatic geniuses to order, and when I had the honour of entering his company he had neither lectures nor professors. But the man who started his career with Mr. Benson in the old days learned the craft in the only possible way: he began at the bottom, he "walked on" for about a year, he was entrusted with a line or two, he was given a small part, he was given a larger part, as his ability and readiness deserved. A clever young fellow at special seasons, such as the Stratford Celebration, might be called on to play (say) twelve minor and varying parts in the course of a week; it is scarcely necessary to compare such a school as this with the work of "Academies," with the three or four parts in the year that the young actor has the chance of playing in the ordinary run of the profession. And not only is such a diverse experience of the utmost—of incalculable—value in the formation of a sound, well-trained actor; but the method employed was (and I have no doubt is) whole heavens above the ordinary stage-management to which the beginner is usually subjected. Under the system to which I have alluded—the system of "Mr. Blank and Miss Dash, supported by a large company of Idiots and Incompetents"—it is a question of drilling inexperienced people into automata; their speech is measured, their gestures are measured, their stations on the stage are chalked out for them. Indeed, this is the only way, when Thirty Shillings is doing the work of Five Pounds. But Mr. Benson, who has the passion of Shakespeare, expects his company to cherish something of the same ardour in their breasts, to think for themselves, to watch the work of their elders, to bring something of the freedom of Nature and of life on to the boards, to be men and women, not things that have been wound up by the puppet showman, that can always be depended to be on a certain square at a certain moment, and to waggle the little finger of the left hand according to careful instructions at a given cue. There is no company where the necessary technique is so thoroughly taught; but it is a technique of general principles and of general application, and no matter of a certain gesture or a certain tone prescribed without reason given for a certain line, and repeated mechanically without feeling and without intelligence. Before I knew anything about the stage I met an actor who spoke with authority; he had played (I think) one part for five years in Charley's Aunt. "The Bensonians," he said, "are capital fellows and good athletes, but they can't act." I believe that it is only necessary to think of certain names now honoured on our London boards to decide that this gentleman was an Ass.

For my part I wish to take leave of Mr. F. R. Benson and of his company in the words of The Ingenious Gentleman, Don Quixote of La Mancha:

"God speed you, good people; keep your festival, and remember, if you demand of me ought wherein I can render you a service, I will do it gladly and willingly, for from a child I was fond of the play, and in my youth a keen lover of the actor's art."

REPRINT FROM "THE NATION"

POSSIBLY the simplest criticism of Mr. John Galsworthy's new book, "A Commentary" (Grant Richards), is contained in the title of the present article. Mr. Galsworthy has for some time past been supplying The Nation, which is a six-penny weekly Liberal review, with brief fictional sketches of a character presumed to be acceptable to the Liberal mind. When one looks closely into these sketches as reprinted in the volume before us one is appalled. For Mr. Galsworthy's book makes it quite plain that the Liberal mind is a sour, dour, superior affair, full of kinks and ill-disposed to mankind at large. We find Mr. Galsworthy writing here in the harshest, most strident, and most exaggerated manner about matters which he himself admits that he does not understand. We find him posing as a helper of the poor and as a sympathiser with the pains of life. Yet all the time one feels that his sentiments are of a bitter and almost brutal kind, and that if the saviours of the poor are to come out of the ranks of the John Galsworthys of this world, heaven must help the poor. Mr. Galsworthy writes himself down as being utterly devoid of charity. Such lack, of course, is common among rabid Liberals, and Mr. Galsworthy has had to write to please them; for we will never believe that any man who trails a pen can mean in his heart what Mr. Galsworthy professes to mean. If it were the poor alone whom Mr. Galsworthy hated one might forgive him a great deal, because though unbecoming in a polite writer hatred of the poor is a quite common human Liberal feeling. But Mr. Galsworthy hates the middle classes and he hates the upper classes. That is to say, he hates, or professes to hate, mankind in the English lump. If you are happy in whatever walk of life you happen to have been placed Mr. Galsworthy has a profound contempt for you. If you are unfortunate or unhappy Mr. Galsworthy is equally contemptuous. The men and women on the British part of this footstool are entirely loathsome objects in the proud Liberal eye of Mr. Galsworthy. The poor man of Mr. Galsworthy is a loose-lipped, weak-chinned, knock-kneed, hopeless, battered, inept wastrel, or a beery, leery, hog-voiced wife-beater. Mr. Galsworthy's poor women have either to be sheltered from their husbands through the kind intervention of Mr. Galsworthy, or they are wicked trulls who ruin their husbands' lives. Mr. Galsworthy's middle-class man and woman happen to love one another and to love their children. For most people this would be sufficient; but it is not good enough for Mr. Galsworthy. He fleers and jeers at the ordinary decent life that a man and his wife may lead in London, without so much as making the smallest suggestion as to how they are to better it, or as to what kind of life he would have them lead. Probably because the man does not concern himself in the pragmatism of the homes of wife-beaters, and because the woman does not array herself in gaudy scarves and whoop round the town on Suffragist wagonettes, they are persons to be condemned from the high, Galsworthian Liberal point of view. Anyway Mr. Galsworthy cannot say an assuring word for them, and he is angry at their happiness. Then for the woman of fashion he has a savage dislike, which might appear to have been instilled into him at a Socialist Sunday-school. Here is Mr. Galsworthy's way with the woman of fashion:

Resented while you gathered being; brought into the world with the most distinguished skill; remembered by your mother when the whim came to her; taught to believe that life consists in caring for your clean, well-nourished body, and your manner that nothing usual can disturb; taught to regard society as the little ring of men and women that you see, and to feel your only business is to know the next thing that you want and get it given you—You have never had a chance!

You take commands from no other creature; your heart gives you your commands, forms your desires, your wishes, your opinions, and passes them between your lips. From your heart well up the springs that feed the river of your conduct; but your heart is a stagnant pool that has never seen the sun. Each year when April comes, and the earth smells new, you have an odd aching underneath your corsets. What is it for? You have a husband, or a lover, or both, or neither, whichever suits you best; you have children, or could have them if you wished for them; you are fed at stated intervals with food and wine; you have all you want of country life and country sports; you have the theatre and the opera, books, music, and religion! From the top of the plume, torn from a dying bird, or the flowers, made at an insufficient wage, that decorate your head to the sole of the shoe that cramps your foot you are decked out with solemn care; a year of labour has been sewn into your garments, and forged into your rings—you are a breathing triumph!

You live in the centre of the centre of the world; if you wish you can have access to everything that has been thought since the world of thought began; if you wish you can see everything that has ever been produced, for you can travel where you like; you are within reach of Nature's grandest forms, and the most perfect works of art. You can hear the last word that is said of everything, if you wish. When you do wish, the latest tastes are servants of your palate, the latest scents attend your nose—You have never had a chance.

This is the merest, shallowest, and most hackneyed kind of nonsense, written brainlessly and without understanding, and full of the falsehood of extremity. Yet it is characteristic of Mr. Galsworthy that he commits himself in this way on almost every page of his book. In point of fact, he has no outlook upon life that may be said to be his own. He sees his costermonger and his peeress through the spectacles of the countless malcontents who have screamed before him in obscure journals with a purpose. It is the cant of these journals that the lower orders are utterly debased and the upper classes utterly worthless and depraved.

If we are to believe such prints, the only righteous people on the earth wear red ties and floppy costumes, and get together a precarious livelihood by contributing to The Nation and the Daily News. All other English people whatsoever are outside the pale. Their loves are wrong, their hatreds are wrong, their ambitions are wrong, their comfort is wrong, their religion is wrong, and they really have no business to be alive. Mr. Galsworthy is constitutionally incapable of comprehending goodness and happiness. He is incapable, too, of perceiving that the ultimate management of mankind is really not his affair. He puts before you a miserable, anæmic, downtrodden woman, whose husband beats her religiously every Saturday. These beatings the good woman takes complacently and without protest. If Mr. Galsworthy knew anything about wife-beating he would make his woman fight. We doubt whether wife-beating in the sense that Mr. Galsworthy would have us think of it ever existed at all. Any policeman or any magistrate could tell him that the women who get beaten are not without talons and china-throwing ability of their own, and that still less are they without tongues and evil tempers. But if Mr. Galsworthy had ventured on the six-of-one-and-half-a-dozen-of-the-other view he would not be properly harrowing up the feelings of Liberal readers. The law has suitable stripes for the wife-beater. It is a libel on the unblessed man, howsoever degraded, to suggest that he has no bowels, and it is most certainly a libel on the unblessed woman to suggest that she has no pluck and never retaliates. The man of the lower orders smacks his wife on the same principle that he smacks other men: that is to say, because he is mentally impatient and, consequently, in no position to argue things out. It is wicked of him to hit, but when he hits hard enough he usually gets punished for it, and, what is worse, he pays his fine or suffers his imprisonment in the more or less certain knowledge that if the persons who administer the law and reprove him so unctuously for his misdeed were to be married for a day to his particular wife they might find themselves hitting hard also. Our point here is not to defend or approve of the domestic jar. But we say that if a man claims to give us life it is his bounden duty to look at and state the whole of it, and not only those portions of it which happen to suit the political propaganda of the moment. Nobody doubts that the existence of certain families in the darker portions of the country is unhappy and brutal to a degree. But to write about it bitterly and to write about it unfairly is a mistake; just as it is a mistake to write bitterly and unfairly about existence in more enlightened and more fortunate quarters. Mr. Galsworthy apparently lives for the purpose of inducing creeps in the Liberal flesh. If I can make you shudder, he argues, I can make you support the Woman's Franchise Bill and kindred agitations for the reform—oh, that blessed word reform—of the marriage laws and the divorce laws, and in fact all the laws on the statute-book. Reform is his obsession. He neither knows nor cares what will happen when his bunch of reforms take place; his delight being in the pursuit, and not in the result. To offer such speciousness to intelligent people with a view of bringing them over to your way of thinking is at once stupid and indiscreet. It merely clouds the issue, and the clouded issue is not what we want at all. We can imagine no class of human being who can read Mr. Galsworthy's commentaries with respect or satisfaction. They must irritate even the oblique and heartless Liberal. They amount in the main to so much gross and heretical pessimism, and from whatever point of view considered, they are not proper to be read. Furthermore they have not even the excuse of cleverness.

"GREY SOCKS"

WITH the charming frankness which characterises so many contemporary publicists, Mr. Hilaire Belloc informs us that his "Essays on Nothing" were written for gain. That a Member of Parliament, with all his unrivalled opportunities of turning an honest penny, should be reduced to journalism for a livelihood ought to be a signal for the long-promised Radical legislation on the payment of Members, if only to obviate such distressing necessity in the future—of Mr. Hilaire Belloc. Mr. Belloc is a vulgar coincidence: we use the adjective merely to indicate recurrence in the sense that we speak of the vulgar tongue. His existence is not the dazzling portent which he or his friends imagine; the phenomenon "is commoner than you suppose," as Mr. Michael Finsbury observed; there have been Bellocs in every age.

This is a dull little book. It leaves on you that feeling of depression following a dinner-party where a loud-voiced talker has monopolised the conversation with pointless stories from the "Memoirs of Captain Sumph," or spoilt it with inapposite interruptions and arid retort.

In Normandy, we gather from the portentous and explanatory dedication, a "jolly company," of which no doubt Mr. Chesterton pars magna fui, determined, not that they, but that Mr. Belloc, should write about Nothing. Whether it was because they thought it was Mr. Belloc's turn, or whether they thought Mr. Belloc had written enough about Mr. Chesterton, or whether Mr. Belloc, short of cash, negotiated a sort of promissory note, we are not told. The obstetrics of the volume are only partially revealed. "What song the Syrens sang, or what name Achilles assumed when he hid himself among women, though puzzling questions, are not beyond all conjecture." Real wit should flash and disappear like the kingfisher, a sudden patch of blue against the green of river bank, and even an ornithologist or the Thames Conservancy should not be able to find its nest; while humour must dance like the dragon-fly—spontaneous, unexpected, and irresponsible, with no obvious purpose. But Mr. Belloc's wit and humour are unsuccessful flying-machines constructed on the "heavier-than-air principle," very clever, very ingenious, and destined to circumnavigate St. Paul's with éclat on a fine day, and doomed to collapse on a wet one. Some one else may do the same thing or something better; the principle is too scientific; you can hear the impatient beat of the "peccant" engine and the smothered oaths of the aeronaut.

It was Thackeray who introduced the fashion among essayists of writing entirely about themselves, since there were no other subjects "made to their hands." It is a brilliant invention, or convention, when confined to the brain of competent people or backed up by an exquisite style and the possession of a whimsical and engaging personality. But all schools, it has been wisely said, come to an end with the birth of the founder, and Mr. Belloc and Mr. Chesterton, though both very clever men, were deceived by the armour of their more eminent predecessor. Its strength was its lightness. Instead of assuming the gold paper shield, the spear of quill, and the wings of peacock feathers, they seem to have consulted Mr. Guy Laking or Mr. Seymour Lucas on their outfit. Theirs is all papier-mâché, solid and good enough for a season's pageant, but it has become shabby already; the damp has spoilt the cardboard windmills against which they tilted. And, though Mr. H. G. Wells goodnaturedly consented to dress up as Alice for their "Tweedle-dum and Tweedle-dee," we have become bored. Like the spectators at a Christmas dumb crambo, we guessed the word immediately. Tableau I., Mr. Belloc adding up life, philosophy, literature, and art. Tableau II., Mr. Chesterton refusing to "vert" to Catholicism or Socialism. Tableau III., Mr. Belloc and Mr. Chesterton talking about themselves—(1) Ad., (2) Vert., (3) Ise (I's).

It was most amusing, and the acting was quite above the average; but to repeat the performance, even for gain, with the accomplished author of the "Grey Stocking" in the rôle of Alice, and without Mr. Chesterton too, seems a rash undertaking—at least for the enterprising impresarios Messrs. Methuen and Co., whose blunders about "greatness" have of late become a little too obvious. It was the poet Webster, by the way, who prompted "the first madman" to say, "Come, let us sing a heavy note, some deadly dogged howl." Without being mad Mr. Belloc achieves the "deadly dogged howl." It seems possible that Mr. Belloc's intentions have been excellent, but he achieves what one might have expected him to achieve in the circumstances—namely, Nothing. In point of fact, this has been his little failing through life. Although he is an author to whom sundry books must be credited at the British Museum, nobody seems seriously to take him for an author, excepting, of course, the two or three other members of his own admiration society. Then, again, since he happens to be a member of Parliament, it is reasonable to presume for him some inclination towards politics. Yet nobody can consider him in the figure of a politician. For all intents and purposes he is just haziness and vapouring whichever way you regard him. This is a pity. We are in need of essayists, and we are in need of wits, and we are in need of people who will write what in them lies, even though it be for gain. Mr. Belloc tries and tries. Carlyle once wrote to a pertinacious poetaster words to this effect: "I have read your verses. There is no floor to them." This is the trouble with Mr. Belloc and the little Bellocs. They are utterly wanting in "floor."

Yet these "Essays on Nothing," from which we have wandered, for all the ostentatious modesty of their label, are big with ephemeral importance, because they are really entirely about Mr. Belloc, who "ten years ago came in the Euston Road, that thoroughfare of Empire," upon—not Stevenson, as you would imagine—but "a young man a little younger than myself." The whole thing is a Bagdad Bazaar of Bellocs; and symptomatic is that fantasy entitled "The Illness of my Muse," which suggests the irresistible conclusion that the patient's complaint was not more serious than ordinary occidental dysentery.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Rhine : its Valley and History. By H. J. MACKINDER.
With Illustrations in Colour after Mr. James Jardine, Two Folding Maps, and others in the Text. (Chatto and Windus, 20s. net.)

BOOKS written round coloured pictures are, generally speaking, of the "songs and snatches" order. This cannot be said of Mr. Mackinder's text, which, beginning with a short historical survey of the Rhine in its frontier aspect, goes on to an extremely clear division of that river into its basins as falling in present-day countries.

Some of the descriptions err, as far as keeping the reader's interest, in giving too many names, without other comment or reason than that they are on or near the Rhine—names which suggest much to one knowing the country well, but little or nothing in themselves. This would be insupportably dull if it were not for the excellence of the maps on which the many tributaries may be traced, and the course of the great river as it threads its way across Europe may be followed with ease.

The colour prints also contribute largely towards the interest, and help us wherever they occur to remember that the Rhine is not only the geographical accident of a combination of streams cutting through granite or sandstone mountains, but a picturesque (if somewhat hackneyed) background where, combined with natural beauties, one may still find towns offering their unspoilt mediæval aspect to the visitor.

The prints vary in quality to an amazing extent, the subjects which allow of a certain atmospheric treatment being by far the more pleasing. The omission of those facing pages 124, 172, and 174 would have added rather than detracted from the value of the book, which is in other respects well up to the standard of this type of publication.

Guide to Greece, the Archipelago, Constantinople, the Coasts of Asia Minor, Crete, and Cyprus. (Macmillan and Co., 9s. net.)

THE comprehensive title of this book, in conjunction with its modest size, prepares us for condensation and compression of the most rigorous kind; and we cannot help wishing that the publishers could have seen their way to dividing the "Guide" into at least three, in order that the limitations of space might not be so severely imposed upon the compilers. This much said, we have nothing but wondering praise for the amount and correctness of the information which is crowded into 226 pages of reasonably good type. The introductory sections of information for yachtsmen and of lists of hotels are wisely kept apart from the body of the book, and careful testing has revealed a high standard of accuracy, though a hint as to port dues in the larger ports might have been added. The most notable omission in the former section is that of Kyrenia Harbour (Cyprus). It is mentioned on p. 211, it is true, but, as one of the very few decent shelters for small craft on the coasts of the whole island, it was worthy of description in the special section. We cannot help noticing, however, that the process of compression has reacted most severely on Cyprus and Asia Minor, for the main interest of the "Guide" is frankly archæological, the great museums of Athens and Constantinople, and the wonders of Troy and Knossos engage the majority of the space. The fulness and care with which these sections have been brought up to date under the best possible auspices will render the book practically indispensable to those whose taste for archæology leads them into Greek lands. And a feature which we have not seen better carried out is the careful description of the details of Mohamedan religious observance, a study of which will enable the uninformed tourist to avoid many difficulties in his contact with Islam. But the transliteration of Turkish words has produced some irritating varieties—"Khoran," for example.

The introductory chapter on Greek Art is good, as we should expect it to be, coming from Professor Ernest Gardner, and has been brought well up to date. Again here transliteration is not very successful. If we read the now almost pedantic "Bapheion" on one page, we hardly expect to find the very doubtful "Olympeum" on another.

In the description of Greece itself there are a few slips. In speaking of Ithaca, it is not correct to refer to "the bay of Molo or Vathy." The latter is a land-locked inlet of the former. And the "school of Homer" is not a rock-dwelling, but a built platform of late cyclopean masonry. We do not remember that there was anything either very blue or very beautiful about the "Grotto of the Nymphs." Baedeker calls it "large and damp," which, though more prosaic, is nearer the mark.

There is very little, however, in the book with which to find fault. And chief among its virtues is the fact that it is the most readable guide to the Eastern Mediterranean that we have yet found. "Guides" always suggest to us the two immortal phrases culled from guides of repute: "Oxford and Cambridge will both repay a visit. If time presses, Cambridge may be omitted;" and "A delightful walk may be taken (two hours) to the summit of this hill. Adders abound." There is nothing of that sort here.

Fox-Hunting Past and Present. By R. H. CARLISLE. (John Lane, 3s. 6d. net.)

A USEFUL book this, in its way, because of one or two of its chapters, those on the cost of hunting and on hunting centres being the most useful, although the lore of the latter is more systematically given in the hunting directory. Some of the statistics of the present day are interesting. The keep of hunters is estimated at 7½ millions per annum, and the 250 riding packs being out, on the average, not less than five times in a fortnight at £500 per day, at sixteen fortnights in the season make up another 10 millions. These items alone, and they are possibly not one-half of the total expense of the sport, if we include clothes, damage to crops, dinners, breakfast, hunt races, and so on, would suggest that the English people spend about as much on fox-hunting as they do on the Navy. It is probably money well laid out in health, nerve, joy, and recreation, but it is not good as literature, and, as usual, the author, who is rightly a stickler for the etiquette of the sport, forgets that grammar has its etiquette equally imperative. His notion of poetry, too, is simply debased. Poor Pegasus, wind-galled and glanderied, thus flounders under his brush-brother, Mr. Wemyss:

Giants there lived in the days which have gone by,
Hounds were they better? or huntsmen? Well, well;
Keep up your standard, breed only for nose, sir,
And stoutness, of course, for one never can tell.

Will no Hugo Meynell ever arise to keep up the standard of hunting versifiers and breed them for ear?

Sport and Life on the Pacific Slope. By HORACE A. VACHELL. (Eveleigh Nash, 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS is wrongly named. It ought to be Life in fifteen chapters and Sport in five. The former and longer part is pleasantly penned, with a ready fund of words and an easy style. But Mr. Vachell is far too sweeping in his unguarded generalisation, and he talks too condescendingly and didactically about the men of the West, and almost insolently about the women and their detestable, neglected prudish and coxcombs of children. But he makes up for it by his ruthless description of the English settlers, who think ranching simple, and have not been taught "that nothing in life is simple"—not even Bible teaching, he might have added; and so these poor fellows come badly and drunkenly to their ends. If the author had written no more than his description of the remittance-men his book deserves to be bought by all who have friends on the Pacific Slope! The only sane policy for all such, in any part of the globe, is not one penny after the first six months. A sentence like this, too, is worth attention:

Nearly all the public buildings in the West are monuments of bad faith upon the part of the builder, contractor, architect, and those paid officials to whom the care of such important matters is assigned.

When Mr. Vachell gets away from the social malpractices of the people to the bears, ducks, and fishes he is a better companion, and he is at his best in the sea-fishing. The leaping tuna is the prince of game fishes. He is a mackerel the size of a tarpon, and meat only for the master anglers of the world. The awe and wonder of fishing for him would make even a political economist into a writer if he ever survived the rush and labour of the battle. For a hundred pounds a London man could get about two days at tuna-fishing if he were very economical, and were not too vilely swindled. He could hardly hope to gaff his tuna, but even to have engaged with him but once were better than five pounds per annum for life. And pure is his mouth, too!

FICTION

Restitution. By DOROTHEA GERARD (Madame Longard de Longgarde). (John Long, 6s.)

DEEP down in the heart of man is an ineradicable passion for melodrama, a passion which has withstood successfully the assaults of a hundred schools. Unacknowledged, or even disavowed, it is still there. Its form may vary, but its essence remains eternally the same. To-day the melodramatist has learned something from the partial failure of his immediate predecessors. He has discovered that the conventional stock-in-trade of a past generation of fiction-mongers will no longer suffice for the needs of a race that has been taught to mistrust its instincts. Hence melodrama, to be wholly successful, must now array itself in the trappings of Romance, and of late years there have been heavy demands on the faded finery of Wardour Street. There is, however, yet another expedient, and one greatly resorted to. Should the scene of your novel of melodrama be laid in foreign climes, the appeal is practically certain. The reader will then lull suspicion to sleep with the reflection that the wildest dreams of Kew are the facts of Khatmandu. This it is, doubtless, that explains the success of such a writer as Dorothea Gerard, who has mastered the trick to perfection, and whose novels—there are some thirty in all, we believe—are among the most widely read in modern fiction.

Miss Gerard's admirers will have no reason to complain of this her latest book. Our author maintains the tradition unimpaired. "Restitution"—the very title hints of dark deeds done and of a price to be paid, and for those who love sensation there is full measure of it in these pages.

The heroine is one Kateryna Malkoff—known familiarly as Katya—a Russian proprietress. Katya has all that heart of woman can desire—youth, beauty, and the possession of a large estate. This estate, however, proves the fly in the otherwise satisfactory ointment, for it had been stolen from its original Polish owner and bestowed upon Katya's grandfather in return for certain important military services which are fully detailed in Part I. In Part II. Katya, having discovered by an accident that a descendant of the rightful owner is still alive, forms the somewhat quixotic resolve of marrying him, and thus restoring the estate. So, disguised as a Pole, and with a false passport, she leaves Russia for Austria, attended only by the inevitable faithful retainer. Here she meets Tadensz Swigello, a handsome and dark-bearded Pole, with whom she immediately falls in love. The reader will not be slow to divine that the handsome and dark-bearded Pole is the very man for whom Katya had been seeking. Tadensz, for his part, is equally infatuated, and there follow some very pretty love scenes. But the course of true love is destined to be violently disturbed, for, on the discovery of Katya's identity her lover falls into a passion and declares in angry accents that all is over. Thus Part III. The anticipated reconciliation is left for Part IV., in which all sorts of strange and harrowing adventures are recorded, including a midnight escape from a Russian prison, into which both Tadensz and Katya have been thrown through the machinations of a very desperate villain. It is a satisfaction to know that the villain is cut in pieces in the last chapter but three as a meet reward for his misdeeds. The book closes with the scene of the Polish lover and his Russian bride seeking sanctuary in Austria from the rigours of Russian law. The estate appears to have been lost to both of them, but it would be treachery to doubt that Justice is not finally triumphant.

The story is told with Miss Gerard's accustomed verve, and it is only fair to add that the incidents are handled in the manner of an accomplished craftsman. "Restitution" can hardly fail to sustain a reputation worthily made and as worthily maintained.

Love's Shadow. By ADA LEVERSON. (Grant Richards, 6s.)

WHAT a delightful group of people it is which Mrs. Ernest Leverson has selected for our delight in her latest novel, and described with a lightness of touch and a sureness of observation, a sparkling wit and penetrating humour rare indeed among novel-writers. Her book is at once a joy to readers and a model to those who feel a call to write a story of modern frivolous society, of life as lived—or played, if you will—by people whose chief object is to kill time in the pleasantest way. As a rule novelists who treat of these people have a bad habit of making them out to be hopelessly idiotic or unlikely vicious. Mrs. Leverson has no need to conceal a want of talent or invention by such subterfuges. She does not find it necessary to be foolish in order to tickle, or nauseous in order to whet, jaded appetites. She takes her characters, just such as any one may meet every day in any drawing-room, and with her observant humour—in spite, one might almost say, of her mordant wit—she makes exquisite miniatures of them, so perfect that one might be in danger of not noticing the skill, the reticence, the restraint which unite to get the effect. The story is slight, yet full of interest—just the tale of a girl, Hyacinth, who falls in love with a young man, Cecil Reeve, who imagines himself to be in love with a fascinating widow, but who finds in the end that Hyacinth was really what he wanted. In their little love story are involved a group of people who each have an interest, an individuality of their own, and who assist the central theme in a most natural and unconscious way. All the men are more or less in love with Hyacinth, but quite nicely. We know it, as we see the effect their devotion has on them; but it delights us, and it makes no one in the book miserable. Even the women are attracted by her, especially her old companion Anne Yeo, the most sensible of women in everything which doesn't concern herself. The chief subsidiary couple are "the little Ottleys," so called rather from the size of their flat and their interests rather than for physical reasons. They make a perfect picture of a ménage only kept satisfactory by the tact of the wife, who knows exactly how to treat her husband—a good-looking, stupid, and conceited young Foreign Office clerk. They have a child who is one of the triumphs of the book; not more life-like than its elders, but how rare is it to find a child in a novel who is the child of real life, which pleases, amuses, bores us, and scores off us by its inconsequent yet direct chatter. The cleverest man, the most tactful woman, is easily "stumped" by a child, and Archie routs his elders with the most perfect ease and the most innocent intentions. It is not too much to say that all the characters are entirely satisfactory; in a few lines the author brings them before our eyes, and they remain perfectly consistent till we take leave of them. Most of them, it must be admitted, are very amusing people; but the clever things they say are neither forced nor unreal; their verbal fencing is deadly, but not strained. And the one or two bores in the book never bore the reader. They are, indeed, as enjoyable as the clever people; their stupidity, their dulness are never allowed to make the reader feel dull or stupid. Even Raggett, whom Otley introduces to his wife and then proceeds to be jealous of, is a joy with his clumsy love-making; and Lady Cannon, who in real life would be unbearable, is a figure of gorgeous fun. But it is not only in her character-drawing that Mrs. Levenson shows her delicious humour and powers of observation. The incidents by which the tale progresses are described with a truth which makes them echoes of every one's personal experience. The chapter entitled "Hyacinth Waits" is an excellent example of this. Lightly and delicately written, it yet has real power; it is a little tragedy which is being enacted as Hyacinth watches the clock, a tragedy we have all experienced, and it is described with a choice and economy of words worthy of Maupassant. It is just this careful brevity, in which nothing essential seems left out, which so remarkably distinguishes the author's work from the general. Her dialogue is so good, so apparently natural and yet so incisive, that much of it could be transferred as it stands to the stage. One knows that the lines would "tell," just as one feels certain that the characters would "get over the footlights." Surely there is here material for a charming light comedy. We are grateful for so brilliant an example of what can be done by delicate wit and humour playing upon characters which a less talented writer would either make heavy in the process of putting them on paper or extenuate to nothingness. Mrs. Levenson has proved herself an artist of rare quality.

Redemption. By RENÉ BAZIN. (Sisley's, Ltd., 6s.)

THE novels of M. Bazin have many thousands of readers in France, and perhaps it would not be far from the truth to say that he is the most popular French novelist of the day. If that is so, the French are more to be congratulated than ourselves, who have to look very far down the scale of writers to find our most popular authors. With us it is almost too true that the greater the writer the fewer the readers. Even Mr. Hardy, who in some ways most nearly approaches M. Bazin in his methods and aims, can hardly be called a popular author, though his admirers must form a crowd of whom any author might be proud.

"Redemption" is a translation by Dr. A. S. Rappoport of "De toute son âme," and he has done his work so well that we think it would be only fair to say that, were it not for the title-page, it might easily be taken for an original English novel. The scene of course is laid in France—at Nantes, in fact; but the essence of the story—the feelings, the aspirations, and the temptations of the group of workers round whom the plot is woven—is as much English as it is French; in any large town the same events are going on, there is the same struggle for existence, the same difficulty of escape from the perils of poverty, the same failures, and happily the same virtues. We have it from M. Bazin himself that when he first began to study the life of the young milliner for the purpose of a novel he did not know what he was going to write. He then discovered that the obstacle in the way of girls in this business marrying lies in the very nature of the business itself. Coming from the poorest homes daily, and returning to them nightly, these girls live their lives in an atmosphere which, at any rate, bears a close relation to the luxuries of life. Their instincts become so well educated that they feel a distaste for the young men with whom they might naturally marry, and they find their pleasures only too often with those whose intentions are clearly against matrimony. The sternest virtue feels the strain, which is made all the greater by the dearth of work and wages at certain seasons of the year. It is obvious that a story with this idea as a basis may be constructed—and has indeed been constructed—on many different lines. M. Bazin treats it with a truth and vigour which carries the reader on, so that the different characters take the firmest grip of his imagination; but withal there is a charity that seeth all things, and believeth all things, and hopeth all things, so that when the story, sad as it is, comes to an end, it is not the misery and vice that one remembers, but the heroism and charm of many of the characters. Pessimism is not for M. Bazin, and he, too, feels and in effect says, "I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary." Bad as life can be, he sees that there is much happiness and kindness and good feeling behind it all. Furthermore, there is about all M. Bazin's novels that sense of atmosphere which gives a living reality for the reader to all the scenes that he describes. One can see the streets of Nantes, its work-rooms and its quays, and the crowds pouring out of the factories, and then one can see the beautiful open country round the Loire; and who is likely to forget his account of the rising of the river over the hayfields, while the struggling peasants are trying to save their hay? The comparison must not be pushed too far, but we have the same kind of impression after reading a novel by Mr. Hardy, the feeling that we know the places well, and have actually seen the events take place. "Redemption" is a book that must give the most acute pleasure to any one who can appreciate a really great work; there must be few recent foreign novels that are more worth while introducing in an English dress, and still fewer that have suffered less in the transformation.

The Pedestal. By DESMOND COKE. (Chapman and Hall, Ltd., 6s.)

MR. DESMOND COKE's latest novel amply sustains the promise of his three predecessors. In the person of his heroine, Ruth Fothergill, he has given us a character-study of remarkable delicacy and penetration. His analysis of motives is as skilful as it is unsparing. Yet, in spite of this unflinching portrayal of human weakness, the book is as far removed as possible from any suspicion of cynicism. Its reading operates like a tonic. There is a healthy moral tone about it as refreshing as it is rare in modern fiction. Above all, Mr. Coke has avoided the temptation, so incident to the subject, of what his inimitable schoolboys would call "pi-jaw."

Ruth Fothergill dominates the stage throughout. She is a devoted, doting mother. Left a widow at an early age, her affections are transferred to her son, who becomes indeed the sole object of her devotion. She idolises him, removes him from the companionship of other boys lest his manners should deteriorate, is (as she believes) justly proud of him. In return she requires from her offspring perfection—nothing less. It is selfishness masquerading as self-sacrifice—selfishness, unperceived and unsuspected. The test comes when the boy performs a dishonourable action, and is in consequence expelled from a public school. There are extenuating circumstances (the sympathies of the reader are enlisted from the first on the side of the culprit), but to the mother there is only a shattered pedestal. Selfishness masquerading as self-sacrifice throws off the mask, and the devoted mother appears as unjust, vindictive, and even brutal. Things are straightened out eventually through the good offices of a middle-aged bachelor who plays with some éclat a sort of Charles Wyndham rôle, and who claims the mother as his reward. The minor characters are recognisably true to type, and Mr. Coke displays an almost uncanny knowledge of the workings of the female mind. He has reproduced, too, with an astonishing fidelity the atmosphere of an English public school. Certainly "The Pedestal" is a novel that counts.

Ashes. By GRAZIA DELEDDA. (John Lane, 6s.)

THERE is no denying the imaginative intensity of this story. "Ashes" is, indeed, a novel that grips the reader from the outset, and that almost suffocates him by the time he has reached the concluding chapter—so relentless is the realism of the author, so terrible are the passions invoked. Oli Derios, a young Sardinian girl, had been betrayed by an unscrupulous ruffian. There is the inevitable sequel—discovery, desertion, and banishment from her father's house. The girl drifts from bad to worse, and finally abandons her child, with whose fortunes the remainder of the story is concerned. Anania finds a shelter with his father. He is a youth of fiery and passionate impulses, ardent, sceptical, and revengeful. He meets Margherita, and they love. But in the background of his memory there lurks the shameful memory of his mother, and his life is consumed by a fear that the woman who had given him life may herself be alive. At last, after many years, he meets her. He offers her a home, but she refuses. He proves insistent, however, and the woman is lodged with an old and decrepit Sardinian widow. Anania's action leads to a rupture with Margherita, which is followed by the news that his mother is dangerously ill. He hurries to the house where she is staying, to find that she has committed suicide. Thus we leave him, overwhelmed with unavailing reproaches, forsaken by the woman whom he had loved, and with the romance of life ended for ever. Madame Deledda has projected this drama of fate against a background of warm Sardinian skies and sunsets. She has an unfailing sense of the dramatic. There is one scene in particular—it is in the first chapter—the lurid horror of which has seldom, if ever, been surpassed in the whole range of modern fiction. But one closes the book with a feeling of passionate protest against that philosophy which sees in life merely a series of denials, and in ashes the sum and symbol of human endeavour.

The Diamond and the Lady. By JAMES BLYTH. (Digby, Long and Co., 6s.)

MR. BLYTH has turned over a new leaf; instead of giving us a relentlessly realistic study of East Anglian village life—sordid, unclean, and wholly degraded—he has written a racy, exciting detective-story, full of incident and action, which rushes along at a speed equal to that of the 60h.p.-car which plays a large part in the story. The scene of the story is, of course, Norfolk and the Broads, and Mr. Blyth again shows his close and intimate knowledge of the people. But as his story deals largely with "county-folk" and not with labourers, he has less occasion to elaborate unpleasant details. Still even here he misses no chances, and when his heroine is kidnapped by the villain he insists quite unnecessarily on one particular fear in the mind of her lover. This is a pity, for otherwise the book would be entirely free from any charge of bad taste.

As in most, if not all, detective-stories, the central figure is the detective. In the present book he is a retired "Yard" man, by name Millbank, who is summoned down from town by the hero, who has been robbed of his family "luck," a priceless diamond. Millbank, of course, secures the jewel, but not without great adventures and imminent risk of his life. The chase leads him to Amsterdam, and he is just in time to save it from the cutter. But, as the title shows, this is not all the story. Not content with stealing the diamond, the villain kidnaps the lady, as mentioned above. This time the chase is confined to Norfolk, and ends with a really splendid fight on the stairs of an old country house, where knives and revolvers are as freely used as in any gambling-hell in Mexico. Of course the villains are worsted and Dartmoor eventually receives them.

Mr. Blyth tells his tale well and handles his characters skilfully. The three Miss Cottinghams are quite charming studies, and his young people are natural and attractive. His villains are perhaps a little "penny plain, twopenny coloured," but in a book of this type it is unkind to expect too much. The story is the thing, and of that there can be no complaint.

His Father's Wife (La Marquise de Sardes). By ERNEST DAUDET. Edited by FREDERICK MARTYN. (Everett, 6s.)

IT is almost impossible to judge a foreign author's work through the medium of a translation. For how much the translator is responsible in this instance we cannot say, as we are not familiar with the book in the original; but, looked upon as an addition to English fiction, "His Father's Wife" leaves much to be desired. It strikes us as a fair example of the dullest and most sensational type of French novel—a type barely readable in French, and certainly not worth the time and trouble which a translation involves. The story is that of a foolish, inflammable youth, who is greatly attracted by a beautiful and unscrupulous lady, who turns out to be his father's second wife—hence the title.

Zoe's Revenge. By M. Y. HALIDOM. (Greening, 6s.)

WHETHER Mr. Halidom intends to be humorous we do not know, but he writes with a certain solemnity which suggests a desire to be taken seriously. There can be no doubt that he has tried to make his reader's flesh creep, there is also, unfortunately, no doubt, that he has failed signally in his endeavour. The preposterous behaviour of Zoe, or rather of Zoe's spirit, is neither amusing, thrilling, nor convincing. Zoe, an artist's model, is strangled by her infuriated lover, who takes her body to his friend, Dr. François Emile de Corbeillac, that he may get rid of it for him. Corbeillac, having reduced the body to a skeleton, is alarmed at the curious behaviour of the bones as they lie on his table. They wriggle about and behave in so disconcerting a manner that he hands the skeleton over to a certain Herr Hoffmann, who uses it as a foundation for a very perfect lay-figure. The rest of the book is devoted to the behaviour of this doll, which, animated by the revengeful spirit of Zoe, not only moves and walks, but boxes people's ears, and ogles them with its glass eyes, while it wreathes papier-mâché arms about their necks. If the reader is fortunate enough to be possessed of a keen sense of humour he may derive a certain amount of entertainment from the antics of this ungainly creature.

The Edge of Beyond. By GERTRUDE PAGE. (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)

THE "Edge of Beyond" is Rhodesia, well east of Suez, where, as every one knows, there ain't no "Ten Commandments." Miss Page has evidently caught the "kopje fever," as she calls it, and in her love for the country of great silences and distances succeeds in giving a most fascinating picture of both the land and the men and women who live in it. At the same time even the influence of Nature cannot alter a man, and caelum non animus is the text throughout the book. If anything, the effect of the loneliness and the self-dependence which the life enforces only serve to intensify, even to exaggerate, the man's character. "The Irresponsibles" become even more irresponsible than they were in London, and Oswald Grant becomes more of a Pharisee and a snob than he could ever have dared to be where life is more crowded and public opinion has the added force of numbers. To be ostracised in Rhodesia would be for a man like Grant only a slight increase of loneliness, but to be "cut" in London would have been a blow that his pride could never have withstood. And just as the character of the men and women become more strongly marked by the country and the life, so apparently do the comedy and tragedy. The free life and close kinship with Nature loosen the bonds of convention, and the humour of the conversation of the men and the women—especially of Dinah—becomes broader, even unrestrained. Yet though at times Dinah's wit flashes with Elizabethan or even Restoration keenness, such is the entire naturalness of the atmosphere that there is no justification for any censure. It is frank, but it is open and natural. In the same way the tragedy of the story—and there is much real tragedy in "The Edge of Beyond"—becomes more poignant because it is more direct. We see Joyce and the Doctor alone, face to face with their fate, with no conventions, no press of extraneous happenings to distract our attention. They are there, self-dependent and complete, with the eternal rocks and veldt around them, watching in silence, neither condemning nor approving. There is neither Half Rome nor the Other Half Rome, nor the tertium quid. Consequently we feel with them, see with them, think their thoughts, and have to fight their battle.

Miss Page has written a strong, resourceful novel. She has succeeded in reproducing the true atmosphere, and, unlike many painters of landscapes, she has the gift of painting in on her canvas figures that are true to life and are really alive.

DRAMA

"THE EXPLORER" AT THE LYRIC THEATRE

WHEN Mrs. Dol—the last of the three plays by Mr. Somerset Maugham, all of which are still running in London—was produced at the Comedy it was whispered abroad that Mr. Maugham had still three plays in his desk that had been written before his first successful entrance as a playwright with Lady Frederick. The Explorer must be one of them—for by no stretch of the imagination is it conceivable that it can be the fruits of maturity. At any rate, there need not be the least hesitation in stating that this new play, which was produced last Saturday night by Mr. Waller, is by far the least satisfactory of any of Mr. Maugham's plays. Not that it has not some claims to respect, but it does not show the now well-known playwright either as a master of technique or as a writer of witty dialogue. Altogether this new production is on a much lower plane than anything we have yet had from Mr. Maugham. Strictly speaking, I suppose it must be described as a drama, though its second Act is perilously near melodrama, and the ethical problem on which the whole motive is based is melodramatic in the extreme, so much so that it might well help the play into competition with Sir John Collier's problem picture of the year.

There is no necessity to discuss the ethical question here, and, indeed, it is not of any great interest in itself; but the question is entwined with the career of a modern empire-maker in whom are combined all the most modern traits together with what may be called thorough "Lyrical" virtues—those virtues which Mr. Waller has made conspicuously his own. It also allows of one Act taking place in Central Africa. The other Acts are all laid in fashionable London, and are quite of the proper dramatic type, though, instead of showing a court of law, as one of them might have been, we have merely the talk and consternation, resulting from the verdict, in a West-end drawing-room. Act 3 shows the sudden fall of the hero from adulation to contempt consequent on a leader in the Times, and the last Act combines the inevitable tea-party with rehabilitation.

Now this is all very well, but it is not what we want and have a right to expect from Mr. Maugham. There are plenty of playwrights in England and America who can supply Mr. Waller with plays of this sort, and if there are to be revolvers on the stage, it is more satisfactory that somebody should be killed. Here no one is even badly injured, except behind the scenes; and even in the melodramatic second Act there is little but some palm trees and a tent—besides the revolver—to legitimise the scene. No, Mr. Maugham is a born writer of Comedy, and Comedy we must have—and without the African deserts. Now and then an excursion into farce may be permitted, but certainly no "legitimate drama." Even in The Explorer the author is striving hard all the time to get back to his Comedy, and the mixture is anything but successful; for it seemed to me that Mr. Maugham's comic muse was endeavouring to mitigate the rigours of the more sensational parts. So a great deal of superfluous though entertaining talk was the result, and more than once the subsidiary love-making of a pair of philanderers kept the audience from the straightforward passion of the hero and heroine.

Mr. Waller as the explorer was entirely suited to his part, and his entrances and his exits were punctuated by the usual volleys of cheers. A play would have to be bad indeed for Mr. Waller to fail of his applause. Mr. A. E. George acted in true comedy vein as Richard Lomas, one of the philandering pair, and the other actors were all that could be desired in their respective parts. The ladies left me quite cold. That excellent actress Miss Mary Rorke had a very poor part, and neither Miss Eva Moore nor Miss Evelyn Millard seemed to me to be capable of what was required of them. That the play has a successful future before it cannot for a moment be doubted, for is not Mr. Waller the most popular actor of the day and Mr. Maugham our most successful dramatist?

A. C.

"VIEILLES GLOIRES" AT HIS MAJESTY'S

I AM afraid there is nothing new to be said about either M. Sardou or about M. Coquelin ainé. They are both vieilles gloires françaises of whom one must write with respect, if not with unbounded admiration.

L'affaire des Poisons—it is Sardou at his best, or at his worst, according to tastes. Here we have again all the theatrical tricks which he uses so wonderfully well, and it is not his fault if his infallible technique only serves to illustrate a rather thin and somewhat confused plot. M. Coquelin as the Abbé Griffard is the artificial link between the historical part of the play and the love interest of M. Sardou's invention. Still, in spite of his artificiality, the Abbé Griffard, who never existed at all, appears more living than all the great historical personages who shone at Versailles and St. Germain in the Louis XIV. days. Such is the power of M. Sardou's cleverness, helped by M. Coquelin's genius.

A very clever man, too, that Abbé Griffard, a nobody, nearly belonging to the class called la canaille by the charming and extravagant Mme. de Montespan. He does everything, masters everybody, argues with Colbert and Louvois, speaks his mind to La Montespan, protects the little lovers, escapes safe from all malicious traps, and chats with Louis XIV. with a most pleasant deferential humour. He stands out as a delightful character—a character after M. Coquelin's heart, full of strength, of nobleness, of pity, of irony, of wit—of all the qualities necessary to the hero of a drama that make the part a star part.

The Abbé Griffard has escaped from the galleys, and a dying convict friend has confided to him a terrible secret, which enables him in the following Acts to master and direct everybody. So, ingratiating himself with La Voisin, he gains her confidence and officiates, together with a lady, masked but otherwise unclothed, in a sacrilegious Black Mass; he subsequently discovers her to be Mme. de Montespan, and saves from the Bastille a Mdle. d'Ormoize, who is wrongly accused of this crime. Of course he scores all along the line in spite of La Montespan's power, in spite of Louvois and Colbert, who argue from the pedestal of Raison d'Etat, while the good abbé, Voltarian before Voltaire, takes as his text the cause of Humanity and real Justice as against the State, and of the individual as against monarchical despotism. Certainly if Griffard had existed there would be now in Republican Paris a Place Griffard next to the Rue Louvois; it would be only fair.

Then what happens next? He saves his own life, he saves Mdle. d'Ormoize's life, he saves the King's life, and is rewarded by the lover's happiness, a "position," as the programme says, "in the Royal library" and the applause of the crowd, the pit being particularly enthusiastic.

As a matter of fact, L'affaire des Poisons is a kind of historical drama without any real poisoning and without comic relief. Although the plot is weak, it is never dull, because of the variety of the incidents. The people who have not seen M. Fallières driving in Buckingham Palace Road, or the winner rounding Tattenham Corner are interested in the cinematographic reproductions of these great events. As, for some good reason, we have not seen Louis XIV.'s Court, we are delighted at the cinematographic reproduction offered to us by M. Sardou. It is instructive too. One ought to see L'affaire des Poisons; it is far more amusing than reading heavy books of history, and it is quite true enough to enable one to talk quite cleverly about the Roi-Soleil's period at a lunch-table. A few pages of Grammont's Memoirs would be of some help, and one should learn some anecdotes out of Saint-Simon. Then one could make a brilliant conversation with quotations from these historians. One could add a touch of modernity by comparing the Abbé Griffard to a Sherlock Holmes sous Louis XIV., just as amusing, and even more funny, if fatter. Historical dramas and detective-stories go together.

And, again, we are obliged to think of M. Sardou's cleverness. Having to deal with so many people, he weaves a Gobelins tapestry gossip; and real anecdotes from the above-mentioned memoirs he uses as his threads. We are reminded of Mme. de Montespan's moods and of her Royal lover, of the smell of Versailles, of Colbert's ambition, of Louvois's harshness, of the potins of the foreign courts, of Mme. de Maintenon's prudery, of La Voisin's sorceries, of so many little things one had forgotten since one's schooldays. History is badly taught at school. The professors have a reprehensible habit of skipping the nice parts of Royal intrigues. M. Sardou does not make that mistake. He revels in them, and uses them for his dramatic purposes. What does it matter if he does not believe in Mme. de Montespan's guilt in the plot against Louis's life? After all, it is a trifling affair. It is more interesting to see her all dressed in gold after some painting of the period, talking to an imaginary abbé, and saying things she might have said.

So M. Sardou, historian, is as delightful as M. Sardou, dramatist, is unerring. Unhappily, in this play there are few opportunities for violent moving scenes like those in Tosca or in La Sorcière, or for amusing sketches like those in Madame Sans Gêne; very seldom has an author the chance of making a washerwoman present her bill to Napoléon I., and Louis XIV. does not cut a particularly brilliant figure, in spite of his wig. But if we find the play sometimes unexciting, let us be thankful for all the charming memories it brings back to us; we may think sympathetically of all these great people one day when strolling on the Versailles terraces, where they strolled once, and where M. Sardou met them, some summer evening, shining in unfaded gold.

And M. Coquelin ainé is M. Coquelin ainé, the greatest actor of his time.

CORRESPONDENCE

SOCIALISM VERSUS THE CHURCH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In reply to your courteous invitation to state the case for Catholic Socialists, I think we need hardly trouble whether this or that prominent writer is for or against the profession of faith. The real question is whether the fundamental concepts of Socialism v. the Faith are coincident or, at least, parallel; or else whether their very outlook is different. There certainly do seem to be very great principles which the Church has always held, which no one else except the Socialists now seems to hold and to apply to practical life.

1. The first is the inter-dependence of men, a doctrine submerged by silly declarations of independence and the whole teaching of Whigs and Radicals for the last century. That is a principle as old as the Lord's Prayer. It is a spiritual principle, because the forces which unite, which explain it, are invisible and not contingent upon time and place, and, being spiritual, it demands faith. Ultimately it depends upon a realism in philosophy, which takes man as the reality and Smith, Jones and Co. as embodiments, sacraments of that greater reality, man. That is Plato's teaching, and Plato was a Socialist and the Moysees atticus of the Church.

2. Then, and therefore, the Socialists seem the only people who sincerely believe in Governance—in authority—which the Church also teaches to be the way in which God's people are to be lifted up for ever. To hear politicians talk, one would believe that Government is a nauseous necessity, to be reduced to the lowest minimum. The ordinary Englishman does not regard the laws as his friends all the days of his life, as Socrates did. He talks contemptuously of them, thinks they cannot make men righteous, and our Parliament puts up a paradoxical statue to a private citizen who abolished the Laws and kicked out the Parliament. Listen to the non-Socialists' talk about Confiscation—they seem to think that the boy with the five barley loaves has rights against the five thousand. I mean that the good of the whole is not superior to some fancied rights of possession by the individual. That is unreasonable and unpatriotic. "Dearer than mother and father and all other relatives is one's country; yes, and grander and holier and of more esteem in the eyes of gods and of men of sense; and a man must reverence and obey and cherish his country, even when she is angry with him, more than he would his father, and must either persuade or obey her; yes, and suffer, if she bids him suffer, with patience; and if she bids him be struck or chained, and if she takes him to war to be wounded or killed, he has just got to do it; justice lies that way, and he must not refuse, nor flinch, nor leave the ranks; but in war and in law he has got to do what his State and country bids him, or else to persuade her, who is the very mother of justice." It seems to me that this is how Catholics look upon the heavenly Jerusalem, the Mother in whom all her children have a stake; and how Socialists look upon the perfect polity which they seek.

3. It follows from this that communal property, being the expression of the whole, is to be preferred to private property, which is the expression of the individual (and sometimes is his suppression too, owning him). The great Doctors of the Church are all in one consent here, that to wish for, to aim at, and to delight in communal property is the inspired method of the Holy Ghost and the mark of a devout soul. "Qui vult facere locum Domino, non de privato sed de communi debet gaudere" is St. Augustine's summary. "Abstineamus ergo nos fratres a possessione rei privatae, aut ab amore si non possumus a possessione." So certain is the Christian verdict upon this point that the religious life has always been associated with a renunciation of private property. To nationalise may be a new and ugly word, but it expresses an old and lovely Catholic thing.

4. The modern State, as an organum for the common weal, seems to offer the only solution of the great usury question. The non-Socialists, in ceding everything to the usurer, are out of touch with and in direct antagonism against the traditional Church teaching, that a man ought not to take unless he earns. On their side they are quite reasonable when they plead that money hired ought to be paid for, like a cab or a boat. The Socialist plan of national banks and communal loans seems an airenicon, which both parties to the argument of a thousand years can accept.

Excuse this long letter, but the subject is a large one and hardly to be jerked into an epigram.

CHARLES L. MARSON.

[We shall reply to this letter next week.—ED.]

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It must be inferred from the curate of St. Mary's letter of the 6th inst. that he is a Socialist of the most advanced type. He says he has been a Socialist for about one year, and he defines Socialism to be "a scheme for taking land and capital out of private hands and transferring it (sic) to the public." This is a very simple statement, and to one like myself, not well-versed in the philosophy of Socialism, there seem but three courses open by which capital and land can be taken out of private hands and transferred to the State—viz., first, by gift from the present owners; secondly, by confiscation, which, of course, means robbery; thirdly, by purchase on the part of the public or State. All three plans are equally impracticable and impossible, if not absurd. And those who advocate any such scheme are doing incalculable mischief by raising illusory as well as dishonest hopes and desires in the breasts of the unthinking and ignorant.

The late Mr. Herbert Spencer was one of the deepest thinkers of this or any other age, and I respectfully advise Mr. Paine to consult him on the question of Socialism. He will find some valuable hints in a letter from Mr. Spencer to the Hon. Auberon Herbert, dated October 13, 1885, set out in Dr. Duncan's Life of Spencer.

Socialism is a difficult and dangerous subject, and should not be dealt with in the offhand manner attempted by Mr. Paine.

SUFFRAGITIS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—While delighting in your Anti-Woman Suffrage propaganda, may I ask you, in reference to your note in THE ACADEMY for May 30th, why you do not once and for all bowl out that old and hoary argument about the voteless Lady of the Manor and the drunken and idiotic Hodge the gardener with a vote. Two wrongs cannot make one right, and I venture to remark that it should be quite easy to shut up the blatant suffragette once and for all by saying that Hodge has no right whatever to the vote, and that if you had your way you would take it away from every one who did not sufficiently know about political matters to register his own claim to a vote and to walk to the poll on his own legs. It was undoubtedly very wrong to give Hodge the vote; it would make matters a thousand times worse if you gave it to the screaming females who use this argument as a lever to get what they want. Trusting that I may peacefully die before they get it, I am, etc.,

(MRS.) J. E. PANTON.

A PERSONAL APPEAL FROM THE SCOTTISH PATRIOTIC ASSOCIATION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The appeal of the above association is amusing in that those making it fall into the very error they condemn. If it is an "offensive misuse" of terms to speak of the inhabitants of Great Britain as "English," how much more offensive is it to speak of the inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland as "British." Surely the adjective "British"—reasoning on the same lines as the Scottish Patriotic Association—can be applied only when Great Britain is referred to. The employment of it to embrace Ireland is quite as sectional, inaccurate, and offensive as the use of the term "English." Scotsmen may be satisfied with the adjective "British" inasmuch as it includes at least themselves, but I do not think that the Scottish Patriotic Association—which makes its appeal in the interests of justice and honour—will insist upon an emendation no less unfair to the sister isle than the adjective "English" is to it.

WILLIAM CLARKE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I admit with the reviewer of the above volume that seven years is a long time after a man's death to publish any of his writings; but there were difficulties in the way, which were personal, and into which I need not therefore enter. But the main point is the question—Why publish at all? Well, it seemed to Mr. Clarke's friends and editors that much of what he wrote was really worth publishing. I suppose that is the underlying reason for ever publishing anything. "Good, thoughtful, forcible journalism, excellent in style and matter," to use the reviewer's words, is not seen every day, especially when it deals with matters of permanent interest; and since the volume was published we have had abundant evidence that, as in his life, so after his death, William Clarke's words and thought have not only interested, but stimulated many minds. Even if only one or two journalists will be "spurred to emulate" his "capable and lucid style" a much-needed something will have been done.

WANTED, A DINNER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Does THE ACADEMY, I wonder, ever give a dinner or some kind of social feast, where "iron could sharpen iron"? It would be much to some of us dwellers in lonely outposts to see sometimes and speak with those who have some interest in abstract subjects and in "the light that never was on sea or land."

A DWELLER WITH MESECH.

THE SO-CALLED "INDETERMINATE" SENTENCE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The "indeterminate" sentence may be a good thing or a bad thing, an instrument of healing or of oppression, according to the nature and temper of the men who are empowered to carry it out; and what we humanitarians fear is that, administered as it is certain to be administered under our present system, it is much more likely to be used as a life-sentence than as a real test of character, or, at any rate, to bear less harshly on the crafty knave who has wit to fawn on prison officials and simulate a repentance which he does not feel, than on the avowed outlaw who will not or cannot conceal his resentment against the society which has made him what he is.

In this respect the Bill which is now before the House of Commons is a most dangerous one. It is the work of theorists who, while they have the means of giving instant effect to that part of their programme which places the liberties of "the criminal" in the hands of his keepers, have no power whatever to call suddenly into existence that intelligent and reformatory spirit which can only come into being when we are able to understand the criminal instead of merely hating him.

The very fact that Mr. Gladstone's Bill has been hailed with rapture by such men as Sir Ralph Littler and Sir Robert Anderson, whose names are associated with all that is most hard and reactionary in the treatment of crime, besides being relentless enemies to appeals in criminal cases, might suggest serious reflections to those who are disposed to accept any measure that comes from a Liberal Home Secretary as necessarily enlightened and progressive.

The Pongo Papers

AND

Duke of Berwick

By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS.

With Illustrations by DAVID WHITELAW. 2s. 6d. net.

This book consists of a Series of Verses satirizing the methods of modern scientific controversialists. Included in the volume is the "Duke of Berwick," an extremely amusing nonsense rhyme. All lovers of skilful and witty light verse should get "The Pongo Papers."

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Lord Alfred Douglas's entertaining whim of associating inappropriate ethical qualities with various undistinguished members of the brute creation reappears in 'The Pongo Papers.' . . . It is all in the best style of 'nonsense-verse,' which consists largely in conveying the minimum of useful information with the maximum of craftsmanship."—Observer.

"Lord Alfred Douglas has done a remarkable thing in this slender book of verses, half nonsense and half satire as he explains in his preface, for he has added another member to the list of legendary persons whose type and habit of mind may usefully be quoted on occasions. . . . It is excellent fooling, and will be enjoyed by all who are amused by comic rhyme and a satire on scientific controversy. . . . We have only one complaint against this excellent little book—there is not enough of it."—Daily Telegraph.

"It is not everybody, as the author admits, who can enjoy nonsense rhymes, but there are very many we feel sure who will appreciate the humour and satire which abounds in the pages of Lord Alfred Douglas' little volume of verses entitled 'The Pongo Papers.' They make some very amusing reading, and the book is cleverly illustrated by David Whitelaw."—Yorkshire Post.

"'The Duke of Berwick' is delightfully witty and satirical. . . . No one will deny that the finish and execution of Lord Alfred Douglas' work is extraordinary."—Country Life.

"Lord Alfred Douglas writes a clever preface for a clever little book . . . he exhibits the very difficult art of being utterly foolish. . . . We are very grateful to him. . . . There is real laughter in 'The Pongo Papers.'"—Tribune.

"In his new book just published by Messrs. Greening, Lord Alfred Douglas has made admirable play with the methods of scientific controversialists. 'The Pongo Papers' are pure satire."—Yorkshire Evening Post.

"'The Pongo Papers' constitute capital 'nonsense'. . . . The volume provides readers with an hour's light literature and is amusingly illustrated by Mr. David Whitelaw."—Sunday Sun.

"'The Pongo Papers' are very cleverly-done nonsense verses with a satirical strain. 'The Duke of Berwick' is to our mind the best as well as the longest of them, but all are remarkably good and neat."—Sportsman.

"Lord Alfred Douglas in 'The Pongo Papers' and 'The Duke of Berwick' by his very amusing verses proves that as a writer of verses pure and simple we have in him a successor to the author of 'Alice in Wonderland.' The illustrations by David Whitelaw are capital."—Madame.

"The poems are written with light and humorous touch throughout, and Mr. David Whitelaw has added some clever drawings."—Outlook.

"'The Pongo Papers' have a distinguished originality, and are framed in the metre that the author handles with marked ease and fluency. Along with these witty and diverting sketches appears another elegant trifle, 'The Duke of Berwick.'"—Perthshire Advertiser.

"'The Duke of Berwick' is the kind of poetry we should like to read when we are sick or sorrowful, for it is pure art unstained by any trace of human emotion or of that sickly business called living. . . . 'The Pongo Papers' are a brilliant satire. . . . This is a book which everyone must read."—Vanity Fair.

"That it takes a clever man to write nonsense is a truism. At any rate 'The Pongo Papers' and 'The Duke of Berwick,' by Lord Alfred Douglas, are conspicuously clever and in some parts even brilliant."—Publisher and Bookseller.

"By far the best verses in 'The Pongo Papers,' by Lord Alfred Douglas, are those on the Lobster. The one good ground for elaboration such as this in nonsense-verses is technical success, and this these have in a high degree, while they are also much more amusing than most of the accepted examples."—Morning Leader.

"'The Pongo Papers,' by Lord Alfred Douglas, contain some of the wittiest verse that has been written in our time. The satire is rapier-like in its thrusts. The solemn methods of modern 'scientific' thinkers come in for some delicious raillery. 'The Duke of Berwick' is full of drollery, and will bear reading more than once. It is difficult to estimate the amount of delicate art and literary culture that have gone to the writing of these astonishingly clever nonsense-verses."—Publishers' Circular.

"The rhymes are vastly amusing, and are most delightfully written; the author has brought to the writing of them, as anybody who remembers 'The City of the Soul' would expect, all the knowledge of versification and charm of diction which only a real poet can possess. Lord Alfred Douglas, when an undergraduate, made a great reputation for his rhymes about animals. These rhymes have been imitated on every side, but he still remains the animal 'laureate' in spite of the multitude of his followers."—Court Journal.

"'The Pongo Papers' consist of most amusing nonsense-verses very cleverly done."—Irish Times.

"Et à présent, quiconque connaît assez l'anglais pour apprécier les finesses des 'nonsense rhymes' devra lire 'The Pongo Papers' and 'The Duke of Berwick' par Lord Alfred Douglas. Nous sommes loin du volume de Poems, que publia jadis le 'Mercure,' et, à ceux qui lui feraient le reproche de se complaire à ces distractions apparemment peu dignes d'un altier poète, Lord Alfred Douglas rétorque: 'Du fait que j'aurais écrit de magnifiques tragédies, me serai-je interdit de m'essayer dans la comédie.' Et il assure que les 'nonsense rhymes' sont pour le moins aussi difficiles à bien composer que le plus noble des poèmes épiques. En tous cas, ils ont le mérite d'être infiniment plus amusants."—Mercure de France.

EDUCATION, PERSONALITY, AND CRIME.

By ALBERT WILSON, M.D.

With about 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

The Author makes a new departure in suggesting that degeneracy forms as distinct a class as insanity. As a scientific basis he gives a full analysis of the brain of a degenerate who was a murderer. There are many micro-photographs to prove his case. If later observers support this view it will form quite a novel feature not only in pathology, but also in sociology and in the medico-legal aspect of crime.

Education, Responsibility, and Empire-building each occupy a chapter, while the subject of multiple personality and the sub-ego receives special attention. The Author details one case, already published, which he watched for thirteen years, and also a second case recently brought under his notice, besides enumerating several other cases from various sources, both at home and abroad.

The Author's remarks on crime and criminals will cause much discussion and controversy amongst the experts, his theories on "multiple personality" alone being startling yet convincing.

THE ACADEMY says: "The portrait of Quinion, the Labour leader, is likely to arouse most irritation. Labourites and Socialists are most sensitive nowadays, and the character of Quinion will not be allowed to pass unchallenged, for the very reason that there is a strong suspicion that it is true to life. 'The Prodigal City' is well worth reading."

LIFE AND LETTERS

We are pleased to be able to record the fact that the demonstration of the Suffragettes last Sunday was, from the point of view of the demonstrators, a gigantic fiasco. It becomes necessary to state this fact very plainly, because certain of the newspapers have published garbled reports giving the impression that the demonstration was "highly successful." The plain facts are that the crowd which at the invitation of the Suffragettes had assembled to pass its verdict upon them was a very hostile crowd. It was not merely good-naturedly hostile, but dangerously so, and had it not been for the presence of an overwhelming body of police, there can be no doubt that a serious disaster would have occurred. Had the angry crowd succeeded, as it very nearly did, in its object of overturning the vans on which the women speakers and their supporters were placed, there can be no doubt that many people, and perhaps many hundreds of people, would have been trampled to death. It is quite obvious that the Metropolitan police cannot devote the whole of their time to the task of protecting these foolish people from the consequences of their own folly, and the papers which have so light-heartedly travestied the real facts as to what occurred on Sunday have a very heavy responsibility. The result of these false representations as to the feeling in London towards the Suffragettes and the Suffragists can only serve to encourage these misguided women to continue their mischievous campaign. Sooner or later some of them will be seriously injured, as the feeling against them, which was at first one of good-humoured amusement, has grown into a violent exasperation which may at any time produce serious results.

Last week we called upon those ladies—the vast majority—who do not want votes, and bitterly resent the action of the Suffragettes and Suffragists to overcome their diffidence and their dislike to publicity to the extent of organising a counter-demonstration. Since then, however, we have been in communication with the Hon. Ivor Guest, the Hon. Secretary of the National Women's Anti-Suffrage Association, and Mr. Guest informs us that a great number of women who have joined the Association have made it a condition that they shall not be called upon to demonstrate publicly. The Association has therefore decided that it will under no circumstances incur the odium of imitating, even in a small degree, the methods of those members of its sex of which they so highly disapprove. We are quite convinced on reflection that they are right. Their protest will be confined to the formation of a league with branches in every electoral district in England in the country, and the movement has already assumed such large proportions that in itself it forms a final answer to the question put by Mr. Asquith to the women of the nation.

The cuckoo did not sing as announced. In other words, while Mr. George Bernard Shaw was paragraphed to walk in the woman's procession he thought better of it at the last moment and contented himself with being "encountered by the Press at Hyde Park Corner." Asked why he had decided not to perambulate, he replied, obviously and truthfully enough, "This is a woman's procession. I am not a woman, therefore I am not in it." According to the reporters, "three features in the procession arrested the eye of Mr. Shaw. His wife he greeted with uplifted hat. The second was a man carrying a baby; the third was a woman carrying a toy-dog. The juxtaposition of the two struck the philosopher. 'Look there,' said he, 'only one baby in the procession, and that carried by a man; only one dog in the procession, and that carried by a woman! Oh, what would Father Vaughan say if he were to see it!'"

It is all very well for Father Bernard Shaw to put these portents off on to Father Bernard Vaughan, but it does not seem to have occurred to Father Shaw that this procession, with its solitary baby carried by a man and its solitary toy-dog carried by a woman, was in a great measure Father Shaw's own handiwork. We do not suppose that there was a woman in that perspiring, fluttering throng who was not deeply versed in the religion of Father Shaw. It is he who purveys for strident woman-kind the bulk of their wobbly arguments. It is he who has studiously impressed them with the importance of despising the order of things, and particularly with the importance of pretending to despise and distrust the male man. Their mouths are full of his cheap cynicisms as to marriage, and the desirability of not bearing children unless you are paid handsomely for doing it. Great in the Suffragist camp is the name of Shaw, and piteously appalling is the lack of babies, not to mention manners and such like. And we are not at all sure that the toy-dog should not be reckoned a Shavian affair. Mr. Shaw is a great inventor of toy-dogs and similar gauds. He has toyed with the serious things of life to the mental destruction of Bayswater and the Shavian female, and we may see what we see in the shape of processions and shouting spinsters in consequence. It is amusing to note that while Mr. Shaw himself deemed it unwise to strut valiantly along Piccadilly with the women, sundry of his male admirers had no such qualms. Here and there the corlège was garnished with a limping minor poet or so, and we hope that Mr. Shaw blushed for them. We remember hearing a crusty critic of the old order remark that it was not the function of a minor poet to live in the best hotels, and it seems to us quite certain that it is not the function of minor poets to hobble at the tail-ends of feminine demonstrations.

We have before now ventured to offer advice to the Editor of the Times, and we shall now, with what courage we may, repeat the temerarious experiment. Our advice to the Editor of the Times is not to print in prominent positions in his paper the letters of young, irresponsible girls on matters which are completely beyond their comprehension. The Times the other day printed a letter from Miss Christabel Pankhurst in which this over-advertised young lady expressed her views as to the effect which last Sunday's demonstration ought to have had on Mr. Asquith. The Editor of the Times is not, so far as we are aware, in the habit of printing letters from schoolboys and undergraduates on matters which are of high national import, and why he should depart from the principle involved in this custom and make an exception in the favour of this particular young lady passes our comprehension. By doing so he makes the Times look ridiculous. There is only one place in the office of any serious newspaper for the letters of Miss Pankhurst and her like, and that is the waste-paper basket. If the Times and papers of like importance were to apply the common-sense rules of procedure which govern any great newspaper to the case of the Suffragists, their letters, their meetings and their methods, the whole agitation would speedily die of inanition. But, as long as they continue to invest with fictitious importance the utterances of babes and sucklings, we may depend upon the said babes and sucklings to continue the supply of "copy" which they seem to value so highly.

The Vicar of a certain church in Marylebone preached a sermon last Sunday on the text—Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life. The admirable discourse which followed illustrated the pleasing fact that, while the English Bishops are ready to authorise "special" services for that modern innovation called a Harvest Festival, they utterly refuse to allow their priests to celebrate the foundation of the Lord's Supper. "With many pumpkins," they seem to say, "with the largest seed potatoes, the biggest cottage loaves procurable, and some of the worst hymns in existence, let us celebrate the material feast: let the Dulcissimum Convivium, the Bread of Heaven and the Wine of Angels, remain unhonoured and unsung." It is not necessary to investigate minutely the motives and reasons of this course of action. A legend has it that Pontius Pilate was converted; it is probable that he was also priested and consecrated Bishop, and his name may be added to the Twelve who are candidates for the honour of having evangelised Britain. Pilate's great motive was cowardice; he was sometimes afraid of the Jews, sometimes afraid of Cæsar; and on the doctrine of Apostolical Succession he would seem to have bequeathed his chief quality to his successors. In a democratic age the Fear of Man is certainly a more popular and acceptable gift than the Fear of God.

But perhaps the Vicar in Marylebone did not realise that his text was quite specially appropriate. The famous Pan-Anglican Congress was then still in session; and one doubts whether there were ever a bigger example of labouring for the meat which perisheth. As a philanthropic gathering to discuss various "questions of the day" in an amiable if feeble spirit of "religiosity" the Congress might have passed; one would have said that it was a great pity that people presumably in earnest could find nothing better to do; and most enlightened and charitable persons would have agreed, adding "However, they mean well." We are suffering from "the spirit of the age," and one of the symptoms of this malady is that when A and B have discovered to their astonishment and delight that two and two make four they say to one another: "Let us assemble vast crowds of people and proclaim amid volleys of 'cheers,' 'hears,' and 'laughter' this truth to the world." This must be so; we are lucky when the discovery is as we have given it; too often A and B find out that two and two make five, and then the cheers are ever so much louder. But (in spite of that probable succession from Pontius Pilate) the Catholic Church of this land should not conform to the spirit of the age or to the ways of the world.

On an altar-cloth in a Roman Catholic church in Scotland are inscribed the words: The Unseen is here and calleth to thee. It would be difficult to indicate in better words the whole sphere and purpose of the Ecclesia Dei. If it seem desirable that "Pan-Anglicans" should gather in vast numbers let it be so that they may receive instruction in the profound mysteries of the Faith from Bishops and Doctors who "rightly divide the word of truth." An unspiritual gravitation is always dragging us down into material things; against our own desires we are continually falling into the error of believing that we live by bread alone—by the Butcher and the Baker, and the Agitation, and the Public Meeting, and the Act of Parliament, and the municipalisation of this and that, and our own fussy exertions generally; most of all by interfering in something which we don't understand. We need to remind ourselves continually, therefore, that we live by Miracles and Compassions; it is then doubly saddening and disgusting to look over the subjects of this foolish Congress, to note that these thousands of professing Catholics can listen to and applaud the dismal drivel of those ten weary days. Here is a sample: Mr. E. G. Selwyn, of King's College, Cambridge (it is the college where they think geomancy means "divination by earthquakes"), spoke as follows:

Why, in the course of an hour, pray so frequently for the King, and recite the Lord's Prayer three or four times, while there is no supplication concerning the problems in which the working-man is deeply concerned, such as the abolition of sweating, the increase of wages, better houses, and better conditions for women-workers? He suggested the frequent issue of an authorised Appendix to the Book of Common Prayer.

And then, on another day, Canon Rawnsley attacked the mutoscope-saloons, the vulgar picture-postcard, the "indecent weekly," and the "railway novel nuisance." He also declared a holy war against the "new novel," whatever that may be. A well-known actress suggested the insertion of a petition in the Litany for those who write, and the Rev. T. Lacey said there was no need of such a petition, as there was one already: "That it may please Thee to bless and keep the magistrates, giving them grace to execute justice," etc. And so on, and so on; and we would suggest that before our ecclesiastics venture to meddle with books or plays they would do well to acquire some faint tincture of knowledge of the subject. The Churchmen, allied with the Dissenting preachers, made the fortune of that disreputable rubbish "The Sign of the Cross;" a dignified Churchman made the fortune of that masterpiece "When it was Dark;" so far as ecclesiastics have had any influence at all in literature it has generally been of the most vicious and deplorable description. Their literary ignorance is abysmal, their literary folly is deep as nether Tartarus; let them hold their peace and keep the Faith, two duties for which hitherto they have shown a most marvellous incompetency. And in the meanwhile the Church of England may have the satisfaction of reflecting that it has succeeded in making a fool of itself before the whole world. Navigel Anticyram.

In his letter last week Mr. C. L. Marson said that:

The real question is whether the fundamental concepts of Socialism v. the Faith are coincident, or, at least parallel; or whether their very outlook is different.

Is there not here the usual mistake of confusing theoretic ideals—which are as necessary to Socialism as to Christianity, and in many cases common to both—with practical proposals?

Our contention was that the practical aims of a large majority of real Socialists was antagonistic to the Faith.

Mr. Marson states four principles which he considers the Church has always held, but now only Socialists apply to practical life:

1. "Inter-dependence of man." But is not this a necessity of civilised existence, universally recognised?

2. "The Socialists seem to be the only people who sincerely believe in governance—in authority." We could not accept this without the qualification "after their own methods," which certainly would not be the methods and discipline of the Church—to them altogether distasteful.

Mr. Marson exactly expresses the fundamental error of Socialists when he compares the "perfect polity" which they seek "with the Catholic conception of the heavenly Jerusalem."

Socialist schemes and proposals depend for their ultimate achievement on one thing only, and that the unattainable—the perfection of human nature. The Catholic, on the other hand, is well aware that perfection and Utopia are not to be found in this, but only in a future existence.

Socialists have sneered at Christian teachers for putting off the poor with a post-dated check on Heaven!

3. "Communal property" may be "an old and lovely Catholic thing" aimed at by the Doctors of the Church, but history shows that it has only been possible where communal religion has been the motive and communal monastic life the concrete realisation. To "nationalise" property in a State for all sorts and conditions of men and religions we believe impracticable. The rates are the nearest approach we have now to communal property. Can municipal methods of administering finance be considered inspiring or reassuring?

With a "perfect polity" of course there could be no corruption nor dishonesty. But Bishop Gore, a leading Christian Socialist, has pointed out that:

There is a false and misleading Socialism which ignores the fact of sin and the need of personal redemption.

Such Socialism is neither "coincident" with nor "parallel" to the Faith.

4. Does Mr. Marson really consider the ordinary fair interest payable on loans for public works "the great usury question"? He suggests "national banks" and "command loans." How are these to be managed? Many Socialists propose that gold should be "demonetised," and unlimited amounts of unconvertible notes issued on the model of the assignats of the French Revolution, whose ultimate value, though secured on the national possessions, as Mirabeau boasted in 1790, was merely waste paper.

A short while ago a certain correspondent of ours inquired where, in our opinion, the best English was spoken, and we gave him our opinion. At that time, however, we had not had the pleasure of listening to Mademoiselle Yvette Guilbert at the Palace Theatre. Yvette Guilbert has studied and sings several songs in English, and anything more fascinating and beautiful it would be hard to conceive. Of course it is unnecessary to say that Yvette Guilbert is pre-eminent in her own art in her own language. Her rendering of "Les Cloches de Nantes" is a marvellous performance, and produces an effect which is quite overwhelming. But it is this new accomplishment of singing songs in English which will make the strongest appeal to the majority of an English audience. On the night of our visit the huge audience at the Palace was completely swept off its feet with enthusiasm over the last song which Yvette Guilbert sang, "The Gallant Man." It is, as many of our readers will be aware, an old Scotch ballad. We can only say that any one who is able to beg, borrow, or steal the price of admission to the Palace Theatre to hear this wonderful artiste, and who fails to do so, will deserve to be written down an ass. It is the sort of performance which we would cheerfully tramp twenty miles to see every day of the week, and we have every intention of seeing it again as soon as possible.

After reading the denunciations of the Evening Standard directed against the statues outside the British Medical School we proceeded to examine them as far as we could. To those which are now exposed to view we can imagine no possible objection being taken. They are symbolic nude male figures, and they are executed with considerable skill and feeling. To condemn them it would be necessary logically to condemn a large proportion of the fine statuary in the British Museum and in the galleries all over the Continent. If the Evening Standard had not drawn attention to them they would probably not have excited any particular notice. On the other hand, we are bound to say that among the statues which are at present concealed, or partly concealed, by the hoarding there is at least one to which objection might be taken. While we do not forget that such figures are common in pictures in the finest schools of Italian art, it is certainly very questionable whether they are suitable as statues, especially when exposed to view in a public thoroughfare. The other statues which are concealed by the hoarding we have not been able to inspect, and we can therefore offer no opinion on them.

There are a great many hazy notions going about as to what constitutes the art of the theatre. Certain superior persons who go in for what they are pleased to call "advanced ideas" affect to scoff at the musical comedy, and it has had the distinction of being abused by Mr. Bernard Shaw. But there is no doubt that very often the so-called serious play is of much less importance than the merest musical comedy. It would be absurd to maintain that Havana, which is now being played at the Gaiety Theatre, is a great play or anything remotely approaching to it. On the other hand, it is an exceedingly delightful entertainment, and the beauty of the cigarette-girls, the flower-girls, and the other girls (particularly "those with the curly curls" is quite bewildering. We cannot justly say that we consider the music is up to the mark, but the Gaiety has a way of improving on its original songs as the run of a piece goes on, and we have no doubt that the process will be repeated in the present case. Miss Evie Greene made the best use of her pleasing voice in songs which did not give her very much opportunity of shining, and among the men Mr. Alfred Lester, Mr. W. H. Berry, and Mr. Lawrence Grossmith were particularly excellent, and the dancing was up to the usual high Gaiety standard.

In our issue of next week we shall publish an important article, called "The Insolent Publisher."

WILSFORD

I.

Lilies and Pansies, and the Pink that grows
In grey-leaved clusters by the garden's edge,
Sweet scented Choisia, and the Vine that throws
Her trails and tendrils by the window ledge,
The rose called Celeste, and the one named Dawn
These have I knowledge of, these are my own ;
And where lush water-meadows meet the lawn
Within my garden are their blossoms shown.

I love this garden, and when most the fret
And noise of living would destroy mine ease
I seek its precincts, and my foot is set
Within its sunlight and its silences.
I take my spirit's road, and cool and wet
The rain falls suddenly for thirsty trees.

II.

This garden has a soul, it has its moods,
As any sentient mind from hour to hour.
I know the leafy silence of its woods
That are so thickly grown with Hemlock flower.
The Hemlock, with her world of slender lace,
Whose leaf is earliest green of all the year,
Beneath the beeches in sequestered place
She spreads the forest of her presence here ;
And draws a veil, as if to hide the slopes
Of the more sunlit of the garden spaces,
Where Tulips blaze, and later Heliotropes
Are set with Poppies, in their several places.
And here the bindweeds knot their twisted ropes
To star the twilight with their milk-white faces.

III.

And it shall be this garden's crown of crowns
That it should be encompassed by no hedge.
It finds a shelter in the high chalk Downs
And takes its own way to the river's edge.
And in this homeliness finds, to my seeing,
For its red Roses a supreme retreat ;
Since it is wholesome for their pride of being
To be so neighbourly with Meadow-sweet.
And here is Ragged Robin, and the Dock,
Whose seeds you draw into your passing hand ;
This garden hears the sheep-bells of the flock
That browses, wattled, on its further strand,
And here are meadows, pale with Lady's-smock
And willows, leaning to the marshy land.

CARLYLE AND OTHERS

Memories of London in the 'Forties. By DAVID MASSON.
(Blackwood, 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS book of "Memories," by the late veteran scholar Professor Masson, arranged and annotated by his daughter, has a particular interest. There are four chapters, of which the first—"Carlyle"—has by far the greatest attraction. There is a pleasant autobiographical light in the whole book, but we especially welcome the portrayal of Carlyle in the mind of his devoutest friends. What was the secret of the loyal and affectionate admiration with which some who knew the grim prophet regarded him? For these days the Carlyle doctrines are largely discredited and himself has suffered at the hands of biographers; bitter wrangles have provoked uneasiness, if not disgust; we have heard more of Carlyle's private life than we wanted to hear, and so have come to think less of his position in literature than we ought.

Now a paper like this of Professor Masson's helps to check this unjust depreciation by giving us a simple, vivid, familiar picture of Carlyle at home. There is no wild championship or ridiculous assertion, but when you reach the end of the chapter you find the great, pathetic figure—usually so dolorous, fierce, scornful—a little more human and pleasant. The visible man is described thus:

The hair dark and thick, without a sign of grizzle, the complexion a strong bilious-ruddy, the brow overhanging and cliff-like, the eyes deep-sunk and aggressive, and the firm mouth and chin then closely-shaven. All in all, with his lean, erect figure, then over 5ft. 11in. in height, and the peculiar bilious-ruddy of his face, he was, apart from the fire of genius in his eyes and flowing through his talk, not unlike some Scottish farmer or other rustic of unusually strong and wiry constitution living much in the open air. His Annandale accent contributed to this resemblance. His vocabulary and grammar were of the purest and most stately English, and the Scotticism, which was very marked, was wholly in the pronunciation and intonation. Like Scotsmen generally, from whatever district of Scotland, he enunciated each syllable of every word with a deliberation and emphasis unusual with English speakers, giving each, as it were, a good bite before letting it go. The West Border intonation was intensified, in his case, by a peculiarity which was either wholly his own or a special characteristic of the Carlyles of Ecclefechan. He spoke always with a distinct lyrical chaunt, not with the monotonous and whining sing-song, mainly of pulpit origin, one hears occasionally among Scotsmen, and which is suggestive too often of hypocrisy and a desire to cheat you, but a bold and varying chaunt, as of a man not ashamed to let his voice rise and fall, and obey by instinctive modulation every flexure of his meaning and feeling. Mrs. Carlyle had caught something of this lyrical chaunt by sympathy and companionship, and the slighter Scotticism of her voice was distinguished also by a pleasant habit of lyrical rise and cadence.

Incidentally, this passage (we may remark) affords a commentary upon the answer to an enquiry appearing in THE ACADEMY just recently as to the speaking of pure English. Masson seems to have been fortunate in gaining the ready interest of both Carlyle and his wife, and he recalls many pleasant scenes from his friendship with them. It is a kindlier, humaner Carlyle that he reveals, a prophet not yet forgetting his message in an indiscriminate, irreflective railing at a deaf world; the sketch is more merciful and hardly less intimate than those which were revived in the sharp controversies of a few years ago. Here is an aspect of the Chelsea prophet which is agreeably unfamiliar:

Of all the walks that Carlyle and I took together in the old London nights that now lie behind me like a distant-stretching dream, there are two which I recall now with peculiar associations of sacredness. One summer night about eleven o'clock we had passed our usual parting-point at Hyde Park Corner and had strolled into the Park itself, lured by the beauty of a specially soft and star-brilliant sky overhead. The softness and stillness around and the starry brilliance above had touched his soul to its finest and gentlest depths. All roughness, all querulousness were gone; he was in a mood of the simplest and most sage-like serenity. As we sauntered to and fro on the grass, the sole human beings peripatetic, where but a few hours before there had been the roar of the carriages in stream and the parallel gallop of the equestrians, it was the stars and the silence that seemed to work upon him and to suggest his theme. From the mystery and splendour of physical infinitude he passed to what ought to be the rule of human behaviour, the conduct of one's own spirit, in a world framed so majestically and so divinely. There was too much jesting in it, he said, too much of mere irony and of laughter at the absurd, too little of calm religiousness and serious walk with God. In speaking of the over-prevalence of the habit of irony, sarcasm, and jesting, he used a sudden phrase of self-humiliation which I have never forgotten. "Ah! and I have given far too much in to that myself—sniggering at things." Though they are the only exact words I can now recall out of that quarter of an hour of his varied talk, all in the same vein of deeply-moved meditation, it is the solemn charm of the whole of the little colloquy that remains in my memory. If ever one man spoke to another absolutely spirit to spirit, it was Carlyle to me in that quarter of an hour of our walk to and fro in that star-silvered and tree-skirted solitude in the middle of London.

The other occasion was that of Carlyle's offering, in a manner of fine delicacy, pecuniary assistance to his young friend when suspecting some need on the part of the latter. All this is hardly the Carlyle whom the stormy disputes of various friends have created for us, and we are frankly glad to have these happier, affectionate lights.

Another chapter, "Down Street, Piccadilly," is full of reminiscence, as is also the final paper, "A London Club." Masson was a member of the "Museum Club," of which Douglas Jerrold was a kind of chief, and Charles Knight, Hervey of the "Athenæum," and Shirley Brooks were frequenters. When the "Museum" died, "Our Club" rose from the ashes; and of this Professor Masson writes fondly, with various anecdotes of the humour of the members. These anecdotes, these jokes of such desperate fervour, seem to us to belong to a period incalculably remote; yet "Our Club" flourished less than forty years since! More attractive are the glimpses of Dickens and Thackeray—the latter "a man apart, a sad and highly sensitive man, a man with whom nobody could take a liberty." And there are also brief, vivid sketches of Kossuth and Mazzini. To Mazzini, indeed, a whole chapter is devoted; but, beyond a record of one or two meetings, there is little of personal interest in it and much of political recapitulation. This, in fact, is the only disappointment—save brevity—in a book of singular interest and real value.

VITA BREVIS

A History of Art. By DR. G. CAROTTI. Vol. I. Ancient Art. Revised by MRS. ARTHUR STRONG. (Duckworth, 5s.)

IF we say at the outset that we consider it impossible for one man to write a history of art even on a large scale; that a history of art on a small scale is not a history at all; and that Dr. Carotti has written a book which more nearly earns its title than we should have thought possible under the circumstances, we shall have made clear our point of view with regard to this book.

Nowadays, it is quite superfluous to say, things are done in a hurry. We wake in a hurry, we work in a hurry, we learn, we play, we eat, we sleep in a hurry. One of the inevitable results of this ghastly state of affairs (and not the worst result by a long way) is the production—not necessarily in a hurry—of "little books on great subjects." This is a little book on a great subject. It measures 6½ by 5 inches; it contains, besides thirty pages of bibliography and fifty pages of index, a history of ancient art in 340 pages of text, together with 540 illustrations! Moreover, though much of the type is small, it is all of an eminently readable size.

Naturally, the virtue of such a book must lie in division and sub-division, in classification and order, rather than in fulness of description and discussion of style. There is no room for controversy. We must be content with dogma. Freely admitting these limitations, we must also admit the author's right to state his own views with finality; and thus we will not turn aside from our pleasant task of appreciation to dispute Professor Carotti's Egyptian chronology, even though we do most emphatically disagree both with it and with Mrs. Strong's airy dictum, in her Introduction, to the effect that a couple of millennia one way or the other can make so little difference in Egyptian chronological systems as to render unnecessary "even a warning footnote" to draw attention to the novelty of the author's ideas on the subject.

Another point on which we find ourselves at issue with the author is his classification of Aegean art in the "Oriental period." Sargon had become a shadowy myth before the neolithic Cretan began to evolve the art which later did so much to enliven Egyptian ideas of beauty. And the points of contact between the Aegean and Western Asia were neither frequent nor continuous enough to bring Aegean art into the same category with the art of Chaldæa.

There are some irritating inaccuracies of description in reference to the illustrations of Cretan art. For example, the famous steatite "harvesters" vase from Phaistos is described as a "tazza," and as an example of ceramic art. And the statement that the Dorians were "mountaineers, really of the same race as the Aegeans themselves," is not supported either by a particle of evidence or a shadow of probability.

It is pleasant to find the Phoenicians given their proper subordinate position in the art development of the Mediterranean, and the chronology of their prosperity reveals a very interesting state of natural antagonism between their interests as the carriers of the Aegean and the interests of the Aegean race of sea-masters.

The few pages devoted to Persian art are extremely well written and illustrated. The estimate of the Persian power of artistic assimilation is a good one, and is well expressed in the minute space devoted to it.

Naturally, the main body of the book is devoted to Greek and Roman art. And here it would be difficult to award any but the most whole-hearted praise. For in dealing with such a vast body of art production, system is absolutely necessary, and the author has marshalled his material with great skill. Steadily, and in good order, the facts of Greek art development are passed before us in review. If there are gaps, at least the ranks are so closed that no gaps are visible. Architecture, sculpture, painting, the minor arts—jewellery, terra-cottas, and vases—all receive their fair share of attention, and the main characteristics of each school and of each of the principal artists are plainly and rapidly set forth. A child could understand the language, and an archæologist will find a wealth of fact ideally arranged for rapid reference. The vexed question of the style of Lysippos is perhaps treated more originally than soundly; but at least his ultimate influence on Greek sculpture is given its true description.

Of the greatest value to students are the summaries of extant examples of the various periods of art, with the museums in which they are to be found. These should recommend the book to a wide public, even though it had no other virtue to recommend it, which is far from being the case, and in like manner the section on Greek painting sets out in small compass much information which has hitherto been rather inaccessible to the ordinary "spare-time" student of ancient art.

Roman art is given a great deal of space, when we consider how little there was in it either of art or originality. We are perfectly well aware that in saying this we shall call down upon our heads the wrath of Mrs. Strong. But none the less, we are firmly of the opinion that whatever there was of originality in Roman sculpture constituted its weakness, and that Roman architecture never existed. The Romans were magnificent builders and engineers. As architects they were tasteless adapters of styles they did not understand. Their only great art was that of portraiture, in which they set up a standard of imaginative and material realism which has been at once the aim and the bane of portrait sculptors ever since, and which yet never approached the subtle power of characterisation of the Alexandrian sculptors. As to the horses of San Marco, we simply refuse to believe that they are Roman work, as the author, without giving any authority, states them to be. In the minor arts they were undoubtedly more successful; and as silversmiths in particular they produced work at once bold and delicate—the work of the confident and loving craftsman. Roman art has left a mark upon European art out of all proportion to its ultimate value, and the skill and learning of its modern apologists will probably result in winning for it a place in the modern mind still more in excess of its deserts.

An extremely complete bibliography and an excellent index complete a volume which is far ahead of any other book of its kind that we have met with hitherto, both in the matter of fulness and compactness. If the future volumes are as good as the first the complete work should enjoy a wide circulation. For the necessary process of elimination has been carried out with rare skill, and though there are inaccuracies, and though some of the opinions held by the author are open to more than doubt, reference to the books mentioned, not only by name but in the essential details of publisher, price, and date, will serve to correct the hasty impressions received from dogmatic statement.

The translation is very fairly good. It is readable, and does not suggest a foreign idiom in more than one or two places. There are a few instances of obvious mistranslation—e.g., "eruption" for "irruption," on p. 57, and the peculiar phrase, in reference to the work of Lysippos, "bronze, a material to which he reverted."

The illustrations, in some cases, suffer from their extreme reduction, especially those of the crowded Roman reliefs and some portraits; there are a few which measure no more than $\frac{7}{8}$ by $\frac{1}{2}$ an inch. But take it for all in all, the book is one which contains enough of pleasure and profit to outweigh by far all the disadvantages necessarily consequent upon its compactness.

THE DAWN OF THE CONSTITUTION

The Dawn of the Constitution: the Reigns of Henry III. and Edward I. By SIR JAMES H. RAMSAY, Bart., of Bamff, M.A., LL.D. (Swan Sonnenschein and Co., Ltd., 12s.)

"I CONTINUE to write not in any partisan spirit, nor to further or combat any particular views, but to provide those desirous of knowing the cardinal facts of English history with a consecutive and verified narrative, based on the original authorities, with the help of all modern lights and interpretations."

This claim which Sir James makes in his Preface is fully supported by the text, and there is much to be said for his protest against "unverified histories." His narrative is clear, calm, and well arranged. Yet we fear that it will not attract any but the most strenuous student. There is little or no animation in these pages; the historian accepts as a definition of style "precision, veracity of utterance, truth to the thing to be presented." The unattractive blue cover and the terrible ponderousness of the book when held in the hand are not, alas! counterbalanced by its inner contents. "Truthful presentation of facts" is no doubt important—nay, essential—but it is not enough. We should be made to feel—and this is the root of the matter—that these people who laid the bases of our Constitution were live men, not mere figments in an orderly array of facts. Sir James is loth to deprecate the artistic touch; but he will not, or cannot, use it.

The reviewer confesses that he is of those to whom the reign of Henry III. has always seemed "a dreary period," illuminated but very feebly by those rushlights the political songs, which waft a faint breath of life over the dead bones of wrangling barons and clerics. Even "the dismal comicality" which Sir James finds in the "consistent perversity" (no ill description, by the way) of the King's conduct fails to provide a sufficient solatium. Earl Simon himself is an unsatisfactory, not altogether credible personage, though he was doubtless the most enlightened of his time. Sir James thinks that his war on the King's friends in 1263 was "a proceeding worthy of King John;" and is inclined to regret that he Had not paused awhile at the close of the year 1262, after the Papal condemnation of the provisions of Oxford, or again in 1264, after the award of Amiens, to see how the King would behave.

Perhaps he hardly deserved the hymns composed in his honour.

As to Edward I., whose support of his father our historian not unjustifiably holds to have been the only thing which saved him from the fate of our Edward II. or Richard II.—perhaps, though, Henry VI. was his nearest analogue—the character presented does not differ greatly from previous estimates. "A man of war, but no shedder of blood," with natural impulses towards justice and truth, "he cannot forgive the man who gets the better of him;" and his autocratic ideas of kingship, derived from Louis IX., considerably modify his appreciation of the value of popular institutions. He is credited with having initiated the custom of having national prayers in times of stress or anxiety, and the less laudable one of holding tournaments; but is denied "any perception of humour" or preoccupation with literature or art. We are glad at last to find a historian candid enough to admit that Pactum Serva was not a motto "that could honestly be claimed on his behalf." Where his interest was concerned he could keep his word, but "in the spirit of a peddling attorney;" on occasion he could "stoop even to falsification of documents." But the aforesaid motto, as Dean Stanley showed, was inscribed on the great King's tomb some three centuries after his death. With all his faults Edward's legal genius, and the fact that he had a conscience, gives him a high place amongst mediæval monarchs.

Sir James Ramsay is a careful and well-informed guide in matters military, and has himself been over the fields of Lewes, Evesham, Stirling, and Falkirk, and is zealous in correcting from the public records the exaggerations of monkish chroniclers. In another department, that of the royal revenue, he claims to have the field all to himself, but guards himself against aught but provisional acceptance of his figures. To the zealous in matters fiscal his Appendices of Exchequer and Wardrobe Accounts will doubtless prove valuable. In the list of authorities cited we notice that the author of the "Decline and Fall" is described as "Gibbon, G.;" we always thought his name was Edward. We have also been rather mystified by a note in which the reader is warned that the Plantagenet dynasty "came in with Edward IV." The indispensable Index is praiseworthy.

A ROLAND FOR AN OLIVER

The Government of England. By PROFESSOR A. LAWRENCE LOWELL. Two Vols. (Macmillan and Co., 17s. net.)

THE American people have given us a perfectly fair and courteous retort to Mr. James Bryce's book on the American Commonwealth by this excellent work, a book which those who read will wish to possess; while those who possess it will wish to retain it for reference. It is not a history; it is not a law-book; it is not a Constitutional Whitaker; it is an impartial and detached account of how England is ruled and rules herself, clearly given, in a temperate literary style, and with an aloofness which is content to describe, with as little comment as possible. The description is taken from original sources, is as accurate as hard work and an ingenuous mind can make it, and the information concerns recent and present situations, methods, and movements. To have accomplished this good piece of work is not only to help us, who are within the English rule, to see things steadily, and see them whole and so to help the cause of light and clearness of vision in regions where heat often takes the place of light; it is to furnish a veracious picture to the readers of the United States of a rule which they often refer to, criticise at random, and on the whole seldom understand. A book like this will certainly furnish materials for an entente to a people who do not love us over much, or at least to such of them as are disposed to inquire into methods which are not their own methods, but about which it can do them no harm to hear.

Professor Lowell begins with the Crown, and sums up not only the King's legal position but explains the inevitableness of the Crown for our Parliamentary system, the smooth working of that institution, and the fact there is really no Republican sentiment left in England. But he something underrates the influence of the Crown. Is it true that

The actual influence of Queen Victoria upon the course of political events was small as compared with the great industry and activity she displayed?

After the death of the Prince Consort, whose views are felicitously described as expressed "in terms not applicable to England," the late Queen was more and more in touch with her people and had a great increase of influence. The description of the Cabinet is excellent, and there is a note of surprise in the writer at its informal character and its great reticence in matters about which the ears of journalists perpetually itch. There is much wisdom, too, in the accounts of the permanent official, who can do no wrong, who shapes matters almost too powerfully for the little responsibility he carries, but who is gradually coming from his dark recess to enjoy subdued honours and possible reproofs; it may be a little too subdued. In one or two minor points the writer has been misled. It is not true, for instance, that slums move but little, and so the voters do not get disfranchised. One of the most perplexing facts about slums is that the whole population moves about twice a year. In the matter of the two political organisations, the National Liberal Federation and the National Union of Conservative Associations, we are told that Both are shams, but with this difference—that the Conservative organisation is a transparent and the Liberal an opaque sham.

It is but too true that our habit of breaking up one another's meetings is "not condemned by average public opinion;" and it ought to be, although our judicious friend does not say so. In a valuable essay on the strength of party ties we read with some surprise that the influence of party upon legislation is, on the whole, much greater in England than in America, "but it is more closely confined to public measures." In fact that and much other casual American information given to the reader causes him surprise—it may be surprise tinged with doubt. A valuable chapter is that upon Municipal Trading. It is so wise that some of its paragraphs may be shortly summarised. Municipal trading arises from a desire of profit, a distrust of companies, the zeal of officials, and the fact that when innovations are proposed to the private Committees of the House, the ratepayers are not represented. The dangers are the restriction of area, the increase of debt, the check to private enterprise, and the multiplication of public employees. The practical man, except in London just now, is everywhere deciding that it works, and he does not see or care whither he is ultimately going. This grieves our author unnecessarily; but, as he has pointed out in an earlier place, our rule is not logical, it is scientific. It is salutary for all debaters on this subject to see that mere municipal trading has no automatic advantage, but only wise, strenuous, and prudent trading. The chapter on the Church is also written in a natural vein of mild astonishment. She Possesses organs so arranged as to imply a closely-knit, if not a centralised form of self-government; and yet those organs have so little power, either legislative or administrative, and the units are so independent, that for practical purposes the Church resembles a profession rather than an organisation.

The Church is not only "bound hand and foot;" but gagged, and as far as possible blinded and deafened, we may safely add. The English conception of law as an expression of natural justice, which, again, means a body of practical maxims to be applied by the court, naturally lies at the back of our whole system, and is properly set forth in a useful chapter—too condensed, perhaps, for the purpose.

On the whole our author is struck by the honesty and truthfulness of the English people, which he attributes largely to the fact that the upper class at present rules us. But we are heading hard for "paternalism," and are more sanguine, impatient, and less fatalist than our fathers were, and in legislation we are horribly hand-to-mouth fellows. Professors all want us to take long views and to elaborate theories. And this one is no exception; but he tells us his wish so politely and pleasantly on the whole that we do not grumble. Perhaps we are getting kinder. The London cats (p. 523) do not now bolt at the entry of a stranger, as they did a generation ago, but walk up to be stroked, with tail erect. That is something, and it implies more. What do the New York and Harvard cats do? Let them come into court, if we are to be compared, and our cats will be even with them: but it is pleasant to think that our cats have got us good marks from the Harvard examiner, and we cheerfully join our purring to theirs. Even the British lion can throw out sparks when he is stroked kindly.

MEN AND MEASURES

The Roman Empire. By H. STUART JONES. "Story of the Nations" Series. (T. Fisher Unwin, 5s.)

MR. STUART JONES, in his Preface, admits the impossibility of writing a complete and final history of Rome. And his review, in a form more or less popular, of the most complicated, and at the same time the most inspiring, period of Roman history makes no pretence of finality. But it is not too much to say that the author has succeeded in presenting at least one side of the development of Imperial Rome in a fashion which will fix his point of view in the minds of his readers. The players in his drama are lifelike, their actions are reasonable, their motives intelligible. And, whether or no we are capable of appreciating the dramatic unity of history, we are all better able to understand its drift if we realise that history is made up of the aggregate of human action, and not of haphazard tricks of fate. We do not think that Mr. Jones has deliberately set before himself the task of realising the individuals of his history. There is a lack of rhetorical effort about his writing which bespeaks attention rather to the wide issues of his subject than to the details of personal character. But he never loses sight of the fact that the history of the Roman Empire is far more a history of men than was the history of the Republic. And thus his estimates of the character of this and that individual go far to elucidate the history in which those individuals were concerned. For example, the whole of the basis on which the Imperial system rested was the direct outcome of the caution and tact which characterised Augustus after he had come into undisputed power in Rome, and the weakness, as well as the strength, of the system was the heritage of an empire from the policy of an individual. Where Cæsar failed Augustus succeeded, for genius refuses compromise, while prudence accepts it. But the masked monarchy of Augustus proved but an insecure foundation for the absolutism of his successors, although he was in essence no more of an opportunist than his greater forerunner, whose dreams were rather of conquest than of empire.

Yet even so Augustus met and solved problems which had never been Cæsar's care. While he kept the outward forms of the Republic, he widened the scope of Roman activity:

It was at least part of Augustus's task to devise a theory by which a monarchy might be enabled to masquerade as a republic. He was not neglectful of forms, but it was in the realm of facts that his chief work was accomplished. For forty-three years he laboured incessantly to give the world which lay at his feet an organised government worthy of the name, and to solve the practical problems which the Republic had never faced.

The keynote of Augustus's life-work was the absorption of the client kingdoms into the Empire, a process which continued down to the very end. The supremacy of the Italian peoples, though it was veiled by the accession to power of one provincial Emperor after another, became the central fact of Roman Imperial existence, and it was to Augustus that the inception of the work was due. And this was largely accomplished by the gradual centralisation of the senatorial power in the person of a single object of devotion—the Emperor himself. Here, too, the means were based on the individual, for personal devotion to the Emperor was the surest door to the senatorial order, and time brought into existence a Senate accustomed to personal service, as no revolutionary sweeping away of the old order could have done.

When Vitellius refused the title of Cæsar, and deferred to the Senate, he was deferring to a spirit which no longer existed. The Julian dynasty had done its work thoroughly, and Rome was no longer republican even in aspiration. The forms might still flatter, but their meaning was gone. A strange aspect of the history of the Roman Empire is revealed by the part which is played by religion in its development. It seems as though, with the fall of the Republic, the old religious solidity of the Romans had ceased to exist; and for long enough gods were made and unmade with the rise and fall of Emperors. But in the long run the innate religious feeling of the Roman reasserted itself, and the Mithraism of Aurelian was no mere counterblast to Christianity, but a political necessity. The growing power of the Christian faith in the Empire was a menace to the Empire itself, for it was a power that must either be supreme or must be definitely rejected before it was too late. The persecution of the Christians has been much exaggerated, and we think that the author is inclined to lay rather a disproportionate amount of stress upon that which actually took place; but, as he remarks, it would be interesting to know the lengths to which Aurelian would have gone in this direction had his reign continued longer after the official declaration of the worship of the "Unconquered Sun." Aurelian's was a powerful personality, and his aim of real consolidation for the Empire would not have been cramped by small scruples. But, at any rate, it is plain that the necessity of a convincing religious faith for the health of a nation was clearer to him than it is to a good many well-meaning folk in these days of love and charity for every variety of pestilential heresy that can be raked in from the five continents. Julian's weakness lay in the same trimming "toleration" as that of to-day. And Mr. Jones's outline of his position is one of the best things in the book.

If it had been possible to devote more space to this book, we should have liked to emphasise in detail the excellent treatment accorded to the reign and reforms of Diocletian—assuredly one of the greatest of the Emperors of Rome. For it points the soundness, in the person of the Emperor himself, of the system upon which he went to work to reconstitute the solidity of the Empire. It is true that the reorganisation of the Army involved, to a great extent, its denationalisation, but we think that Mr. Jones goes too far when he says that:

Thus the science which, in the days before arms of precision were invented, gave to civilised troops their sole advantage over barbaric courage was irretrievably lost, and the fate of Rome was sealed.

To tell the truth, we rather fancy that we can detect a note of hostility to the whole Imperial system in Mr. Jones's writing. It is not unnatural, for Rome of the Empire was great mostly in spite of herself and of her Emperors; and the glamour of Rome is a thing that, for ourselves, we have never been able to understand, though, in a degree, we are bound to admit its existence. Greece and her gods are gone, for all their claim on our imagination, but Rome, who has contributed nothing to the history of the world save the spirit of order born of the body of chaos, is with us still, maintaining her claim to universal dominion as the seat of a spiritual kingdom which, in the words of an English philosopher, is "none other than the ghost of the deceased Roman Empire sitting crowned upon the grave thereof."

THE SUFFRAGIST AND THE SOCIALIST

THE article which appeared in last week's issue of THE ACADEMY under the above title has provoked a voluminous correspondence, most of it rehearsing ancient and fish-like arguments. From Lady Henry Somerset, however, we have received the following :

SIR,—I am amused to find on reading your article of June 20th on "The Suffragist and the Socialist" that I fall between every stool. When I spoke at the Albert Hall I was hissed by some who took a militant attitude for expressing my strong disapproval of the methods lately adopted by a certain section of women for enforcing their views. The open disapproval thus shown did not surprise me. I thought it well emphatically to state my position, and I did so with no uncertain voice.

In your article you say I "publicly admitted that I approved of the methods of the Suffragettes and sympathised with them." The ladies who hissed evidently did not understand my words in this sense, and the writer of your article could neither have been present nor have done me the honour to read my speech, reported in the Times and other daily papers, so the terrible object-lesson which I present against the suffrage by reason of my "feminine mind," on this account at any rate, falls to pieces like a house of cards, and I fail to see why the condemnation of Suffragette methods "is a good and sufficient reason to prove" that I cannot open my mouth at a public meeting "without abundantly justifying that ancient and wise provision of the law which debars women from the franchise." I quote from the words of your article.

I may be, as you say, "limited in my lights ;" I may be unfit to share with the public-house loafer the responsibility of voting ; but at any rate I may share with the meanest the right to have my words reported as they were spoken, and not misrepresented in order to furnish a good instance for a poor argument.—Yours faithfully,

ISABEL SOMERSET.

June 22, 1908.

We are obliged to Lady Henry Somerset for her letter. There can be no doubt in the world that she shares with the meanest the right to have her words reported as they were spoken, and not misrepresented. It is true that in the Times report of her speech in the Albert Hall she is made to say that : "It would not be just or honest if she were not to say that she was not in accord with many of the methods which have been recently used in order to push [the Suffragist] principles into the ranks of practical politics." But she immediately went on to remark that she had "a deep respect—nay more, she had a reverence—for all who were willing to suffer for their opinions." Furthermore she observed that : "This would make her refrain even from criticising actions which she could not honestly endorse, were it not that she felt that in a great measure the mind of a large portion of the public associated their claim with actions which they deprecated and called unwomanly ; but they who believed in being womanly first felt strongly that their attitude was in no way incompatible with their insistence on the right to vote." The point of our article was that this very attitude is incompatible with the Suffragist insistence on the right to vote. So that our house of cards scarcely tumbles so readily as Lady Henry Somerset could wish. Nowhere in her speech did she come out flatly and condemn the unseemly conduct which has all along characterised the Suffragist campaign.

The words of which she complains were : "Lady

Henry Somerset—one of the leaders of the Suffragist movement—publicly admitted that she approved of the methods of the Suffragists and sympathised with them." In so far as this is a misrepresentation of Lady Henry Somerset's actual words we are extremely sorry, and we apologise to Lady Henry Somerset. The misrepresentation was inadvertent. But, although it is true that Lady Henry said she was not in accord with many of the methods which had been recently used, nobody can read those portions of the Times report of her speech which we have quoted without concluding that she excuses and condones the Suffragist methods, and we submit that to excuse and condone amounts to approval. It is all very well to say to rowdy persons, "I do not sympathise with your methods, but pray go on and prosper. There is nothing incompatible with reasonableness in your attitude." This in effect is what Lady Henry Somerset said. It is true that a feminine audience hissed some of her remarks, but that was before she had finished her speech, for we find that the very last offering of Lady Henry's audience was "Cheers." There is such a thing as damning a movement with faint praise. We think that Lady Henry Somerset praised the Suffragettes' methods with faint damns. Apart from any question of mistake, however, it is quite evident that Lady Henry is a supporter of the Suffragist agitation for votes. We hold that the agitation has from the first been so inseparably associated with brawling and improprieties of conduct on the part of its advocates that dissociation is now impossible. If the Suffragists were to be sworn down to a womanly and decent ventilation of their views the movement would cease to be of the smallest consequence. Au fond it is of no consequence whatever. The women of England desire the vote with no more desire than they desire that their faces should be embellished with whiskers. If a plebiscite of the women of the country could be taken to-morrow the Suffragists would find themselves in a hopeless and preposterous minority. The instinct of intelligent women is entirely against the whole business. The whoopers and the screamers and the female stump-orators and banner-bearers and processionists are no more the women of England than if they were the three tailors of Tooley Street. For every woman that has trudged the London streets among the banner-wavers it would be possible to produce at least ten women who, should occasion arise, would consent to be driven over the same ground in the interests of a counter-demonstration. The tap-root of the whole trouble lies in the vanity and the rebellion of certain ill-balanced women. The broad basis of their argument is that they can no longer "trust" mankind. Though their liberties and rights are much more generously recognised in England than in any other country in the world, they pretend that they are ground down and treated improperly, and that the only way in which their dreadful state can be ameliorated is that the franchise should be extended to them. The working-class women of England see the falsity of all this, and so do the upper-class women. It is the middle-class women of the country from whose ranks the agitators are, for the most part, recruited. There are reasons for this, the chief of them being that it is the middle-class woman who has brought herself most generally into conscious competition with salary-earning men, and it is the middle-class woman who is filled with the soaring ambition to conduct her life on an unfeminine basis. Her position is often a bitter one, because she is only too frequently over-educated, and she can never make sure of getting married. Hence she is discontented, peevish, and prone to imagine that the world is wrongly made. There is an incompleteness about her life which is pitiable. It is natural that she should look round for something which will alleviate her condition, and she has got it into her head that "the vote" will do this for her. Greater or more woeful mistake was never made. The political assuagement of a spiritual trouble is an impossibility. The wrongs of woman are certainly not political wrongs. Her private wrongs may be many and various. On the other hand, we doubt if she suffers from a wrong from which men do not equally suffer. As the condition of the body politic improves so does the condition of women improve. Politics, like prize-fighting and war, is a man's job. If a Suffragist were to issue a challenge to contest the light-weight championship with Mr. Tommy Burns everybody would be amused; the papers would be full of startling comments, and we suppose that Lady Henry Somerset would consider that it would not be honest of her if she did not point out that she did not approve. We have borrowed Lady Henry's treble negative, but that makes no difference. Women who demand the vote should keep Mr. Tommy Burns well in mind.

We may add that we take grave exception to Lady Henry Somerset's remarks about sharing with the public-house loafer the responsibilities of voting. If the persons who do the voting in this country are public-house loafers, it is clear that a vote means the degradation of the voter. Consequently a self-respecting woman should remain voteless. But we cannot believe that Lady Henry really believes what she says. On the other hand, she has said it. It is characteristic of the "feminine mind" that it prompts people to say what they do not mean. And that subtle bolt about the public-house loafer makes us wonder whether Lady Henry Somerset meant what she said about not approving of certain methods.

FROM A NOTEBOOK

I.—AN EASTERN FABLE

It is said that during the glorious reign of Haroun Alraschid an Arabian alchemist came to the Caliph with a strange and extravagant proposal. Haroun sat in all his splendour—his Viziers, his Chamberlains, and his great officers about him—in his golden Court, which displayed all the wonders and superfluities of the East. He gave judgment—the wicked were punished, the virtuous were rewarded, God's Name was exalted, the Prophet was venerated. Then came before the Commander of the Faithful a poor old man in the poor and ragged robes of a wandering poet; he was oppressed by the weight of his years, and his entrance was like the entrance of misery. So wretched was his appearance that one of the Chamberlains, who was well acquainted with the poets, could not help quoting the following verses:

Between the main and a drop of rain the difference seen is nothing great.
The sun so bright and the taper's light are alike and one save in pomp and state.
'Twixt the grain of sand and all the land what may ye arraign as disparate?
A crust of bread and a King's board spread will hunger's lust alike abate.
With the smallest blade or with host arrayed the ruler may quench his gall and hate.
A stone in a box and a quarry of rocks may be shown to be of an equal freight.
With a sentence bold or with gold untold the lover may hold and capture his mate.
The King and the Bard may alike be debarred from the fold of the Lord Compassionate.

The Commander of the Faithful praised God, the Merciful, the Compassionate, the King of the Day of Judgment, and caused the Chamberlain to be handsomely rewarded. He then inquired of the old man for what reason he came before him, and the beggar, as indeed he seemed, informed the Caliph that he had for many years prosecuted his studies in magic, alchemy, astrology, geomancy, and all other curious and surprising arts in Spain, Grand Cairo, the land of the Moors, in India, China, and in various cities of the Infidels—in fact, in every city in the world where magicians were to be found. In proof of his proficiency he produced a little box which he carried about him for the purpose of his geomantic operations, and asked any one who was willing to stand forth, that he might hear his whole life—past, present, and future. The Caliph ordered one of his officers to submit himself to this ordeal, and the beggar having made the points in the sand, and having erected the figure according to the rules of the geomantic art, immediately informed the officer of all the most secret and hidden transactions in which he had been engaged, including several matters which this officer thought had been secrets locked in his own breast. He also foretold his death in a year's time from a certain herb, and so, indeed, it fell out, for he was strangled with a hempen cord by order of the Caliph. In the meantime the Commander of the Faithful and all about him were astonished, and the Beggar Magician was ordered to proceed with his story. He spoke at great length, and every one remarked the elegance and propriety of his diction, which was wanting in no refinement of classical eloquence. But the sum of his speech was this—that he had discovered the greatest wonder of the whole world, the name of which he declared was Asrar, and by this talisman he said that the Caliph might make himself more renowned than all the Kings that had ever reigned on the earth, not excepting King Solomon, the son of David. This was the method of the operation which the beggar proposed. The Commander of the Faithful was to gather together all the wealth of his entire kingdom, omitting nothing that could possibly be discovered; and while this was being done the magician said that he would construct a furnace of peculiar shape, in which all these splendours and magnificences and treasures of the world must be consumed in a certain fire of Art, prepared with Wisdom. And at last, he continued, after the operation had endured many days, the fire being all the while most curiously governed, there would remain but one drop no larger than a pearl, but glorious as the sun and moon, and all the starry heavens, and the wonders of the Compassionate; and with this drop the Caliph Haroun might heal all the sorrows of the universe. Both the Commander of the Faithful and all his Viziers and officers were stupefied by this proposal, and most of the assemblage considered the beggar to be a madman. The Caliph, however, asked him to return the next day, in order that his plans might receive more mature consideration. The beggar prostrated himself, and went forth from the hall of audience, but he returned no more, nor could it be discovered that he had been seen again by anyone.

II.—THE ENCHANTED CAFÉ.

The papers in the shops were all French; ensigns on every side proclaimed "Vins Fins," "Beaune Supérieur;" the tobacconists kept their tobacco in square blue, yellow, and brown packets; "Charcuterie" made a brave and appetising show. And here was a "Café Restaurant: Au Château de Chinon." The name was enough; they could not dine elsewhere, and Ambrose felt that he was honouring the memory of the great Rabelais.

It was probably not a very good dinner. It was infinitely better than the Soho dinner of these days, for the quarter had hardly begun to yield to the attack of Art, Intellect, and the Suburbs which, between them, have since destroyed the character and unction of many a good cookshop. Ambrose only remembered two dishes—the pieds de porc grillés and the salad. The former he thought both amusing and delicious, and the latter, strangely and artfully compounded of many herbs, of little vinegar, of abundant Provençal oil, with the chapon (or crust rubbed with garlic) reposing at the bottom of the bowl after madame had "tormented" the ingredients—the salad was a dish from fairyland. There be no such salads now in all the land of Soho.

"Let me celebrate, above all, the little red wine," says Ambrose, in a brief, dithyrambic note. "Not in any mortal vineyard did its father grape ripen; it was not nourished by the warmth of the visible sun, nor were the rains that made it swell common waters from the skies above us. Not even in the Chinonais, sacred earth though that be, was the press made that caused its juices to be poured into the cuve, nor was the humming of its fermentation heard in any of the good cellars of the lower Touraine. But in that region which Keats celebrates, when he sings the 'Mermaid Tavern,' was the juice engendered; the vineyard lay low down in the South among the starry plains, where is the Terra Turonensis Celestis which Rabelais beheld in his vision, where mighty Gargantua drinks from inexhaustible, immortal vats eternally, where Pantagruel is athirst for evermore, though he be satisfied continually; there in the land of the Crowned Immortal Tossspots was that wine of ours vintaged, red with the rays of the Dogstar, made magical by the influences of Venus, fertilised by the happy aspect of Mercury. O rare, superabundant, and most excellent juice, fruit of all fortunate stars, by thee were we translated, by thee exalted into the fellowship of that Tavern of which the old poet writes: Mihi est propositum in Taberna mori."

Ambrose lit a black Caporal cigarette; he had bought a packet on his way. He saw an enticing bottle of rotund form paying its visits to some neighbouring tables, and the happy fools made the acquaintance of Benedictine.

"Oh yes, it's all very well," Ambrose has been heard to say, on being offered this agreeable and aromatic liqueur, "it's nice enough, I daresay. But you should have tasted the real stuff. I got it at a little café in Soho some years ago—the Château de Chinon. No; it's no good going there now—it's quite different. All the walls are plate-glass and gold, the head waiter is called Maitre d'Hôtel, and I'm told it's quite the thing, both in southern and northern suburbs, to make up dinner-parties at the Château—everything most correct, evening-dress, fans, opera-cloaks, 'Hideseek' champagne, and stalls afterwards. One gets a glimpse of Bohemian life that way, and everybody says it's been such a qucer evening, but quite amusing too. But you can't get the real Benedictine there now.

"Where can you get it? Ah, I wish I knew. I never come across it. The bottle looks just the same, but it's quite a different flavour—the phylloxera may be responsible of course, but I don't think it is. Perhaps the bottle that went round the tables that night was like the powder in 'Jekyll and Hyde'; its properties were the result of some strange accident. At all events, they were quite magical."

III.—"ELECTRICITY."

It is doubtful whether Charlotte Brontë, proud as she was of her sister Emily, ever understood her. Writing to Mr. Williams about the new edition of "Wuthering Heights," she says: "Every page is surcharged with a sort of moral electricity;" and the context shows that she regarded this "electricity" as a fault and a "peculiarity." It is, in a sense, a peculiarity; it is the peculiarity of the highest genius; it is the differentia which exalts "Wuthering Heights" to a place very far above "Jane Eyre" and "Shirley." This quality, whatever it may be called, is, I say, the note of the very finest things in literature; it is the quality that must be present in its most exquisite and quintessential form in all true poetry, which must pervade all prose that would be called great. In a word it is that quality which distinguishes art in its true sense from clever and agreeable and exciting compositions of all sorts; and it seems essentially indefinable. Omnia exeunt in mysterium says an old writer; even in that most exact of sciences, the mathematics, where you begin with "twice two are four," you end, I am told, in strange regions of mystery and surmise; it is not marvellous, then, that in the arts the Last Word is in a sense a Lost Word; its presence may be felt, but it may scarcely be named: those who find it can give no account of their quest, and those who have the secret could not impart it if they would. "Electricity" is not a bad definition by way of analogy; in the world of art, as in the world of physical things, there is this secret force which operates and transmutes, which is known rather by its workings than in itself, which changes the dull iron into the magnet. Imagine the tale of "Wuthering Heights" related by a "Realist"—to make use of a popular but absurd and erroneous nomenclature—what a brutal, horrid thing we should have: a story of ugly temper and evil deeds, neither worth telling nor hearing. Its "electricity" has made it to be what it is: one of the greatest of all romances, worthy of a place beside the "Scarlet Letter."

Whence follows the not unimportant conclusion that Life itself, which is reflected in all great art, must be regarded from the same standpoint—from this standpoint of mystery. The people whom Mr. Mallock was satirising some thirty years ago are, I believe, dead; one does not hear now, even from "scientific" quarters, that the Universe can be explained with a box of chemicals, but the mood doubtless continues, and we must unceasingly beware of it. We must always remember that a proposition which is not mysterious is either radically unimportant or entirely false.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

THE GENTLE JOURNALIST

The Pan-Anglican Conference has concluded its deliberations. We approve entirely of Anglicanism and of Pan-Anglicanism, but we are afraid that a series of discussions in which the late Conference zealously indulged itself has not contributed greatly to the sum of Anglican wisdom. The meetings appear to have been without exception most successful from the point of view of attendance and talk. When you have said this much, however, you have said pretty well all that needs to be said. The two facts that loom out rather unpleasantly as a result of the Conference's efforts are, first, that the best intellectuality of Pan-Anglicanism does not come to the meetings, and, secondly, that the mind of Pan-Anglicanism appears to be given over to a sort of dubious Radicalism. Whenever the Pan-Anglicans had to deal with the questions of the day—and they dealt with them pretty comprehensively—one found them moving on what Mr. Asquith would call democratic lines. They displayed a friendly feeling toward the Licensing Bill and they cheered Socialism to the echo. There was a certain amount of dissension of course, but wherever the democracy popped up you had fluttering and unbounded enthusiasm. The effect upon the public mind will not be particularly advantageous to Anglicanism. The public mind makes few allowances. It has a knack of accepting things as they appear to be, and it judges accordingly. When it endeavours to gauge the meaning and intention of Anglicanism by the measure of the Pan-Anglican Conference it will come to a woefully wrong conclusion. So much cannot be helped, however, and the back of Anglicanism is broad. In our view the disposition of the Conference to hear all sides and to attempt nothing in the way of definite Anglican pronouncement has been the underlying fault of the debates. Indefiniteness and open verdicts are of precious little use nowadays. In point of fact they do great harm. Tolerance is all very well until it travels into the region of latitudinarianism. But apparently we are all latitudinarians. One of the most extraordinary and disappointing of the many extraordinary and disappointing meetings of the Conference was held at the Kensington Town Hall on Saturday last, the subject of discussion being "Religion and the Press." The Pan-Anglicans took up a whole day on this arduous business, dealing with general literature at the morning session, and dramatic literature and journalism during the afternoon. The principal speakers on journalism appear to have been Mr. J. St. Loe Strachey and Mr. Chesterton—as sublime a couple probably as ever trod platform. Mr. Strachey is the editor of the Spectator. Before he purchased and made himself editor of this highly respectable journal he appears to have edited the Cornhill Magazine. Mr. Chesterton, on the other hand, has edited nothing except Dickens. Until the other day we had always set him down for a wild and whirling Nonconformist. His journalism is done for the most part in Nonconformist organs such as the Daily News. Mr. Strachey's connection with a certain sort of Anglicanism is obvious. Mr. Chesterton's requires explanation. To anybody who is acquainted with the true inwardness of modern journalism the speeches of both gentlemen will read like desperate efforts in the direction of humour. For example, Mr. Strachey assured his auditory that the Press had been growing purer during the last twenty years. The which glad tidings he supplemented with the pleasing remark that :

The pioneers of cheap newspapers had every right to say they had deliberately refrained from any attempt to make profit by corrupting the public mind.

We wonder if Mr. Strachey has every perused a hapenny paper. The pioneers of cheap newspapers in this country were to all intents and purposes the Harmsworths. There is no cheap Press in England which does not take the Harmsworth congregation of gutter-journals for its motto. Does Mr. Strachey believe that the Harmsworth journals have had any but the most deleterious effect on the public mind ? After delivering himself of this angelic testimonial to the virtues of the pioneers, Mr. Strachey continued as follows :

The justifiable complaints that could be raised against popular journalism in its newest forms were irresponsibility, cynical carelessness in the matter of truth, sensationalism, the destruction of an honourable and manly reticence, and the introduction of triviality—the worst of these faults, after the supreme evil of indifference to veracity of statement, being triviality. This triviality was twice cursed, for it degraded him who read and him who wrote.

Which is entirely our own view. But, if the new journalism degrades him who reads, how can it be said that its pioneers have deliberately refrained from any attempt to make profit by corrupting the public mind ? It is certain that if you gave a man the choice of being degraded or corrupted he would not have a pin to choose. Mr. Strachey wishes to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds in the true, modern, noble, enlightened, respectable, mealy-mouthed, inoffensive, menial, English journalistic way. He says in effect : "Here is a fine horse ; I warrant him sound in wind and limb and without vice. All he suffers from is spavin, glanders, string-halt, pink-eye, blind staggers, and the twice-cursed habit of biting little children ! Woa then ! Would yer !" The editor of the Spectator explained further that the desire for direct and legitimate profits from a newspaper was an antiseptic and prevented corruption, and he besought his hearers to think better of journalists and their morals than probably they were inclined to do, and not to exaggerate the influence and power of the Press, that power being much more limited than was popularly supposed. Here, again, we find ourselves able to agree with Mr. Strachey, though we think that he should have told us exactly what he means by the direct and legitimate profits of a newspaper, and that he should have told us also why it is that the influence and power of the Press have become so limited. It is quite evident that the corruption and influence and power which Mr. Strachey had in his mind's eye are not in any sense the same things as the corruption and influence and power which really exist. By corruption, we presume, Mr. Strachey can mean only the actual taking of money for writing on this or that side of a controversy on the part of a newspaper proprietor or his editor. That kind of corruption does not exist in England to any appreciable extent, for the very simple reason that nobody will pay the price. There are other and subtler forms of corruption, however, which will readily occur to the newspaper-reader who can see beyond the length of his nose. Of these Mr. Strachey takes no note. As to influence and power, it is true that the older journals have given up thundering and devoted their attention to the sale of atlases. On the other hand, the pioneers of cheap newspapers have built up for themselves influence and power of a character never dreamed of by papers like the Spectator. They are incapable of deciding the fates of Governments, or, for that matter, of emptying a playhouse, or stopping the sale of a book. But they have influence and power enough to aggrandise every species of clap-trap and chicanery, and to keep the public mind continually and exclusively occupied with that twice-cursed thing, triviality. We suppose that Mr. Strachey has sense enough to know that it would be better for the country if the circulation of the Spectator were ten times what it is to-day, and the circulation of the Daily Mail and its offshoots ran, say, into only fifty or sixty thousand.

In any case, to speak for ourselves, we have no doubts upon the subject. Practically there is only one Press for Englishmen at the present moment, and that Press is the cheap and trivial Press. Even the Spectator, with its honourable traditions and its vast hold upon country parsonages, must have felt the pinch of this mammoth wallowing, pit-mouthed monster that swallows the hapence and belches triviality with such wicked and overwhelming persistence.

As for Mr. Chesterton, the less we say of him perhaps the better. His chief complaint against modern journalism is its anonymity, and the present is an anonymous article. It is easy to understand Mr. Chesterton's position. He and his friends have signed so many articles themselves that they are filled with pain when other journalists refrain. Mr. Chesterton would have us believe that his opinions on the subject take their rise on high moral grounds. Jones must sign his leader, he says in effect, in order that we may read it in the light of Jones's private and special character. If it were found on inquiry that Jones was in the habit of drinking two bottles of cheap Médoc with his dinner, which by the way he takes in Soho, Jones's leader on the finance of the Balkan States must be discounted accordingly. Jones, in short, shall be handed over to the Chestertons and Bellocs for moral dissection. We believe that it could be proved that anonymity is a sure sign of grace in an author, whether he be journalist or otherwise. It is no concern of ours that Mr. Chesterton is an impeccably moral being. When we read his written words we find ourselves incapable of referring them to his private habits. We have no knowledge whatever of his private habits. They may be good, bad, or indifferent for anything that is to be gathered from his signature. A man writes what he thinks, or what he thinks other people should think. The putting of his name to what he has written is usually the merest advertisement of himself. If the wickedest man in England wrote a beautiful sonnet the sonnet remains, and we have no right to discount it on the ground that the author is privately wicked. Anonymity in the matter of attack is always called stabbing in the back. In nine cases out of ten such anonymity is forced upon the writer by the rule of his editor or the traditions of his paper. Journalists are not in any sense the pusillanimous persons that Mr. Chesterton imagines them to be. Neither are they by any means so modest as their anonymity might imply. It is virtually impossible for an editor to preserve the anonymity of any article or series of articles of any importance. The secret "leaks out," and quite frequently the leakage is directly traceable to the author. And when you have disambushed your anonymous one, what of it ? He may be your bosom friend ; what of that, if he has said the truth about you. He may be your bitterest enemy ; what of that, if he has equally said the truth. If everybody who omitted to sign what he has written were to sign it all to-morrow, the world and Mr. Chesterton—particularly Mr. Chesterton—would be little the wiser.

NEWS AND NONSENSE

"TEACLOTHS, sufficient in number to fill a large, deep drawer, surpass even the bedspreads in beauty and variety." Were this a sermon on the sin of inanity, the foregoing sentence, quoted from a recent issue of the Times, might very well be spoken as its text. The pages of that serene and heroic "Reverberator" were profaned by half a column of mellifluous English descriptive of the lingerie and linen of a lady who was lately married, and it occurs to one, somehow, that the exhilarating teacloth and the importunate bedspread have been suffered to usurp a shade more attention than even their overpowering quantity or immaculate quality deserve. Who wades through this sporadic nonsense ? Who cares what great private possessions in the way of house-linen this or that lady has ? At the reading-rooms of almost any library you will see some poor, shabby creature carefully working her way through the Court news, with grimy finger tracing the travels of squire and dame ; presently she will light upon the teacloth column and read every word religiously, her mouth screwed into an orifice of silent admiration—and she, her dingy kith and kin, comprise about all who take the trouble to do so. One is irresistibly reminded of Calverley's lines :

But O, a piece of orange-peel, the end of a cigar, Once trod on by a princely heel, how beautiful they are !

There is no harm, bien entendu, in owning a large array of teacloths or dishcloths, or whatever they are, pace the pyrotechnists of Essex Street. A man may have twenty-seven umbrellas and a separate stand for each if he likes, and welcome ; but if we were to read in reputable journals—journals which are supposed to sway the affairs of nations—that the astounding umbrellas of M. Quelquechose are only surpassed in beauty and variety by his marvellous vests, of which he has a sufficient number to fill a large deep drawer, we should feel inclined to put the editor who passed the paragraph into a sack with M. Quelquechose and hire a professional wrestler to shake it violently.

It may be objected that the whole matter is trivial and harmless. Objected wrongly ; for the craze of personal paragraphs has spread through what used to be literature—even though poor—until now we have actually weekly papers (pun and all) devoted to chronicling the vanities and vexations of persons who happen to be "popular." If an author of that description has a cold he "is suffering from a slight attack of influenza ;" should he visit Brighton he "was observed seated in a chair on the Parade, with his legs crossed, enjoying a cigarette." We are cheered by the soul-stirring discovery that he likes mint-sauce with lamb, are unnerved by the statement that his hat blew off, and are profoundly depressed by the mournful fact that fruit disagrees with him. Young and very smiling actresses write their autobiographies and detail their "careers" for the benefit of brains whose calibre is such that they can stand no heavier charge than the featherweight of adulatory snippets ; the popular authors themselves—facilis descensus . . .—have even been known to lay bare their souls, to consent to a kind of mental vivisection that their agonies and raptures of composition may be studied by the wondering crowd. Municipal mediocrities find themselves delightfully in the public eye—they are able to point proudly to their names in sundry superficial inches of space, and feel that they have not lived for nothing.

Well, and if you are so down on these personal compilations, says some one, you need not read them. Thank heaven, we needn't. But, apart from our predilections, wherein does the good of this class of "literature" consist ? What single item, remaining in the brain of its readers, can bear any flower of thought, any fruit of intellect, any seed of better things ? We have a mania for reading nowadays, and it is to be feared that sometimes it keeps us from thinking ; even the labouring man takes in his halfpenny daily paper and cons it in tube or train. Afterwards, in place of a book, he has twenty different sheets to choose from which will give him little insipid straws of news and hashed-up jokes to while away the hours till bedtime. And thus his attention is frittered on banalities, his mind is spent on information which if remembered would be useless ; as a matter of fact it is forgotten immediately, ousted by the next instalment of his favourite. The teacloth half-column, split up into seven or eight divisions, formed part of his fare for the ensuing week, without doubt. The important question is, What is the ultimate condition of mind of those who can read such stuff with avidity ?

The answer in a word is—flabby. It may be said, again, that the regenerated working-man under the educational régime hinted at in this article would become a sombre, smug individual, going to his work with Lamb's Essays in one pocket and "Malory" in the other, incapable of appreciating either. Not a bit of it. The cheap and attractive issues and reprints of good novels—not necessarily "deep"—would be quite enough for him to start on ; taking him all round, he does not lack intelligence ; but they will avail little while his power of concentration is steadily, unceasingly sapped. He might well enjoy "Troy Town," or "My Lady Nicotine," or "Joseph Vance," or a dozen other delightful things written in plain, straightforward English ; once he came under the spell who knows how far he would go ? As it is, the newspapers don't give him a chance ; he cannot fix his mind on anything so long as five consecutive pages unless they are dismembered into unrelated bits—in which case he can read them straight through at a sitting. Legitimate news we must have—we all want to know to what tune the world is spinning ; but when the premier journal of the country sets the example of cataloguing and eulogising teacloths and bedspreads a protest will surely be felt, if not uttered, by all its readers who are interested in keeping the line of demarcation between what is news and what is nonsense clearly defined.

THE NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB

AFTER almost twenty-five years of life, the New English Art Club may be considered to have arrived at years of discretion ; but whether it is that it exhausted its exuberance and vigour during its first violent days, or for some other reason, it seems, with the exception of one or two of its members, to be sinking into the torpor of middle-age. One knows beforehand fairly certainly what will be exhibited by its most prominent members ; it is getting very settled and mature, and for that reason its value is distinctly less now than it was ten or fifteen years ago, when it acted as a sort of artistic blister on the debilitated body of painting towards the end of the last century. One exception is, of course, Mr. John, round whose work discussion so healthily rages. In his personality the New English Art Club holds the germ of a new spirit. Violent, unconcerned, rebellious as he is, perhaps because of these very qualities, he is the originator of a new impulse in painting. Conservatives in painting and the public, long accustomed to have their art gently broken to them, rage furiously together at his uncompromising disregard of their susceptibilities. He offers no prettiness, hardly even beauty, to gild the pill. That vigour and restless striving which are the only means of advance in an artist always lead to irritation on the part of those who are comfortably settled into knowing what to expect in the way of pictures, and who resent being jolted out of their comfort. But they benefit by their irritation, they are stirred out of the unquestioning acceptance of the art which sinks into convention and decadence immediately its production becomes too facile. The force behind Mr. John's pictures is undeniable. They intrude themselves into the consciousness of the beholder, and indifference is impossible ; they either irritate or impress profoundly. He is already welcomed by the few who feel the weight of the paralysis of decadence that deadens so much of modern painting. His work is sometimes barbaric and uncouth, but full of Dionysian energy. "The Infant Pyramus" is an enormous advance on "Seraphita," which he exhibited at the New Gallery during the winter of this year, in which the repulsive qualities were so evident that one only grudgingly admitted its vigour, obvious as that quality was. But this new picture possesses attributes which demand and compel admiration. It is practically the only picture in the whole exhibition which moves to any strong emotion—an emotion difficult to analyse, but undeniable. It may be the charming gesture of the standing woman that makes such a strong impression by its truth and beauty. The resemblance in tone and colour to the work of Puvis de Chavannes has been attacked and censured. In the simplified colour-scheme and high key in which it is painted, accentuated as they are by the unfortunate pictures which have been chosen to surround it, it does resemble Chavannes, but the spirit and intelligence behind the paint is of an entirely different quality. The canvas radiates impulse and growth. It seems a matter of small importance that Mr. John produces odd things at times :

he should be valued by his serious conceptions; the rest do not matter. He has not yet reached the height of his attainment; he still strives, and one looks to see the importance of his promise developed and fulfilled. His enormous value is in the significance of this promise.

There are several examples of the distinguished art of Professor Holmes. Decorative and invariably charming in colour, his pictures please by an original and personal vision. One feels, looking at his landscapes, that he sees uninfluenced by other people's views. He has an extremely personal point of view, a quality whose rarity gives it great value in these days of all-pervading eclecticism. It is no slight achievement to have produced the charming and even romantic effect that he has in "On the Isis, Oxford," when the subject consists of such unpromising material as two gasometers and a towing-path. But in all this Professor Holmes has seen beauty, and, still more, has made that beauty intelligible.

Mr. Orpen shows a portrait-group of a well-known painter and his family. It is painted with enormous facility, but its lack of sincerity and its affectation of naïveté spoil what should have been a pleasing picture. That Mr. Orpen is a painter of no small capability is shown in his portrait of Professor Mayor, and the simplicity and restraint of this latter canvas make it by far the greater achievement of the two pictures he exhibits here. Mr. Steer has for many years produced landscapes that compel admiration and respect for their æsthetic beauty, and in "The Outskirts of a Town" there is no decline of his earlier power and accomplishment; rather, one might say from the curious difficulty of the composition that the artist feels that no subject, however complicated, is beyond his mastery. His other picture, a portrait, shows what his portraits always do, that his sympathy and interest find freer scope in landscape; his paintings of people are never so intimate and impressive, and indeed Mr. Steer only too often gives the spectator a feeling that his interest in the background and accessories of a portrait are greater than his sympathy with the sitter. In Mr. Tonks's literary picture, full of suggestion for the seeker of symbols, there is a timidity of method, an insecurity of drawing to which one cannot be blinded by the violence of its colour. Mr. Sargent is not well represented by the two sketches which are his only contributions to this exhibition, neither of which are as interesting or characteristic as those examples of his work he is showing at the Carfax Gallery. "St. Sauloe," by Professor Brown, is an admirable painting, interesting in colour and design, unspoiled by eccentricity or affectation, and the charm of his painting in "An Interior" is so obvious that it is hardly necessary to call attention to its good qualities. Mr. Rich is another painter of landscape who endows his pictures with charm of colour and a rare sense of line and composition. His water-colours are of the type one likes to possess and to live with. He is a true descendant of the great masters of the British school of water-colour landscape at its best, and he has evolved his art from their example without the sacrifice of his individuality. All the pictures he exhibits reach a very high standard, "Battersea" and "The South Downs" being particularly distinguished. It should be almost unnecessary to put forward a theory that for a portrait to justify its existence it should either be well painted or it should resemble the sitter, and to be considered a work of art it should possess other good qualities as well. In the portrait of Bernard Berenson, Mr. Rothenstein, never very happy at getting a likeness, has in this particular instance failed to produce a work of art, though one would have supposed that the distinguished art-critic might himself have constituted sufficient inspiration. Messrs. Mark Fisher, Lucien Pissaro, W. A. Nicholson, and W. G. von Glehn all exhibit pictures which deserve more detailed criticism than is possible in the space of a small article.

It seems a pity that the New English Art Club, whose primary aim is not a commercial one, should admit, with pictures of merit, so many trivial and meretricious works, whose justification is certainly not in their possession of any artistic quality. They may, of course, be accepted to provide a background for the pictures of a better class, but that function would be fulfilled far better by bare spaces on the walls, and the general standard of the exhibition would be higher.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Grammar of Philosophy. By DAVID GRAHAM. (T. and T. Clarke, 7s. 6d. net.)

WHEN greedy Thrasymachus leapt with a roar into the Socratic discussion upon Justice, and talked about drivel and mutual admiration, he did not wholly depend upon rudeness and abuse. He was strong as well as coarse. Mr. Graham leaps into the arena, and hopes by buffoonery, jests in the nice style of Dr. Parker, and a thunderous egoism peculiar to himself, to re-establish the Scottish reaction associated with the names of Reid, Beattie, Oswald, and Stewart. He is apparently unaware that these gentlemen were unarmed against the more logical developments of Condillac and Helvetius. When stripped of the adornments of Billingsgate, the imitations of Carlyle, and the furious, bombastic advertisements, which proclaim that in a dark world of fool thinkers Scotland alone has wisdom and light, then the theses for which Mr. Graham foams are these—(1) That the individual consciousness is the criterion of truth; (2) that mind and matter are incommensurable; (3) so are the finite and the infinite; (4) some truths are necessary and some contingent; (5) these and some other propositions are implicitly recognised by all men. But why, if each one of us knows so infallibly, does our author want us to pay three half-crowns to be informed? If mind and matter are so utterly sundered, how did we ever get matter into our minds, or how can mind act upon matter? If the finite and infinite are also so radically divided, God can never be known and infinity of life is absurd. Is it not enough to say, in answer to a man who says you must hold this, that we simply do not hold it? For instance the objectivity of space and time, so far from all men holding this of necessity, only "thinkers" like Mr. Graham seem to formulate anything of the kind. Common sense is indeed valuable in philosophy—the sense which we have in common, our Catholic sense; but how is this compatible with that frenzy of revolt and scorn against the expression of the communal sense which we call authority and which Mr. Graham flouts with added eggs. Possibly by common sense he means that habit of passing an eye from one wearer to another, which Perseus noticed in the Grey Sisters, and which vulgar persons think to be wisdom, and the power of the individual. If a man might dare to use a passage of Hegel (whom Mr. Graham would call a lunatic, goose, jack-pudding, and so on), he might remember that

A man who does not rid himself of the phantom of the opposition of finite and infinite steep himself in vanity, for he posits the Divine as something powerless to come to itself, while he clings to his own subjectivity and, taking his stand on this, asserts the impotence of his knowledge.

People should not write grammars until they have mastered the alphabet.

Tramps Round the Mountains of the Moon and Through the Back Gate of the Congo State. By T. BROADWOOD JOHNSON, M.A., F.R.G.S. (T. Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

THE adventure-book of an earnest missionary who endeavours to follow, however inadequately, in the footsteps of Livingstone can never be quite without interest if the writer makes a plain statement of what he has seen and accomplished, and draws up some sort of rough-and-ready debit and credit account of the result of his Mission. But if such an one makes his story the vehicle of gibes at other religions than his own, the value of his work is considerably lessened. Mr. Broadwood Johnson in the very beginning of his book thinks fit to make the following statement :

In addition there are the Roman Catholic Missions, in whose ranks are many devoted workers. With their looser standards and more mechanical methods they appeal more readily to some, but do not lead their converts on to much independence of thought, and their adherents comprise few of the influential.

This is narrow and uncharitable. Moreover, it is untrue.

For the rest, Mr. Johnson's experiences seem to have been much the same as those of other well-meaning missionaries. He writes simply and unaffectedly of Uganda (with a good word for the estimable Bishop thereof), Toro, the Pygmies, Ruwenzori, King Mtesa, and "The Back Gate" of the Congo, with no more than natural antipathy to Belgian men and methods. A good index and many photographs enhance the value of the work.

Memoir of the Life and Military Services of Viscount Lake, Baron Lake of Delhi and Laswaree, 1744-1808. By COLONEL HUGH PEARSE. (William Blackwood and Sons, 15s. net.)

ALTHOUGH he did much to bring about the creation of the Indian Empire, the life and military service of Lord Lake have not hitherto received the attention they deserved, the principal reason being that his death in 1808 coincided with the rising fame of Wellington, which swamped the records of many good men and patriots. Yet Wellesley, as he was then, had the highest opinion of Lake. He wrote of him : "His masterly operations, his unexampled alacrity and honourable zeal, the judgment, skill, and promptitude of decision which he has manifested in every crisis of difficulty or danger, combined with his irresistible spirit of enterprise and courage, entitle him to the gratitude and admiration of every loyal British subject, and of every heart and mind which can feel for the honour, or can understand the interests of the British Empire." In Fortescue's "History of the British Army," in Thorne's "Memoirs of the War in India," and in Hamilton's "History of the First or Grenadier Guards" there is reference to the splendid achievements of Lord Lake, and Major H. Helsham-Jones wrote a book, "The Campaigns of Lord Lake," which gave a succinct account of his exploits. It remained, however, for Colonel Pearse to write this best and authoritative book on a man who has unjustly fallen into oblivion, but whose record deserves a better fate. He has done his work thoroughly and well, and has done service alike to a noble soldier and to all those who are interested in the Indian Empire and the men who made it.

One City and Many Men. By the RIGHT HON. SIR ALGERNON WEST, G.C.B. (Smith and Elder, 6s. net.)

WE confess that we have read Sir Algernon West's last book with some disappointment ; but that may have been our own fault. Remembering his delightful "Recollections," so abounding as they were in good stories and interesting notes of differences between a past age and our own, we looked forward to an equal pleasure. What we get is something different. The good stories and the differences are not absent, but their place is largely taken by Sir Algernon's general views about things and by essays which might, so to say, have been written by many other people without his long and peculiar experiences—such as a review of "Queen Victoria's Letters," an account of "No. 10, Downing Street"—a subject treated much more elaborately in a recent book—a sketch of the history of London theatres, and an essay on "The Great Unpaid !" These are all very well, but they are not what we looked for ; only, as we said, the fault was ours.

Perhaps the most interesting of the papers included in the volume is that on "Some Changes in Social Life During the Queen's Reign." The facts in it are not all new, but it is interesting to have personal confirmation of them. Thus, the late Lord Clanwilliam told Sir Algernon of a dinner at a friend's villa near Putney which began at eight o'clock—a very late hour for those days—and lasted en revanche till 8.30 the next morning ! And when Sir Algernon first entered the Admiralty the chief clerk would announce that he would not be there to-morrow, "for I am going to dine out to-night"—not at all as a joke. He gives instances of peculiar formality in address. One, a brother and sister calling each other "your ladyship" and "your Grace," seems almost incredible ; if it was not a joke, surely that family must have been extraordinarily stiff. The contemporary pronunciation of Byron in the poet's time—Byron—one had heard before ; it would be interesting to know when the change came in, since proper names are usually conservative. In going back to an earlier day than his own Sir Algernon has made one or two slight mistakes. Old Q., for instance, did not live "next door" to Byron's house in Piccadilly ; Byron's house was one of two which in old Q.'s time was a single house. But this sort of antiquarianism can be done, as we said, by people who lack Sir Algernon's personal experiences, and it is the latter for which we look to him. Not, we trust, in vain ; for there must be many left which previous books have not exhausted. We still hope for more.

FICTION

The Fourth Ship. By ETHEL COLBURN MAYNE. (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)

RARELY indeed is the reviewer tempted to betray an ill-regulated enthusiasm over the subject of his labours. He is apt to view the rise and fall of literary portents with a surprising detachment, nor does the announcement that a new star—and one, too, of quite unusual magnitude—has risen on the intellectual horizon move him to more than the faintest flutter of curiosity. There are exceptions however. It is said that on the conclusion of Sheridan's famous speech on the American War the adjournment of the House was moved, as it was unanimously felt that no calm or dispassionate verdict could be arrived at under the circumstances. The present reviewer has to confess to a similar weakness with regard to Miss Ethel Colburn Mayne's latest novel, which he unhesitatingly pronounces to be the finest and most finished work of fiction he has read for many years.

Miss Mayne works in a quiet medium. Her chapters have all the charm and grace of a series of perfect etchings. The book, too, is one that enthralls and engrosses. Having opened it, you will find it impossible to lay it down till you have reached the last page, and you will find, as well, that the last page is reached all too soon.

"The Fourth Ship" is the story of a woman who has missed her chances, and who awakens, after many years, to find that life, with the best of its gifts, has passed her by. The author introduces us, in the first chapter, to a small Irish village. It is the Ireland of fifty years ago—the day of crinolines, side whiskers, and countless proprieties. Josephine St. Lawrence lives with her two sisters at a country parsonage. Her father is a widower, a bully, and a tyrant. The days pass uneventfully enough, varied only by domestic storms or an occasional visit to a neighbour. With the coming of Philip Maryon, however, a new and disturbing element is introduced into this orderly and homespun existence. Philip has been to Rouen—is therefore to be regarded with awe. Josephine is just at the age when conquests are most easy, and conquered she is. The passion seems reciprocal, but there suddenly enters Millicent North, and with her the note of tragedy is struck. Josephine's happiness is short-lived. The inconstant Philip quickly succumbs to the superior attractions of the fair stranger. Millicent, indeed, is a curious contrast to her rival. She is swayed by passion, volatile, capricious. Her insistent, imperious spirit leaps eagerly to the possibilities of the dramatic. To Josephine, country-bred and unversed in the subtleties of a complex civilisation, she remains a perpetual enigma. Strangely enough, however, the two girls, so dissimilar in temperament, become the best of friends and, after the wedding of Millicent Josephine goes on a long visit to her house. There she meets a doctor, who falls somewhat violently in love with her. A proposal follows, but Josephine is unused to the accents of genuine passion, and the doctor is roughly, brutally dismissed. Then begin the long years of weariness and hope deferred for poor Josephine. Her father dies, and she is forced upon the world, compelled to support herself as best she may. Ultimately we find her, after many bitter experiences and disillusionments, an old, white-haired woman, domiciled with the Maryons, as in some welcome sanctuary. Millicent is by now the mother of many children, with one of whom, Christabel, the remainder of the story is largely concerned, so that it is only, as it were, through the interstices of the narrative that we catch an occasional glimpse of Josephine. She is loved by all who know her; but the ships that she has waited for have not come in, and we leave her at last awaiting the "fourth ship that comes for all of us," the ship of the "black sails."

It is impossible to preserve in this rather graceless dissection of a charming story the quaint, old-world atmosphere that pervades every line of it. Miss Mayne reminds us occasionally of Jane Austen in the fidelity of her observation and the extreme delicacy of her touch. To predict even the most limited of immortalities for any contemporary work of fiction is a rash and ill-advised undertaking; but in the case of "The Fourth Ship" we take the risk, and with a certain degree of confidence.

Pauline. By W. E. NORRIS. (Archibald Constable and Co., 6s.)

MR. W. E. NORRIS is one of the most brilliant living exponents of what may perhaps be termed the school of polite fiction. His writing is always capable and forceful. He is sparing of epithets, impatient of redundancies. He views each of his characters through the medium of a cold detachment. He is capable, indeed, of an artistic sympathy, but he never pauses to apportion praise or blame, and he succeeds admirably—and surely this is no mean achievement—in concealing his own point of view.

"Pauline" is quite up to the level of Mr. Norris's previous work. The characters are well sketched, each impressed with a distinct and recognisable individuality; and the story itself, if not enthralling, holds the interest of the reader from the first page to the last. If we have one complaint to make, it is that Mr. Norris has made it impossible for us to feel much sympathy for his hero. Neville Arnott is, not to put too fine a point upon it, a very complete prig, and the misfortunes that befall him may not unfairly be regarded as justly retributive. In Switzerland he meets Pauline Daguerre, a fascinating divorcée some years older than himself. Pauline's past has been a wholly innocent one, but she had displayed at times a regrettable disregard for appearances, and she lives in an atmosphere of subdued rumour. Neville, however, is disposed to be generous, having regard to the fact that he has fallen in love with the charming actress, for such is Pauline's profession. Maternal influences are, in consequence, brought to bear. A secret interview between Neville's mother and Pauline takes place, with the result that Pauline is induced to blacken her reputation in order to save her lover. The ruse is successful, and Neville flies to London, plunges into an electoral campaign, and becomes engaged to Evie Drake, a pretty and conventional English girl. Pauline, however, reappears—at a London theatre—and old passions are aroused in the breast of Neville, who is led to suspect the ruse, and flies to Pauline's rooms for confirmation of his doubts. There he meets a fiery foreigner, named Ibarra, and a dispute between the two in Pauline's absence leads to a fight, in which Neville is very badly hit over the head. The foreigner, pursued by the police, commits suicide. Hence the termination of Neville's engagement and the flight of Pauline to France. After a somewhat severe illness Neville follows her, determined now to marry her at any cost. Fate, however, wills otherwise, for Pauline is in the last stages of a dangerous illness. So the book closes on a note of subdued melancholy. One can hardly feel sorry for such an impossible prig, but no reader of the novel will withhold a tribute of admiration from the heroine. For her sake alone this book is worth reading.

The Orchard Close. By ALICE and CLAUDE ASKEW. (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)

A VEIN of mysticism runs through "The Orchard Close." Hanumân, the monkey-god, exercises his malicious power over the life of an Englishman who is rash enough to insult his image in an Indian temple. The man lives to marry a young English girl, but his first love, who is present when he offends the ape-like deity, is drawn back to India after a life of sorrow to meet her fate at the feet of the vindictive little god. The contrast between her character and that of Joy, the fresh, unsophisticated English girl, is cleverly emphasised. The treatment of the story is a little melodramatic, and the colour somewhat heavily laid on in the more emotional scenes, but the book is neither cheap nor vulgar in style, and the interest is well kept up to the end.

A Case for Compromise. By HENRY STACE. (Alston Rivers, 6s.)

MR. STACE tells us continually that his story is a tragedy, not a comedy; but there is little that is funny, and a great deal that is sad, in the adventures of Mr. and Mrs. Newton. It is true that it "ends well," and we have reason to believe that, after being sufficiently buffeted by fate, the unfortunate pair do find peace at last, and "live happily ever afterwards," but seldom has more tragic material been used in the making of a comedy. The plot is more suggestive of a problem play. Lucy Newton, to use the author's words, "a comely, pleasant, highly-domesticated lady," wife of a very respectable business man, is sitting in her drawing-room awaiting the arrival of a Mr. Craddock, whom she has never seen and who has been invited by her husband to dinner. The guest arrives, and she instantly recognises in him her first husband, who deserted her years before in America. There is no sign of comedy in Newton's subsequent behaviour or in Lucy's flight from home and her tragic and lonely life. The discovery that Craddock was married to another woman before she became his wife at last brings her back to her real husband. The book is worth reading. It is well and carefully written, and the characterisation is excellent.

Mrs. Fitz-Maurice on Leave. By GABRIELLE FITZ-MAURICE. (Greening, 6s.)

MRS. FITZ-MAURICE is a beautiful but silly little lady who appears to have an irresistible fascination for every man with whom she comes in contact. Consequently, the history of her adventures in England while her husband is in India consists of a series of passionate episodes. In spite of her frequent and fervent protestations that her whole heart belongs to her husband, and to him alone, she is able to get a good deal of enjoyment out of at least one of her victims. This is, no doubt, partly due to a comfortable philosophy she evolves which convinces her that it is not only permissible, but her stern duty, to spend much of her time, in her husband's absence, in the arms of another man. How she arrives at this conclusion may be seen by reading the book. The remarkable thing is that she has no difficulty in convincing Mr. Fitz-Maurice of the justice of this ingenious theory.

The Moth and the Candle. By Alice Maud Meadows. (Milne, 6s.)

MISS MEADOWS takes a tremendous amount of trouble to build up the evidence against Margaret Lumley, charged with the murder of her stepmother. It is quite evident from the start that Cora Westwood is to be murdered and that Margaret is to be accused of the crime, though her innocence is obvious. Cora is a fashionable woman who compels several men to fall in love with her, and from amongst them she eventually selects Stephen Lumley, whom she has previously rejected many times because of the opposition of his daughter, whose dislike for Cora is passionate. The marriage, however, takes place, and the daughter of Lumley appears to accept the situation until her jealousy is aroused by the confidential attitude of Dennison Brent, her lover, towards Cora. The young girl, maddened by jealousy, seeks an interview with her stepmother; there is a scene, she strikes her, and rushes from the room. Later Cora is found murdered, and it is subsequently discovered that Margaret has fled. Thus all the conventions of melodrama are faithfully observed. The reader is never in doubt as to the author of the crime, for José Navarro is an old friend of the novelist of to-day, and his fiery southern blood and eccentricities of temperament are brought into play to complicate matters. Margaret is run to earth by her lover in a house where José is lying ill, but when the girl is arrested the foreign gentleman gives an explanation in open court which amounts to a confession. Margaret goes free and marries Brent, and, incidentally, pays a tribute of regret at the grave of Cora Lumley. A novel in which there is nothing very striking or new, written with conventional explicitness, "The Moth and the Candle" is merely one of a great many books that are published by the hundreds every year. There must be a public for them, but it makes us wonder where that public is and what it is like.

Drelma. By G. WHITELEY WARD. (Greening, 6s.)

It would be easy to point out the weaknesses of Mr. Ward's story, but the painful lack of proportion, occasional slovenly writing, and historical inaccuracies will not disturb the peace of mind of those who will read it. "Drelma" is not an altogether bad specimen of what is termed the "readable novel," and though the setting in the city of Kanastê, which practises Egyptian customs in the twentieth century, is familiar, the author writes with a certain amount of gusto that sometimes affects the reader. Dick Chelmsford and Drelma, the great-niece of the high priest of Kanastê, are the hero and heroine, but comparatively little space is devoted to them, and it is the Greek adventurer, Stephano, who dominates the story from start to finish. The book opens with Dick Chelmsford and a companion gold-prospecting in the Sahara. They are attacked and robbed by Stephano, who makes off only to fall into the hands of the inhabitants of Kanastê, where Isis is the reigning divinity and everything is archaic. After a miraculous escape Stephano is admitted to the circle of the priests, and with the help of Sathi, a dancing girl, achieves high honours. At the critical moment Chelmsford re-enters, and the Lady Drelma falls in love with him at first sight—a common occurrence in this book. Coincidences are the heritage of the minor novelist, and Mr. Ward claims his rights on every possible occasion. But Stephano is also in love with the girl, and as Sathi is passionately devoted to the Greek, she of course prevents anybody's love running smoothly. By a trick she induces the priests to believe that the goddess desires Chelmsford and Drelma to be sacrificed, and but for a stroke of lightning they would have been offered up. All comes well in the end, however, death very obligingly removing the superfluous characters.

The Woman Who Vowed. By ELLISON HARDING. (Fisher Unwin, 6s.)

THE idea of this book is astonishing enough, but the author has failed to make it successful. His "vision of the future" reveals New York as the centre of the cult of the Demetrian and other customs of the ancient Greeks, including their names and costumes. Henry T. Joyce, who tells the story, awakens to find himself confronted by a girl in Greek dress. She is Lydia, the woman who vowed, and she introduces him to Chairō, Cleon, Ariston, and other incongruous inhabitants of the revolutionised American city. Lydia has decided to accept the call of Demeter, and, naturally, this scientific marriage is distasteful to Chairō, who is in love with her. The lover eventually carries off Lydia from the temple of the priests, and, after a few tame adventures, is absolved from punishment and marries her. Of course, the principal object of the author is to show us how Collectivism and the cult of Demeter would work in a world that had already tacitly accepted Christianity and its rival religions. He is too ambitious, however; for, easy as it may be to repeat the copy-book maxims of Socialism, it is quite another thing to reproduce them in a novel and make them appear real. There is no genuine imagination shown in "The Woman Who Vowed"—no distinction either in style or thought—and it is not improved by the American spelling adopted throughout. This may be a small point, but the English reader with a reverence for the classics will scarcely approve of Neaera, of New York City, "traveling" from one "center" to another. Only a great writer could rise superior to the difficulties of this subject; and Ellison Harding's attempt only convinces us that Nature never intended Greek culture to flourish in the western hemisphere.

Before Adam. By JACK LONDON. (T. Werner Laurie, 6s.)

IN "Before Adam" Mr. Jack London transports us to an earth in which man has not appeared. His predecessors are depicted as hairy and ape-like, possessed of a certain amount of animal cunning, yet entirely devoid of the idea of co-operation or even of the faintest glimmerings of a tribal instinct. The survival of the fittest holds undisputed sway. Yet even among these savage and primitive beings we are permitted to see the rudiments of the great passions of humanity—love, hatred, jealousy, heroism. Mr. London, with a certain audacity which we cannot but admire, tells the story in the first person. It is revealed to him in a series of dreams, in which he becomes once more primitive man, with all primitive man's savagery and fear. In an explanatory chapter Mr. London alludes to the sensation, familiar in sleep, of falling suddenly through space. This, he would have us believe, is a racial memory:

It dated back to our remote ancestors who lived in trees. With them, being tree-dwellers, the liability of falling was an ever-present menace. Many lost their lives that way; all of them experienced terrible falls, saving themselves by clutching branches as they fell towards the ground.

Now a terrible fall, averted in such fashion, was productive of shock. Such shock was productive of molecular changes in the cerebral cells. These molecular changes were transmitted to the cerebral cells of progeny—became, in short, racial memories.

This theory, however, though undeniably ingenious, must be dismissed as a mere effort of the imagination, since the non-transmissibility of acquired characteristics is now asserted by all competent biologists. Scientific accuracy is not, perhaps, essential to a work of fiction, even when that work of fiction infringes upon the province of the anthropologist. It remains to be said that Mr. London has told a somewhat difficult story with a considerable amount of vigour, and that at no stage in the narrative are the probabilities violated. He has also compassed the original feat of writing a novel without dialogue.

CORRESPONDENCE

WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE V. THE MORNING POST'S LOGIC

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you permit me to point out through your columns one or two facts which, for some reason best known to themselves, the editors of such newspapers as the Morning Post and others do not wish to see the light in their anxiety to hasten the day when men and the country generally will be ruled by women, for that can be the only logical and indeed inevitable result of "Woman's Suffrage"? The Morning Post, in a peculiarly foolish leader, asks the women who, like myself, oppose the revolution known as "Woman Suffrage," how long we want to go on being classed with criminals, lunatics, and children. I might, with precisely the same kind of reasoning, ask Mr. Fabian Ware, the editor of the Morning Post, how long he intends to remain classed with fools. For, by his own reasoning, as he is not a man of first-rate intellect or genius, therefore he must be a fool. If he argues that there are many men neither fools nor men of genius, then why compel women either to be Woman Suffragists or fools, criminals, lunatics, etc. In both cases the logic is faulty and the reasoning confused. Then there is repeated in the same "leader" the old stupid fallacy about the "woman" who plays the essential rôle of a woman in creating and maintaining the home being a person of "narrow interests and inferior intelligence." What is it broadens a woman's (or man's) intellect; what is it stimulates the imagination; what is it that makes a fuller, richer man or woman? Does Mr. Fabian Ware really think it is knocking about the world joining in election rows and the like? Does he really think that a woman who has created a Home—not the sordid, ugly, unpoetical thing he and his friends pretend is represented by a Home, but a true Home, the symbol of a woman's rule, of her creative capacity, of her intellectual standpoint—for the atmosphere of each Home is the faithful mirror of the woman who is the centre of it—of her artistic faculty—the only field for most women—is inferior in all that makes thought feeling, heroic discharge of duty, in all that makes up moral beauty, to the achievements of her female friends, whose lives are passed in declaiming "economics," of which they have never read one serious page; in discussions at smart clubs for women; in the senseless clamour for the "vote," the very nature of which they are in confusion over?

If Mr. Fabian Ware felt so strongly on this point, why not suggest that a woman should edit the Morning Post? Probably there might be considerable improvement at least in the reviewing department.

Now, Sir, we on our side are incessantly taunted by the Daily News and other of the "male-Suffragette" papers that we have no distinguished women on our side.

Consider for a moment, after all the fuss and sensation and incessant beating up of recruits, the calibre of the women who represented Literature:

Miss Beatrice Harraden—whose chef d'œuvre, "Ships that Pass in the Night," is not, I suppose, regarded, even by the Daily News, as precisely literature.

Then there are Mrs. Sarah Grand and Miss Evelyn Sharp. I need not comment on their names.

Then comes Miss Elizabeth Robins, with some faculty for writing and much more for acting.

Lastly comes—actually Miss Cicely Hamilton, the author of Diana of Dobson's, whose idea of humour is an allusion to corsets; her notion of wit, women in their undergarments; her idea of dramatic presentation, a woman combing out her back hair; yet the authoress of one of the most vulgar, common, and stupid plays—for there isn't a line above the level of the shopgirl's intellect and taste—and the crudity and childishness of such a presentation as a blushing sort of hobbledohoy "guardsman" are beyond words—it is significant that the group of dramatic critics were in ecstasy over what Punch rightly calls this "stuffy" art). As I say, the authoress of this is held up as a genius of the first order; and we who ask in vain, Where are Lady Richmond Ritchie, Mrs. Clifford, Mrs. Steel, Mrs. Molesworth?—and one could name scores of other women of real literary distinction—are told that all the intellect is on the other side!

May I in conclusion ask what on earth Vashti and all the other historic women have to do with the demand for Female Suffrage? If we can infer anything, it is surely that, with every opportunity, the real great women never did ask for political power, never wanted it, and achieved their greatness without it. We women against Woman's Suffrage are now invited to processions and demonstrations, and all the rest. I sincerely hope that every woman of sense and taste will resolutely set her face against this. Our part is quiet argument and the incessant influencing of every man of sense against their clamour, which means the neglect of numberless real duties and real privileges which only women can deal with. I am afraid I have too long trespassed on your space. As, strange to say, I do not want publicity, allow me to subscribe myself by that despised name

A WOMAN.

SUFFRAGITIS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—I have a suggestion and a guinea at the disposal of the Anti-Suffrage Association, when I can discover the whereabouts of their office. My guinea I will reserve, but my suggestion I will, with your permission, place at the disposal of the above Association. It is that the answers to the following questions be made as public as possible:

1. What is the number of unfortunates, according to the latest estimates, in London?

2. How many of this class would receive the franchise were women placed on a political equality with men?

3. Under the Lodgers' Acts is it a fact that this class of woman would be more fully represented in the Metropolis than any other?

4. Is there any constituency in London where it is sufficiently strong to elect a member with little or no outside influence?

I do not sign my name because I am frankly afraid of such a type of person as the Moloney or the younger Pankhurst.

BARRISTER-AT-LAW.

June 20, 1908.

[In reply to the first part of our correspondent's letter we can say that the Woman's National Anti-Suffrage Union has its headquarters at Wimborne House, Arlington Street. The Hon. Secretary is the Hon. Ivor Guest, M.P.—Ed.]

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Last Sunday morning, as the Chelsea and Battersea contingents of wishful women straggled through Oakley Street on their way to the park, an illuminating incident occurred which is worth recording as a woman's comment on the other side of the question. On the balcony of a house a family was assembled, consisting of the mother, dainty and winsome, the father, iron-grey, humorous, quiet, smoking a comfortable pipe, four of the bonniest, healthiest-looking girls imaginable, aged from seventeen down to ten or thereabout, and a charming little boy of about seven. Chattering and joking, with the mother seated in the middle and the father standing behind, they made as fine and happy a little English picture as could be desired while they waited for the procession to pass. Then, when the festive note of the hired drum and the snort of trombones sounded in the distance, the lady rose and exposed a large black fan, on the reverse side of which was boldly painted in white letters the prefix

"ANTI—";

she held it and showed it well during the passage of her weaker sisters below, smiling and nodding vivaciously as who should say, "I am content—why all this pother? Go you and do likewise." A neater and more telling observation on the flurry underneath could not have been devised, and one onlooker at least thought that the home-circle portrayed by that contented, jovial group of seven people represented strength and love and a sane outlook on life which in time of sorrow would prove an armoury far finer than flaunting banners or misused votes, to say nothing of the national or social aspect of the question.

A SHORT WAY WITH SOCIALISTS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I submit that the only way with Socialists is to ignore them. If their teaching is, as you say, neither popular nor convincing, it surely is better that the great Political Party—the Conservative, that is—should work out a constructive policy both convincing and intellectually sound, and so kill—not by suppression, à la Russe, but by sheer integrity of both conduct and argument. As the Socialists are both irreligious and the dupes of a wicked apriorism, let us leave them to their foolish philosophy, and re-convert its converts by our rational teaching and our sweetness and light.

"SAD HAPPY RACE"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The "Sad Happy Race" is an excellent essay, framed with most happy moderation and exact estimate, and the concluding extract from Cervantes is a veritable lesson in aptness for the quotation agonists of a certain chloros-coloured weekly paper; but concerning the matter of acting not being "in the highest of all senses an art"—credat Judæus! To the writer, Literature; to the musician, Music; to the painter, Painting should respectively seem the greatest art. To me (an actor) the least of the apostles that am not meet to be called an apostle, acting seems to be the greatest of all the arts. It is quite certain that all art, under whatever guise it shows itself, is neither more nor less than simplification, so said one of the greatest artists that ever lived, and the saying is akin to those other words, "Let your communication be Yea, yea! Nay, nay! for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil." Life sweeps through our time and space dimension into the Oblique with the phylactery firm-bound on the forehead, and whatever wrenches one word from that writing is art.

Mr. Machen says:

The actor never shows us a complete picture; he does a series of lightning sketches, each disappearing to give place to another, there is no total and simultaneous impression." But surely this is exactly what does constitute a complete picture—it could hardly have been put better; take any painting by a great impressionist—and all great painters are impressionists—what is it but a series of subtly-veiled ideas arriving and disappearing, impinging and recoiling and cumulatively sweeping on to the acronyc, if only in that Götter-Dämmerung, the word, which was in the beginning with God, and which was God, may be found. If this be not so, how is our estate more gracious than that of Messrs. Frith and Maclise?

Is there no complete picture in such works as Coquelin's Cyrano, Wyndham's Garrick, or Irving's Shylock? I saw these when I was many years younger than I am now, but the culminating "Mon Panache" of Cyrano is as clear in my mental vision now as the Divine dignity in Rembrandt's "Christ before Pilate," which I see a score of times every year, and they both mean precisely the same thing, and the actor bears the same relation to the author in this case as the painter to the Scripture. In one sense—a sense very difficult to define—the actor is entirely independent of the playwright, as the great painters are independent of anecdote. There are very few great actors to-day, the greatest art is dying out, along with the decay of our religious faith and belief, and this must be so until the Renaissance. The playwright of to-day more and more assumes the functions of the actor, and the actors are cut and shaped and squared much after the fashion of the pierced parchments of the pianola. When this is done well by our best authors and producers the effect is not always entirely unsatisfactory; there are most ingenious stops and pedals. But, good heavens! look at the results obtained by the second-rate producers—the imitators!

It will not remedy the state of affairs to take away from our actors the belief that real acting is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of all the arts. "The inhabitants of earth have many tongues, those of heaven but one." Undoubtedly the great actor does translate a few words of that one tongue; undoubtedly such translation is permanent. I grant that, by its very nature, the actor's work is transitory, so is a destructive lightning flash, so is a charge of cavalry; the result in each case is permanent enough.

A QUERY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Could you, through your columns, kindly inform me where is to be found a copy of the "Translations from the Servian Minstrelsy," privately printed by Mr. Lockhart in 1826, and reviewed in the Quarterly Review, January, 1827, p. 66?

58 Princes Square, London, W., June 20, 1908.

[We regret that we are unable to give the information required, but perhaps some of our readers may be able to. This reminds us that we, through an oversight, omitted to answer a question which was put to us by Mr. L. Gunnis. The answer is: there are no oil-paintings of Industry and Idleness. The original sketches from which the engravings were made are in the British Museum Print Rooms. They were acquired in 1896.—ED.]

UNCONSCIOUS PLAGIARISM?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—In the first book of Dryden's translation of "The Æneid" a line runs thus:

And the long glories of majestic Rome.

Tennyson, in "The Passing of Arthur," has:

And the long glories of the winter moon.

The same poet, in one of the songs in "The Princess," says:

Ask me no more:

No more, dear love, for at a touch I yield.

Mr. Watson, in his "Domine Quo Vadis," has:

Urge me no more, lest at a touch I fall.

Faber, in a sonnet entitled "On the Ramparts at Angoulême," writes:

The inverted minarets of poplar quake.

A sonnet in the last issue of THE ACADEMY has:

The inverted minarets of poplar shake.

Are these instances of unconscious plagiarism—if there is such a thing—or what?

G. B. F.

[These are instances not of plagiarism, but of sub-conscious memory, which all poets cannot but possess.—ED.]

OUR STATUS IN THE ART WORLD

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—John Bull is self-assertive enough in many things; but in others he is singularly modest and self-depreciatory, and in art matters he has never done justice to himself, nor has he received justice from others. I believe that we are a musical people; this is proved by our appreciation of the great Continental masters; but we have allowed ourselves to be dominated and overshadowed by them. So while our instrumentalists hold their own with any in the world, our composers have had their spontaneity checked by the overpowering influence of foreign composers, especially of the Germans. We have put the foreigner above our own musicians in every department; and we are only now seeing the merits of our orchestras and chorus-singers through the surprised appreciation of the foreigners—as the Germans "discovered" Shakespeare.

In the plastic and pictorial arts we have dared to be ourselves, and if we are not easily first, as I believe we are, we are assuredly in the front rank. At the last of the great international Expositions—the "Biggest Ever" at St. Louis—many of the best judges thought our collection the best. I knew that we should hold our own, but I was surprised to find ours better than I expected, while none of the others came up to my expectations. This set me comparing them, and after checking personal predilections I was compelled to the conclusion that for richness, variety, individuality, invention, and all-round artistry we were easily highest—that is, our average was the highest; we had more fine works and fewer bad ones than other nations. There were splendid works in nearly every other collection, to compare these would lead to endless dispute; we can only judge on broad general lines, and by purely artistic criteria.

We have enriched Art in so many ways—in the development of landscape in the hands of Turner, Constable, and others; in the development of painting in water-colours; in first seeing the incipient soul in animals; in enriching art with a more human feeling, more soul and sentiment, those dramatic and "literary" qualities at which fashion's fools still sneer. We have always shown more individuality than others, and it is time we claimed credit for our achievements. A French critic has said that there are only two distinctive schools of painting—the French and the British—the other Continental schools being variations of the French. Be this as it may, there is no doubt that France takes the lead on the Continent; so the splendid collections at the Franco-British affords a good opportunity to compare these two representative schools. In justice to the French it should be borne in mind that they are not so well represented as we are; but, on the other hand, our appreciation of our own work is dulled by familiarity. Comparisons of this kind will be the reverse of odious, and will greatly enhance the interest. M. Rodin said that London would become the metropolis of the art world; that prophecy is being rapidly fulfilled. Despite our Little Englander critics who have been so steadily defaming our art, I believe that the race which produced Shakespeare has won for itself a place in pictorial art as high as it has in poetry and the drama.

"IN AND AROUND THE ISLE OF PURBECK"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I point out some remarkable errors in the review of my book "In and Around the Isle of Purbeck" in THE ACADEMY for June 6th?

1. My critic says:

No effort has been made to give any original and accurate information as to the quarrying and early wide use of Purbeck marble.

I have given the "original and accurate" information that the much talked-of copy of the Charter of the Company of Marblers does not exist, and that the document hitherto supposed to be it is the copy of a charter granted by Charles II. to Ralph Bankes. I have stated and given proof that Purbeck stone was used by the Romans.

2. The "Forest" story—it was all under forest law in the time of King John—is almost wholly neglected.

I say, on p. 2, that the island was under forest laws under Saxon and Norman kings, and give the history of Purbeck when under these laws in chapter I, briefly, and in detail under the heads of the various manors, etc.

3. Blunders anent architectural accounts and dates. I consulted the standard books and the greatest living authority.

Also the book was half written before the pictures were painted, and I have known Purbeck for a good many years.

IDA WOODWARD.

[Our reviewer writes: I am well aware that the various early local records of the "Company of Marblers or Stone Cutters of the Isle of Purbeck" are supposed to have been burnt in a fire at Corfe Castle during the reign of Charles II., and that the copies of their statutes and rules of sixteenth-century date are still extant. Much of this information is all set forth by Miss Woodward, but it is all to be found at greater length in the well-known extended edition of Hutchins's "Dorsetshire," published in 1861 (Vol. I., pp. 682-8). By original and accurate information as to quarrying, etc., I chiefly referred to a considerable variety of material that could have been gleaned by any careful investigator from the Pipe Rolls, later Close Rolls, Exchequer Accounts, Assize Rolls, and many other sources at the Public Record Office. It is strange how much the exceedingly interesting study of the highly important carving and remarkably wide distribution of Purbeck stone or marble has been hitherto neglected. If properly followed up it would make an entertaining and valuable monograph. When this work came into my hands I hoped to find much hitherto unprinted information on this particular—knowing the abundance of it—but was quite disappointed. Miss Woodward will find a certain portion of this evidence briefly set forth in an article by Mr. C. H. Vellacott on Dorsetshire quarrying, in the recently-published second volume of the Victoria History of the county (pp. 331-344).

As to the very thin outline reference to the forestry of Purbeck, Miss Woodward may be referred to Dr. Cox's article on the forestry of the county in the same volume, where sources of information with which she seems to have had no acquaintance will be opened up to her.

As to my strictures on the nature of the architectural comments in the book under review, I had marked some ten passages for adverse criticism, and then came to the conclusion that it was not worth while to go into detail, and that a brief notice was all that the book demanded. I will now mention three points as samples. On p. 20, the tower of St. Mary's, Swanage, is named as the "oldest building in the island," and it is pronounced with emphasis to be Saxon. To a student of our early church architecture, I can only say that such a statement (though I know it has been made before in print) is amusingly impossible, and I think I can claim to have seen and studied as much Saxon architecture as any Englishman now living. Again, on p. 23, Gonalston Manor House is positively stated to be of tenth or eleventh century date, with a new wing added in the sixteenth century. This is simply and absurdly wrong. The merest tyro in old architecture, in examining this building, will realise that the oldest parts now standing are Edwardian. Contrariwise, Miss Woodward errs in the opposite direction with regard to the most highly interesting church of Studland. She does not make nearly enough of the extensive and absolutely indisputable remains of pre-Norman work; and dates the Norman work wrongly by at least half a century, in ascribing it to about the year 1100. In this she has clearly been led astray by a written very faulty account of the church that hangs, or hung, in the church porch. It would have been well if she had read the paper printed by the gentleman responsible for the wonderful restoration and reparation of this building. He is still living at Swanage, and his paper was printed in the proceedings of the Dorset Field Club.

For the sake of the reputation of THE ACADEMY as an encourager of fair and unhasty reviewing, I should be glad if the editor will allow me to say that I have reviewed topographical works in high-class reviews for very nearly forty years; that I have known Dorset, and particularly the Isle of Purbeck, for very many years—my first visit to the Isle being in the year of the Prince Consort's death; and that I have quite recently revived my recollections of the Isle, by a careful visit to every church and old manor-house within its limits.]

"A HALF-HOGGER"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I trust I am not so foolish as to complain of a review, and if those who conduct THE ACADEMY are satisfied with the sort of criticism which marks your notice of my book, "The Shakespeare Problem Restated," it certainly is not for me to object. In common fairness, however, I must ask you to allow me to correct a few inaccuracies.

1. It is not true that I "taunt a well-known opponent with his Semitic origin," either "twice" or at all. I have many friends who may be described, in the words of your reviewer, as of "Semitic origin," and I have no racial prejudices. On the contrary, I should as soon think of reproaching a man for being born a Jew as I should think of reproaching him for being born a Christian—or for being born at all, for the matter of that. I challenge your reviewer either to make good his assertion or to withdraw it.

2. It is not true that I am "a hard-shell Baconian." As a simple matter of fact I am not a "Baconian" at all. I am entirely agnostic on that vexed question. I state this in my Preface, and

I had hitherto supposed that a writer is to be credited with a regard for truth until the contrary be proved.

3. It is not true that I attempt to prove, as your reviewer suggests, that Shakspeare "never went to school at all." On the contrary, it is part of my case that he did.

4. It is not true that I "sneer at Downes." On the contrary. I merely explain a note by Mr. Nichol Smith by quoting what Downes really said. Your reviewer, surely, does not think that there is "nothing impossible" in the supposition that Betterton was coached by Shakspeare!

I may add—5. The suggestion that Shakspeare took "a leading part in the management and conduct of two theatres" is part of a quotation which I give from Lord Penzance's book. Lord Penzance bases his statement on passages cited by him from Charles Knight's biography. The expression "a leading part" may be too strong. I am not concerned to defend its strict accuracy. The "two theatres" were the Globe and the Blackfriars, in each of which Shakspeare had shares (see Lee's "Life," Library Edition, p. 214).

6. As to Ward's statement that Shakspeare "supplied the stage with two plays every year," I actually quote it but six lines above the words cited from my book by your reviewer. I should indeed be sorry to omit that statement.

I lay special stress on No. 1 supra.

G. G. GREENWOOD.

House of Commons, June 22, 1908.

[Our reviewer replies: I will take Mr. Greenwood's points in order.

1. On p. 10, note 1, Mr. Greenwood writes as follows:—

"For the benefit of the puzzled investigator (and such, at first, was I) it may be mentioned that he [there is no need to mention the name, your readers will find it in Mr. Greenwood's book] there [i.e., in the "Oxford Calendar" of 1880] appears under a slightly different form of appellation to [sic] that by which he is now familiar to us, not having at that date discarded two Biblical praenomina in order to assume the more Saxon name of ——. I cannot help thinking, by the way, that Mr. — might be rather more tolerant of those who imagine that some great man in Elizabethan times might have seen advantages in the assumption of a pseudonym."

The sneer in that is surely unmistakable. But worse follows. Throughout his book Mr. Greenwood makes jest and diverting fun with the "doubtless," which is a favourite word of the author in question. On p. 499 he writes: "doubtless ('I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word!')." If that was not intended for a sneer, Mr. Greenwood must be (what I have no reason to suppose from reading his book) merely tactless and stupid.

2. I refer your readers to the index, svv. "Bacon," "Baconiana," "Baconian," etc. The pages to which references are there made will be sufficient to prove to them that Mr. Greenwood is at heart a hard-shell Baconian. All the more credit to him for so carefully leaving that issue open in his book.

3. I did not even suggest that Mr. Greenwood "attempted to prove that Shakspeare never went to school." I suggested that tradition puts him at the Grammar-school, and that it is for the anti-Shakesperians to prove that he did not enjoy for a few years such education as was to be had there. Mr. Greenwood has either misread or misinterpreted my parenthesis.

4. On p. 215 (footnote) Mr. Greenwood writes: "There is a similar story as to Betterton playing King Henry VIII. Betterton was said to have been instructed by Sir William [D'Avenant], who was instructed by Lowen, who was instructed by Shakspeare!" Why the note of exclamation? There is nothing impossible or absurd in the story. I made no reference to Mr. Nichol Smith's blunder.

5. I ought to have made it clear that Mr. Greenwood was quoting Lord Penzance. The slip makes no difference to the argument. I regret that I have no trustworthy book handy from which I can verify the date at which the King's company first occupied the Blackfriars playhouse. It was not, I believe (though I speak under correction), before 1608, at which time Shakespeare had already displayed in his works most of his knowledge of the law. Before that date the Blackfriars was leased to the manager of the Chapel Children, and Shakespeare can have had little or nothing to occupy his time in connection with it.

6. Exactly. On p. 207 Mr. Greenwood quotes Ward in full, but a few lines lower down, in summing up the information, he omits all reference to the play-writing. The "local gossip" included that most important detail.]

"BRITISH" AND IRELAND

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A correspondent in your columns revives the old idea, to which Mr. Frederic Harrison has lent the weight of his authority, that "British" is inapplicable to Ireland. Is it not the case that mediæval geography recognised two Britains—the larger, England with Scotland, and the smaller, Ierne, Ireland? Our King's title was not "Britanniae Rex," but "Britanniarum Rex." Magna Britannia refers to physical size, and implies Britannia Minor—viz., Ireland. If this is correct, the word "British" belongs equally to both islands, and Americans are justified in giving the name "Britisher" (ugly, but appropriate) to natives of both. If any one has cause to complain, it is John Bull, whose supposed exclusively "English" ancestry disappears under the more ancient race-name.

T. S. O.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Surely your correspondent in last week's ACADEMY is wrong in arguing that the term "British" can be applied properly only to the inhabitants of Great Britain. On referring to the New English Dictionary I find "Brettania=Great Britain in its most extended sense, comprising Albion (England and Scotland), and Hibernia, or Ibernia (Ireland)."

Aristotle, the earliest writer to mention the British Isles by name, says:—"Beyond the pillars of Hercules the Ocean flows round the earth, and in it are two very large islands called British, Albion and Ierne, lying beyond the Keltai." The application of the name Britannia to denote the larger island is first found in Cæsar.

So much for the name, but, so far as race is concerned, probably Englishmen are less British than either the Welsh, Scotch, or Irish. Still, I believe they are proud to be included in the relationship.

"WANTED—A DINNER"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It was with great interest I read the letter signed "A Dweller with Mesech," and I am writing to earnestly second his suggestion in the spirit at least, if not in the letter, since it seems to me that a dinner is not at all what is wanted. Surely the very word would attract the wrong sort of people—those who do not ask for "a feast of reason and a flow of soul." Yet a gathering of some among the few who are interested in literature and poetry, with their kindred arts, might surely be arranged, and he who would bring it about would perform an act of real charity. There are many in this great London of ours who see "the light that never was on sea or land," as your correspondent aptly quotes, and who are forced to fight their battles and dream their dreams alone, because they know none who are able to share them, because they are overwhelmed by the hordes of the Philistines who compass us around.

THE CITY OF THE SOUL

By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS

This volume was issued anonymously in May, 1899. The first edition of 500 was exhausted within a few months of publication, and a second edition of 500 was issued in December, 1899.

Owing to the failure of the Publisher the book has been unobtainable for several years. Of the second edition only a few copies now remain. They are offered for sale at the original published price, 5s. net, by Messrs, BICKERS & SON, LEICESTER SQUARE, LONDON, from whom alone they can be obtained.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS

THE LATE MR. LIONEL JOHNSON IN THE "OUTLOOK," IN AN ARTICLE ENTITLED "A GREAT UNKNOWN."

"The title of these arresting poems is taken from that of an opening set of four sonnets, and it well describes and defines the writer's poetical attitude. . . . Here is not the impeccable dulness of an accomplished imitator, of the soulless craftsman who has caught some master's style; behind or within these poems is a personality. The pieces which will probably win most admirers are three ballads. . . . Youth in its white, fresh grace, its wistfulness and joyousness, wonder and simplicity, sings and sighs in these ballads, of which one is a legend, one historical, and the third a beautiful invention. . . . But possibly finer than these fine fantasies are the more personal, or at least more intimately conceived and meditative poems. . . . Let the reader turn to 'Rejected,' a mystical lyric worthy of Blake, and impossible to describe otherwise; if he has any sense of poetry he will feel and confess that we have here an authentic poet. Among crowds of clever versifiers here comes a poet."

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

"Delicate imagination and sense of words are not the only qualities that entitle 'The City of the Soul' to peculiar distinction. The writer adds to these a technical judgment no less completely at home with the ballad than with the lyrical or sonnet form. As a criticism of verse, this would be exhaustive praise. But these pieces contain just that element of passion which transforms skilful verse into fine poetry. . . . The ballad soliloquy 'Perkin Warbeck' is extraordinarily good. . . . Among the rest of the poems are two translations from 'Les Fleurs du Mai.' In daintiness of expression, often married to exotic sentiment, the translator himself has no slight affinity with Baudelaire. The book is full of things which tempt one to linger."

THE STANDARD

"The verses have a character of their own, and are at times quite exquisite in point of workmanship. . . . this accomplished and skilful hand."

THE TIMES

"He is by turns æsthetic and introspective, and is at his best in his ballads, especially the ballad of 'St. Vitus,' almost every stanza of which is a Pre-Raphaelite picture."

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH

"These are the verses of a poet. The volume is small, but it would be most unjust to call it the production of a minor bard. . . . It is a work of a remarkably high order. The author has achieved great distinction in his sonnets. . . . Indeed, all through the book one comes upon lines which are astonishing in their beauty and their distinction. . . . a poet who proves himself capable of the very highest work. There can be no doubt as to the fate of these poems."

"A PARISIAN" IN THE "ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE"

"These poems, 'The City of the Soul,' by an anonymous author, were known in part to the Parisian public before they were printed in England, for some of the best among them—and the volume, it seems to me, is a treasure-house of gems—first appeared in the 'Revue Blanche,' with the accompaniment of a French translation. That is some three years ago, and the great masters of French poetry, chief among them the late Stephen Mallarmé, were not slow to applaud."

"The remarkable success which I hear the book has since had in England does credit I think, to the judgment of our French critics, which is often singularly just in its estimate of English poetry, especially if it belongs to the Elizabethan period of our literature or be animated by the Elizabethan 'soufflé' . . . and surely it is this 'soufflé,' a pure invigorating wind from heaven which blows and whispers and weeps in this new poet's verses. . . . The two translations from Baudelaire are as perfect in form and in the repetition of the frisson of the original verse as Baudelaire's own translations from Poe and Longfellow. It is a pleasure to find so complete, so temperamental a sympathy between a great French and great English poet."

THE LATE MR. FRANCIS THOMPSON IN "THE ACADEMY"

"He has a rich sense of language, a true gift of mellifluous versification. Few poems are without cunning and iridescent diction; and all have a rich, youthful passion for beauty which is in itself an inspiration. . . . No poem at once complete and brief enough for quotation will exhibit altogether the glow of his diction, the luxuriance of his fancy, and the melodious quality of his verse."

MR. GEORGE STREET IN THE "PALL-MALL MAGAZINE"

"In my case, I reckon but very few of the contemporary writers of verse known to me as poets—how few I should hardly like to say. Among them I place without hesitation the anonymous author of the 'City of the Soul.' . . . This inspiration I take to be first of all the beauty of visible things freshly impressive on the senses. It is as though a child said 'Look, how beautiful!' but a child able to see minutely and variously. . . . and the power to see beautiful things and to express them beautifully is so rare, that one is justified [taking my view of it] in thinking the appearance of this little book a most fortunate event."

THE SCOTSMAN

"This is a book of anonymous poetry of a rare distinction. . . . This is a verse of the proud kind that scorns a vulgar appreciation, and looks for the approbation of connoisseurs. . . . In all these the feeling is always wrought to a high pitch of intensity, yet cautiously and solemnly, without weakness of hysterics."

Daily Graphic.—"A sound piece of historical work, scholarly yet popularly written. . . . The translation and the general get-up of the book, with its numerous illustrations, are excellent."

THE SHAKESPEARE PROBLEM RESTATED

By GEORGE GREENWOOD, M.P. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

*. Scholars admit that a large portion of the dramas contained in the First Folio of 1623 did not emanate from the pen of Shakespeare. Was the author of these plays really William Shakespeare, "the Stratford rustic," or did the name conceal the identity of some "spirit of a different sort"? In the present work the author restates the arguments for the negative case—viz., that the Stratford player was not the real Shakespeare.

LIFE OF SIR HALLIDAY MACARTNEY,

Commander of Li Hung Chang's Trained Force in the Taiping Rebellion, Founder of the first Chinese Arsenal, Secretary to the first Chinese Embassy to Europe, Secretary and Counsellor to the Chinese Legation in London for thirty years. By DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER, Author of the "History of China," the "Life of Gordon," etc. With Illustrations, demy 8vo, 24s. net.

Daily Telegraph.—"The life-story of a remarkable man . . . a solid and serviceable piece of work."

THE PATH TO PARIS

The Record of a Riverside Journey from Le Havre to Paris. By FRANK RUTTER. With 62 Illustrations by Hanslip Fletcher. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

FRENCH NOVELISTS OF TO-DAY

Essays Biographical, Descriptive, and Critical. By WINIFRED STEPHENS. With Portraits and Bibliographies, crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Nation.—"A clear and judicious treatment of her theme. The English reader who requires a guide to contemporary French fiction can find nothing better."

THE PEACOCK'S PLEASANCE

By E. V. B. Uniform with "Seven Gardens and a Palace." Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Times.—"The writer has much to say about gardens, and scarcely ever does she lose her hold on our interest; she is lavish of all sorts of mysterious facts and pretty hearsays about plants. The book might be called a drama of the garden."

HOLLY, YEW, AND BOX

THE RE-BIRTH OF RELIGION

By Dr. A. S. CRAPSEY. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Christian Life.—"A bold book, full of teaching, life, and thought."

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

A MAN OF GENIUS

By M. P. WILLCOCKS, Author of "The Wingless Victory."

Punch.—"There is no excuse for not reading 'A Man of Genius,' and making a short stay in the 'Seventh Devon of Delight.' There must always be a welcome for a book by Miss Willcocks. It is very fine on the psychological side, but, if anything, it is even finer Devonshire."

Literary World.—"Miss Willcocks shows the wit of Barrie in close alliance with the bold realism of Thomas Hardy and the philosophical touches of George Meredith."

Daily Telegraph.—"Widdicombe" was good and "The Wingless Victory" was perhaps better, but in 'A Man of Genius' the author has given us something that should assure her place in the front rank of our living novelists. It should be one of the most popular novels of the year."

THE CHILD OF CHANCE. By Maxime Formont

Outlook.—"Not a mere exploitation of sexuality, but a considered exposition of a subject which thinking people take seriously."

Standard.—"Convincing and virile."

ABSOLUTION. By Clara Viebig

Pall Mall Gazette.—"The author's realism achieves its purpose."

Athenaeum.—"Frau Viebig presents a slice of life carved from the history of a Polish farmstead. The book . . . is sincere. Frau Viebig's story may be warmly recommended."

A MISTAKEN MARRIAGE. By F. E. Mills Young

THE DOOR OF DARKNESS

By MAUDE ANNESLEY, Author of "The Wine of Life."

Pall Mall Gazette.—"An enthralling story, powerfully imagined, and distinguished for artistry of no mean order."

THE BISHOP'S SCAPEGOAT

By T. B. CLEGG, Author of "The Love Child" and "The Wilderness."

Standard.—"Mr. Thomas Bailey Clegg has only published three books . . . but each one has been singularly powerful and impressive, and each one has attracted an unusual amount of praise and attention."

ASHES: a Sardinian Story

By GRAZIA DELEDDA.

Scotsman.—"An exquisitely touching picture, invested with an atmosphere peculiarly Italian."

LADY JULIA'S EMERALD

By HELEN HESTER COLVILL.

Manchester Guardian.—"A thoroughly amusing story."

ANATOLE FRANCE IN AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION

IT has long been a reproach to England that only one volume by ANATOLE FRANCE has been adequately rendered into English; yet outside this country he shares the distinction with TOLSTOI of being the greatest and most daring student of humanity now living.

THERE have been many difficulties to encounter in completing arrangements for a uniform edition, though perhaps the chief barrier to publication here has been the fact that his writings are not for babes—but for men and the mothers of men. Indeed, some of his Eastern romances are written with Biblical candour. "I have sought Truth strenuously," he tells us, "I have met her boldly. I have never turned from her, even when she wore an unexpected aspect." Still, it is believed that the day has come for giving English versions of all his imaginative works, and of his monumental study JOAN OF ARC, which is undoubtedly the most discussed book in the world of letters to-day.

MR. JOHN LANE has pleasure in announcing an English edition of the works of M. ANATOLE FRANCE, under the general editorship of Mr. FREDERIC CHAPMAN, commencing with the following Volumes:

1. THE RED LILY

A Translation by WINIFRED STEPHENS.

FIRST REVIEW.

Observer.—" . . . Anatole France is perhaps . . . the greatest of all living prose-writers. . . . One of the most charming stories of modern times; full of life, pregnant with rich thought, throbbing with a fine soul. 'The Red Lily' is a masterpiece."

2. MOTHER OF PEARL

A Translation by the EDITOR. [Just out.]

3. THE GARDEN OF EPICURUS

A Translation by ALFRED ALLINSON.

[July 8th.]

4. THE CRIME OF SYLVESTRE

BONNARD

A Translation by LAFCADIO HEARN.

[July.]

DURING the autumn and next year will appear the remaining Volumes, including JOAN OF ARC. All the books will be published, demy 8vo, at six shillings each, with the exception of JOAN OF ARC. The translation has been entrusted to such competent French scholars as Mr. ALFRED ALLINSON, Hon. MAURICE BARING, Mr. FREDERIC CHAPMAN, Mr. ROBERT B. DOUGLAS, Mr. A. W. EVANS, Mrs. FARLEY, Mrs. JOHN LANE, Mrs. NEWMARCH, Mr. C. E. ROCHE, Miss WINIFRED STEPHENS, and Miss M. P. WILCOCKS.
